TO THE HIGH AND MIGHTY MONARCH OVR DEARE AND DREAD SOVERAIGNE LORD, IAMES, BY THE good prouidence of God, King of Great BRITAINE, FRANCE and IRELAND; the most worthy, and most able Defender of the Faith, and most gracious Patron of the Church; All Peace and Happinesse.

Most gracious Soueraigne:

I Cannot so ouer-loue this issue of my owne braine, as to hold it worthy of your Maiesties iudicious eyes; much lesse of the highest Patronage vnder Heauen: Yet now, my very duty hath bidden mee looke so high; & tels me it would be no lesse then iniurious, if I should not lay down my work, where I owe my seruice; and that I should offend, if I presumed not. Besides; whither should the riuers runne, but into the Sea? It is to your Maiesty (vnder the Highest) that wee owe both these sweete opportunities of good, and all the good fruites of these happy opportunities: If we should not therefor freely offer to your Maiestie some præmetiall handfulls of that croppe, whereof you may challenge the whole harueſt, how could wee bee but shamelesly vnthankfull? I cannot praise my Present otherwise, then by the truth of that heart from which it proceedeth: Onely this I may say; that seldome any man hath offered to your Royall hands a greater bundle of his owne thoughts (Some whereof, whereof, as it must needs fall out amongst so many, haue beene confessed profitable) nor perhaps more varietie of discourse: for here shall your Maiestie finde Moralitie, like a good handmaid, waiting on Diuinity; and Diuinity, like some great Lady, euery day in seuerall dresses; Speculation interchanged with experience; Positiue Theologie with Polemicall; Textuall with discursorie; Popular with Scholasticall.

I cannot dissemble my ioy to haue done this little good: And if it be the comfort, and honour of your vnworthy seruant, that the God of Heauen hath vouchsafed to vse his hand in the least seruice of his Church; How can it bee but your Crowne and reioycing, that the same God hath set apart your Maiesty, as a glorious instrument of such an vniuersall good to the whole Christian World? It was a madde conceit of that old Heresiarch, which might iustly take his name from madnes; That an huge Giant beares vp the earth with his shoulder; which he changes euery thirtieth yeere, for ease; and with the remouall causes an Earthquake. If by the deuice hee had meant onely an Embleme of Kings (as our ancient Mythologists vnder their Saint George, and Christopher, haue described the Christian Souldier, and good Pastor) he had not done amisse; for surely, the burthen of the whole world lies on the shoulders of Soueraigne authoritie; and it is no maruell if the Earth quake in the change. As Kings are to the World, so are good Kings to the Church: None can be so blinde, or enuious, as not to grant, that the whole Church of God vpon earth, rests her selfe principally (next to her stay aboue) vpon your Maiesties Royall supportation; You may truly say with Dauid, Ego sustineo columnas eius. What wonder is it then, if our tongues and pens blesse you; if we be ambitious of all occasions, that may testifie our cheerefull gratulations of this happinesse to your Highnesse, & ours in you? Which, our humble prayers vnto him, by whom Kings reigne, shall labour to continue, till both the Earth and Heauens be truly changed.

The vnworthiest of your Maiesties seruants,

Ios: Hall.

TO THE RIGHT WORSHIPFVLL, SIR ROBERT DRVRY, KNIGHT, ALL INCREASE OF TRVE HONOVR AND VERTVE.

SIR, that I haue made these my homely Aphorismes publike, needs no other reason, but that though the world is furnished with other writings, euen to satiety and surfet, yet of those which reduce Christianitie to practice, there is (at least) scarce enough: wherein (yet) I must needs confesse, I had some eye to my selfe, For, hauing after a sort vowed this austere course of iudgement & practice to my selfe, I thought it best to acquaint the world with it, that it may either witnesse my answerable proceeding, or checke me in my straying there-from. By which meanes, so many men as I liue amongst, so many monitors I shall haue, which shall poynt mee to my owne rules, and vpbraid mee with my aberrations. Why I haue dedicated them to your name, cannot be strange to any, that knowes you my Patron, and mee your Pastor. The regard of which bond, easily drew mee on to consider, that whereas my body, which was euer weake, began of late to languish more, it would not be inexpedient (at the worst) to leaue behinde mee this little monument of that great respect which I deseruedly beare beare you. And if it shall please God to reprieue me, vntill a longer day; yet it shall not repent me, to haue sent this vnworthy scrowle, to wait vpon you in your necessary absence; neither shall it be, I hope, bootlesse for you, to adioyne these my meane speculations vnto those grounds of vertue you haue so happily laid: to which if they shall adde but one scruple, it shall be to mee sufficient ioy, contentment, recompence. From your Hal-sted. Decemb. 4. 1622.

Your VVorships humbly deuouted,

IOS: HALL.

THE FIRST CENTVRIE OF MEDITATIONS AND VOWES,

DIVINE and MORALL.

1

IN Meditation, thoſe, which begin heauenly thoughts, and proſecute them not, are like thoſe which kindle a fire vnder greene wood, and leaue it, ſo ſoone as it but begins to flame; leeſing the hope of a good beginning, for want of ſeconding it with a ſutable proceeding: when I ſet my ſelfe to meditate, I will not giue ouer, till I come to an iſſue. It hath beene ſaid by ſome, that the beginning is as much as the middeſt; yea, more than all: but I ſay, the ending is more than the beginning.

There is nothing (but Man) that reſpecteth greatneſſe: Not God; not death; not Iudgement. Not God: he is no accepter of perſons. Not nature: we ſee the ſonnes of Princes borne as naked as the pooreſt: and the poore child as faire, well-fauoured, ſtrong, witty, as the heire of Nobles. Not diſeaſe, death, iudgement: they ſicken alike, die alike, fare alike after death. There is nothing (beſides naturall men) of whom goodneſſe is not reſpected. I will honour greatneſſe in others: but for my ſelfe, I will eſteeme a dram of goodneſſe, worth a whole world of greatneſſe.

As there is a fooliſh wiſdome, ſo there is a wiſe ignorance; in not prying into Gods Arke; not enquiring into things not reuealed. I would faine know all that I need, and all that I may: I leaue Gods ſecrets to himſelfe. It is happy for me, that God makes me of his Court, though not of his Counſell.

As there is no vacuity in nature, no more is there ſpiritually. Euery veſſell is full; if not of liquor, yet of aire: ſo is the heart of man; though (by nature) it is empty of grace, yet it is full of hypocriſie, and iniquitie. Now, as it is filled with grace, ſo it is empty of his euill qualities; as in a veſſell, ſo much water as goes in, ſo much ayre goes out: but mans heart is a narrow-mouthed veſſell, and receiues grace but by drops; and therefore takes a long time to empty and fill. Now, as there be differences in degrees, and one heart is neerer to fulneſſe than another: ſo the beſt veſſell is not quite full, while it is in the body; becauſe there are ſtill remainders of corruption. I will neither be content with that measure of grace I haue, nor impatient of Gods delay; but euery day I will endeuour to haue one drop added to the rest: so my last day shall fill vp my vessell to the brim.

BIRMINGHAM REFERENCE LIBRARY

5

Satan would seeme to bee mannerly and reasonable: making, as if hee would bee content with one halfe of the heart, whereas God challengeth all or none: as (indeed) hee hath most reason to claime all, that made all. But this is nothing but a craftie fetch of Satan; for he knowes, that if hee haue any part, God will haue none: so, the whole falleth to his share alone. My heart (when it is both whole, and at the best) is but a strait and vnworthy lodging for God: if it were bigger and better, I would reserue it all for him. Satan may looke in at my doores by a temtation: but hee shall not haue so much as one chamber-roome set apart for him to soiourne in.

I see that in naturall motions, the neerer any thing comes to his end, the swifter it moueth. I haue seene great riuers, which at their first rising out of some hills side, might bee couered with a bushell; which, after many miles, fill a very broad channell; and drawing neere to the Sea, doe euen make a little Sea in their owne bankes: So the winde at the first rising, as a little vapour from the crannies of the earth, and passing forward about the earth, the further it goes, the more blustering and violent it waxeth. A Christians motion (after hee is regenerate) is made naturall to God-ward: and therefore, the neerer he comes to heauen, the more zealous he is. A good man must not bee like Ezekias Sunne, that went backward; nor like Ioshuahs Sunne, that stood still; but Dauids Sunne, that (like a Bridegroome) comes out of his chamber, and as a Champion reioiceth to runne his race: onely herein is the difference, that when hee comes to his high noone, hee declineth not. How euer therefore, the minde (in her naturall faculties) followes the temperature of the body, yet in these supernaturall things she quite crosses it. For with the coldest complexion of age, is ioined in those that are truly religious, the feruentest zeale and affection to good things: which is therefore the more reuerenced, and better acknowledged, because it cannot bee ascribed to the hot spirits of youth. The Deuill himselfe deuised that old slander of early holinesse; A young Saint, an old Deuill. Sometimes young Deuils haue proued old Saints; neuer the contrarie: but true Saints in youth, doe alwaies proue Angels in their age. I will striue to bee euer good; but if I should not finde my selfe best at last, I should feare I was neuer good at all.

Consent harteneth sinne; which a little dislike would haue daunted at first. As wee say, There would bee no theeues, if no receiuers: so would there not bee so many open mouthes to detract and slander, if there were not so many open eares to entertaine them. If I cannot stop another mans mouth from speaking ill, I will either open my mouth to reproue it, or else I will stop mine eares from hearing it; and let him see in my face, that he hath no roome in my heart.

I haue oft wondered how fishes can retaine their fresh taste, and yet liue in salt waters; since I see that euery other thing participates of the nature of the place wherein it abides. So, the waters passing thorow the chanels of the earth, varie their sauour with the veines of soile, thorow which they slide. So, brute creatures, transported from one region to another, alter their former qualitie, and degenerate by little and little. The like danger I haue seene in the manners of men, conuersing with euill companions in corrupt places: For, besides that, it blemisheth our reputation, and makes vs thought ill, though wee bee good; it breeds in vs an insensible declination to ill; and workes in vs, vs, if not an approbation, yet a leſſe diſlike of thoſe ſinnes, to which, our eares and eies are ſo continually inured. I may haue a bad acquaintance: I will neuer haue a wicked companion.

Expectation, in a weake minde, makes an euill, greater; and a good, leſſe: but in a reſolued minde, it digeſts an euill, before it come: and makes a future good, long before preſent. I will expect the worſt, becauſe it may come; the beſt, becauſe I know it will come.

10

Some promiſe what they cannot doe, as Satan to Chriſt; ſome, what they could, but meane not to doe, as the ſons of Iacob to the Sechemites; ſome, what they meant for the time, and after, retrait, as Laban to Iacob; ſome, what they doe alſo giue, but vnwillingly, as Herod; ſome, what they willingly giue, and after repent them, as Ioſhua to the Gibeonites: So great diſtruſt is there in man, whether from his impotence, or faithleſneſſe. As in other things, ſo in this, I ſee God is not like man: but in what euer he promiſes, he approues himſelfe moſt faithfull, both in his ability and performances. I will therefore euer truſt God on his bare word; euen with hope, beſides hope, aboue hope, againſt hope; and onwards I will relie on him for ſmall matters of this life: for how ſhall I hope to truſt him in impoſſibilities, if I may not in likelihoods? How ſhall I depend on him for raiſing my body from duſt, and ſauing my ſoule; if I miſtruſt him for a cruſt of bread, towards my preſeruation?

11

If the World would make me his Minion, he could giue me but what he hath. And what hath he to giue? but a ſmoke of honour, a ſhadow of riches, a ſound of pleaſures, a blaſt of fame; which when I haue had in the beſt meaſure, I may be worſe, I cannot bee better: I can liue no whit longer, no whit merrier, no whit happier. If hee profeſſe to hate me, what can he doe, but diſgrace me in my name, impouerith mee in my eſtate, afflict me in my body? in all which, it is eaſie, not to be euer the more miſerable. I haue beene too long beguiled with the vaine ſemblances of it: Now henceforth, accounting my ſelfe borne to a better world, I will in an holy loftineſſe beare my ſelfe as one too good to be enamoured of the beſt pleaſures, to be daunted with the greateſt miſeries of this life.

12

I ſee there is no man ſo happy as to haue all things; and no man ſo miſerable, as not to haue ſome. Why ſhould I looke for a better condition than all others? If I haue ſomewhat, and that of the beſt things; I will in thankfulneſſe enioy them, and want the reſt with contentment.

13

Conſtraint makes an eaſie thing toilſome; whereas againe, loue makes the greateſt toile pleaſant. How many miles doe we ride and runne, to ſee one ſilly beaſt follow another, with pleaſure! which if we were commanded to meaſure, vpon the charge of a Superiour, we ſhould complaine of wearineſſe. I ſee the folly of the moſt men, that make their liues miſerable, and their actions tedious, for want of loue to that they muſt doe: I will firſt labour to ſettle in my heart a good affection to heauenly things: ſo Lord, thy yoke ſhall be eaſie, and thy burthen light.

14

I am a ſtranger euen at home: therefore if the dogs of the world barke at me, I neither care nor wonder.

15

It is the greateſt madneſſe in the world, to bee an hypocrite in religious profeſſion. Men hate thee, becauſe thou art a Chriſtian, ſo much as in appearance. God hates thee double, becauſe thou art but in appearance: ſo, while thou haſt the hatred of both, thou haſt no comfort in thy ſelfe. Yet if thou wilt not be good as thou ſeemeſt; I hold it better to ſeeme ill as thou art. An open wicked man doth much hurt with notorious ſinnes; but an hypocrite doth at laſt more ſhame goodneſſe, by ſeeming good. I had rather be an open wicked man, than an hypocrite: but I had rather be no man, than either of them.

16

When I caſt downe mine eyes vpon my wants, vpon my ſinnes, vpon my miſeries; me thinkes no man ſhould be worſe, no man ſo ill as I; my meanes ſo many, ſo forcible, and almoſt violent, my progreſſe ſo ſmall, and inſenſible; my corruptions ſo ſtrong, my infirmities ſo frequent and remedileſſe; my body ſo vnanſwerable to my minde. But when I looke vp to the bleſſings that God hath enriched me withall, me thinkes I ſhould ſoone be induced to thinke none more happy than my ſelfe: God is my friend, and my father: the world not my maſter, but my ſlaue: I haue friends not many, but ſo tried that I dare truſt them: an eſtate not ſuperfluous, not needy; yet neerer to defect, than abundance: A calling, if deſpiſed of men, yet honourable with God: a body not ſo ſtrong, as to admit ſecurity, (but often checking me in occaſion of pleaſure) nor yet ſo weake, as to afflict me continually: A minde not ſo furniſhed with knowledge, that I may boaſt of it; nor yet ſo naked, that I ſhould deſpaire of obtaining it: My miſeries affoord me ioy, mine enemies aduantage; my account is caſt vp for another world. And if thou thinke I haue ſaid too much good of my ſelfe, either I am thus, or I would be.

17

The worldlings life is (of all other) moſt diſcomfortable: For, that which is his God, doth not alway fauour him: that which ſhould be, neuer.

18

There are three meſſengers of death; Caſualty, Sickneſſe, Age. The two firſt are doubtfull; ſince many haue recouered them both: the laſt is certaine. The two firſt are ſudden: the laſt leaſurely and deliberate. As for all men, vpon ſo many ſummons, ſo eſpecially for an old man, it is a ſhame to be vnprepared for death: for where other ſee they may die, hee ſees he muſt die. I was long agone old enough to die: but if I liue till age, I will thinke my ſelfe too old to liue longer.

19

I will not care what I haue; whether much, or little. If little, my account ſhall bee leſſe; if more, I ſhall doe the more good, and receiue the more glory.

20

I care not for any companion, but ſuch as may teach me ſomewhat; or learne ſomewhat of me. Both theſe ſhall much pleaſure me; (one as an Agent, the other as a Subiect to worke vpon) neither know I, whether more. For though it be an excellent thing to learne; yet I learne, but to teach others.

If earth (that is prouided for mortality, and is poſſeſſed by the Makers enemies) haue ſo much pleaſure in it, that Worldlings thinke it worth the account of their heauen: ſuch a Sunne to enlighten it, ſuch an heauen to wall it about, ſuch ſweet fruits and flowers flowers to adorne it, such varietie of creatures, for the commodious vse of it: What must heauen needs bee, that is prouided for God himselfe, and his friends? How can it bee lesse in worth, than God is aboue his creatures, and Gods friends better than his enemies? I will not onely be content, but desirous to be dissolued.

It is commonly seene, that boldnesse puts men forth before their time, before their abilitie. Wherein we haue seene many, that (like Lapwings, and Partridges) haue runne away with some part of their shell on their heads: whence it followes, that as they began boldly, so they proceed vnprofitably, and conclude not without shame. I would rather be haled by force of others to great duties, than rush vpon them vnbidden. It were better a man should want worke, than that great workes should want a man answerable to their weight.

23

I will vse my friend as Moses did his rod: While it was a rod hee held it familiarly in his hand: when once a Serpent, he ran away from it.

24

I haue seldome seene much ostentation, and much learning met together. The Sunne, rising, and declining, makes long shadowes; at mid-day when hee is at highest, none at all. Besides that, skill when it is too much showne, loseth the grace: as fresh-coloured wares, if they be often opened, lose their brightnesse, and are soiled with much handling, I had rather applaud my selfe for hauing much, that I shew not; than that others should applaud me for shewing more than I haue.

25

An ambitious man is the greatest enemie to himselfe, of any in the world besides: for he still torments himselfe with hopes, and desires, and cares: which he might auoid, if hee would remit of the height of his thoughts, and liue quietly. My onely ambition shall be, to rest in Gods fauour on earth, and to be a Saint in heauen.

26

There was neuer good thing easily come by. The Heathen man could say, God sels knowledge for sweat; and so hee doth honour for ieopardy. Neuer any man hath got either wealth or learning with ease. Therefore the greatest good must needs bee most difficult. How shall I hope to get Christ, if I take no paines for him? And if in all other things the difficultie of obtaining, whets the minde so much the more to seeke; why should it in this alone daunt mee? I will not care what I doe, what I suffer, so I may winne Christ. If men can endure such cutting, such lancing, and searing of their bodies, to protract a miserable life yet a while longer; what paine should I refuse for eternitie?

27

If I die, the world shall misse me but a little; I shall misse it lesse. Not it mee, because it hath such store of better men: Not I it, because it hath so much ill, and I shall haue so much happinesse.

28

Two things make a man set by; Dignitie, and Desert. Amongst fooles, the first without the second is sufficient: amongst wise men, the second without the first. Let me deserue well, though I bee not aduanced. The conscience of my worth shall cheere me more in others contempt, than the approbation of others can comfort me, against the secret checke of my owne vnworthinesse.

29

The beſt qualities doe ſo cleaue to their ſubiects, that they cannot be communicated to others. For whereas patrimony and vulgar account of honor follow the bloud, in many generations; Vertue is not traduced by propagation, nor learning bequeathed by our Will to our heires; leſt the giuers ſhould wax proud, and the receiuers negligent. I will account nothing my owne, but what I haue gotten; nor that mine owne, becauſe it is more of gift, than deſert.

30

Then onely is the Church moſt happy, when Truth and Peace kiſſe each other; and then miſerable, when either of them balke the way, or when they meet and kiſſe not. For truth, without peace, is turbulent: and peace, without truth, is ſecure iniuſtice. Though I loue peace well, yet I loue maine truths better. And though I loue all truths well, yet I had rather conceale a ſmall truth, than diſturbe a common peace.

31

An indiſcreet good action, is little better than a diſcreet miſchiefe. For in this the doer wrongs onely the Patient: but in that other, the wrong is done to the good action: for both it makes a good thing odious (as many good tales are marr'd in telling) and beſides, it preiudices a future opportunitie. I will rather let paſſe a good gale of wind, and ſtay on the ſhore; than lanch forth, when I know the wind will be the contrary.

32

The World teacheth me, that it is madneſſe to leaue behinde me thoſe goods that I may carry with me: Chriſtianitie teacheth me, that what I charitably giue aliue, I carrie with me dead: and experience teacheth me, that what I leaue behinde, I loſe. I will carrie that treaſure with me by giuing it, which the worldling loſeth by keeping it: ſo, while his corps ſhall carrie nothing but a winding cloth to his graue, I ſhall bee richer vnder the earth, than I was aboue it.

33

Euery worldling is an hypocrite: for while his face naturally lookes vpward to heauen, his heart grouels beneath on the earth: yet if I would admit of any diſcord in the inward and outward parts; I would haue an heart that ſhould looke vp to heauen in an holy contemplation of the things aboue, and a countenance caſt downe to the earth, in humiliation. This onely diſſimilitude is pleaſing to God.

34

The heart of man is a ſhort word, a ſmall ſubſtance; ſcarce enough to giue a Kite one meale, yet great in capacitie; yea, ſo infinite in deſire, that the round Globe of the world cannot fill the three corners of it. When it deſires more, and cries, Giue, giue; I will ſet it ouer to that infinite Good, where the more it hath, it may deſire more, and ſee more to be deſired: when it deſires but what it needeth, my hands ſhall ſoone ſatisfie it. For, if either of them may containe it, when it is without the body; much more may both of them fill it, while it is within.

35

With men it is a good rule; To try firſt, and then to truſt: with God it is contrary; I will firſt truſt him (as moſt wiſe, omnipotent, mercifull) and try him afterwards. I know it is as impoſſible for him to deceiue me, as not to be.

36

As Chriſt was both a Lambe, and a Lion: ſo is euery Chriſtian; A Lambe, for patien ce patience in ſuffering, and innocencie of life: A Lion, for boldneſſe in his innocencie. I would ſo order my courage and mildneſſe, that I may bee neither Lion-like in my conuerſation, nor ſheepiſh in the defence of a good cauſe.

The godly ſowe in teares, and reape in ioy. The ſeed-time is commonly wateriſh, and lowring. I will be content with a wet Spring, ſo I may be ſure of a cleere and ioyfull Harueſt.

38

Euery man hath an Heauen and an Hell. Earth is the wicked mans Heauen; his Hell is to come: on the contrarie, the godly haue their Hell vpon earth; where they are vexed with tentations, and afflictions, by Satan and his complices: their Heauen is aboue in endleſſe happineſſe. If it be ill with me on earth, it is well my torment is ſo ſhort, and ſo eaſie: I will not be ſo couetous to hope for two heauens.

39

Man, on his Death-bed hath a double proſpect: which in his life-time the interpoſition of pleaſure and miſeries debarred him from. The good man lookes vpward, and ſees heauen open, with Steuen, and the glorious Angels ready to carrie vp his ſoule: The wicked man lookes downeward, and ſees three terrible ſpectacles; Death, Iudgement, Hell, one beyond another, and all to be paſſed thorow by his ſoule. I maruell not that the godly haue beene ſo cheerefull in death, that thoſe torments, whoſe very ſight hath ouercome the beholders, haue ſeemed eaſie to them. I maruell not that a wicked man is ſo loth to heare of death; ſo deiected when hee feeleth ſickneſſe, and ſo deſperate when he feeleth the pangs of death; nor that euery Balaam would faine die the death of the righteous. Henceforth I will enuie none, but a good man: I will pittie nothing ſo much as the proſperitie of the wicked.

40

Not to bee afflicted, is a ſigne of weakneſſe. For, therefore God impoſeth no more on mee, becauſe hee ſees I can beare no more. God will not make choice of a weake Champion. When I am ſtronger, I will looke for more: and when I ſuſtaine more, it ſhall more comfort me, that God findes me ſtrong, than it ſhall grieue me to be preſſed with an heauie affliction.

41

That the wicked haue peace in themſelues, is no wonder: they are as ſure as Tentation can make them. No Prince makes warre with his owne ſubiects. The godly are ſtill enemies; therefore they muſt looke to bee aſſaulted both by ſtratagems and violence. Nothing ſhall more ioy me, than my inward quietneſſe. A iuſt warre is a thouſand times more happy, than an ill-conditioned peace.

42

Goodneſſe is ſo powerfull, that it can make things ſimply euill (namely, our ſinnes) good to vs: not good in nature, but good in the euent; good, when they are done, not good to be done. Sinne is ſo powerfull, that it can turne the holieſt ordinances of God into it ſelfe: but herein our ſinne goes beyond our goodneſſe; That ſinne defiles a man or action otherwiſe good; but all the goodneſſe of the world cannot iuſtifie one ſinne; as the holy fleſh in the skirt, makes not the bread holy that toucheth it; but the vncleane touching an holy thing, defileth it. I will loath euery euill for it owne ſake: I will doe good, but not truſt to it.

Fooles meaſure good actions by the euent after they are done; Wiſe men before-hand, hand, by iudgement vpon the rules of reason and faith. Let mee doe well; let God take charge of the succeſſe. If it be well accepted, it is well; if not, my thanke is with God.

He was neuer good man that amends not. For, if hee were good, he muſt needs deſire to bee better. Grace is ſo ſweet, that who-euer taſts of it, muſt needs long after more: and if hee deſire it, he will endeuour it; and if he doe but endeuour, God will crowne it with ſucceſſe. Gods familie admitteth of no Dwarfes (which are vnthriuing, and ſtand at a ſtay) but men of meaſures. What euer become of my bodie, or my eſtate, I will euer labour to finde ſomewhat added to the ſtature of my ſoule.

45

Pride is the moſt dangerous of all ſinnes. For, both it is moſt inſinuatiue (hauing crept into Heauen and Paradiſe) and moſt dangerous where it is. For, where all other Tentations are about euill, this alone is conuerſant onely about good things; and one dram of it poiſons many meaſures of grace. I will not bee more afraid of doing good things amiſſe, than of being proud when I haue well performed them.

46

Not onely commiſſion makes a ſinne. A man is guiltie of all thoſe ſinnes he hateth not. If I cannot auoid all, yet I will hate all.

47

Preiudice is ſo great an enemie to truth, that it makes the minde vncapable of it. In matters of faith, I will firſt lay a ſure ground, and then beleeue, though I cannot argue; holding the concluſion in ſpight of the premiſſes: but in other leſſe matters, I will not ſo foreſtall my minde with reſolution, as that I will not bee willing to bee better informed. Neither will I ſay in my ſelfe, I will hold it, therefore it ſhall bee truth: but this is truth, therefore I will hold it. I will not ſtriue for victorie, but for truth.

48

Drunkenneſſe and Couetouſneſſe doe much reſemble one another. For the more a man drinkes, the more hee thirſteth: and the more hee hath, ſtill the more hee coueteth. And for their effects, beſides other, both of them haue the power of transforming a man into a beaſt; and of all other beaſts, into a Swine. The former is euident to ſenſe: the other, though more obſcure, is no more queſtionable. The couetous man in two things plainly reſembleth a Swine; That hee euer roots in the earth, not ſo much as looking towards heauen: That hee neuer doth good till his death. In deſiring, my rule ſhall bee neceſſitie of nature, or eſtate. In hauing, I will account that my good, which doth me good.

49

I acknowledge no maſter of Requeſts in Heauen, but one; Chriſt my Mediator. I know I cannot bee ſo happie as not to need him; nor ſo miſerable, that hee ſhould contemne mee. I will alwaies aske, and that of none but where I am ſure to ſpeed; but where there is ſo much ſtore, that when I haue had the moſt, I ſhall leaue no leſſe behinde. Though numberleſſe drops bee in the Sea; yet if one bee taken out of it, it hath ſo much the leſſe, though inſenſible: but God, becauſe hee is infinite, can admit of no diminution. Therefore are men niggardly, becauſe the more they giue, the leſſe they haue: but thou, Lord, maieſt giue what thou wilt, without abatement of thy ſtore. Good praiers neuer came weeping home: I am ſure I ſhall receiue either what I aske, or what I ſhould aske.

I ſee that a fit bootie many times makes a theefe: and many would bee proud, if they had had but the common cauſes of their neighbours. I account this none of the leaſt fauours of God, That the world goes no better forward with me: For, I feare, if my eſtate were better to the world, it might be worſe to God. As it is an happy neceſſity that inforceth to good; ſo is that next happy that hinders from euill.

It is the baſeſt loue of all others, that is for a benefit; for herein we loue not another ſo much as our ſelues. Though there were no HEAVEN, O Lord, I would loue thee: Now there is one, I will eſteeme it, I will deſire it; yet ſtill I will loue thee for thy goodneſſe ſake. Thy ſelfe is reward enough, though thou broughteſt no more.

52

I ſee men point the field, and deſperatly ieopard their liues (as prodigall of their bloud) in the reuenge of a diſgracefull word againſt themſelues, while they can bee content to heare God pulled out of Heauen with blaſphemy, and not feele ſo much as a riſing of their bloud. Which argues our cold loue to God, and our ouer-feruent affection to our ſelues. In mine owne wrongs, I will hold patience laudable; but in Gods iniuries, impious.

53

It is an hard thing to ſpeake well; but it is harder to be well ſilent, ſo as it may bee free from ſuſpicion of affection, or ſullenneſſe, or ignorance: elſe loquacity, and not ſilence, would be a note of wiſdome. Herein I will not care how little, but how well. He ſaid well for this; Not that which is much, is well; but that which is well, is much.

54

There is nothing more odious than fruitleſſe old age. Now (for that no tree beares fruit in Autume, vnleſſe it bloſſome in the Spring) to the end that my age may bee profitable, and laden with ripe fruit; I will endeuour that my youth may be ſtudious, and flowred with the bloſſomes of learning and obſeruation.

55

Reuenge commonly hurts both the offerer, and ſufferer: as we ſee in the fooliſh Bee (though in all other things commendable, yet herein the patterne of fond ſpightfulneſſe) which in her anger inuenometh the fleſh, and loſeth her ſting, and ſo liues a Drone euer after. I account it the onely valour, To remit a wrong; and will applaud it to my ſelfe as right Noble and Chriſtian, that I Might hurt, and Will not.

56

He that liues well, cannot chuſe but die well. For, if he die ſuddenly, yet he dies not vnpreparedly: if by leiſure, the conſcience of his well-lead life makes his death more comfortable: But it is ſeldome ſeene, that he which liueth ill, dieth well. For the conſcience of his former euills, his preſent paine, and the expectation and feare of greater, ſo take vp his heart, that he cannot ſeeke God. And now it is iuſt with God, not to be ſought, or not to be found, becauſe he ſought to him in his life time, and was repulſed. Whereas therefore there are vſually two maine cares of good men, to Liue well, and Die well: I will haue but this one; to Liue well.

57

With God there is no free man, but his Seruant, though in the Gallies: no ſlaue, but the ſinner, though in a Palace: none noble, but the vertuous, if neuer ſo baſely deſcended: none rich, but he that poſſeſſeth God, euen in rags: none wiſe, but hee that is a foole to himſelfe and the world: none happy, but he whom the world pities: Let mee be free, noble, rich, wiſe, happy to God; I paſſe not what I am to the world.

When the mouth praieth, man heareth; when the heart, God heareth. Euery good praier knocketh at heauen for a blessing: but an importunate praier pierceth it, (though as hard as brasse) and makes way for it selfe into the eares of the Almightie. And as it ascends lightly vp, carried with the wings of faith; so it comes euer laden downe againe vpon our heads. In my praiers my thoughts shall not be guided by my words, but my words shall follow my thoughts.

59

If that seruant were condemned of euill, that gaue God no more than his owne, which he had receiued; what shall become of them that rob God of his owne? If God gaine a little glorie by me, I shall gaine more by him. I will labour so to husband the stocke that God hath left in my hands, that I may returne my soule better than I receiued it; and that he may take it better than I returne it.

60

Heauen is compared to an hill; and therefore is figured by Olympus, among the Heathen; by mount Sion, in Gods Booke: Hell, contrariwise, to a pit. The ascent to the one is hard therefore, and the descent to the other easie and headlong: and so as if we once beginne to fall, the recouerie is most difficult: and not one (of many) staies till hee comes to the bottome. I will bee content to pant, and blow, and sweat in climbing vp to heauen: as, contrarily, I will bee warie of setting the first step downward towards the pit. For, as there is a Iacobs Ladder into heauen, so there are blinde staires that goe winding downe into death, whereof each makes way for other. From the obiect is raised an ill suggestion: suggestion drawes on delight, delight consent, consent endeuour, endeuour practice, practice custome, custome excuse, excuse defence, defence obstinacie, obstinacie boasting of sinne, boasting, a reprobate sense. I will watch ouer my waies: and doe thou Lord watch ouer me, that I may auoid the first degrees of sinne. And if those ouertake my frailtie, yet keepe me that presumptuous sinnes preuaile not ouer me. Beginnings, are with more ease and safetie declined, when we are free; than proceedings when we haue begunne.

61

It is fitter for youth to learne, than teach; and for age to teach, than learne: and yet fitter for an old man to learne than to be ignorant. I know I shall neuer know so much, that I cannot learne more; and I hope I shall neuer liue so long, as till I be too old to learne.

62

I neuer loued those Salamanders, that are neuer well but when they are in the fire of contention. I will rather suffer a thousand wrongs, than offer one: I will suffer an hundred, rather than returne one: I will suffer many ere I will complaine of one, and endeuour to right it by contending. I haue euer found, that to striue with my superiour, is furious; with my equall, doubtfull; with my inferiour, sordid and base; with any, full of vnquietnesse.

The praise of a good speech standeth in words and matter: Matter, which is as a faire and well-featur'd body; Elegance of words, which is as a neat and well-fashioned garment. Good matter, slubbered vp in rude and careless words, is made lothsome to the hearer; as a good body mis-shapen with vnhandsome clothes. Elegancie without soundnes, is no better than a nice vanitie. Although therefore the most hearers are like Bees, that goe all to the flowers, neuer regarding the good herbs (that are of as wholesome vse, vſe, as the other of faire ſhew:) yet let my ſpeech ſtriue to bee profitable; plauſible, as it happens: better the coat be mis ſhapen, than the body.

I ſee that as blacke and white colours to the eies, ſo is the Vice and Vertue of others to the iudgement of men. Vice gathers the beames of the ſight in one; that the eie may ſee it, and bee intent vpon it: Vertue ſcatters them abroad; and therefore hardly admits of a perfect apprehenſion. Whence it comes to paſſe, that (as iudgement is according to ſenſe) wee doe ſo ſoone eſpie, and ſo earneſtly cenſure a man for one vice; letting paſſe many laudable qualities vndiſcerned, or at leaſt vnacknowledged. Yea, whereas euery man is once a foole, and doth that (perhaps) in one fit of his folly, which hee ſhall at leiſure repent of (as Noah, in one houres drunkenneſſe, vncouered thoſe ſecrets, which were hid ſix hundred yeeres before) the world is hereupon ready to call in queſtion all his former integritie, and to exclude him from the hope of any future amendment. Since God hath giuen mee two eies; the one ſhall bee buſied about the preſent fault that I ſee, with a deteſting commiſeration; the other about the commendable qualities of the offender; not without an vnpartiall approbation of them. So ſhall I doe God no wrong, in robbing him of the glorie of his gifts, mixed with infirmities: nor yet, in the meane time, encourage Vice; while I doe diſtinctly reſerue for it a due proportion of hatred.

65

God is aboue man; the brute creatures vnder him; hee ſet in the midſt. Leſt he ſhould be proud that he hath infinite creatures vnder him, that One is infinite degrees aboue him. I doe therefore owe awe vnto God; mercie to the inferiour creatures: knowing, that they are my fellowes, in reſpect of creation; whereas there is no proportion betwixt mee, and my Maker.

66

One ſaid, It is good to inure thy youth to ſpeake well; for good ſpeech is many times drawne into the affection: But, I would feare, that ſpeaking well without feeling, were the next way to procure an habituall hypocriſie. Let my good words follow good affections; not goe before them. I will therefore ſpeake as I thinke: but withall, I will labour to thinke well; and then I know, I cannot but ſpeake well.

67

When I conſider my ſoule, I could be proud, to thinke of how diuine a nature and quality it is: but when I caſt downe mine eies to my body (as the Swanne to her blacke legs) and ſee what loathſome matter iſſues from the mouth, noſtrils, eares, pores, and other paſſages, and how moſt carrion-like of all other creatures it is after death; I am iuſtly aſhamed to thinke, that ſo excellent a gueſt dwels but in a meere cleanly dunghill.

68

Euery worldling is a mad man. For, beſides that hee preferreth profit and pleaſure to Vertue, the World to God, Earth to Heauen, Time to Eternitie; hee pampers the body, and ſtarues the ſoule. He feedes one Fowle an hundred times, that it may feed him but once; and ſeekes all Lands and Seas for dainties, not caring whether any, or what repaſt he prouideth for his ſoule. Hee cloathes the body with all rich ornaments, that it may bee as faire without, as it is filthie within; whileſt his ſoule goes bare and naked, hauing not a rag of knowledge to couer it. Yea, hee cares not to deſtroy his ſoule, to pleaſe the body; when for the ſaluation of the ſoule, he will not ſo much as hold the body ſhort of the leaſt pleaſure. What is, if this be not, a reaſonable kinde of madneſſe? Let me enioy my ſoule no longer, than I preferre it to my body. Let mee haue a deformed, leane, crooked, vnhealthfull, neglected body; ſo that I may finde my ſoule ſound, ſtrong, well furniſhed, well diſpoſed both for earth and heauen.

69

Asa was ſicke but of his feet, farre from the heart: yet becauſe he ſought to the Phyſicians, not to God, he eſcaped not. Ezechiah was ſicke to die: yet becauſe he truſted to God, not to Phyſicians, he was reſtored. Meanes, without God, cannot helpe: God, without meanes, can, and often doth. I will vſe good meanes, not reſt in them.

70

A mans beſt monument is his vertuous actions. Fooliſh is the hope of immortality, and future praiſe, by the coſt of ſenſeleſſe ſtone; when the Paſſenger ſhall onely ſay, Here lies a faire ſtone, and a filthy carkaſſe. That only can report thee rich: but for other praiſes, thy ſelfe muſt build thy monument aliue; and write thy owne Epitaph in honeſt and honourable actions. Which are ſo much more noble than the other, as liuing men are better than dead ſtones: Nay, I know not if the other be not the way to worke a perpetua l ſucceſſion of infamy, whiles the cenſorious Reader, vpon occaſion therof, ſhall comment vpon thy bad life: whereas in this, euery mans heart is a Toombe, and euery mans tongue writeth an Epitaph vpon the well-behaued. Either I will procure me ſuch a monument, to be remembred by; or elſe it is better to be inglorious, than infamous.

71

The baſeſt things are euer moſt plentifull. Hiſtory and experience tell vs, that ſome kinde of Mouſe breedeth 120 young ones in one neſt: whereas the Lion, or Elephant, beareth but one at once. I haue euer found, The leaſt wit, yeeldeth the moſt words. It is both the ſureſt, and wiſeſt way, to Speake little, and Thinke more.

72

An euill man is clay to God, wax to the Deuill. God may ſtamp him into powder, or temper him anew; but none of his meanes can melt him. Contrariwiſe, a good man is Gods wax, and Satans clay: he relents at euery looke of God, but is not ſtirred at any tentation. I had rather bow than breake, to God: but, for Satan, or the world, I had rather be broken in peeces with their violence, than ſuffer my ſelfe to be bowed vnto their obedience.

73

It is an eaſie matter for a man to be carcleſſe of himſelfe; and yet much eaſier to be enamoured of himſelfe. For, if he be a Chriſtian, whiles he contemneth the world perfectly, it is hard for him to reſerue a competent meaſure of loue to himſelfe: if a worldling, it is not poſſible but he muſt ouer-loue himſelfe. I will ſtriue for the meane of both; and ſo hate the world, that I may care for my ſelfe: and ſo care for my ſelfe, that I bee not in loue with the world.

74

I will hate popularitie and oſtentation (as euer dangerous; but moſt of all, in Gods buſineſſe) which who ſo affect, doe as ill ſpokeſmen; who when they are ſent to wooe for God, ſpeake for themſelues. I know how dangerous it is to haue God my Riuall.

75

Earth affords no found contentment. For, what is there vnder Heauen not troubleſome, beſides that which is called pleaſure? and, that, in the end, I finde moſt irkſome of all other. My ſoule ſhall euer looke vpward for ioy, and downeward for penitence.

76

God is euer with me, euer before me. I know, he cannot but ouer-ſee me alwaies; though my eies be held that I ſee him not: yea, he is ſtill within me, though I feele him not:

not: neither is there any moment, that I can liue without God. Why doe I not, therefore, alwaies liue with him? Why doe I not account all houres loſt, wherein I enioy him not?

There is no man ſo happy as the Chriſtian. When he lookes vp vnto heauen, hee thinkes, That is my home: the God that made it, and owes it, is my Father: the Angels, more glorious in nature than my ſelfe, are my attendants: mine enemies are my vaſſals. Yea, thoſe things, which are the terribleſt of all to the wicked, are moſt pleaſant to him. When he heares God thunder aboue his head, he thinks, This is the voice of my Father. When he remembreth the Tribunall of the laſt Iudgement, he thinkes, It is my Sauiour that ſits in it: when death, he eſteemes it but as the Angell ſet before Paradiſe; which with one blow admits him to eternall ioy. And (which is moſt of all) nothing in earth or hell can make him miſerable. There is nothing in the world, worth enuying, but a Chriſtian.

78

As Man is a little world: ſo euery Chriſtian is a little Church within himſelfe. As the Church, therefore, is ſometimes in the wane, through perſecution; other times in her full glory and brightneſſe: ſo let mee expect my ſelfe ſometimes drouping vnder Tentations, and ſadly hanging downe the head for the want of the feeling of Gods preſence; at other times caried with the full ſaile of a reſolute aſſurance, to heauen: knowing, that as it is a Church at the weakeſt ſtay, ſo ſhall I, in my greateſt deiection, hold the Childe of God.

79

Tentations on the right hand, are more perillous than thoſe on the left; and deſtroy a thouſand, to the others ten: as the Sunne, more vſually, cauſeth the traueller to caſt off his cloke, than the wind. For, thoſe on the left hand miſcarry men but two waies: to diſtruſt, and deniall of God; more rare ſinnes: but the other, to all the reſt, wherewith mens liues are ſo commonly defiled. The ſpirit of Chriſtians, is like the Engliſh Ieat; whereof we reade, that it is fired with water, quenched with oyle. And theſe two, proſperity and aduerſity, are like heat and cold: the one gathers the powers of the ſoule together, and makes them abler to reſiſt, by vniting them: the other diffuſes them; and, by ſuch ſeparation, makes them eaſier to conquer. I hold it therefore as praiſe-worthy with God, for a man to contemne a proffered honour, or pleaſure, for conſcience ſake; as, on the racke not to denie his profeſſion. When theſe are offered, I will not nibble at the bait; that I be not taken with the hooke.

80

God is Lord of my body alſo: and therefore challengeth as well reuerent geſture, as inward deuotion. I will euer, in my praiers, either ſtand, as a ſeruant, before my maſter; or kneele, as a ſubiect, to my Prince.

81

I haue not beene in others breaſts: but, for my owne part, I neuer taſted of ought, that might deſerue the name of pleaſure. And, if I could, yet a thouſand pleaſures cannot counteruaile one torment: becauſe the one may be exquiſite; the other, not without compoſition. And, if not one torment, much leſſe a thouſand. And, if not for a moment, much leſſe for eternity. And, if not the torment of a part, much leſſe of the whole. For if the paine but of a tooth be ſo intolerable, what ſhall the racking of the whole body be? And, if of the body; what ſhall that be, which is primarily of the ſoule? If there be pleaſures that I heare not of, I will be wary of buying them ſo ouer-deare.

82

As Hypocriſie is a common counterfeit of all vertues : ſo there is no ſpeciall vertue, which is not (to the very life of it) ſeemingly reſembled, by ſome ſpeciall vice. So, deuotion is counterfeited by ſuperſtition : good thrift, by niggardlineſſe ; charity, with vaine-glorious pride. For, as charity is bounteous to the poore ; ſo is vaine-glory to the wealthy : as charity ſuſtaines all, for truth ; ſo pride, for a vaine praiſe : both of them make a man courteous and affable. So the ſubſtance of euery vertue is in the heart : which, ſince it hath not a window made into it, by the Creator of it, (but is reſerued vnder locke and key for his owne view) I will iudge onely by appearance. I had rather wrong my ſelfe, by credulity ; than others, by vniuſt cenſures and ſuſpicions.

83

Euery man hath a kingdome within himſelfe : Reaſon, as the Princeſſe, dwels in the higheſt and inwardeſt roome : the ſenſes are the Guard and attendants on the Court ; without whoſe aid, nothing is admitted into the Preſence : The ſupreme faculties (as will, memory, &c.) are the Peeres : The outward parts, and inward affections, are the Commons : Violent Paſſions are as Rebels, to diſturbe the common peace. I would not be a Stoicke, to haue no Paſſions : for that were to ouerthrow this inward gouernment God hath erected in me ; but a Chriſtian, to order thoſe I haue. And for that I ſee, that as (in commotions) one mutinous perſon drawes on more ; ſo in paſſions, that one makes way for the extremity of another, (as exceſſe of loue cauſeth exceſſe of griefe, vpon the loſſe of what we loued :) I will doe as wiſe Princes vſe, to thoſe they miſdoubt for faction ; ſo hold them downe, and keepe them bare, that their very impotency and remiſneſſe ſhall affoord me ſecuritie.

84

I looke vpon the things of this life, as an owner ; as a ſtranger. As an owner, in their right ; as a ſtranger, in their vſe. I ſee, that owning, is but a conceit, beſides vſing : I can vſe (as I lawfully may) other mens commodities as my owne ; walke in their woods, looke on their faire houſes, with as much pleaſure as my owne ; yet againe, I will vſe my owne, as if it were anothers ; knowing, that though I hold them by right, yet it is only by Tenure at will.

85

There is none like to Luthers three maſters ; Prayer, Tentation, Meditation. Tentation ſtirs vp holy meditation : Meditation prepares to Praier : and Praier makes profit of Tentation ; and fetcheth all diuine knowledge from Heauen. Of others, I may learne the Theorie of Diuinity ; of theſe onely, the Practiſe. Other maſters teach me by rote, to ſpeake Parrot-like of heauenly things : theſe alone, with feeling and vnderſtanding.

86

Affectation is the greateſt enemy both of doing well, and good acceptance of what is done. I hold it the part of a wiſe man, to endeuour rather that fame may follow him, than goe before him.

87

I ſee a number, which, with Shimei, whiles they ſeeke their ſeruant, which is riches, loſe their ſoules. No worldly thing ſhall draw me without the gates, within which God hath confined me.

88

It is an hard thing for a man to finde wearineſſe in pleaſure, while it laſteth ; or contentment in paine, while he is vnder it. After both (indeed) it is eaſie : yet both of theſe muſt must be found in both ; or elſe we ſhall be drunken with pleaſures, and ouerwhelmed with ſorrow. As thoſe, therefore, which ſhould eat ſome diſh ouer-deliciouſly ſweet, doe allay it with tart ſawce, that they may not be cloyed : and thoſe that are to receiue bitter pills (that they may not be annoyed with their vnpleaſing taſte) rowle them in Sugar : So in all pleaſures it is beſt to labour, not how to make them moſt delightfull ; but how to moderate them from exceſſe : and in all ſorrowes, ſo to ſettle our hearts in true grounds of comfort, that we may not care ſo much for being bemoned of others, as how to be moſt contented in our ſelues.

In wayes, we ſee Trauellers chuſe not the faireſt, and greeneſt, if it be either croſſe or contrary ; but the neereſt, though miry and vneuen : ſo, in opinions, let me follow not the plauſibleſt, but the trueſt, though more perplexed.

90

Chriſtian ſocietie is like a bundle of ſticks laid together, whereof one kindles another. Solitary men haue feweſt prouocations to euill ; but againe feweſt incitations to good. So much, as doing good, is better than not doing euill, will I account Chriſtian good fellowſhip better than an Eremitiſh and melancholike ſolitarineſſe.

91

I had rather confeſſe my ignorance, than falſly profeſſe knowledge. It is no ſhame, not to know all things ; but it is a iuſt ſhame to ouer-reach in any thing.

92

Sudden extremitie is a notable triall of faith, or any other diſpoſition of the ſoule. For as in a ſudden feare, the bloud gathers to the heart, for guarding of that part which is principall : ſo the powers of the ſoule combine themſelues in an hard exigent, that they may be eaſily iudged of. The faithfull (more ſuddenly than any caſualtie) can lift vp his heart to his ſtay in Heauen : Whereas the worldling ſtands amazed, and diſtraught with the euill ; becauſe he hath no refuge to flie vnto. For, not being acquainted with God in his peace, how ſhould he but haue him to ſeeke in his extremitie ? When therefore ſome ſudden ſtitch girds me in the ſide, like to be the meſſenger of death ; or when the ſword of my enemie, in an vnexpected aſſault, threatens my body ; I will ſeriouſly note how I am affected : ſo the ſuddenneſt euill, as it ſhall not come vnlooked for, ſhall not goe away vnthought of. If I finde my ſelfe couragious, and heauenly-minded, I will reioyce in the truth of Gods grace in me ; knowing that one dram of tried faith, is worth a whole pound of ſpeculatiue ; and that, which once ſtood by me, will neuer faile mee : If deiected, and heartleſſe, herein I will acknowledge cauſe of humiliation ; and, with all care and earneſtneſſe, ſeeke to ſtore my ſelfe againſt the dangers following.

93

The Rules of ciuill policie may well be applied to the minde. As therefore for a Prince, that he may haue good ſucceſſe againſt either Rebels, or forraine enemies, it is a ſure axiome, Diuide and Rule : but when he is once ſeated in the Throne ouer loyall ſubiects, Vnite and Rule : ſo, in the regiment of the ſoule, there muſt be variance ſet in the iudgement, and the conſcience and affections ; that that which is amiſſe may be ſubdued : but, when all parts are brought to order, it is the only courſe to maintaine their peace ; that, all ſeeking to eſtabliſh and helpe each other, the whole may proſper. Alwayes to be at warre, is deſperate : alwayes at peace, ſecure, and ouer-Epicure-like. I doe account a ſecure peace, a iuſt occaſion of this ciuill diſſenſion in my ſelfe ; and a true Chriſtian peace, the end of all my ſecret warres : which when I haue atchieued, I ſhall reigne with comfort ; and neuer will be quiet, till I haue atchieued it.

94

I brought ſin enough with me into the world to repent of all my life, though I ſhould neuer actually ſinne: and ſinne enough actually euery day, to ſorrow for, though I had brought none with me into the world: but, laying both together, my time is rather too ſhort for my repentance. It were madneſſe in me to ſpend my whole life in iollity and pleaſure, whereof I haue ſo ſmall occaſion; and neglect the opportunity of my ſo iuſt ſorrow: eſpecially, ſince before I came into the World, I ſinned; after I am gone out of the World, the contagion of my ſinne paſt, ſhall adde to the guilt of it: yet, in both theſe eſtates, I am vncapable of repentance. I will doe that while I may, which, when I haue neglected, is vnrecouerable.

95

Ambition is torment enough for an enemie. For, it affoords as much diſcontentment in enioying, as in want; making men like poyſoned rats: which when they haue taſted of their bane, cannot reſt, till they drinke; and then can much leſſe reſt, till their death. It is better for me to liue in the wiſe mens flocks, in a contented want; than in a fooles Paradiſe, to vex my ſelfe with wilfull vnquietneſſe.

96

It is not poſſible but a conceited man muſt be a foole. For, that ouer-weening opinion he hath of himſelfe, excludes all opportunity of purchaſing knowledge. Let a veſſell be once full of neuer ſo baſe liquor, it will not giue roome to the coſtlieſt; but ſpills beſide, whatſoeuer is infuſed. The proud man, though he be empty of good ſubſtance, yet is full of conceit. Many men had proued wiſe, if they had not ſo thought themſelues. I am empty enough to receiue knowledge enough; Let me thinke my ſelfe but ſo bare as I am, and more I need not. O Lord, doe thou teach mee how little, how nothing I haue; and giue me no more, than I know I want.

97

Euery man hath his turne of ſorrow: whereby (ſome more, ſome leſſe) all men are in their times miſerable. I neuer yet could meet with the man that complained not of ſomewhat. Before ſorrow come, I will prepare for it: when it is come, I will welcome it: when it goes, I will take but halfe a farewell of it; as ſtill expecting his returne.

98

There be three things that follow an iniury ſo farre as it concerneth our ſelues; (for, as the offence toucheth God, it is aboue our reach) Reuenge, Cenſure, Satisfaction; which muſt bee remitted of the mercifull man. Yet not all at all times: but Reuenge alwaies, leauing it to him that can, and will doe it: Cenſure oft times; Satisfaction ſometimes. He that deceiues mę oft, though I muſt forgiue him; yet charity bindes me not, not to cenſure him for vntruſty: and he, that hath endammaged me much, cannot plead breach of charity, in my ſeeking his reſtitution. I will ſo remit wrongs, as I may not encourage others to offer them; and ſo retaine them, as I may not induce God to retaine mine to him.

99

Garments that haue once one rent in them, are ſubiect to be torne on euery naile, and euery bryer; and glaſſes, that are once crackt, are ſoone broken: ſuch is mans good name once tainted with iuſt reproch. Next to the approbation of God, and the teſtimony of mine owne conſcience, I will ſeeke for a good reputation amongſt men: not by cloſe cariage, concealing faults, that they may not be knowne to my ſhame: but auoiding all vices, that I may not deſerue it. The efficacy of the agent, is in the patient well diſpoſed. It is hard for me euer to doe good, vnleſſe I be reputed good.

100

Many vegetable, and many brute creatures exceed man in length of age. Which hath opened the mouthes of Heathen Philosophers to accuse Nature, as a step-mother to Man; who hath giuen him the least time to liue, that onely could make vse of his time, in getting knowledge. But herein Religion doth most magnifie God, in his wisdome and iustice; teaching vs, that other creatures liue long, and perish to nothing, onely Man recompences the shortnesse of his life, with eternity after it; that the sooner he dies well, the sooner hee comes to perfection of knowledge, which hee might in vaine seeke below: the sooner he dies ill, the lesse hurt he doth with his knowledge. There is great reason then, why man should liue long; greater, why he should die early. I will neuer blame God, for making mee too soone happy; for changing my ignorance, for knowledge; my corruption, for immortality; my infirmities, for perfection. Come Lord Iesus, come quickly.

THE SECOND CENTVRY.

By Ios. Hall.

LONDON,
Printed for THOMAS PAVIER, MILES FLESHER
and John Haviland. 1624.

TO THE RIGHT VERTVOVS AND WORSHIPFVLL LADIE, THE Ladie DRVRY, all increase of Grace.

MADAME, I know your Christian ingenuitie such, that you will not grudge others the communication of this your priuate right: which yet I durst not haue presumed to aduenture, if I feared that either the benefit of it would be lesse, or the acceptation. Now it shall be no lesse yours: onely it shall be more knowne to be yours. Vouchsafe therefore to take part with your worthy Husband, of these my simple Meditations. And if your long and gracious experience haue written you a larger volume of wholesome lawes, and better informed you by precepts fetcht from your owne feeling, than I can hope for, by my bare speculation: yet where these my not vnlikely rules shall accord with yours, let your redoubled assent allow them, and they confirme it. I made them not for the eie, but for the heart: neither doe I commend them to your reading, but your practice: wherein also it shall not be enough that you are a meere and ordinary agent, but that you be a patterne propounded vnto others imitation. So shall your vertuous and holy progresse, besides your owne peace and happpinesse, be my Crowne and reioycing, in the Day of our common appearance. Halsted. Decemb. 4.

Your L. humbly deuoted,

IOS. HALL.

MEDITATIONS AND VOWES.

1

A Man vnder Gods affliction, is like a bird in a net; the more he ſtriueth, the more he is intangled. Gods Decree cannot be eluded with impatience. What I cannot auoid, I will learne to beare.

I finde, that all worldly things require a long time in getting; and affoord a ſhort pleaſure in enioying them. I will not care much, for what I haue; nothing, for what I haue not.

I ſee naturall bodies forſake their owne place and condition, for the preſeruation of the whole; but of all other creatures, Man; and of all other Men, Chriſtians haue the leaſt intereſt in themſelues. I will liue, as giuen to others, lent only to my ſelfe.

That which is ſaid of the Elephant, that being guiltie of his deformitie, hee cannot abide to looke on his owne face in the water (but ſeekes for troubled and muddie channels) we ſee well moralized, in men of euill conſcience, who know their ſoules are ſo filthie, that they dare not ſo much as view them; but ſhift off all checks of their former iniquitie, with vaine excuſes of good-fellowſhip. Whence it is, that euery ſmall reprehenſion ſo galls them; becauſe it calls the eye of the ſoule home to it ſelfe, and makes them ſee a glimpſe of what they would not. So haue I ſeene a fooliſh and timorous Patient, which knowing his wound very deepe, would not endure the Chirurgion to ſearch it: whereon what can enſue, but a feſtering of the part, and a danger of the whole body? So I haue ſeene many prodigall waſters run ſo farre in bookes, that they cannot abide to heare of reckoning. It hath beene an old and true Prouerbe, Oft and euen reckonings make long friends: I will oft ſumme my eſtate with God; that I may know what I haue to expect, and anſwer for. Neither ſhall my ſcore run on ſo long with God, that I ſhall not know my debts, or feare an Audit, or deſpaire of pardon.

I account this body, nothing, but a cloſe priſon to my ſoule; and the earth a larger priſon to my body. I may not breake priſon, till I be looſed by death: but I will leaue it, not vnwillingly, when I am looſed.

The common feares of the World are cauſeleſſe, and ill placed. No man feares to doe ill; euery man to ſuffer ill: wherein, if we conſider it well, we ſhall finde that we feare our beſt friends. For my part, I haue learned more of God and of my ſelfe, in one weekes extremitie, than all my whole lifes proſperitie had taught me afore. And, in reaſon and common experience, proſperitie vſually makes vs forget our death: aduerſitie, on the other ſide, makes vs neglect our life. Now (if we meaſure both of theſe, by their effects) forgetfulneſſe of death makes vs ſecure: neglect of this life makes vs carefull of a better. So much therefore as neglect of life is better than forgetfulneſſe of death; and watchfulneſſe better than ſecuritie: ſo much more beneficiall will I eſteeme aduerſitie, than proſperitie.

Euen griefe it ſelfe is pleaſant to the remembrance, when it is once paſt: as ioy is, whiles it is preſent. I will not therefore in my conceit, make any ſo great difference betwixt ioy and griefe: ſith griefe paſt, is ioyfull; and long expectation of ioy, is grieuous.

8

Euery ſickneſſe is a little death. I will be content to die oft, that I may die once well.

9

Oft times thoſe things which haue beene ſweet in opinion, haue proued bitter in experience. I will therefore euer ſuſpend my reſolute iudgement, vntill the triall and euent: in the meane while I will feare the worſt, and hope the beſt.

10

In all diuine and morall good things, I would faine keepe that I haue, and get that I want. I doe not more loath all other couetouſneſſe, than I affect this. In all theſe things alone, I proteſſe neuer to haue enough. If I may increaſe them, therefore, either by labouring, or begging, or vſurie, I ſhall leaue no meanes vnattempted.

11

Some children are of that nature, that they are neuer well, but while the rod is ouer them: ſuch am I to God; Let him beat me, ſo he amend me: let him take all away from me, ſo he giue me himſelfe.

12

There muſt not be one vniforme proceeding with all men, in reprehenſion: but that muſt varie according to the diſpoſition of the reproued. I haue ſeene ſome men as thornes, which eaſily touched, hurt not; but if hard and vnwarily, fetch bloud of the hand: others, as nettles, which if they be nicely handled, ſting and pricke; but if hard and roughly preſſed, are pulled vp without harme. Before I take any man in hand, I will know whether he be a thorne, or a nettle.

13

I will account no ſinne little; ſince there is not the leaſt, but workes out the death of the ſoule. It is all one, whether I be drowned in the ebber ſhore, or in the midſt of the deepe Sea.

14

It is a baſe thing to get goods, to keepe them. I ſee that God (which only is infinitely rich) holderh nothing in his owne hands, but giues all to his creatures. But, if we will needs lay vp, where ſhould wee rather repoſe it, than in Chriſts treaſurie? The poore mans hand is the treasury of Christ. All my superfluity shall be there hoorded vp, where I know it shall be safely kept, and surely returned me.

The Schoole of God, and Nature, require two contrary manners of proceeding. In the Schoole of Nature, we must conceiue, and then beleeue: in the Schoole of God, wee must first beleeue, and then we shall conceiue. He that beleeues no more than hee conceiues, can neuer be a Christian; nor he a Philosopher, that assents without reason. In Natures Schoole, we are taught to bolt out the truth, by Logicall discourse: God cannot endure a Logician. In his Schoole, he is the best Scholler, that reasons least, and assents most. In diuine things, what I may I wil conceiue: the rest I will beleeue and admire. Not a curious head, but a credulous and plaine heart, is accepted with God.

16

No worldly pleasure hath any absolute delight in it: but as a Bee, hauing honey in the mouth, hath a sting in the taile. Why am I so foolish, to rest my heart vpon any of them? and not rather labour to aspire to that one absolute Good, in whom is nothing sauouring of griefe, nothing wanting to perfect happinesse?

17

A sharpe reproofe I account better than a smooth deceit. Therefore when my friend checkes me, I will respect it with thankfulnesse: when others flatter me, I will suspect it, and rest in mine owne censure of my selfe; who should be more priuie (and lesse partiall) to my owne deseruings.

18

Extremity distinguisheth friends: Worldly pleasures, like Physicians, giue vs ouer when once we lie a dying; and yet the death-bed had most need of comforts: Christ Iesus standeth by his, in the pangs of death; and after death at the barre of iudgement; not leauing them either in their bed, or graue. I will vse them therefore to my best aduantage; not trust them. But for thee, O my Lord, which in mercy and truth canst not faile me, (whom I haue found euer faithfull and present in all extremities) Kill me, yet will I trust in thee.

19

We haue heard of so many thousand generations passed, and we haue seene so many hundreds die within our knowledge; that I wonder any man can make account to liue one day. I will die daily. It is not done before the time, which may be done at all times.

20

Desire oft times makes vs vnthankfull. For, who so hopes for that he hath not, vsually forgets that which he hath. I will not suffer my heart to roue after high or impossible hopes; lest I should, in the meane time, contemne present benefits.

21

In hoping well, in being ill, and fearing worse, the life of man is wholly consumed. When I am ill, I will liue in hope of better: when well, in feare of worse: neither will I, at any time, hope without feare; lest I should deceiue my selfe with too much confidence (wherein euill shall be so much more vnwelcome and intolerable, because I looked for good) nor, againe, feare without hope; lest I should be ouer-much dejected: nor doe either of them, without true contentation.

22

What is man, to the whole earth? What is earth to the heauen? What is heauen, to his Maker? I will admire nothing in it selfe; but all things in God, and God in all things.

23

There be three vſuall cauſes of ingratitude, vpon a benefit receiued: Enuie, Pride, Couetouſneſſe: Enuie, looking more at others benefits, than our owne; Pride, looking more at our ſelues, than the benefit; Couetouſneſſe, looking more at what wee would haue, than what we haue. In good turnes, I will neither reſpect the giuer, nor my ſelfe, nor the gift, nor others; but onely the intent and good will from whence it proceeded. So ſhall I requite others great pleaſures, with equall good will, and accept of ſmall fauours, with great thankfulneſſe.

24

Whereas the cuſtome of the world is, to hate things preſent, to deſire future, and magnifie what is paſt; I will contrarily eſteeme that which is preſent, beſt. For, both what is paſt, was once preſent; and what is future, will be preſent: future things next, becauſe they are preſent in hope; what is paſt, leaſt of all, becauſe it cannot be preſent: yet ſomewhat becauſe it was.

25

We pitie the folly of the Larke, which (while it plaieth with the fether, and ſtoopeth to the glaſſe) is caught in the Fowlers net: and yet cannot ſee our ſelues alike made fooles by Satan; who, deluding vs by the vaine feathers and glaſſes of the world, ſuddenly enwrappeth vs in his ſnares. We ſee not the nets indeed; it is too much that we ſhall feele them, and that they are not ſo eaſily eſcaped after, as before auoided. O Lord, keepe thou mine eies from beholding vanity. And though mine eies ſee it, let not my heart ſtoope to it, but loath it afarre off. And, if I ſtoope at any time, and be taken, ſet thou my ſoule at libertie: that I may ſay, My ſoule is eſcaped, euen as a bird out of the ſnare of the Fowler; the ſnare is broken, and I am deliuered.

26

In ſuffering euill, to looke to ſecondary cauſes, without reſpect to the higheſt, maketh impatience. For ſo we bite at the ſtone, and neglect him that threw it. If we take a blow at our equall, we returne it with vſurie: if of a Prince, we repine not. What matter is it, if God kill me, whether he doe it by an Ague, or by the hand of a Tyrant? Againe, in expectation of good, to looke to the firſt cauſe, without care of the ſecond, argues idleneſſe, and cauſeth want. As we cannot helpe our ſelues, without God: ſo God will not ordinarily helpe vs, without our ſelues. In both, I will looke vp to God, without repining at the meanes in one, or truſting them in the other.

27

If my money were another mans, I could but keepe it: onely the expending ſhewes it my owne. It is greater glory, comfort, and gaine, to lay it out well, than to keepe it ſafely. God hath made me, not his Treaſurer, but his Steward.

28

Auguſtines friend, Nebridius, not vniuſtly hated a ſhort anſwer, to a weighty and difficult queſtion; becauſe the diſquiſition of great truths requires time, and the determining is perillous: I will as much hate a tedious and farre-fetched anſwer to a ſhort and eaſie queſtion. For, as that other wrongs the truth, ſo this the hearer.

29

Performance is a binder. I will requeſt no more fauour of any man than I muſt needs. I will rather chuſe to make an honeſt ſhift, than ouer-much enthrall my ſelfe, by being beholding.

30 The

30

The World is a Stage; euery man an actor, and plaies his part here, either in a Comedie, or Tragedie. The good man is a Comedian; which (how-euer he begins) ends merrily: but the wicked man acts a Tragedie; and therefore euer ends in horrour. Thou seest a wicked man vaunt himselfe on this stage: stay till the last Act, and looke to his end (as Dauid did) and see whether that be peace. Thou wouldest make strange Tragedies, if thou wouldest haue but one Act. Who sees an Oxe, grazing in a fat and ranke pasture, and thinkes not that he is neere to the slaughter? whereas the leane beast, that toyles vnder the yoke, is farre enough from the Shambles. The best wicked man cannot be so enuied in his first shewes, as he is pitiable in the conclusion.

31

Of all obiects of Beneficence, I will chuse either an old man, or a childe; because these are most out of hope to requite. The one forgets a good turne: the other liues not to repay it.

32

That, which Pythagoras said of Philosophers, is more true of Christians: (for, Christianity is nothing but a diuine and better Philosophy.) Three sorts of men come to the Market: buyers, sellers, lookers on. The two first are both busie, and carefully distracted about their Market: onely the third liue happily; vsing the world as if they vsed it not.

33

There be three things, which of all other I will neuer striue for: the wall, the way, the best seat. If I deserue well, a low place cannot disparage me so much as I shall grace it: if not, the height of my place shall adde to my shame; whiles euery man shall condemne me of pride matched with vnworthinesse.

34

I see there is not so much difference betwixt a man and a beast, as betwixt a Christian, and a naturall man. For, whereas man liues but one life of reason, aboue the beast; a Christian liues foure liues, aboue a naturall man: The life of inchoate regeneration, by grace; the perfect life of imputed righteousnesse; the life of glory begun, in the separation of the soule; the life of perfect glory, in the society of the body, with the soule in full happinesse: The worst whereof is better by many degrees, than the best life of a naturall man. For whereas the dignitie of the life is measured, by the cause of it, (in which regard the life of the plant is basest, because it is but from the iuyce, arising from the root, administred by the earth: the life of the bruit creature better than it, because it is sensitiue: of a man better than it, because reasonable) and the cause of this life, is the Spirit of God; so farre as the Spirit of God is aboue reason, so farre doth a Christian exceed a meere naturalist. I thanke God much that hee hath made me a man; but more, that hee hath made me a Christian: without which, I know not whether it had beene better for me to haue beene a beast, or not to haue beene.

35

Great mens fauours, friends promises, and dead mens shooes, I will esteeme, but not trust to.

36

It is a fearefull thing to sinne; more fearefull to delight in sinne; yet worse than worst, to boast of it. If therefore I cannot auoid sinne, because I am a man; yet I will auoid the delight, defence and boasting of sinne, because I am a Christian.

37

Thoſe things which are moſt eagerly deſired, are moſt hardly both gotten and kept; God commonly croſſing our deſires, in what we are ouer-feruent. I will therefore account all things, as too good to haue, ſo nothing too deare to loſe.

38

A true friend is not borne euerie day. It is beſt to be courteous to all, entire with few. So may we (perhaps) haue leſſe cauſe of ioy: I am ſure, leſſe occaſion of ſorrow.

39

Secrecies, as they are a burthen to the minde, ere they be vttered: ſo are they no leſſe charge to the receiuer, when they are vttered. I will not long after more inward ſecrets, leſt I ſhould procure doubt to my ſelfe, and iealous feare to the diſcloſer: But as my mouth ſhall be ſhut with fidelitie, not to blab them; ſo mine eare ſhall not bee too open to receiue them.

40

As good Phyſicians, by one receit, make way for another: ſo is it the ſafeſt courſe in practice: I will reueale a great ſecret to none, but whom I haue found faithfull in leſſe.

41

I will enioy all things in God, and God in all things; nothing in it ſelfe: So ſhall my ioyes neither change, nor periſh. For how euer the things themſelues may alter, or fade: yet he, in whom they are mine, is euer like himſelfe, conſtant, and euerlaſting.

42

If I would prouoke my ſelfe to contentation, I will caſt downe mine eies to my inferiours; and there ſee better men in worſe condition: if to humility, I will caſt them vp to my betters; and ſo much more deiect my ſelfe to them, by how much more I ſee them thought worthy to be reſpected of others, and deſerue better in themſelues.

43

True vertue reſts in the conſcience of it ſelfe, either for reward, or cenſure. If therefore I know my ſelfe vpright, falſe rumors ſhall not daunt me: if not anſwerable to the good report of my fauourers, I will my ſelfe finde the firſt fault, that I may preuent the ſhame of others.

44

I will account vertue the beſt riches, knowledge the next, riches the worſt; and therefore will labour to be vertuous and learned, without condition: as for riches, if they fall in my way, I refuſe them not; but if not, I deſire them not.

45

An honeſt word I account better, than a careleſſe oath. I will ſay nothing but what I dare ſweare, and will performe. It is a ſhame for a Chriſtian to abide his tongue a falſe ſeruant, or his minde a looſe miſtreſſe.

46

There is a iuſt and eaſie difference to be put betwixt a friend and an enemie; betwixt a familiar, and a friend; and much good vſe to be made of all: but, of all, with diſcretion. I will diſcloſe my ſelfe no whit to my enemie, ſomewhat to my friend, wholly to no man; leſt I ſhould be more others, than mine owne. Friendſhip is brittle ſtuffe. How know I, whether he that loues me, may not hate mee hereafter?

47

No man, but is an eaſie Iudge of his owne matters; and lookers on oftentimes ſee the more. I will therefore ſubmit my ſelfe to others, in what I am reproued: but in what I am praiſed, onely to my ſelfe.

48

I will not be ſo merry, as to forget God; nor ſo ſorrowfull, to forget my ſelfe.

49

As nothing makes ſo ſtrong and mortall hoſtilitie, as diſcord in religions: ſo nothing in the world vnites mens hearts ſo firmely, as the bond of faith. For, whereas there are three grounds of friendſhip, Vertue, Pleaſure, Profit; and by all confeſſions, that is the ſureſt, which is vpon Vertue: it muſt needs follow, that what is grounded on the beſt, and moſt heauenly Vertue, muſt be the faſteſt: which, as it vnites man to God ſo inſeparably, that no tentations, no torments, not all the gates of Hell can ſeuer him; ſo it vnites one Chriſtian ſoule to another ſo firmely, that no outward occurrences, no imperfections in the partie loued, can diſſolue them. If I loue not the childe of God (for his owne ſake, for his Fathers ſake) more than my friend (for my commodity, or my kinſman for bloud) I neuer receiued any ſparke of true heauenly loue.

50

The good duty, that is deferred vpon a conceit of preſent vnfitneſſe, at laſt growes irkſome; and thereupon altogether neglected. I will not ſuffer my heart to entertaine the leaſt thought of lothneſſe towards the taske of deuotion, wherewith I haue ſtinted my ſelfe: but violently breake thorow any motion of vnwillingneſſe; not without a deepe checke to my ſelfe, for my backwardneſſe.

51

Hearing is a ſenſe of great apprehenſion; yet farre more ſubiect to deceit, than ſeeing: not in the manner of apprehending, but in the vncertainty of the obiect. Words are vocall interpreters of the minde; actions, reall: and therefore how euer both ſhould ſpeake according to the truth of what is in the heart; yet words doe more belie the heart, than actions. I care not what words I heare, when I ſee deeds. I am ſure, what a man doth, he thinketh: not ſo alwaies, what he ſpeaketh. Though I will not bee ſo ſeuere a cenſor, that, for ſome few euill acts, I ſhould condemne a man of falſe-heartedneſſe: yet, in common courſe of life I need not be ſo mopiſh, as not to beleeue rather the language of the hand, than of the tongue. He, that ſaies well, and doth well, is without exception commendable: but, if one of theſe muſt be ſeuered from the other, I like him well, that doth well, and ſaith nothing.

52

That, which they ſay of the Pelican, that when the Shepherds, in deſire to catch her, lay fire not farre from her neſt; which ſhe finding, and fearing the danger of her young, ſeekes to blow out with her wings, ſo long till ſhe burne her ſelfe and makes her ſelfe a prey, in an vnwiſe pitty to her young; I ſee morally verified in experience, of thoſe which indiſcreetly medling with the flame of diſſention kindled in the Church, rather increaſe than quench it; rather fire their owne wings than helpe others. I had rather bewaile the fire afarre off, than ſtirre in the coles of it. I would not grudge my aſhes to it, if thoſe might abate the burning: but, ſince I ſee this is daily increaſed with partaking, I will behold it with ſorrow; and meddle no otherwiſe than by praiers to God, and intreaties to men; ſeeking my owne ſafety, and the peace of the Church, in the freedome of my thought, and ſilence of my tongue.

That which is ſaid of Lucillaes faction, that anger bred it, pride foſtered it, and couetouſneſſe confirm'd it, is true of all Schiſmes, though with ſome inuerſion. For, the moſt are bred through pride, (whiles men, vpon an high conceit of themſelues, ſcorne to goe in the common road, and affect ſingularitie in opinion) are confirmed through anger, (whiles they ſtomacke and grudge any contradiction) and are nouriſhed through couetouſneſſe, whiles they ſeeke abilitie to beare out their part. In ſome others againe, couetouſneſſe obtaines the firſt place, anger the ſecond, pride the laſt. Herein therefore I haue beene alwaies wont to commend and admire the humilitie of thoſe great and profound wits, whom depth of knowledge hath not lead to by-paths in iudgement; but (walking in the beaten path of the Church) haue bent all their forces to the eſtabliſhment of receiued truths: accounting it greater glorie to confirme an ancient veritie, than to deuiſe a new opinion (though neuer ſo profitable) vnknowne to their predeceſſors. I will not reiect a truth, for meere noueltie: (Old truths may come newly to light; neither is God tied to times, for the gift of his illumination) but I will ſuſpect a nouell opinion, of vntruth; and not entertaine it, vnleſſe it may be deduced from ancient grounds.

The eare and the eie are the minds receiuers, but the tongue is onely buſied in expending the treaſure receiued. If therefore the reuenues of the minde bee vttered as faſt, or faſter than they are receiued; it cannot bee, but that the minde muſt needs bee held bare, and can neuer lay vp for purchaſe. But, if the receiuers take in ſtill with no vtterance, the minde may ſoone grow a burthen to it ſelfe, and vnprofitable to others. I will not lay vp too much, and vtter nothing, leſt I be couetous: nor ſpend much, and ſtore vp little, leſt I be prodigall and poore.

55

It is a vaine-glorious flatterie for a man to praiſe himſelfe: An enuious wrong to detract from others. I will therefore ſpeake no ill of others, no good of my ſelfe.

56

That which is the miſerie of Trauellers, to finde many Oaſts, and few friends, is the eſtate of Chriſtians in their pilgrimage to a better life. Good friends may not, therefore, be eaſily forgone: neither muſt they bee vſed as ſuits of apparell; which when wee haue worne threed-bare, wee caſt off, and call for new. Nothing, but death or villanie, ſhall diuorce mee from an old friend; but ſtill I will follow him ſo farre, as is either poſſible or honeſt: and then I will leaue him, with ſorrow.

57

True friendſhip neceſſarily requires Patience. For there is no man, in whom I ſhall not miſlike ſomewhat, and who ſhall not, as iuſtly, miſlike ſomewhat in mee. My friends faults therefore, if little, I will ſwallow and digeſt; if great, I will ſmother them: howeuer, I will winke at them to others; but, louingly notifie them to himſelfe.

58

Iniuries hurt not more in the receiuing, than in the remembrance. A ſmall iniurie ſhall goe as it comes: a great iniurie may dine or ſup with me; but none at all ſhall lodge with me. Why ſhould I vex my ſelfe, becauſe another hath vexed me?

59

It is good dealing with that, ouer which we haue the moſt power. If my ſtate will not be framed to my minde, I will labour to frame my minde to my eſtate.

60

It is a great miſerie to be either alwaies, or neuer alone: ſocietie of men hath not ſo much

gaine

gaine as diſtraction. In greateſt companie I will bee alone to my ſelfe : in greateſt priuacie, in companie with God.

61

Griefe for things paſt that cannot be remedied, and care for things to come that cannot be preuented, may eaſily hurt, can neuer benefit me. I will therefore commit my ſelfe to God in both, and enioy the preſent.

62

Let my eſtate bee neuer ſo meane, I will euer keepe my ſelfe rather beneath, than either leuell or aboue it. A man may riſe when he will, with honour : but cannot fall without ſhame.

63

Nothing doth ſo befoole a man, as extreme paſſion. This doth both make them fooles, which otherwiſe are not ; and ſhew them to bee fooles, that are ſo. Violent paſſions, if I cannot tame them, that they may yeeld to my eaſe ; I will at leaſt ſmother them by concealement, that they may not appeare to my ſhame.

64

The minde of man, though infinite in deſire, yet is finite in capacitie. Since I cannot hope to know all things, I will labour firſt to know what I needs muſt, for their vſe ; next, what I beſt may, for their conuenience.

65

Though time be precious to me (as all irreuocable good things deſerue to be) and of all other things, I would not be lauiſh of it ; yet I will account no time loſt, that is either lent to, or beſtowed vpon my friend.

66

The practiſes of the beſt men are more ſubiect to errour than their ſpeculations. I will honour good examples : but I will liue by good precepts.

67

As charitie requires forgetfulneſſe of euill deeds : ſo patience requires forgetfulneſſe of euill accidents. I will remember euils paſt, to humble me ; not to vex me.

68

It is both a miſerie and a ſhame for a man to bee a Bankrupt in loue : which hee may eaſily pay, and be neuer the more impoueriſhed. I will be in no mans debt, for good will: but will at leaſt returne euery man his owne meaſure, if not with vſurie. It is much better to bee a Creditor, than a Debtor, in any thing ; but eſpecially of this : yet of this I will ſo bee content to bee a Debtor, that I will alwaies bee paying it where I owe it ; and yet neuer will haue ſo paid it, that I ſhall not owe it more.

69

The Spaniſh Prouerbe is too true ; Dead men and abſent finde no friends. All mouthes are boldly opened, with a conceit of impunitie. My eare ſhall bee no graue to burie my friends good name. But as I will bee my preſent friends ſelfe ; So will I bee my abſent friends deputie ; to ſay for him what he would (and cannot) ſpeake for himſelfe.

The loſſe of my friend, as it ſhall moderately grieue mee ; ſo it ſhall another way much benefit mee ; in recompence of his want : for it ſhall make mee thinke more often, and and ſeriouſly of earth, and of heauen. Of earth, for his body which is repoſed in it: Of Heauen, for his ſoule which poſſeſſeth it before mee: Of earth, to put me in minde of my like frailtie and mortality: Of Heauen, to make me deſire, and (after a ſort) emulate his happineſſe and glory.

Varietie of obiects is wont to cauſe diſtraction: when againe a little one, laid cloſe to the eye (if but of a peny breadth) wholly takes vp the ſight; which could elſe ſee the whole halfe Heauen at once. I will haue the eies of my minde euer fore-ſtalled, and filled with theſe two obiects; the ſhortneſſe of my life, eternity after death.

72

I ſee that he is more happy, that hath nothing to loſe, than he that loſeth that which he hath. I will therefore neither hope for riches, nor feare ponerty.

73

I care not ſo much in any thing for multitude, as for choice. Bookes and friends I will not haue many: I had rather ſeriouſly conuerſe with a few, than wander amongſt many.

74

The wicked man is a very coward, and is afraid of euery thing. Of God; becauſe he is his enemy: of Satan, becauſe he is his tormentor: of Gods creatures, becauſe they (ioyning with their Maker) fight againſt him: of himſelfe, becauſe he beares about him his owne accuſer and executioner. The godly man contrarily, is afraid of nothing. Not of God, becauſe he knowes him his beſt friend, and therefore will not hurt him: not of Satan, becauſe he cannot hurt him: not of afflictions, becauſe he knowes they proceed from a louing God, and end to his owne good: not of the creatures, ſince the very ſtones of the field are in league with him: not of himſelfe, ſince his conſcience is at peace. A wicked man may be ſecure, becauſe he knowes not what he hath to feare; or deſperate, through extremitie of feare: but, truly couragious he cannot be. Faithleſneſſe cannot chuſe but be falſe-hearted. I will euer, by my courage, take triall of my faith. By how much more I feare, by ſo much leſſe I beleeue.

75

The godly man liues hardly, and (like the Ant) toiles here, during the Summer of his peace, holding himſelfe ſhort of his pleaſures, as looking to prouide for an hard Winter. Which, when it comes, he is able to weare it out comfortably: whereas the wicked man doth prodigally laſh out all his ioyes, in the time of his proſperitie; and (like the Graſhopper) ſinging merrily all Summer, is ſtarued in Winter. I will ſo enioy the preſent, that I will lay vp more for hereafter.

I haue wondred oft, and bluſhed for ſhame, to reade in meere Philoſophers (which had no other Miſtreſſe, but Nature) ſuch ſtrange reſolution in the contempt of both fortunes (as they call them:) ſuch notable precepts for a conſtant ſetledneſſe and tranquillitie of minde; and to compare it with my owne diſpoſition, and practice: whom I haue found too much drouping and deiected vnder ſmall croſſes; and eaſily againe caried away with little proſperitie: To ſee ſuch courage and ſtrength to contemne death, in thoſe which thought they wholly periſhed in death; and, to finde ſuch faintheartedneſſe in my ſelfe, at the firſt conceit of death, who yet am thorowly perſwaded of the future happineſſe of my ſoule. I haue the benefit of nature as well as they; beſides infinite other helps that they wanted. Oh the dulneſſe and blindneſſe of vs vnworthy Chriſtians! that ſuffer Heathens, by the dim candle-light of Nature, to goe further than than we by the cleere Sun of the Gospell: that an indifferent man could not tell by our practice, whether were the Pagan. Let me neuer for shame account my selfe a Christian, vnlesse my Art of Christianitie haue imitated and gone beyond nature, so farre, that I can finde the best Heathen as farre below me in true resolution, as the vulgar sort were below them. Else, I may shame Religion; it can neither honest nor helpe me.

If I would be irreligious and vnconscionable, I would make no doubt to be rich. For if a man will defraud, dissemble, forsweare, bribe, oppresse, serue the time, make vse of all men for his owne turne, make no scruple of any wicked action for his aduantage; I cannot see how hee can escape wealth and preferment. But for an vpright man to rise, is difficult: while his conscience straightly curbes him in, from euery vniust action; and will not allow him to aduance himselfe by indirect meanes. So riches come seldome easily, to a good man; seldome hardly, to the conscienceless. Happy is that man that can be rich with truth, or poore with contentment. I will not enuy the gravell, in the vniust mans throat. Of riches let mee neuer haue more, than an honest man can beare away.

78

God is the God of order, not of confusion. As therefore, in naturall things, he vseth to proceed from one extreme to another by degrees, through the meane: so doth hee in spirituall. The Sun riseth not at once to his highest, from the darknesse of midnight; but first sends forth some feeble glimmering of light in the dawning; then lookes out with weake and watrish beames; and so by degrees ascends to the midst of heauen. So in the seasons of the yeere, we are not one day scorched with a Summer heat; and on the next, frozen with a sudden extremitie of cold. But Winter comes on softly; first, by cold dewes, then hoare frosts; vntill at last it descend to the hardest weather of all; such are Gods spirituall proceedings: He neuer brings any man from the estate of sin, to the estate of glory, but through the estate of grace. And as for grace, he seldome brings a man from grosse wickednesse to any eminence of perfection. I will be charitably iealous of those men, which from notorious lewdnesse leape at once into a sudden forwardnesse of profession. Holinesse doth not, like Ionas gourd, grow vp in a night. I like it better, to goe on, soft and sure, than for an haftie fit to runne my selfe out of winde; and after stand still and breathe me.

79

It hath beene said of old; To doe well and heare ill, is princely. Which as it is most true, by reason of the enuy which followes vpon iustice: so is the contrary no lesse iustified, by many experiments. To doe ill, and to heare well, is the fashion of many great men. To doe ill, because they are borne out with the assurance of impunitie: To heare well, because of abundance of Parasites; which as Rauens to a carkasse, gather about great men. Neither is there any so great misery in greatnesse as this, that it conceales men from themselues; and when they will needs haue a sight of their owne actions, it shewes them a false glasse to looke in. Meannesse of state (that I can finde) hath none so great inconuenience. I am no whit sorrie, that I am rather subiect to contempt, than flattery.

80

There is no earthly blessing so precious, as health of body: without which, all other worldly good things are but troublesome. Neither is there any thing more difficult, than to haue a good soule, in a strong and vigorous body (for, it is commonly seene, that the worse part drawes away the better:) But to haue an healthfull and sound soule, in a weake sickly body, is no noueltie; whiles the weaknesse of the body is an helpe to the soule; playing the part of a perpetuall monitor, to incite it to good, and checke it for euill. I will not be ouer-glad of health, nor ouer-fearefull of sicknesse. I will more

feare

feare the ſpirituall hurt, that may follow vpon health, than the bodily paine, that accompanies ſickneſſe.

81

There is nothing more troubleſome to a good minde, than to doe nothing. For, beſides the furtherance of our eſtate, the minde doth both delight, and better it ſelfe with exerciſe. There is but this difference then betwixt labour and idleneſſe; that labour is a profitable and pleaſant trouble: idleneſſe, a trouble both vnprofitable and comfortleſſe. I will be euer doing ſomething; that either God when he commeth, or Satan when he tempteth, may finde me buſied. And yet, ſince (as the old prouerbe is) better it is to be idle than effect nothing; I will not more hate doing nothing, than doing ſomething to no purpoſe. I ſhall doe good, but a while; let me ſtriue to doe it, while I may.

82

A faithfull man hath three eies: The firſt of ſenſe, common to him with brute creatures: the ſecond of reaſon, comnion to all men: the third of faith, proper to his profeſſion: whereof each looketh beyond other; and none of them medleth with others obiects. For, neither doth the eye of ſenſe reach to intelligible things and matters of diſcourſe: nor the eye of reaſon to thoſe things which are ſupernaturall and ſpirituall: neither doth faith looke downe, to things that may be ſenſibly ſeene. If thou diſcourſe to a brute beaſt of the depths of Philoſophy, neuer ſo plainly, he vnderſtands not, becauſe they are beyond the view of his eye, which is onely of ſenſe. If to a meere carnall man, of diuine things; he perceiueth not the things of God: neither indeed can doe, becauſe they are ſpiritually diſcerned. And therefore no wonder if thoſe things ſeeme vnlikely, incredible, impoſſible to him, which the faithfull man (hauing a proportionable meanes of apprehenſion) doth as plainly ſee, as his eye doth any ſenſible thing. Tell a plaine Country-man, that the Sunne, or ſome higher or leſſer ſtarre is much bigger than his Cart-wheele; or, at leaſt, ſo many ſcores bigger than the whole earth; hee laughes thee to ſcorne, as affecting admiration, with a learned vntruth. Yet the Scholler, by the eye of reaſon, doth as plainly ſee and acknowledge this truth, as that his hand is bigger than his pen. What a thicke miſt, yea what a palpable, and more than Egyptian darkneſſe, doth the naturall man liue in! what a world is there, that he doth not ſee at all! and how little doth he ſee in this, which is his proper element! There is no bodily thing, but the brute creatures ſee as well as he; and ſome of them better. As for his eye of reaſon, how dim is it in thoſe things which are beſt fitted to it! what one thing is there in nature, which he doth perfectly know? what herbe, or flowre, or worme that he treads on, is there, whoſe true eſſence he knoweth? No, not ſo much, as what is in his owne boſome; what it is, where it is, or whence it is that giues Being to himſelfe. But, for thoſe things which concerne the beſt world, he doth not ſo much as confuſedly ſee them; neither knoweth whether they be. Hee ſees no whit into the great and awfull Maieſtie of God. He diſcernes him not in all his creatures, filling the world with his infinite and glorious preſence. Hee ſees not his wiſe prouidence, ouerruling all things, diſpoſing all caſuall euents, ordring all ſinfull actions of men to his owne glory. He comprehends nothing of the beautie, maieſty, power, and mercy of the Sauiour of the world, ſitting in his humanity at his Fathers right hand. He ſees not the vnſpeakable happineſſe of the glorified ſoules of the Saints. He ſees not the whole heauenly Common-wealth of Angels (aſcending and deſcending to the behoofe of Gods children) waiting vpon him at all times inuiſibly (not excluded with cloſeneſſe of priſons, nor deſolateneſſe of wilderneſſes) and the multitude of euill ſpirits paſſing and ſtanding by him, to tempt him vnto euill: but, like vnto the fooliſh bird when he hath hid his head that he ſees no body, he thinkes himſelfe altogether vnſeene; and then counts himſelfe ſolitary, when his eye can meet with no companion. It was not without cauſe, that we call a meere foole a naturall. For how-euer worldlings haue ſtill thought Chriſtians Gods fooles, we know them the fooles of the world. The deepeſt Philoſopher that euer was (ſauing the reuerence of the Schooles) is but an ignorant for.

for, to the simplest Christian. For the weakest Christian may, by plaine information, see somwhat into the greatest mysteries of Nature, because he hath the eie of Reason common with the best: but the best Philosopher, by all the demonstration in the world, can conceiue nothing of the mysteries of godlines, because he vtterly wants the eie of faith. Though my insight into matters of the world be so shallow, that my simplicity moueth pitie, or maketh sport vnto others; it shall be my contentment and happines, that I see further into better matters. That which I see not, is worthlesse, and deserueth little better than contempt: that which I see, is vnspeakable, inestimable, for comfort, for glory.

83

It is not possible for an inferiour to liue at peace, vnlesse he haue learned to be contemned. For the pride of his superiors, and the malice of his equals and inferiors, shall offer him continuall & inuitable occasions of vnquietnes. As contentation is the mother of inward peace with our selues: so is humility the mother of peace with others. For if thou be vile in thine owne eies first, it shall the lesse trouble thee to be accounted vile of others. So that a man of an high heart, in a low place, cannot want discontentment: whereas a man of lowly stomack, can swallow and digest contempt, without any distemper. For, wherein can he be the worse for being contemned, who out of his own knowledge of his deserts, did most of all contemne himselfe? I should be very improuident, if in this calling I did not looke for daily contempt: wherein we are made a spectacle to the World, to Angels, and Men. When it comes, I will either embrace it, or contemne it: Embrace it, when it is within my measure; when aboue, contemne it. So embrace it; that I may more humble my selfe vnder it: and so contemne it, that I may not giue heart to him that offers it; nor disgrace him, for whom I am contemned.

84

Christ raised three dead men to life: One, newly departed; another, on the Bere; a third, smelling in the graue: to shew vs, that no degree of death is so desperate, that it is past helpe. My sinnes are many, and great: yet if they were more, they are farre below the mercy of him that hath remitted them, and the value of his ransome that hath payed for them. A man hurts himselfe most by presumption: but we cannot doe God a greater wrong, than to despaire of forgiuenesse. It is a double iniury to God, first, that we offend his iustice by sinning; then, that we wrong his mercy, with despairing, &c.

85

For a man to be weary of the world through miseries that he meets with (and for that cause to couet death) is neither difficult, nor commendable; but rather argues a base weaknesse of minde. So it may be a cowardly part, to contemne the vtmost of all terrible things, in a feare of lingering misery: but for a man either liuing happily here on earth, or resoluing to liue miserably, yet to desire his remouall to Heauen, doth well become a true Christian courage; and argues a noble mixture of patience and faith. Of patience, for that he can and dare abide to liue sorrowfully: of faith, for that he is assured of his better Being other-where, and therefore prefers the absent ioyes he looks for, to those he feeles in present: No sorrow shall make me wish my selfe dead, that I may not be at all. No contentment shall hinder me from wishing my selfe with Christ, that I may be happier.

It was not for nothing that the wise Creator of all things hath placed gold and siluer, and all precious minerals vnder our feet to be trod vpon, and hath hid them low in the bowels of the earth, that they cannot without great labour be either found, or gotten: whereas he hath placed the noblest part of his creation aboue our heads: and that so open to our view, that we cannot chuse but euery moment behold them. Wherein what did hee else intend, but to draw away our mindes from these worthlesse, and yet hidden hidden treasures, (to which he fore-saw wee would be too much addicted) and to call them to the contemplation of those better things, which (beside their beautie) are more obuious to vs, that in them wee may see and admire the glory of their Maker, and withall seeke our owne? How doe those men wrong themselues, and misconstrue God, who (as if he had hidden these things, because he would haue them sought, and laid the other open for neglect) bend themselues wholly to the seeking of these earthly commodities! and doe no more minde Heauen, than if there were none. If we could imagine a beast to haue reason, how could he be more absurd in his choice? How easie is it to obserue, that still the higher we goe, the more puritie and perfection we finde! (So earth is the very drosse and dregs of all the elements: water somewhat more pure than it; yet also more feculent than the aire aboue it: the lower aire lesse pure than his vppermost regions; and yet these as farre inferior to the lowest heauens: which againe are more exceeded by the glorious & Empyriall seat of God, which is the heauen of the iust:) Yet these brutish men take vp their rest, and place their felicitie in the lowest and worst of all Gods workmanship; not regarding that which with it owne glory can make them happy. Heauen is the proper place of my soule: I will send it vp thither continually in my thoughts, whiles it sojourns with me, before it goe to dwell there for euer.

A man need not to care for more knowledge, than to know himselfe: he needs no more pleasure, than to content himselfe: no more victory, than to ouercome himselfe: no more riches, than to enioy himselfe. What fooles are they that seeke to know all other things, & are strangers in themselues? that seeke altogether to satisfie other mens humors, with their owne displeasure: that seeke to vanquish Kingdomes and Countries, when they are not Masters of themselues, that haue no hold of their owne hearts, yet seeke to be possessed of all outward commodities. Goe home to thy selfe, first, vaine heart: and when thou hast made sure worke there, (in knowing, contenting, ouercomming, enioying thy selfe) spend all the superfluitie of thy time and labour, vpon others.

88

It was an excellent rule that fell from the Epicure (whose name is odious to vs, for the father of loosnesse;) That if a man would be rich, honorable, aged, he should not striue so much to adde to his wealth, reputation, yeeres, as to detract from his desires. For certainly, in these things which stand most vpon conceit, he hath the most that desireth least. A poore man that hath little, and desires no more, is in truth richer than the greatest Monarch, that thinketh hee hath not what hee should, or what hee might, or that grieues there is no more to haue. It is not necessitie, but ambition, that sets mens hearts on the racke. If I haue meat, drinke, apparell, I will learne therewith to be content. If I had the world full of wealth beside, I could enioy no more than I vse: the rest could please me no otherwise but by looking on. And why can I not thus solace my selfe, while it is others?

89

An inconstant and wauering minde, as it makes a man vnfit for societie (for that there can bee no assurance of his words, or purposes, neither can wee build on them, without deceit:) so, besides that, it makes a man ridiculous, it hinders him from euer attaining any perfection in himselfe, (for a rolling stone gathers no mosse; and the minde, while it would bee euery thing, proues nothing. Oft changes cannot bee without losse:) Yea, it keepes him from enioying that which he hath attained. For, it keepes him euer in worke; building, pulling downe, selling, changing, buying, commanding, forbidding. So, whiles he can be no other mans friend, hee is the least his owne. It is the safest course for a mans profit, credit, and ease, to deliberate long, to resolue surely; hardly to alter, not to enter vpon that, whose end hee fore-sees not answerable; and when hee is once entered, not to surcease till he haue attained the end he fore-saw. So may he, to good purpose, beginne a new worke, when he hath well finished the old.

90

The way to Heauen, is like that which Ionathan and his Armour-bearer paſſed, betwixt two rocks; one Bozez, the other Seneh; that is, foule and thornie: whereto wee muſt make ſhift to climbe on our hands and knees; but when wee are come vp, there is victorie and triumph. Gods children haue three ſutes of apparell, (whereof two are worne daily, on earth; the third laid vp for them in the Ward-rope of Heauen: They are euer either in blacke, mourning; in red, perſecuted; or in white, glorious. Any way ſhall bee pleaſant to me, that leads vnto ſuch an end. It matters not, what rags, or what colours I weare with men; ſo I may walke with my Sauiour in white, and reigne with him in glorie.

There is nothing more eaſie, than to ſay Diuiniti- by rote; and to diſcourſe of ſpirituall matters from the tongue or pen of others: but to heare God ſpeake it to the ſoule, and to feele the power of Religion in our ſelues, and to expreſſe it out of the truth of experience within, is both rare, and hard. All that wee feele not in the matters of God, is but hypocriſie: and therefore the more wee profeſſe, the more wee ſinne. It will neuer be well with mee, till in theſe greateſt things I bee careleſſe of others cenſures, fearefull onely of Gods, and my owne: till ſound experience haue really catechiſed my heart, and made me know God, and my Sauiour, otherwiſe than by words; I will neuer bee quiet till I can ſee, and feele, and taſte God: my hearing I will account as onely ſeruing to effect this, and my ſpeech onely to expreſſe it.

92.

There is no enemie can hurt vs, but by our owne hands. Satan could not hurt vs, if our owne corruption betraied vs not: afflictions cannot hurt vs without our owne impatience: tentations cannot hurt vs, without our owne yeeldance: death could not hurt vs, without the ſting of our owne ſinnes: ſinne could not hurt vs, without our owne impenitence: how might I defie all things, if I could obtaine not to be my owne enemie? I loue my ſelfe too much, and yet not enough. O God, teach me to wiſh my ſelfe but ſo well as thou wiſheſt me, and I am ſafe.

93

It grieues me to ſee all other creatures ſo officious to their Maker in their kinde: that both winds, and ſea, and heauen, and earth, obey him with all readineſſe, that each of theſe heares other, and all of them their Creator, though to the deſtruction of themſelues; and Man onely is rebellious, imitating herein the euill ſpirits, who in the receit of a more excellent kinde of reaſon, are yet more peruerſe: hence it is, that the Prophets are oft times faine to turne their ſpeech to the earth, void of all ſenſe and life, from this liuing earth informed with reaſon: that onely which ſhould make vs more pliable, ſtifneth vs. God could force vs, (if hee pleaſed) but hee had rather incline vs by gentleneſſe. I muſt ſtoope to his power, why doe I not ſtoope to his will? It is a vaine thing to reſiſt his voice, whoſe hand we cannot reſiſt.

94

As all naturall bodies are mixt; ſo muſt all our morall diſpoſition: no ſimple paſſion doth well. If our ioy be not allayed with ſorrow, it is madneſſe: and if our ſorrow bee not tempered with ſome mixture of ioy, it is helliſh and deſperate: if in theſe earthly things, we hope without all doubt, or feare without all hope, wee offend on both ſides; if we labour without all recreation, we grow dull and heartleſſe: if wee ſport our ſelues without all labour, wee grow wilde and vnprofitable: theſe compoſitions are wholſome, as for the bodie, ſo for the minde; which though it bee not of a compounded ſubſtance, as the body; yet hath much varietie of qualities and affections, and thoſe contrarie to each

each other. I care not how ſimple my heauenly affections are, which the more free they are from compoſition, are the neerer to God: nor how compounded my earthly, which are eaſily ſubiect to extremities: if ioy come alone, I will aske him for his fellow; and euermore in ſpight of him, couple him with his contrarie: that ſo while each are enemies to other, both may be friends to me.

95

Ioy and ſorrow are hard to conceale: as from the countenance, ſo from the tongue; there is ſo much correſpondence betwixt the heart and the tongue, that they will moue at once: euery man therefore ſpeakes of his owne pleaſure and care: the Hunter and Falconer of his games; the Plough-man of his teame; the Souldier of his march, and colours. If the heart were as full of God, the tongue could not refraine to talke of him. The rarenesse of Chriſtian communication, argues the common pouertie of grace. If Chriſt bee not in our hearts, we are godleſſe: if hee be there without our ioy, wee are ſenſeleſſe: if wee reioice in him, and ſpeake not of him, wee are ſhamefully vnthankfull: euery man taketh, yea raiſeth occaſion to bring in ſpeech of what he liketh. As I will thinke of thee alwaies, O Lord, ſo it ſhall be my ioy to ſpeake of thee often: and if I finde not opportunitie, I will make it.

96

When I ſee my Sauiour hanging in ſo forlorne a faſhion, vpon the Croſſe; his head drouping downe, his temples bleeding with thornes, his hands and feet with the nailes, and ſide with the ſpeare; his enemies round about him, mocking at his ſhame, and inſulting ouer his impotence: how ſhould I thinke any otherwiſe of him, than, as himſelfe complaineth, forſaken of his Father? But when againe I turne mine eies, and ſee the Sunne darkened, the earth quaking, the rocks rent, the graues opened, the theefe confeſſing, to giue witneſſe to his Deitie; and when I ſee ſo ſtrong a guard of prouidence ouer him, that all his malicious enemies are not able ſo much as to breake one bone of that body, which ſeemed careleſſly neglected, I cannot but wonder at his glorie, and ſafetie. God is euer neere, though oft vnſeene; and if he winke at our diſtreſſe, he ſleepeth not: the ſenſe of others muſt not bee iudges of his preſence, and care; but our faith: what care I, if the world giue me vp for miſerable, whiles I am vnder his ſecret protection? O Lord, ſince thou art ſtrong in our weakneſſe, and preſent in our ſenſleſneſſe; giue mee but as much comfort in my ſorrow, as thou giueſt mee ſecuritie, and at my worſt I ſhall bee well.

97

In ſinnes and afflictions our courſe muſt bee contrarie: wee muſt beginne to deteſt the greateſt ſinne firſt, and deſcend to the hatred of the leaſt; wee muſt firſt beginne to ſuffer ſmall afflictions with patience, that we may aſcend to the indurance of the greateſt. Then alone ſhall I be happy, when by this holy method, I haue drawne my ſoule to make conſcience of the leaſt euill of ſinne, and not to ſhrinke at the greateſt euill of affliction.

98

Preſcription is no plea againſt the King: much leſſe can long cuſtome pleade for error againſt that our ſupreme Lord, to whom a thouſand yeeres are but as yeſterday: yea, Time, which pleads voluntarily for continuance of things lawfull, will take no fee, not to ſpeake againſt an euill vſe. Hath an ill cuſtome laſted long? it is more than time it were abrogated: age is an aggrauation to ſinne. Hereſie or abuſe, if it be gray-headed, deſerues ſharper oppoſition: to ſay, I will doe ill becauſe I haue done ſo, is perillous and impious preſumption: continuance can no more make any wickedneſſe ſafe, than the author of ſinne, no Deuill: If I haue once ſinned, it is too much; if oft, woe bee to mee, if the iteration of my offence cauſe boldneſſe, and not rather more ſorrow, more deteſtation: woe be to me and my ſinne, if I be not the better becauſe I haue ſinned.

99

It is ſtrange to ſee the varieties and proportion of ſpirituall and bodily diets: there bee ſome creatures that are fatted and delighted with poyſons: others liue by nothing but aire; and ſome (they ſay) by fire: others will taſte no water, but muddie: others feed on their fellowes, or (perhaps) on part of themſelues: others, on the excretions of nobler creatures: ſome ſearch into the earth for ſuſtenance, or diue into the waters; others content themſelues with what the vpper earth yeelds them without violence. All theſe and more, are anſwered in the palate of the ſoule: there bee ſome (yea the moſt) to whom ſinne (which is of a moſt venemous nature) is both food and dainties; others, that thinke it the onely life, to feed on the popular aire of applauſe; others that are neuer well out of the fire of contentions; and that wilfully trouble all waters with their priuate humours and opinions; others, whoſe crueltie delights in oppreſſion, and bloud; yea, whoſe enuie gnawes vpon their owne hearts; others, that take pleaſure to reuiue the wicked and foule hereſies of the greater wits of the former times; others, whoſe worldly mindes root altogether in earthly cares; or who not content with the ordinarie prouiſion of doctrine, affect obſcure ſubtilties; vnknowne to wiſer men; others, whoſe too indifferent mindes feed on what-euer opinion comes next to hand, without any carefull diſquiſition of truth; ſo ſome feed foule: others (but few) cleane and wholſome. As there is no beaſt vpon Earth, which hath not his like in the Sea, and which (perhaps) is not in ſome ſort parallelled in the plants of the earth: ſo there is no beſtiall diſpoſition, which is not anſwerably found in ſome men. Mankinde therefore hath within it ſelfe his Goats, Chameleons, Salamanders, Camels, Wolues, Dogs, Swine, Moles, and whatsoeuer ſorts of beaſts: there are but a few men amongſt men: to a wiſe man the ſhape is not ſo much as the qualities: If I be not a man within, in my choices, affections, inclinations; it had beene better for mee to haue beene a beaſt without: A beaſt is but like it ſelfe; but an euill man is halfe a beaſt, and halfe a Deuill.

Forced fauours are thankleſſe; and commonly with noble mindes finde no acceptation; for a man to giue his ſoule to God, when he ſees he can no longer hold it: or to beſtow his goods, when he is forced to depart with them: or to forſake his ſinne, when hee cannot follow it, are but vnkinde and cold obediences: God ſees our neceſſitie, and ſcornes our compelled offers; what man of any generous ſpirit will abide himſelfe made the laſt refuge of a craued, denied, and conſtrained courteſie? While God giues mee leaue to keepe my ſoule, yet then to bequeathe it to him; and whiles ſtrength and opportunitie ſerue mee to ſinne, then to forſake it, is both accepted and crowned: God loues neither grudged, nor neceſſarie gifts: I will offer betimes: that hee may vouchſafe to take: I will giue him the beſt, that he may take all.

O God, giue me this grace, that I may giue thee my ſelfe, freely, and ſeaſonably: and then I know thou canſt not but accept me, becauſe this gift is thine owne.

TO THE RIGHT WORSHIPFVLL, SIR

EDMVND BACON, Knight, increase of honour, strength of body, perfection of VERTVE.

SIR, There is no wise man would giue his thoughts for all the world: which as they are the most pleasing and noble businesse of man, being the naturall and immediate issue of that reason, whereby he is seuered from brute creatures: so they are in their vse most beneficiall to our selues, and others. For, by the meanes hereof, we enioy both God and our selues; and hereby we make others partners of those rich excellencies, which God hath hid in the minde. And though it be most easie and safe, for a man, with the Psalmist to commune with his owne heart in silence; yet is it more behouefull to the common good, for which (both as men and Christians) we are ordained, that those thoughts, which our experience hath found comfortable and fruitfull to our selues, should (with neglect of all censures) be communicated to others. The concealement whereof (me thinkes) can proceed from no other ground, but either timorousnesse, or enuie. Which consideration hath induced me to clothe these naked thoughts in plaine and simple words, and to aduenture them into the light, after their fellowes: Consecrating them the rather to your name, for that (besides all other respects of dutie) they are part of those meditations, tions, which in my late peregrination with you, tooke me vp vnder the solitarie hilles of Ardenna, wanting as then the opportunitie of other employment. I offer them to you not for that your selfe is not stored with choice of better; but as poore men vse to bring presents to the rich: If they may carrie acceptation from you, and bring profit vnto any soule, it shall abundantly satisfie mee, who should thinke it honour enough, if I might be vouchsafed to bring but one pinne towards the decking of the Spouse of Christ; whiles others, out of their abundance, adorne her with costly robes, and rich medals. I commend their successe to God, their patronage to you, their vse to the world. That God multiplie his rare fauours vpon you, and your worthy Ladie; and goe you on to fauour

Your Worships humbly deuoted,

MEDITATIONS
AND

1

GOod men are placed by God, as ſo many ſtarres in the lower firmament of the world. As they muſt imitate thoſe heauenly bodies, in their light and influence; ſo alſo in their motion: and therefore as the Planets haue a courſe proper to themſelues, againſt the ſway of the Heauen that carries them about; ſo muſt each good man haue a motion out of his owne iudgement, contrary to the cuſtomes and opinions of the vulgar; finiſhing his owne courſe with the leaſt ſhew of reſiſtance. I will neuer affect ſingularity, except it bee among thoſe that are vicious. It is better to doe, or thinke well alone, than to follow a multitude in euill.

What ſtrange variety of actions doth the eie of God ſee at once round about the compaſſe of the earth, and within it! Some building houſes; ſome deluing for metals; ſome marching in troups, or encamping one againſt another; ſome bargaining in the market; ſome trauelling on their way; ſome praying in their cloſets; others quaffing at the Tauerne; ſome rowing in the Gallies; others dallying in their chambers; and in ſhort, as many different actions as perſons: yet all haue one common intention of good to themſelues; true in ſome, but in the moſt, imaginary. The glorified Spirits haue but one vniforme worke, wherein they all ioyne; The praiſe of their Creator. This is one difference betwixt the Saints aboue, and below: They aboue are free both from buſineſſe, and diſtraction; theſe below are free (though not abſolutely) from diſtraction, not at all from buſineſſe. Paul could thinke of the cloke that he left at Troas; and of the ſhaping of his skins for his Tents: yet, thorow theſe he look't ſtill at heauen. This world is made for buſineſſe: my actions muſt vary according to occaſions: my end ſhall be but one, and the ſame now on earth, that it muſt be one day in heauen.

To ſee how the Martyrs of God died, and the life of their perſecutors, would make a man out of loue with life, and out of all feare of death. They were fleſh and bloud, as well as we; life was as ſweet to them, as to vs; their bodies were as ſenſible of paine as ours; ours; wee goe to the ſame heauen with them. How comes it then, that they were ſo courragious in abiding ſuch torments in their death, as the very mention ſtrikes horror into any Reader, and we are ſo cowardly in encountering a faire and naturall death? if this valour had beene of themſelues, I would neuer haue looked after them in hope of imitation. Now, I know it was he for whom they ſuffered, and that ſuffered in them, which ſuſtained them. They were of themſelues as weake as I; and God can bee as ſtrong in me as hee was in them. O Lord, thou art not more vnable to giue me this grace; but I am more vnworthie to receiue it: and yet thou regardeſt not worthineſſe, but mercie. Giue mee their ſtrength, and what end thou wilt.

Our firſt age is all in hope. When wee are in the wombe, who knowes whether wee ſhall haue our right ſhape and proportion of body, being neither monſtrous nor deformed? When wee are borne, who knowes whether with the due features of a man, wee ſhall haue the faculties of reaſon and vnderſtanding? When yet our progreſſe in yeeres diſcouereth wit or follie; who knowes, whether with the power of reaſon wee ſhall haue the grace of faith to bee Chriſtians? and when wee begin to profeſſe well, whether it bee a temporarie, and ſeeming, or a true and ſauing faith? Our middle age is halfe in hope for the future, and halfe in proofe for that is paſt: Our old age is out of hope, and altogether in proofe. In our laſt times therefore we know, both what wee haue beene, and what to expect. It is good for youth to looke forward, and ſtill to propound the beſt things vnto it ſelfe; for an old man to looke backward, and to repent him of that wherein he hath failed, and to recollect himſelfe for the preſent: but in my middle age I will looke both backward and forward; comparing my hopes with my proofe; redeeming the time, ere it be all ſpent, that my recouerie may preuent my repentance. It is both a folly and miſerie to ſay, This I might haue done.

It is the wonderfull mercie of God, both to forgiue vs our debts to him in our ſinnes, and to make himſelfe a debtor to vs in his promiſes. So that now both waies the ſoule may be ſure; ſince hee neither calleth for thoſe debts which hee hath once forgiuen; nor withdraweth thoſe fauours, and that heauen which hee hath promiſed: but as hee is a merciſull creditor to forgiue, ſo is hee a true debtor to pay whatſoeuer hee hath vndertaken: whence it is come to paſſe, that the penitent ſinner owes nothing to God but loue and obedience, and God owes ſtill much and all to him: for he owes as much as he hath promiſed; and what he owes by vertue of his bleſſed promiſe, we may challenge. O infinite mercie! Hee that lent vs all that wee haue, and in whoſe debt-bookes wee runne hourely forward till the ſumme be endleſſe; yet owes vs more, and bids vs looke for payment. I cannot deſerue the leaſt fauour hee can giue; yet will I as confidently challenge the greateſt, as if I deſerued it. Promiſe indebteth no leſſe than loane or deſert.

It is no ſmall commendation to manage a little well. He is a good Waggoner that can turne in a narrow roome. To liue well in abundance, is the praiſe of the eſtate, not of the perſon. I will ſtudie more how to giue a good account of my little, than how to make it more?

7

Many Chriſtians doe greatly wrong themſelues with a dull and heauie kinde of ſullenneſſe; who not ſuffering themſelues to delight in any worldly thing, are thereupon oft-times ſo heartleſſe, that they delight in nothing. Theſe men, like to careleſſe gueſts, when they are inuited to an excellent banquet, loſe their dainties for want of a ſtomacke; and loſe their ſtomacke for want of exerciſe. A good conſcience keepes alwaies good cheere: hee cannot chuſe but fare well that hath it, vnleſſe hee loſe his appetite with neglect

neglect and ſlothfulneſſe. It is a ſhame for vs Chriſtians, not to finde as much ioy in God, as worldlings doe in their forced meriments; and lewd wretches in the practice of their ſinnes.

8

A wiſe Chriſtian hath no enemies. Many hate and wrong him: but hee loues all men, and all pleaſure him. Thoſe that profeſſe loue to him, pleaſure him with the comfort of their ſocietie, and the mutuall reflection of friendſhip: thoſe that profeſſe hatred, make him more warie of his waies; ſhew him faults in himſelfe, which his friends would either not haue eſpied, or not cenſured; ſend him the more willingly to ſeeke fauour aboue; and as the worſt doe beſtead him, though againſt their wills; ſo hee againe doth voluntarily good to them. To doe euill for euill, as Ioab to Abner, is a ſinfull weakneſſe: To doe good for good, as Aha ſuerus to Mordecai, is but naturall iuſtice: To doe euill for good, as Iudas to Chriſt, is vnthankfulneſſe and villanie: Onely to doe good for euill, agrees with Chriſtian profeſſion. And what greater worke of friendſhip, than to doe good? If men will not be my friends in loue, I will perforce make them my friends in a good vſe of their hatred. I will be their friend, that are mine, and would not be.

All temporall things are troubleſome. For if wee haue good things, it is a trouble to forgoe them; and when wee ſee they muſt bee parted from, either wee wiſh they had not beene ſo good, or that wee neuer had enioyed them. Yea, it is more trouble to loſe them, than it was before ioy to poſſeſſe them. It contrarily, wee haue euill things, their very preſence is troubleſome; and ſtill we wiſh that they were good, or that we were disburdened of them. So good things are troubleſome in euent, euill things in their vſe. They in the future, theſe in preſent: they, becauſe they ſhall come to an end; theſe, becauſe they doe continue. Tell mee, thy wife, or thy childe lies dying, and now makes vp a louing and dutifull life, with a kinde and louing parture; whether hadſt thou rather for thy owne part, ſhee had beene ſo good, or worſe? would it haue coſt thee ſo many heartie ſighs and teares, if ſhee had beene peruerſe and diſobedient? yet if in her life time I put thee to this choice, thou thinkeſt it no choice at all, in ſuch inequalitie. It is more torment (ſaieſt thou) to liue one vnquiet moneth, than it is pleaſure to liue an age in loue. Or if thy life bee yet dearer: Thou haſt liued to gray haires, not haltened with care, but bred with late ſucceſſion of yeeres. Thy table was euer couered with varietie of diſhes. Thy backe ſoftly and richly clad: Thou neuer gaueſt deniall to either skinne or ſtomacke: Thou euer fauouredſt thy ſelfe; and health, thee. Now death is at thy threſhold, and vnpartially knocks at thy doore, doſt thou not wiſh thou hadſt liued with crufts, and beene clothed with rags? Wouldſt not thou haue giuen a better welcome to death, if hee had found thee, lying vpon a pallet of ſtraw, and ſupping of water-gruell; after many painefull nights, and many ſides changed in vaine? Yet this beggerly eſtate thou deteſteſt in health, and pitieſt in others, as truly miſerable. The ſumme is; A begger wiſheth hee might bee a Monarch while he liues; and the great Potentate wiſheth he had liued a begger when he comes to die: and, if beggerie bee to haue nothing, hee ſhall bee ſo in death, though he wiſhed it not. Nothing therefore but eternitie can make a man truly happy; as nothing can make perfect miſerie but eternitie: for as temporall good things afflict vs in their ending, ſo temporall ſorrowes afford vs ioy in the hope of their end. What folly is this in vs to ſeeke for our trouble, to neglect our happineſſe? I can bee but well; and this that I was well, ſhall one day bee grieuous. Nothing ſhall pleaſe mee, but that once I ſhall be happie for euer.

10

The eldeſt of our fore-fathers liued not ſo much as a day to God, to whom a thouſand yeeres is as no more; we liue but as an houre to the day of our fore-fathers: for if nine hundred and ſixtie were but their day, our foureſcore is but as the twelfth part of it: and

yet of this our houre we liue ſcarce a minute to God. For, take away all that time that is conſumed in ſleeping, dreſſing, feeding, talking, ſporting; of that little time there can remaine not much more than nothing: yet the moſt ſeeke paſtimes to haſten it. Thoſe which ſeeke to mend the pace of Time, ſpurre a running horſe. I had more need to redeeme it with double care and labour, than to ſeeke how to ſell it for nothing.

11

Each day is a new life, and an abridgement of the whole. I will ſo liue, as if I counted euery day my firſt, and my laſt: as if I began to liue but then, and ſhould liue no more afterwards.

12

It was not in vaine, that the ancient founders of languages vſed the ſame word in many tongues, to ſignifie both Honour and Charge; meaning therein to teach vs the inſeparable connexion of theſe two. For there ſcarce euer was any charge without ſome opinion of honour: neither euer was there honour without a charge; which two as they are not without reaſon ioined together in name by humane inſtitution, ſo they are moſt wiſely coupled together by God in the diſpoſition of theſe worldly eſtates. Charge without Honour, to make it amends, would be too toileſome, and muſt needs diſcourage and ouer-lay a man. Honour without charge would bee too pleaſant, and therefore both would be too much ſought after, and muſt needs carrie away the minde in the enioying it. Now many dare not bee ambitious, becauſe of the burden; chuſing rather to liue obſcurely and ſecurely: And yet on the other ſide thoſe that are vnder it, are refreſhed in the Charge with the ſweetneſſe of Honour. Seeing they cannot bee ſeparated, it is not the worſt eſtate to want both. They whom thou enuieſt for Honour, perhaps enuie thee more for thy quietneſſe.

13

Hee that taketh his owne cares vpon himſelfe, loades himſelfe in vaine with an vneaſie burden. The feare of what may come, expectation of what will come, deſire of what will not come, and inabilitie of redreſſing all theſe, muſt needs breed him continuall torment. I will caſt my cares vpon God, hee hath bidden mee: they cannot hurt him; hee can redreſſe them.

14

Our infancie is full of folly; youth, of diſorder and toyle; age, of infirmitie. Each time hath his burden, and that which may iuſtly worke our wearineſſe: yet infancie longeth after youth; and youth, after more age: and he that is very old, as he is a childe for ſimplicitie, ſo he would be for yeeres. I account old age the beſt of three; partly, for that it hath paſſed thorow the folly and diſorder of the others; partly, for that the inconueniences of this are but bodily, with a bettered eſtate of the minde; and partly, for that it is neereſt to diſſolution. There is nothing more miſerable, than an old man that would bee young againe. It was an anſwer worthy the commendations, of Petrarch, and that which argued a minde truly philoſophicall of him, who when his friend bemoned his age appearing in his white temples, telling him he was ſorry to ſee him looke ſo old, replied: Nay, be ſorrie rather that euer I was young, to be a foole.

There is not the leaſt action or euent (what-euer the vaine Epicures haue imagined) which is not ouer-ruled, and diſpoſed by a prouidence: which is ſo farre from detracting ought from the maieſtie of God for that the things are ſmall, as that there can bee no greater honour to him, than to extend his prouidence and decree to them becauſe they are infinite. Neither doth this hold in naturall things onely, which are chained one to another by a regular order of ſucceſſion, but euen in thoſe things which fall out by caſualtie casualtie and imprudence: whence that worthy Father, when as his speech digressed his intention to a confutation of the errors of the Manichees, could presently gheſſe, that in that vnpurposed turning of it, God intended the conuersion of some vnknowne Auditor; as the euent proued his coniecture true ere many daies. When ought falls out contrary to that I purposed, it shall content me, that God purposed it as it is falne out: so the thing hath attained his owne end, whiles it missed mine. I know what I would, but God knoweth what I should will. It is enough that his will is done, though mine be crossed.

It is the most thankleſſe office in the world, to be a mans Pandar vnto sinne. In other wrongs, one man is a Wolfe to another: but in this, a Deuill. And, though at the first this damnable seruice carry away reward, yet in conclusion, it is requited with hatred and curses. For, as the sicke man extremely distasted with a loathsome potion, hateth the very cruze wherein it was brought him; so doth the conscience, once soundly detesting sinne, loath the meanes that induced him to commit it. Contrarily, who withstands a man in his prosecution of a sin, while he doteth vpon it, beares away frownes, and heart-burnings for a time: but when the offending partie comes to himselfe, and right reason, he recompenseth his former dislike with so much more loue, and so many more thankes. The franticke man returned to his wits, thinkes him his best friend that bound him, and beat him most. I will doe my best to crosse any man in his sinnes: if I haue not thanks of him, yet of my conscience I shall.

17

God must be magnified in his very iudgements. He looks for praise, not onely for heauen, but for hell also. His iustice is himselfe, as well as his mercy. As heauen then is for the praise of his mercy; so hell for the glory of his iustice. We must therefore be so affected to iudgements as the author of them is, who delighteth not in bloud, as it makes his creature miserable, but as it makes his iustice glorious. Euery true Christian then must learne to sing that compound dittie of the Psalmist: Of mercy and iudgement. It shall not onely ioy me to see God gracious and bountifull in his mercies, and deliuerances of his owne; but also to see him terrible in vengeance to his enemies. It is no crueltie to reioyce in iustice. The foolish mercy of men is cruelty to God.

Rareneſſe causeth wonder, and more than that, incredulitie, in those things which in themselues are not more admirable, than the ordinary proceedings of Nature. If a blazing starre be seene in the sky, euery man goes forth to gaze; and spends, euery euening, some time in wondring at the beames of it. That any fowle should be bred of corrupted wood resolued into wormes: or that the Chameleon should euer change his colours, and liue by aire: that the Ostrich should digest Iron: that the Phœnix should burne her selfe to ashes, and from thence breed a successor; we wonder, and can scarce credit. Other things more vsuall, no lesse miraculous, we know and neglect. That there should be a bird, that knoweth, and noteth the houres of day and night, as certainly as any Astronomer by the course of Heauen, if we knew not, who would beleeue? Or that the Load-stone should by his secret vertue so draw iron to it selfe, as that a whole chaine of needles should all hang by insensible points at each other, onely by the influence that it sends downe from the first, if it were not ordinary, would seeme incredible. Who would beleeue when he sees a fowle mounted as high as his sight can descry it, that there were an engine to be framed, which could fetch it downe into his fist? Yea, to omit infinite examples, that a little despised creature should weaue nets out of her owne entrailes, and in her platformes of building should obserue as iust proportions as the best Geometrician, we should suspect for an vntruth, if we saw it not daily practised in our owne windowes. If the Sun should arise but once to the earth, I doubt, euery man would be a Persian, and fall downe and worship it: whereas now it riseth and declineth without any regard. Extraordinarie euents each man can wonder at. The frequence of Gods best workes causeth neglect: not that they are euer the worse for commonnesse; but because we are soone cloyed with the same conceit, and haue contempt bred in vs through familiaritie. I will learne to note Gods power and wisdome, and to giue him praise of both, in his ordinarie workes: so those things which are but triuiall to the most ignorant, shall be wonders to me; and that not for nine daies, but for euer.

Those that affect to tell nouelties and wonders, fall into many absurdities, both in busie enquirie after matters impertinent, and in a light credulitie, to what-euer they heare; and in fictions of their owne, and additions of circumstances to make their reports the more admired. I haue noted these men, not so much wondered at for their strange stories, while they are telling, as derided afterwards, when the euent hath wrought their disproofe and shame. I will deale with rumors as graue men doe by strange fashions, take them vp when they are growne into common vse before: I may beleeue, but I will not relate them but vnder the name of my author; who shall either warrant me with defence, if it be true; or if false, beare my shame.

20

It was a wittie and true speech of that obscure Heraclitus, That all men awaking are in one common world, but when we sleepe, each man goes into a seuerall world by himselfe; which though it be but a world of fancies, yet is the true image of that little world which is in euery mans heart. For the imaginations of our sleepe, shew vs what our disposition is awaking. And as many in their dreames reueale those their secrets to others, which they would neuer haue done awake: so all may and doe disclose to themselues in their sleepe those secret inclinations, which after much searching, they could not haue found out waking. I doubt not therefore, but as God heretofore hath taught future things in dreames (which kinde of reuelation is now ceased) so still he teacheth the present estate of the heart this way. Some dreames are from our selues, vaine and idle, like our selues: Others are diuine, which teach vs good, or moue vs to good: and others deuillish, which sollicite vs to euill. Such answer commonly shall I giue to any temptation in the day, as I doe by night. I will not lightly passe ouer my very dreames. They shall teach me somewhat; so neither night nor day shall be spent vnprofitably: the night shall teach me what I am, the day what I should be.

21

Men make difference betwixt seruants, friends, and sonnes. Seruants, though neere vs in place, yet for their inferioritie, are not familiar. Friends, though by reason of their equalitie, and our loue, they are familiar; yet still we conceiue of them as others from our selues. But children we thinke of, affectionately, as the diuided peeces of our owne bodies. But all these are one to God: his seruants are his friends, his friends are his sons, his sons his seruants. Many claime kinred of God, and professe friendship to him, because these are priuileges without difficultie, and not without honour: all the triall is in seruice. The other are most in affection, and therefore secret, and so may be dissembled, this consisting in action, must needs shew it selfe to the eies of others. Yee are my friends, if ye doe whatsoeuer I command you: friendship with God is in seruice, and this seruice is in action. Many weare Gods cloth, that know not their master, that neuer did good chare in his seruice: so that God hath many retainers that weare his liuerie, for a countenance, neuer wait on him; whom he will neuer owne for seruants either by fauour, or wages; few seruants, and therefore few sons. It is great fauour in God, and great honour to me, that he will vouchsafe to make me the lowest drudge in his family; which place if I had not, and were a Monarch of men, I were accursed. I desire no more

more but to ſerue; yet, Lord, thou giueſt me more, to be thy ſonne. I heare Dauid ſay, Seemeth it a ſmall matter to you, to be the ſonne in law to a King? What is it then, oh what is it, to bee the true adopted ſonne of the King of glory? Let me not now ſay as Dauid of Saul, but as Sauls grand-childe to Dauid; Oh, what is thy ſeruant, that thou ſhouldeſt looke vpon ſuch a dead dogge as I am?

22

I am a ſtranger here below, my home is aboue; yet I can thinke too well of theſe forraine vanities, and cannot thinke enough of my home. Surely, that is not ſo farre aboue my head, as my thoughts; neither doth ſo farre paſſe me in diſtance, as in comprehenſion: and yet I would not ſtand ſo much vpon conceiuing, if I could admire it enough: but my ſtraight heart is filled with a little wonder; and hath no roome for the greateſt part of glorie that remaineth. O God, what happineſſe haſt thou prepared for thy choſen? What a purchaſe was this, worthy of the bloud of ſuch a Sauiour? As yet I doe but looke towards it afarre off: but it is eaſie to ſee by the outſide, how goodly it is within: Although as thine houſe on earth; ſo that aboue hath more glorie within, than can be bewrayed by the outward appearance. The outer part of thy Tabernacle here below, is but an earthly and baſe ſubſtance; but within, it is furniſhed with a liuing, ſpirituall, and heauenly gueſt: ſo the outer heauens, though they bee as gold to all other materiall creatures; yet they are but droſſe to thee: yet how are euen the outmoſt walls of that houſe of thine, beautified with glorious lights, whereof euery one is a world for bigneſſe, and as an heauen for goodlineſſe! Oh teach me by this to long after, and wonder at the inner part, before thou letſt me come in to behold it.

23

Riches or beautie, or what-euer worldly good that hath beene, doth but grieue vs; that which is, doth not ſatisfie vs; that which ſhall be, is vncertaine. What folly is it to truſt to any of them?

24

Securitie makes worldlings merry: and therefore are they ſecure, becauſe they are ignorant. That is onely ſolid ioy, which ariſeth from a reſolution; when the heart hath caſt vp a full account of all cauſes of diſquietneſſe, and findeth the cauſes of his ioy more forcible: thereupon ſetling it ſelfe in a ſtaied courſe of reioicing. For the other, ſo ſoone as ſorrow makes it ſelfe to be ſeene, eſpecially in an vnexpected forme, is ſwallowed vp in deſpaire; whereas this can meet with no occurrence, which it hath not preuented in thought. Securitie and ignorance may ſcatter ſome refuſe morſels of ioy, ſawced with much bitterneſſe; or may be like ſome boaſting houſe-keeper, which keepeth open doores for one day with much cheere, and liues ſtaruedly all the yeere after. There is no good Ordinarie but in a good conſcience. I pitie that vnſound ioy in others, and will ſeeke for this ſound ioy in my ſelfe. I had rather weepe vpon a iuſt cauſe, than reioice vniuſtly.

25

As loue keepes the whole Law, ſo loue onely is the breaker of it; being the ground, as of all obedience, ſo of all ſinne; for whereas ſinne hath beene commonly accounted to haue two roots, Loue and Feare; it is plaine, that feare hath his originall from loue: for no man feares to loſe ought but what hee loues. Here is ſinne and righteouſneſſe brought both into a ſhort ſumme, depending both vpon one poore affection: It ſhall be my onely care therefore to beſtow my loue well, both for obiect, and meaſure. All that is good, I may loue, but in ſeuerall degrees; what is ſimply good, abſolutely; what is good by circumſtance, onely with limitation. There be theſe three things that I may loue without exception, God, my neighbour, my ſoule; yet ſo as each haue their due place: My body, goods, fame, &c. as ſeruants to the former. All other things I will either not care for, or hate.

26

One would not thinke, that pride and baſe-mindedneſſe ſhould ſo well agree; yea, that they loue ſo together, that they neuer goe aſunder. That enuie euer proceeds from a baſe minde, is granted of all: Now the proud man, as he faine would bee enuied of others, ſo he enuieth all men. His betters he enuies, becauſe he is not ſo good as they: he enuies his inferiours, becauſe he feares they ſhould proue as good as he: his equals, becauſe they are as good as he. So vnder bigge lookes, he beares a baſe minde, reſembling ſome Cardinals Mule, which to make vp the traine, beares a coſtly Port-mantle ſtuffed with traſh. On the contrary, who is more proud than the baſeſt? (the Cynicke tramples on Platoes pride, but with a worſe) eſpecially if he be but a little exalted; wherein wee ſee baſe men ſo much more haughtie, as they haue had leſſe before what they might be proud of. It is iuſt with God, as the proud man is baſe in himſelfe, ſo to make him baſely eſteemed in the eies of others; and at laſt to make him baſe without pride. I will contemne a proud man, becauſe he is baſe, and pitie him, becauſe he is proud.

27

Let me but haue time to my thoughts; but leiſure to thinke of Heauen, and grace to my leiſure; and I can be happy in ſpight of the world. Nothing, but God that giues it, can bereaue me of grace; and he will not; for his gifts are without repentance. Nothing but death can abridge me of time; and when I begin to want time to thinke of heauen, I ſhall haue eternall leiſure to enioy it. I ſhall be both waies happie, not from any vertue of apprehenſion in mee (which haue no peere in vnworthineſſe) but from the glorie of that I apprehend; wherein the act and obiect are from the author of happineſſe. He giues me this glorie; let me giue him the glorie of his gift. His glory is my happineſſe; let my glorie be his.

28

God beſtowes fauours vpon ſome in anger, as he ſtrikes otherſome in loue: (The Iſraelites had better haue wanted their Quailes, than to haue eaten them with ſuch ſawce.) And ſometimes at our inſtancie remouing a leſſer puniſhment, leaues a greater, though inſenſible, in the roome of it. I will not ſo much ſtriue againſt affliction, as diſpleaſure. Let me rather be afflicted in loue, than proſper without it.

29

It is ſtrange that we men hauing ſo continuall vſe of God, and being ſo perpetually beholding to him, ſhould be ſo ſtrange to him, and ſo little acquainted with him: ſince wee account it a peruerſe nature in any man, that being prouoked with many kinde offices, refuſes the familiaritie of a worthy friend, which doth ſtill ſeeke it, and hath deſerued it. Whence it comes, that we are ſo loth to thinke of our diſſolution and going to God: for naturally where we are not acquainted, we liſt not to hazard our welcome; chuſing rather to ſpend our money at a ſimple Inne, than to turne in for a free lodging to an vnknowne Oaſt, whom we haue onely heard of, neuer had friendſhip with; whereas to an entire friend, whoſe nature and welcome we know, and whom wee haue elſewhere familiarly conuerſed withal, we goe as boldly & willingly as to our home, knowing that no houre can be vnſeaſonable to ſuch a one: whiles on the other ſide we ſcrape acquaintance with the world, that neuer did vs good, euen after many repulſes. I will not liue with God, and in God, without his acquaintance, knowing it my happineſſe to haue ſuch a friend. I will not let one day paſſe without ſome act of renewing my familiaritie with him: not giuing ouer till I haue giuen him ſome teſtimonie of my loue to him, and ioy in him; and till he hath left behinde him ſome pledge of his continued fauour to me.

Men, for the moſt part, would neither die nor be old. When we ſee an aged man that hath hath ouer-liued all the teeth of his gums, the haire of his head, the ſight of his eies, the taſte of his palate; we profeſſe, we would not liue till ſuch a comberſome age wherein we proue burdens to our deareſt friends, and our ſelues: yet if it be put to our choice what yeere we would die, we euer ſhift it off till the next; and want not excuſes for this prorogation, rather than faile, alleaging, we would liue to amend; when yet wee doe but adde more to the heape of our ſinnes by continuance. Nature hath nothing to plead for this folly, but that life is ſweet: wherein wee giue occaſion of renewing that ancient checke, or one not vnlike to it, whereby that primitiue viſion taxed the timorouſneſſe of the ſhrinking Confeſſors; Yee would neither liue to bee old, nor die ere your age: what ſhould I doe with you? The Chriſtian muſt not thinke it enough to endure the thought of death with patience, when it is obtruded vpon him by neceſſitie; but muſt voluntarily call it into his minde with ioy; not onely abiding it ſhould come, but wiſhing that it might come. I will not leaue till I can reſolue, if I might die to day, not to liue till to morrow.

As a true friend is the ſweeteſt contentment in the world: ſo in his qualities hee well reſembleth hony, the ſweeteſt of all liquors. Nothing is more ſweet to the taſte, nothing more ſharpe and cleanſing, when it meets with an exulcerate ſore. For my ſelfe, I know I muſt haue faults; and therefore I care not for that friend, that I ſhall neuer ſmart by. For my friends, I know they cannot be faultleſſe; and therefore as they ſhall finde mee ſweet in their praiſes and encouragements, ſo ſharpe alſo in their cenſure. Either let them abide me no friend to their faults, or no friend to themſelues.

32

In all other things, we are lead by profit; but in the maine matter of all, we ſhew our ſelues vtterly vnthriftie; and whiles we are wiſe in making good markets in theſe baſe commodities, we ſhew our ſelues fooliſh in the great match of our ſoules. God and the world come both to one ſhop, and make proffers for our ſoules. The world, like a franke Chapman, ſayes, All theſe will I giue thee, ſhewing vs his bagges, and promotions, and thruſting them into our hands. God offers a crowne of glory, which yet he tels vs we muſt giue him day to performe, and haue nothing in preſent, but our hope and ſome ſmall earneſt of the bargaine. Though we know there is no compariſon betwixt theſe two in value, finding theſe earthly things vaine and vnable to giue any contentment, and thoſe other of inualuable worth and benefit: yet wee had rather take theſe in hand, than truſt God on his word for the future; while yet in the ſame kinde we chuſe rather to take ſome rich Lordſhips in reuerſion, after the long expectation of three liues expired, than a preſent ſumme much vnder foot: As contrarily, when God and the world are ſellers, and we come to the Mart, the world offers fine painted wares, but will not part with them vnder the price of our torment: God proclaimes; Come yee that want, buy for nought. Now we thriftie men, that trie all ſhops for the cheapeſt pennieworth, refuſe God, proffering his precious commodities for nothing; and pay an hard price for that which is worſe than nothing, painfull. Surely, wee are wiſe for any thing but our ſoules: and not ſo wiſe for the body, as fooliſh for them. O Lord, thy payment is ſure, and who knowes how preſent? Take the ſoule that thou haſt both made and bought: and let me rather giue my life for thy fauour, than take the offers of the world for nothing.

There was neuer age that more bragged of knowledge, and yet neuer any that had leſſe ſoundneſſe. He that knowes not God, knoweth nothing; and hee that loues not God, knowes him not: for hee is ſo ſweet, and infinitely full of delight, that who-euer knowes him, cannot chuſe but affect him. The little loue of God then argues the great ignorance euen of thoſe that profeſſe knowledge. I will not ſuffer my affections to run before my knowledge: for then I ſhall loue faſhionably onely, becauſe I heare God is worthy of loue; and ſo be ſubiect to relapſes: but I will euer lay knowledge as the ground of my loue. So, as I grow in diuine knowledge, I ſhall ſtill profit in an heauenly zeale.

Thoſe that trauell in long pilgrimages to the holy Land, what a number of wearie paſes they meaſure? what a number of hard lodgings, and knowne dangers they paſſe? and at laſt when they are come within view of their iournies end, what a large tribute pay they at the Piſan Caſtle to the Turkes? And when they are come thither, what ſee they but the bare Sepulcher wherein their Sauiour lay? and the earth that he trode vpon, to the increaſe of a carnall deuotion? What labour ſhould I willingly vndertake in my iourney to the true Land of promiſe, the celeſtiall Ieruſalem, where I ſhall ſee and enioy my Sauiour himſelfe? What tribute of paine or death ſhould I refuſe to pay for my entrance, not into his Sepulcher, but his Palace of glory? and that not to looke vpon, but to poſſeſſe it?

35

Thoſe that are all in exhortation, no whit in doctrine, are like to them that ſnuffe the candle, but powre not in oile. Againe, thoſe that are all in doctrine, nothing in exhortation, drowne the wike in oile, but light it not; making it fit for vſe, if it had fire put to it; but as it is, rather capable of good, than profitable in preſent. Doctrine, without exhortation, makes men all braine, no heart. Exhortation, without doctrine, makes the heart full, leaues the braine empty. Both together make a man: One makes a man wiſe; the other good. One ſerues that we may know our dutie; the other, that we may performe it. I will labour in both: but I know not in whether more. Men cannot practiſe, vnleſſe they know; and they know in vaine, if they practiſe not.

There be two things in euery good worke; honour and profit. The latter God beſtowes vpon vs, the former he keepes to himſelfe. The profit of our works redoundeth not to God. My weldoing extendeth not to thee. The honour of our worke may not be allowed vs. My glorie I will not giue to another. I will not abridge God of his part, that he may not bereaue me of mine.

37

The proud man hath no God; the enuious man hath no neighbour; the angry man hath not himſelfe. What can that man haue that wants himſelfe? What is a man better, if he haue himſelfe, and want all others? What is he the neerer, if hee haue himſelfe, and others, and yet want God? What good is it then to be a man, if he be either, wrathfull, proud, or enuious?

38

Man that was once the ſoueraigne Lord of all creatures, whom they ſeruiceably attended at all times, is now ſent to the very baſeſt of all creatures to learne good qualities, Goe to the Piſmire, &c. and ſee, the moſt contemptible creatures prefer'd before him: The Aſſe knoweth his owner; wherein we, like the miſerable heire of ſome great Peere, whoſe houſe is decaied through the treaſon of our progenitors, heare and ſee what Honours and Lord-ſhips wee ſhould haue had; but now finde our ſelues below many of the vulgar: we haue not ſo much cauſe of exaltation, that wee are men, and not beaſts; as we haue of humiliation, in thinking how much we were once better than we are, and that now in many duties we are men inferiour to beaſts: ſo as thoſe whom we contemne, if they had our reaſon, might more iuſtly contemne vs; and as they are, may teach vs by their examples, and doe condemne vs by their practice.

The idle man is the Deuils cuſhion, on which hee taketh his free eaſe: who as hee is vncapable vncapable of any good, ſo he is fitly diſpoſed for all euill motions. The ſtanding water ſoone ſtinketh; whereas the current euer keepes cleere and cleanly: conueying downe all noiſome matter that might infect it, by the force of his ſtreame. If I doe but little good to others by my endeuours, yet this is great good to me, that by my labour I keepe my ſelfe from hurt.

There can be no neerer coniunction in nature, than is betwixt the body and the ſoule: yet theſe two are of ſo contrarie diſpoſition, that as it falls out in an ill-matched man and wife, thoſe ſeruants which the one likes beſt, are moſt diſpraiſed of the other; ſo here, one ſtill takes part againſt the other in their choice: what benefits the one, is the hurt of the other. The glutting of the body pines the ſoule; and the ſoule thriues beſt when the body is pinched. Who can wonder, that there is ſuch faction amongſt others, that ſees ſo much in his very ſelfe? True wiſdome is to take, not with the ſtronger, as the faſhion of the world is, but with the better: following herein, not vſurped power, but iuſtice. It is not hard to diſcerne, whoſe the right is; whether the ſeruant ſhould rule or the miſtreſſe. I will labour to make and keepe the peace, by giuing each part his owne indifferently: but if more bee affected with an ambitious contention, I will rather beat Hagar out of dores, than ſhe ſhall ouer-rule her miſtreſſe.

41

I ſee Iron firſt heated red hot in the fire, and after beaten and hardened with cold water. Thus will I deale with an offending friend: firſt heat him with deſerued praiſe of his vertue, and then beat vpon him with reprehenſion: ſo good nurſes, when their children are fallen, firſt take them vp and ſpeake them faire, chide them afterwards: Gentle ſpeech is a good preparatiue for rigor. He ſhall ſee that I loue him, by my approbation; and that I loue not his faults, by my reproofe. If he loue himſelfe, he will loue thoſe that miſlike his vices; & if he loue not himſelfe, it matters not whether he loue me.

42

The liker we are to God, which is the beſt and onely good, the better and happier we muſt needs be. All ſinnes make vs vnlike him, as being contrary to his perfect holineſſe; but ſome ſhew more direct contrarietie: ſuch is enuie. For whereas God bringeth good out of euill; the enuious man fetcheth euill out of good; wherein alſo his ſinne proues a kinde of puniſhment: for whereas to good men euen euill things worke together to their good; contrarily, to the enuious, good things worke together to their euill. The euill, in any man, though neuer ſo proſperous, I will not enuie, but pittie: The good graces I will not repine at, but holily emulate; reioicing that they are ſo good, but grieuing that I am no better.

43

The couetous man is like a Spider, as in this that he doth nothing but lay his nets to catch euery Flie, gaping onely for a bootie of gaine; ſo yet more, in that whiles hee makes nets for theſe Flies, he conſumeth his owne bowels: ſo that which is his life is his death. If there be any creature miſerable, it is he; and yet hee is leaſt to be pitied, becauſe he makes himſelfe miſerable; ſuch as he is I will acount him; and will therefore ſweepe downe his webs and hate his poyſon.

In heauen there is all life, and no dying: in hell is all death, and no life. In earth there is both liuing and dying; which, as it is betwixt both, ſo it prepares for both. So that he which here below dies to ſinne, doth after liue in heauen; and contrarily, hee that liues in ſinne vpon earth, dies in hell afterwards. What if I haue no part of ioy here below, but ſtill ſucceſſion of afflictions? The wicked haue no part in heauen, and yet they they enioy the earth with pleasure: I would not change portions with them. I reioyce, that seeing I cannot haue both, yet I haue the better. O Lord, let me passe both my deaths here vpon earth. I care not how I liue or die, so I may haue nothing but life to looke for in another world.

The conceit of proprietie hardens a man against many inconueniences, and addeth much to our pleasure. The mother abides many vnquiet nights, many painfull throes, and vnpleasant sauours of her childe, vpon this thought, It is my owne. The indulgent father magnifies that in his owne sonne, which he would scarce like in a stranger. The want of this to God-ward, makes vs so subiect to discontentment, and cooleth our delight in him, because we thinke of him aloofe, as one in whom we are not interessed. If we could thinke, It is my God that cheereth me with his presence, and blessings, while I prosper; that afflicteth me in loue, when I am dejected; my Sauiour is at Gods right hand; my Angels stand in his presence, it could not bee but Gods fauour would bee sweeter, his chastisements more easie, his benefits more effectuall. I am not my owne, while God is not mine: and while he is mine, since I doe possesse him, I will enioy him.

46

Nature is of her owne inclination froward, importunately longing after that which is denied her; and scornfull of what she may haue. If it were appointed that we should liue alwaies vpon earth, how extremely would we exclaime of wearinesse, and wish rather that we were not? Now it is appointed wee shall liue here but a while, and then giue roome to our successors, each one affects a kinde of eternitie vpon earth. I will labour to tame this peeuish and sullen humour of nature, and will like that best that must be.

47

All true earthly pleasure forsooke man, when he forsooke his Creator; what honest and holy delight he tooke before in the dutifull seruices of the obsequious creatures; in the contemplation of that admirable varietie, and strangenesse of their properties; in seeing their sweet accordance with each other, and all with himselfe? Now most of our pleasure is, to set one creature together by the eares with another, sporting our selues onely with that deformitie, which was bred through our owne fault: yea, there haue beene, that haue delighted to see one man spill anothers bloud vpon the sand, and haue shouted for ioy at the sight of that slaughter, which hath fallen out vpon no other quarrell, but the pleasure of the beholders: I doubt not but as wee solace our selues in the discord of the inferiour creatures, so the euill spirits sport themselues in our dissentions. There are better qualities of the creature, which we passe ouer without pleasure. In recreations, I will chuse those which are of best example, and best vse; seeking those by which I may not onely be the merrier, but the better.

48

There is no want for which a man may not finde a remedie in himselfe. Doe I want riches? He that desires but little, cannot want much. Doe I want friends? If I loue God enough, and my selfe but enough, it matters not. Doe I want health? If I want it but a little, and recouer, I shall esteeme it the more, because I wanted. If I be long sicke, and vnrecouerably, I shall be the fitter and willinger to die; and my paine is so much lesse sharpe, by how much more it lingreth. Doe I want maintenance? A little, and course, will content nature. Let my minde be no more ambitious, than my backe and belly, I can hardly complaine of too little. Doe I want sleepe? I am going whither there is no vse of sleepe: where all rest, and sleepe not. Doe I want children? Many that haue them, wish they wanted: It is better to be childlesse, than crossed with their miscariage. Doe I want learning? He hath none, that saith he hath enough. The next way to get more, is to finde thou wantest. There is remedy for all wants, in our selues, sauing onely for want want of grace: and that, a man cannot ſo much as ſee and complaine that he wants, but from aboue.

49

Euery vertuous action (like the Sunne eclipſed) hath a double ſhadow; according to the diuers aſpects of the beholders: one of glory, the other of enuy. Glory followes vpon good deſerts; Enuy vpon glory. He that is enuied, may thinke himſelfe well: for he that enuies him, thinkes him more than well: I know no vice in another, whereof a man may make ſo good and comfortable vſe to himſelfe. There would be no ſhadow, if there were no light.

50

In medling with the faults of friends, I haue obſerued many wrongfull courſes; what for feare, or ſelfe-loue, or indiſcretion. Some I haue ſeene, like vnmercifull and couetous Chirurgians, keepe the wound raw, (which they might haue ſeaſonably remedied) for their owne gaine. Others, that haue laid healing plaiſters to skin it aloft, when there hath beene more need of Corroſiues to eat out the dead fleſh within. Others, that haue galled and drawne, when there hath beene nothing but ſolid fleſh, that hath wanted onely filling vp. Others, that haue healed the ſore, but left an vnſightly ſcarre of diſcredit behinde them. He that would doe good this way, muſt haue Fidelitie, Courage, Diſcretion, Patience. Fidelitie, not to beare with; Courage, to reproue them; Diſcretion, to reproue them well; Patience, to abide the leiſure of amendment; making much of good beginnings, and putting vp many repulſes, bearing with many weakneſſes; ſtill hoping, ſtill ſolliciting; as knowing that thoſe who haue beene long vſed to fetters, cannot but halt a while, when they are taken off.

51

God hath made all the World, and yet what a little part of it is his? Diuide the World into foure parts: but one, and the leaſt containeth all that is worthy the name of Chriſtendome: the reſt ouer-whelmed with Turciſme, and Paganiſme: and of this leaſt part, the greater halfe yet holding aright concerning God and their Sauiour in ſome common principles, ouerthrow the truth in their concluſions; and ſo leaue the leſſer part of the leaſt part for God. Yet lower: of thoſe that hold aright concerning Chriſt, how few are there, that doe otherwiſe than faſhionably profeſſe him? And of thoſe that do ſeriouſly profeſſe him, how few are there that in their liues deny him not, liuing vnworthy of ſo glorious a calling? Wherein I doe not pittie God, who will haue glory euen of thoſe that are not his: I pitie miſerable men, that doe reiect their Creator and Redeemer, and themſelues in him. And I enuy Satan, that he ruleth ſo large. Since God hath ſo few, I will be more thankfull that he hath vouchſafed me one of his; and be the more zealous of glorifying him, becauſe we haue but a few fellowes.

52

As thoſe that haue taſted of ſome delicate diſh, finde other plaine diſhes but vnpleaſant; ſo it fareth with thoſe which haue once taſted of heauenly things, they cannot but contemne the beſt worldly pleaſures. As therefore ſome dainty gueſt knowing there is ſo pleaſant fare to come; I will reſerue my appetite for it, and not ſuffer my ſelfe cloied with the courſe diet of the world.

I finde many places where God hath vſed the hand of good Angels for the puniſhment of the wicked; but neuer could yet finde one, wherein he emploied an euill Angell in any direct good to his children. Indirect I finde many, if not all, through the power of him that brings light out of darkneſſe, and turnes their euill to our good: In this choice God would and muſt be imitated. From an euill ſpirit I dare not receiue ought, if if neuer ſo good; I will receiue as little as I may from a wicked man. If he were as perfectly euill as the other, I durſt receiue nothing; I had rather hunger, than wilfully dip my hand in a wicked mans diſh.

Wee are ready to condemne others, for that which is as eminently faulty in our ſelues. If one blinde man ruſh vpon another in the way; either complaines of others blindneſſe, neither of his owne. I haue heard thoſe which haue had moſt corrupt lungs, complaine of the vnſauoury breath of others. The reaſon is, becauſe the minde caſteth altogether outward, and reflecteth not into it ſelfe. Yet it is more ſhamefull to be either ignorant of, or fauourable to our owne imperfections. I will cenſure others vices fearefully, my owne confidently, becauſe I know them; and thoſe I know not, I will ſuſpect.

55

He is a very humble man, that thinkes not himſelfe better than ſome others, and he is very meane, whom ſome others doe not account better than themſelues: ſo that Veſſell that ſeemed very ſmall vpon the Maine, ſeemes a tall ſhip vpon the Thames. As there are many better for eſtate than my ſelfe, ſo there are ſome worſe; and if I were yet worſe, yet would there be ſome lower: and if I were ſo low, that I accounted my ſelfe the worſt of all, yet ſome would account themſelues in worſe caſe. A mans opinion is in others, his being is in himſelfe. Let me know my ſelfe, let others gueſſe at me. Let others either enuy or pitie me, I care not, ſo long as I enioy my ſelfe.

56

He can neuer wonder enough at Gods workmanſhip, that knowes not the frame of the world: for he can neuer elſe conceiue of the hugeneſſe, and ſtrange proportion of the creature. And he that knowes this, can neuer wonder more at any thing elſe. I will learne to know, that I may admire; and by that little I know, I will more wonder at that I know not.

57

There is nothing below but toyling, grieuing, wiſhing, hoping, fearing; and wearineſſe in all theſe. What fooles are we to be beſotted with the loue of our owne trouble, and to hate our libertie and reſt? The loue of miſery, is much worſe than miſerie it ſelfe. We muſt firſt pray, that God would make vs wiſe, before we can wiſh he would make vs happy.

58

If a man referre all things to himſelfe, nothing ſeemes enough: If all things to God, any meaſure will content him of earthly things; but in grace he is inſatiable. Worldlings ſerue themſelues altogether in God, making Religion but to ſerue their turnes, as a colour of their ambition, and couetouſneſſe. The Chriſtian ſeekes God onely in ſeeking himſelfe, vſing all other things but as ſubordinately to him; not caring whether himſelfe win or loſe, ſo that God may win glory in both. I will not ſuffer mine eies and minde to be bounded with theſe viſible things; but ſtill looke through theſe matters, at God which is the vtmoſt ſcope of them: accounting them onely as a throughfare to paſſe by, not as an habitation to reſt in.

59

He is wealthy enough, that wanteth not. He is great enough, that is his owne maſter. Hee is happy enough, that liues to die well. Other things I will not care for; nor too much for theſe, ſaue onely for the laſt, which alone can admit of no immoderation.

60

A man of extraordinary parts, makes himſelfe by ſtrange and ſingular behauiour, more admired; which if a man of but common facultie doe imitate, he makes himſelfe ridiculous: for that which is conſtrued as naturall to the one, is deſcried to be affected in the other. And there is nothing forced by affectation can be comely. I will euer ſtriue to goe in the common road: ſo while I am not notable, I ſhall not be notorious.

61

Gold is the beſt metall, and for the puritie not ſubieſt to ruſt, as all others; and yet the beſt Gold hath ſome droſſe. I eſteeme not that man that hath no faults: I like him well that hath but a few, and thoſe not great.

62

Many a man marres a good eſtate, for want of skill to proportion his carriage anſwerably to his ability. A little ſaile to a large veſſell, rids no way, though the wind be faire. A large ſaile to a little Barke drownes it. A top-ſaile to a ſhip of meane burthen in a rough weather, is dangerous. A low ſaile in an eaſie gale, yeelds little aduantage. This diſproportion cauſeth ſome to liue miſerably in a good eſtate: and ſome to make a good eſtate miſerable. I will firſt know what I may doe for ſafetie, and then I will try what I can doe for ſpeed.

63

The rich man hath many friends; although in truth riches haue them, and not the man. As the Aſſe that carried the Egyptian Goddeſſe, had many bowed knees, yet not to the beaſt, but to the burthen. For, ſeparate the riches from the perſon, and thou ſhalt ſee friendſhip leaue the man, and follow that which was euer her obiect: while he may command, and can either giue, or controll, he hath attendance, & proffer of loue at all hands; but which of theſe dares acknowledge him, when hee is going to priſon for debt? Then theſe Waſpes, that made ſuch muſicke about this Gally-pot, ſhew plainly, that they came onely for the honey that was in it. This is the miſery of the wealthy, that they cannot know their friends: whereas thoſe that loue the poore man, loue him for himſelfe. He that would chuſe a true friend, muſt ſearch out one that is neither couetous nor ambitious; for ſuch a one loues but himſelfe in thee. And if it be rare to finde any not infected with theſe qualities, the beſt is to entertaine all, and truſt few.

64

That which the French Prouerbe hath of ſickneſſes, is true of all euils: That they come on horſebacke, and goe away on foot. We haue oft ſeene a ſudden fall, or one meales ſurfeit hath ſtucke by many to their graues; whereas pleaſures come like Oxen, ſlow and heauily, and goe away like Poſt-horſes, vpon the ſpur. Sorrowes, becauſe they are lingring gueſts, I will entertaine but moderately; knowing, that the more they are made of, the longer they will continue: and for pleaſures, becauſe they ſtay not, and doe but call to drinke at my doore; I will vſe them as paſſengers, with ſlight reſpect. He is his owne beſt friend, that makes leaſt of both of them.

65

It is indeed more commendable to giue good example, than to take it: yet imitation, how-euer in ciuill matters it be condemned of ſeruilitie, in Chriſtian practice hath his due praiſe; and though it be more naturall for beginners at their firſt imitation, that cannot ſwim without bladders; yet the beſt proficient ſhall ſee euer ſome higher ſteps of thoſe that haue gone to heauen before him, worthy of his tracing: wherin much caution muſt be had, that we follow good men, and in good: Good men, for if we propound imperfect patterns to our ſelues, we ſhall be conſtrained firſt to vnlearne thoſe

ill

ill habit we haue got by their imitation, before we can be capable of good: so besides the losse of labour, we are further off from our end. In good; for that a man should be so wedded to any mans person, that he can make no separation from his infirmities, is both absurdly seruile, and vnchristian. He therefore that would follow well, must know to distinguish well, betwixt good men, and euill; betwixt good men and better; betwixt good qualities and infirmities. Why hath God giuen me education not in a Desart alone, but in the company of good and vertuous men, but that by the sight of their good carriage, I should better my owne? Why should we haue interest in the vices of men, and not in their vertues? And although precepts be surer, yet a good mans action is according to precept; yea, is a precept it selfe. The Psalmist compares the Law of God to a Lanterne; good example beares it. It is safe following him that carries the light. If he walke without the light, he shall walke without me.

66

As there is one common end to all good men, saluation; and one author of it, Christ: so there is but one way to it, doing well, and suffering euill. Doing well (me thinks) is like the Zodiacke in the heauen, the hie-way of the Sunne, thorow which it daily passeth: Suffering euill, is like the Eclipticke line that goes thorow the middest of it. The rule of doing well, the Law of God, is vniforme and eternall; and the copies of suffering euill in all times agree with the originall. No man can either do well, or suffer ill without an example. Are we sawne in peeces? so was Esay. Are we beheaded? so Iohn Baptist. Crucified? so Peter. Throwne to wilde beasts? so Daniel. Into the furnace? so the three children. Stoned? so Steuen. Banished? so the beloued Disciple. Burnt? so millions of Martyrs. Defamed and slandered? what good man euer was not? It were easie to be endlesse both in torments and sufferers: whereof each hath begun to other, all to vs. I may not hope to speed better than the best Christians; I cannot feare to fare worse. It is no matter which way I goe, so I come to heauen.

67

There is nothing beside life of this nature, that it is diminished by addition. Euery moment we liue longer than other, and each moment that we liue longer, is so much taken out of our life. It increaseth and diminisheth onely by minutes, and therefore is not perceiued: the shorter steps it taketh, the more slily it passeth. Time shall not so steale vpon me, that I shall not discerne it, and catch it by the fore-lockes; nor so steale from me, that it shall carry with it no witnesse of his passage in my proficiency.

68

The prodigall man, while he spendeth, is magnified: when he is spent, is pitied: and that is all his recompence for his lauisht Patrimonie. The couetous man is grudged while he liues, and his death is reioyced at: for when he ends, his riches begin to bee goods. He that wisely keepes the meane betweene both, liueth well, and heares well; neither repined at by the needy, nor pitied by greater men. I would so manage these worldly commodities, as accounting them mine to dispose, others to partake of.

69

A good name (if any earthly thing) is worth seeking, worth striuing for; yet to affect a bare name, when we deserue either ill or nothing, is but a proud hypocrisie: and to be puffed vp with the wrongfull estimation of others mistaking our worth, is an idle and ridiculous pride. Thou art well spoken of vpon no desert: what then? Thou hast deceiued thy neighbours, they one another, and all of them haue deceiued thee: for thou madest them thinke of thee otherwise than thou art; and they haue made thee thinke of thy selfe as thou art accounted: the deceit came from thee, the shame will end in thee. I will account no wrong greater, than for a man to esteeme and report me aboue that I am:

I am: not reioicing in that I am well thought of, but in that I am such as I am esteemed.

It was a speech worthy the commendation, and frequent remembrance of so diuine a Bishop as Augustine, which is reported of an aged Father in his time; who when his friends comforted him on his sicke bed, and told him, they hoped hee should recouer, answered: If I shall not die at all, well; but if euer, why not now? Surely it is folly, what we must doe, to doe vnwillingly. I will neuer thinke my soule in a good case, so long as I am loth to thinke of dying; and will make this my comfort: Not, I shall yet liue longer, but, I shall yet doe more good.

71

Excesses are neuer alone. Commonly those that haue excellent parts, haue some extremely vicious qualities: great wits haue great errours; and great estates haue great cares: whereas mediocritie of gifts or of estate, hath vsually but easie inconueniences: else the excellent would not know themselues, and the meane would bee too much dejected. Now those whom we admire for their faculties, we pittie for their infirmities; and those which finde themselues but of the ordinarie pitch, ioy that as their vertues, so their vices are not eminent. So the highest haue a blemished glory, and the meane are contentedly secure. I will magnifie the highest, but affect the meane.

72

The body is the case, or sheath of the minde: yet as naturally it hideth it; so it doth also many times discouer it. For although the forehead, eyes, and frame of the countenance doe sometime belie the disposition of the heart; yet most commonly they giue true generall verdicts. An angry mans browes are bent together, and his eies sparkle with rage, which when he is well pleased, looke smooth and cheerefully. Enuie hath one looke; desire another; sorrow yet another; contentment, a fourth, different from all the rest. To shew no passion, is too Stoicall; to shew all, is impotent; to shew other than we feele, hypocriticall. The face and gesture doe but write, and make commentaries vpon the heart. I will first endeuour so to frame and order that, as not to entertaine any passion, but what I need not care to haue laid open to the world: and therefore will first see that the Text be good; then that the glosse bee true; and lastly, that it be sparing. To what end hath God so walled-in the heart, if I should let euery mans eies into it by my countenance?

73

There is no publike action which the world is not ready to scan; there is no action so priuate, which the euill spirits are not witnesses of; I will endeuour to liue, as knowing that I am euer in the eies of mine enemies.

74

When we our selues, and all other vices are old, then couetousnesse alone is young, and at his best age. This vice loues to dwell in an old ruinous cotage: yet that age can haue no such honest colour for niggardlinesse and insatiable desire. A young man might plead the vncertaintie of his estate, and doubt of his future need: but an old man sees his set period before him. Since this humour is so necessarily annexed to this age, I will turne it the right way, and nourish it in my selfe. The older I grow, the more couetous I will be; but of the riches, not of the world I am leauing, but of the world I am entring into. It is good coueting what I may haue, and cannot leaue behinde mee.

There is a mutuall hatred betwixt a Christian, and the world: for on the one side, the loue of the world is enmitie with God; and Gods children cannot but take their Fathers part. On the other, The world hates you, becauſe it hated me firſt. But the hatred of the good man to the wicked is not ſo extreme, as that wherewith hee is hated. For the Chriſtian hates euer with commiſeration and loue of that good he ſees in the worſt; knowing that the eſſence of the very Deuils is good, and that the lewdeſt man hath ſome excellent parts of nature, or common graces of the Spirit of God, which he warily ſingleth out in his affection. But the wicked man hates him for goodneſſe, and therefore findes nothing in himſelfe to moderate his deteſtation. There can be no better muſicke in my eare than the diſcord of the wicked. If he like me, I am afraid he ſpies ſome qualitie in me, like to his owne. If he ſaw nothing but goodneſſe, hee could not loue me, and be bad himſelfe. It was a iuſt doubt of Phocion, who when the people praiſed him, aſked, What euill haue I done? I will ſtriue to deſerue euill of none: but not deſerning ill, it ſhall not grieue me to heare ill of thoſe that are euill. I know no greater argument of goodneſſe, than the hatred of a wicked man.

A man that comes hungry to his meale, feeds heartily on the meat ſet before him, not regarding the metall, or forme of the platter, wherein it is ſerued; who afterwards when his ſtomacke is ſatisfied, begins to play with the diſh, or to reade ſentences on his trencher. Thoſe auditors which can finde nothing to doe, but note elegant words and phraſes, or rhetoricall colours, or perhaps an ill grace of geſture in a pithie and materiall ſpeech, argue themſelues full ere they came to the feaſt: and therefore goe away with a little pleaſure, no profit. In hearing others, my onely intention ſhall be to feed my minde with ſolid matter: if my eare can get ought by the way, I will not grudge it, but I will not intend it.

77

The ioy of a Chriſtian in theſe worldly things is limited, and euer awed with feare of exceſſe, but recompenced abundantly with his ſpirituall mirth: whereas the worldling giues the reines to his minde, and powres himſelfe out into pleaſure, fearing onely that he ſhall not ioy enough. He that is but halfe a Chriſtian, liues but miſerably; for he neither enioyeth God, nor the world. Not God, becauſe he hath not grace enough to make him his owne: Not the world, becauſe hee hath ſome taſte of grace; enough to ſhew him the vanitie and ſinne of his pleaſures. So the ſound Chriſtian hath his heauen aboue, the worldling here below, the vnſetled Chriſtian no where.

78

Good deeds are very fruitfull; and not ſo much of their nature, as of Gods bleſſing, multipliable. We thinke ten in the hundred extreme and biting vſurie; God giues vs more than an hundred for ten; yea, aboue the increaſe of the gaine which wee commend moſt for multiplication. For out of one good action of ours, God produceth a thouſand; the harueſt whereof is perpetuall: Euen the faithfull actions of the old Patriarchs, the conſtant ſufferings of ancient Martyrs liue ſtill, and doe good to all ſucceſſions of ages by their example. For publike actions of vertue, beſides that they are preſently comfortable to the doer, are alſo exemplary to others: and as they are more beneficiall to others, ſo are more crowned in vs. If good deeds were vtterly barren and incommodious, I would ſeeke after them for the conſcience of their owne goodneſſe: how much more ſhall I now be incouraged to performe them, for that they are ſo profitable both to my ſelfe, and to others, and to me in others? My principall care ſhall be, that while my ſoule liues in glory in heauen, my good actions may liue vpon earth; and that they may be put into the banke and multiply, while my body lies in the graue and conſumeth.

A Chriſtian for the ſweet fruit hee beares to God and men, is compared to the nobleſt of all plants, the Vine. Now as the moſt generous Vine, if it be not pruned, runs out into many ſuperfluous ſtems, and growes at laſt weake and fruitleſſe: ſo doth the beſt man, if he be cut ſhort of his deſires, and pruned with afflictions. If it bee painfull to bleed, it is worſe to wither. Let me be pruned that I may grow, rather than cut vp to burne.

80

Thoſe, that doe but ſuperficially taſte of diuine knowledge, finde little ſweetneſſe in it; and are ready for the vnpleaſant relliſh to abhorre it: whereas if they would diue deepe into the Sea, they ſhould finde freſh water neere to the bottome: That it ſauours not well at the firſt, is the fault not of it, but of the diſtempered palate that taſtes it. Good metals and minerals are not found cloſe vnder the skinne of the earth, but below in the bowels of it: No good Miner caſts away his Mattock, becauſe he findes a veine of tough clay, or a ſhelfe of ſtone; but ſtill delueth lower, and paſſing thorow many changes of ſoyle, at laſt comes to his rich treaſure. We are too ſoone diſcouraged in our ſpirituall gaines. I will ſtill perſeuere to ſeeke, hardning my ſelfe againſt all difficultie. There is comfort euen in ſeeking, hope; and there is ioy in hoping, good ſucceſſe; and in that ſucceſſe, is happineſſe.

81

Hee that hath any experience in ſpirituall matters, knowes that Satan is euer more violent at the laſt; then raging moſt furiouſly, when he knowes he ſhall rage but a while. Hence of the perſecutions of the firſt Church, the tenth and laſt vnder Diocleſian and Maximinian, and thoſe other fiue Tyrants, was the bloudieſt. Hence this age is the moſt diſſolute, becauſe neereſt the concluſion. And as this is his courſe in the vniuerſall aſſaults of the whole Church: ſo it is the ſame in his conflicts with euery Chriſtian ſoule. Like a ſubtill Orator he reſerues his ſtrongeſt force till the ſhutting vp: And therefore miſerable is the folly of thoſe men who defer their repentance till then, when their onſet ſhall be moſt ſharpe, and they through paine of body, and perplexednes of minde, ſhall be leaſt able to reſiſt. Thoſe that haue long furniſht themſelues with ſpirituall munition, finde worke enough in this extreme brunt of temptation: how then ſhould the careleſſe man, that with the helpe of all opportunities could not finde grace to repent, hope to atchieue it at the laſt gaſpe, againſt greater force, with leſſe meanes, more diſtraction, no leiſure? Wiſe Princes vſe to prepare ten yeeres before for a field of one day: I will euery day lay vp ſomewhat for my laſt. If I win that skirmiſh, I haue enough. The firſt and ſecond blow begin the battell, but the laſt onely wins it.

82

I obſerue three ſeaſons wherein a wiſe man differs not from a foole; In his infancy, in ſleepe, and in ſilence: for in the two former we are all fooles; and in ſilence all are wiſe. In the two former yet, there may bee concealement of folly: but the tongue is a blab: there cannot be any kinde of folly, either ſimple, or wicked in the heart, but the tongue will bewray it. He cannot be wiſe that ſpeakes much, or without ſenſe, or out of ſeaſon; nor he knowne for a foole that ſaies nothing. It is a great miſery to be a foole: but this is yet greater, that a man cannot be a foole but he muſt ſhew it. It were well for ſuch a one, if he could be taught to keepe cloſe his fooliſhnes: but then there ſhould be no fooles. I haue heard ſome (which haue ſcorned the opinion of folly in themſelues) for a ſpeech wherein they haue hoped to ſhew moſt wit, cenſured of folly, by him that hath thought himſelfe wiſer: and another, hearing his ſentence againe, hath condemned him for want of wit in cenſuring. Surely hee is not a foole that hath vnwiſe thoughts, but he that vtters them. Euen concealed folly is wiſdome: and ſometimes wiſdome vttered, is folly. While others care how to ſpeake, my care ſhall be how to hold my peace.

A worke is then onely good and acceptable, when the action, meaning, and manner are all good: For to doe good with an ill meaning, (as Iudas saluted Christ to betray him) is so much more sinfull, by how much the action is better; which being good in the kinde, is abused to an ill purpose: To doe ill, in a good meaning, (as Vzza in staying the Arke) is so much amisse, that the good intention cannot beare out the vnlawfull act: which although it may seeme some excuse, why it should not be so ill, yet is no warrant to iustifie it. To meane well and doe a good action, in an ill manner, (as the Pharisee made a good praier, but arrogantly) is so offensiue, that the euill manner depraueth both the other. So a thing may be euill vpon one circumstance, it cannot bee good but vpon all. In what euer businesse I goe about, I will enquire, What I doe for the substance, How for the manner, Why for the intention: For the two first, I will consult with God; for the last, with my owne heart.

I can doe nothing without a million of Witnesses: The conscience is as a thousand witnesses; and God is as a thousand consciences: I will therefore so deale with men, as knowing that God sees me; and so with God, as if the world saw me; so with my selfe, and both of them, as knowing that my conscience seeth me: and so with them all, as knowing I am alwaies ouer-looked by my accuser, by my Iudge.

85

Earthly inheritances are diuided oft-times with much inequality. The priuilege of primogeniture stretcheth larger in many places now, than it did among the ancient Iewes. The younger many times serues the elder; and while the eldest aboundeth, all the latter issue is pinched. In heauen it is not so: all the sonnes of God are heires, none vnderlings; and not heires vnder wardship, and hope, but inheritors; and not inheritors of any little pittance of land, but of a Kingdome; nor of an earthly Kingdome, subiect to danger of losse, or alteration, but one glorious and euerlasting. It shall content me here, that hauing right to all things, yet I haue possession of nothing but sorrow. Since I shall haue possession aboue, of all that, whereto I haue right below, I will serue willingly, that I may reigne; serue for a while, that I may reigne for euer.

86

Euen the best things ill vsed, become euils; and contrarily, the worst things vsed well, proue good. A good tongue, vsed to deceit; a good wit, vsed to defend errour; a strong arme, to murther; authority, to oppresse; a good profession, to dissemble; are all euill; yea Gods owne Word is the sword of the Spirit; which if it kill not our vices, kils our soules. Contrariwise (as poisons are vsed to wholesome medicine) afflictions and sinnes, by a good vse proue so gainfull, as nothing more. Words are as they are taken: and things are as they are vsed. There are euen cursed blessings: O Lord, rather giue me no fauours, than not grace to vse them. If I want them, thou requirest not what thou doest not giue: but if I haue them, and want their vse, thy mercy proues my iudgement.

87

Man is the best of all these inferiour creatures; yet liues in more sorrow and discontentment, than the worst of them: whiles that Reason wherein he excels them, and by which he might make aduantage of his life, hee abuses to a suspitious distrust. How many hast thou found of the fowles of the aire, lying dead in the way for want of prouision? They eat, and rest, and sing, and want nothing. Man, which hath farre better meanes to liue comfortably, toyleth and careth, and wanteth; whom yet his reason alone might teach, that he which careth for these lower creatures made onely for man, will much more prouide for man, to whose vse they were made. There is an holy carelesnesse; free from idlenesse; free from distrust. In these earthly things, I will so depend on my Maker, that my trust in him may not exclude all my labour; and yet so labour (vpon my confidence on him) as my endeuour may be void of perplexity.

The precepts, and practice of thoſe with whom we liue, auaile much on either part. For a man not to bee ill, where hee hath no prouocations to euill, is leſſe commendable; but for a man to liue continently in Aſia (as he ſaid) where hee ſees nothing but allurements to vncleanneſſe: for Lot to be a good man in the middeſt of Sodom, to bee abſtemious in Germany, and in Italy chaſte, this is truly praiſe-worthy. To ſequeſter our ſelues from the companie of the world, that we may depart from their vices, proceeds from a baſe and diſtruſting minde: as if wee would ſo force goodneſſe vpon our ſelues, that therefore onely we would be good, becauſe we cannot be ill. But for a man ſo to bee perſonally, and locally in the throng of the world, as to withdraw his affections from it, to vſe it, and yet to contemne it at once, to compell it to his ſeruice without any infection, becomes well the noble courage of a Chriſtian. The world ſhall be mine, I will not be his; and yet ſo mine, that his euill ſhall be ſtill his owne.

89

He that liues in God, cannot be wearie of his life, becauſe he euer findes both ſomewhat to doe, and ſomewhat to ſolace himſelfe with; cannot bee ouer-loth to part with it, becauſe hee ſhall enter into a neerer life and ſocietie with that God in whom hee delighteth. Whereas he that liues without him, liues many times vncomfortably here, becauſe partly he knowes not any cauſe of ioy in himſelfe; and partly he finds not any worthy employment to while himſelfe withall; dies miſerably, becauſe hee either knowes not whither he goes, or knowes he goes to torment. There is no true life, but the life of faith. O Lord, let me liue out of the world with thee (if thou wilt) but let me not liue in the world without thee.

90

Sinne is both euill in it ſelfe, and the effect of a former euill, and the cauſe of ſinne following; a cauſe of puniſhment, and laſtly a puniſhment it ſelfe. It is a damnable iniquitie in man, to multiplie one ſinne vpon another; but to puniſh one ſinne by another, in God is a iudgement both moſt iuſt, and moſt fearefull; ſo as all the ſtore-houſe of God hath not a greater vengeance: with other puniſhments the body ſmarteth, the ſoule with this. I care not how God offends me with puniſhments, ſo hee puniſh mee not with offending him.

91

I haue ſeene ſome afflict their bodies with wilfull famine, and ſcourges of their owne making; God ſpares me that labour; for hee whips mee daily with the ſcourge of a weake body; and ſometimes with ill tongues. He holds me ſhort many times of the feeling of his comfortable preſence, which is in truth ſo much more miſerable an hunger than that of the body, by how much the ſoule is more tender, and the food denied, more excellent. Hee is my Father; infinitely wiſe, to proportion out my correction according to my eſtate; and infinitely louing, in fitting mee with a due meaſure. Hee is a preſumptuous childe, that will make choice of his owne rod. Let mee learne to make a right vſe of his corrections, and I ſhall not need to correct my ſelfe. And if it ſhould pleaſe God to remit his hand a little; I will gouerne my body, as a Maſter, not as a Tyrant.

If God had not ſaid, Bleſſed are thoſe that hunger, I know not what could keepe weake Chriſtians from ſinking in deſpaire: Many times all I can doe, is to finde and complaine that I want him, and wiſh to recouer him: Now this is my ſtay, that he in mercie eſteemes vs not onely by hauing, but by deſiring alſo; and after a ſort accounts vs to haue that which we want, and deſire to haue: and my ſoule aſſuming, tells me I doe vn-fainedly wish him, and long after that grace I misse. Let me desire still more, and I know I shall not desire alwaies. There was neuer soule miscarried with longing after grace. O blessed hunger, that ends alwaies in fulnesse! I am sorry that I can but hunger; and yet I would not bee full; for the blessing is promised to the hungry: Giue mee more, Lord, but so as I may hunger more. Let me hunger more, and I know I shall be satisfied.

There is more in the Christian than thou seest. For he is both an entire body of himselfe, and he is a limme of another more excellent; euen that glorious mysticall body of his Saviour; to whom he is so vnited, that the actions of either are reciprocally referred to each other. For, on the one side, the Christian liues in Christ, dies in Christ, in Christ fulfils the Law, possesseth heauen: on the other, Christ is persecuted by Paul in his members, and is persecuted in Paul afterwards by others: he suffers in vs, he liues in vs, he workes in and by vs: so thou canst not doe either good or harme to a Christian, but thou doest it to his Redeemer, to whom he is inuisibly vnited. Thou seest him as a man, and therefore worthy of fauour for humanities sake: Thou seest him not as a Christian, worthy of honour for his secret and yet true vnion with our Sauiour. I will loue euery Christian, for that I see; honour him, for that I shall see.

94

Hell it selfe is scarce a more obscure dungeon, in comparison of the earth, than earth is in respect of heauen. Here, the most see nothing, and the best see little: Here, halfe our life is night; and our very day is darknesse, in respect of God. The true light of the world, and the Father of lights dwelleth aboue: There is the light of knowledge to informe vs, and the light of ioy to comfort vs; without all change of darknesse. There was neuer any captiue loued his dungeon, and complained when he must bee brought out to light and libertie: whence then is this naturall madnesse in vs men, that wee delight so much in this vncleane, noysome, darke, and comfortlesse prison of earth? and thinke not of our release to that lightsome and glorious Paradise aboue vs, without griefe and repining? We are sure that we are not perfectly well here: if we could bee as sure that we should be better aboue, we would not feare changing. Certainly our sense tells vs, we haue some pleasure here; and we haue not faith to assure vs of more pleasure aboue: and hence we settle our selues to the present, with neglect of the future, though infinitely more excellent: The heart followes the eies: and vnknowne good is vncared for. O Lord, doe thou breake thorow this darknesse of ignorance, and faithlesnesse, wherewith I am compassed. Let mee but see my heauen, and I know I shall desire it.

95

To be carried away with an affectation of fame, is so vaine, and absurd, that I wonder it can be incident to any wise man. For what a mole-hill of earth is it, to which his name can extend, when it is furthest carried by the wings of report? and how short a while doth it continue where it is once spread? Time (the deuourer of his owne brood) consumes both vs and our memories; not brasse, nor marble can beare age. How many flattering Poets haue promised immortalitie of name to their Princes, who now together are buried long since in forgetfulnesse! Those names and actions, that are once on the file of heauen, are past the danger of defacing. I will not care whether I bee knowne, or remembred, or forgotten amongst men, if my name and good actions may liue with God in the records of eternitie.

There is no man, nor no place free from spirits, although they testifie their presence by visible effects but in few. Euery man is an Oast to entertaine Angels, though not in visible shapes, as Abraham and Lot. The euill ones doe nothing but prouoke vs to sinne, and plot mischiefes against vs; by casting into our way dangerous obiects, by suggesting gesting sinfull motions to our mindes, stirring vp enemies against vs amongst men, by frighting vs with terrors in our selues, by accusing vs to God. On the contrary, The good Angels are euer remouing our hinderances from good, and our occasions of euill; mitigating our tentations; helping vs against our enemies; deliuering vs from dangers; comforting vs in sorrowes; furthering our good purposes; and at last carrying vp our soules to heauen. It would affright a weake Christian that knowes the power and malice of wicked spirits, to consider their presence, and number, but when with the eies of Elishaes seruant, he sees those on his side as present, as diligent, more powerfull; he cannot but take heart againe: especially if he consider, that neither of them is without God, limiting the one the bounds of their tentation; directing the other in the safegard of his children. Whereupon it is come to passe, that though there be many legions of Deuils, and euery one more strong than many legions of men, and more malicious than strong, yet the little flocke of Gods Church liueth and prospereth. I haue euer with me inuisible friends, and enemies. The consideration of mine enemies shall keepe me from securitie, and make me fearefull of doing ought to aduantage them. The consideration of my spirituall friends shall comfort me against the terrour of the other; shall remedie my solitarinesse; shall make me warie of doing ought indecently, grieuing me rather, that I haue euer heretofore made them turne away their eyes, for shame of that whereof I haue not beene ashamed; that I haue no more enioyed their societie; that I haue beene no more affected with their presence. What though I see them not? I beleeue them. I were no Christian, if my faith were not as sure as my sense.

There is no word or action, but may be taken with two hands; either with the right hand of charitable construction, or the sinister interpretation of malice, and suspicion: and all things doe so succeed, as they are taken. I haue noted euill actions well taken, passe currant for either indifferent or commendable: Contrarily, a good speech or action ill taken, scarce allowed for indifferent; an indifferent one, censured for euill; an euill one for notorious: So fauour makes vertues of vices; and suspicion makes vertues faults; and faults crimes. Of the two, I had rather my right hand should offend: It is alwaies safer offending on the better part. To construe an euill act well, is but a pleasing and profitable deceit of my selfe: but to misconstrue a good thing, is a treble wrong; to my selfe, the action, the author. If no good sense can be made of a deed or speech, let the blame light vpon the author: If a good interpretation may be giuen, and I chuse a worse, let me be as much censured of others, as that misconceit is punishment to my selfe.

97

I know not how it comes to passe, that the minde of man doth naturally both ouerprize his owne, in comparison of others, and yet contemne and neglect his owne, in comparison of what he wants. The remedie of this latter euil is, to compare the good things we haue, with the euils which we haue not, and others groane vnder. Thou art in health and regardest it not; Looke on the miserie of those which on their bed of sicknesse, through extremitie of paine and anguish, intreat death to release them. Thou hast cleare eye-sight, sound lims, vse of reason; and passest these ouer with slight respect: Thinke how many there are which in their vncomfortable blindnesse, would giue all the world for but one glimpse of light: how many that deformedly crawle on all foure, after the manner of the most loathsome creatures: how many that in mad phrensies are worse than brutish, worse than dead: thus thou mightest bee, and art not. If I be not happy for the good that I haue, I am yet happy for the euils that I might haue had, and haue escaped. I haue deserued the greatest euill; euery euill that I misse, is a new mercy.

Earth, which is the baasest element, is both our mother that brought vs forth, our stage ſtage that beares vs aliue, and our graue wherein at laſt we are entombed; giuing to vs both our originall, our harbour, our Sepulcher: She hath yeelded her backe to beare thouſands of generations; and at laſt opened her mouth to receiue them; ſo ſwallowing them vp, that ſhe ſtill both beareth more, and lookes for more; not bewraying any change in her ſelfe, while ſhe ſo oft hath changed her brood, and her burden. It is a wonder we can be proud of our parentage, or of our ſelues, while we ſee both the baſeneſſe and ſtabilitie of the earth, whence we came. What difference is there? Liuing earth treads vpon the dead earth, which afterwards deſcends into the graue, as ſenſeleſſe and dead, as the earth that receiues it. Not many are proud of their ſoules; and none but fooles can be proud of their bodies. While wee walke and looke vpon the earth, we cannot but acknowledge ſenſible admonitions of humility; and while we remember them, we cannot forget our ſelues. It is a mother-like fauour of the earth, that ſhe beares and nouriſhes me, and at the laſt entertaines my dead carkaſe: but it is a greater pleaſure, that ſhe teacheth me my vileneſſe by her owne, and ſends me to heauen, for what ſhe wants.

The wicked man carrieth euery day a brand to his hell, till his heape be come to the height: then he ceaſeth ſinning, and begins his torment; whereas the repentant, in euery fit of holy ſorrow, caries away a whole faggot from the flame, and quencheth the coales that remaine, with his teares. There is no torment for the penitent; no redemption for the obſtinate. Safetie conſiſteth not in not ſinning, but in repenting: neither is it ſinne that condemnes, but impenitence. O Lord, I cannot bee righteous, let me be repentant.

100

The eſtate of heauenly and earthly things is plainly repreſented to vs, by the two lights of heauen, which are appointed to rule the night and the day. Earthly things are rightly reſembled by the Moone, which being neereſt to the region of mortalitie, is euer in changes, and neuer lookes vpon vs twice with the ſame face; and when it is at the full, is blemiſhed with ſome darke blots, not capable of any illumination. Heauenly things are figured by the Sunne, whoſe great and glorious light is both naturall to it ſelfe, and euer conſtant. That other fickle and dimme ſtarre is fit enough for the night of miſery, wherein we liue here below. And this firme and beautifull light is but good enough for that Day of glory, which the Saints liue in. If it be good liuing here where our ſorrowes are changed with ioyes; what is it to liue aboue, where our ioyes change not? I cannot looke vpon the body of the Sunne: and yet I cannot ſee at all without the light of it. I cannot behold the glory of thy Saints, O Lord; yet without the knowledge of it, I am blinde. If thy creature be ſo glorious to vs here below; how glorious ſhall thy ſelfe be to vs when we are aboue this Sunne? This Sunne ſhall not ſhine vpward, where thy glory ſhineth: the greater light extinguiſheth the leſſer. O thou Sunne of righteouſneſſe (which ſhalt onely ſhine to me when I am glorified) doe thou heat, enlighten, comfort me with the beames of thy preſence, till I be glorified. AMEN.

TO THE RIGHT HONOVRABLE, HENRY

Earle of Huntingdon, Lord Haſtings, Hungerford, Botreaux, Molines and Moiles, his Maieſties Lieutenant in the Counties of Leiceſter and Rutland, my ſingular good Lord:

All increaſe of true Honour, and HEAVEN begun vpon EARTH.

RIGHT HONORABLE,

I Haue vndertaken a great taske, to teach men how to bee happy in this life: I haue vndertaken and performed it: wherein I haue followed Seneca, and gone beyond him; followed him as a Philoſopher, gone beyond him as a Chriſtian, as a Diuine. Finding it a true cenſure of the beſt Moraliſts, that they were like to goodly Ships, graced with great titles, the Sauegard, the Triumph, the Good-ſpeed, and ſuch like, when yet they haue beene both extremely Sea-beaten, and at laſt wracked. The volume is little, perhaps the vſe more; I haue euer thought according to the Greeke Prouerbe, μέγα βιβλίον μέγα κακόν. What it is, euen iuſtice challengeth it to him, to whom the Author hath deuoted himſelfe: The children of the bondman are the goods of the parents Maſter. I humbly betake it to your Honours protection, and your Honour to the protection of the Higheſt.

Your Honours moſt humbly deuoted in all dutie and ſeruice,

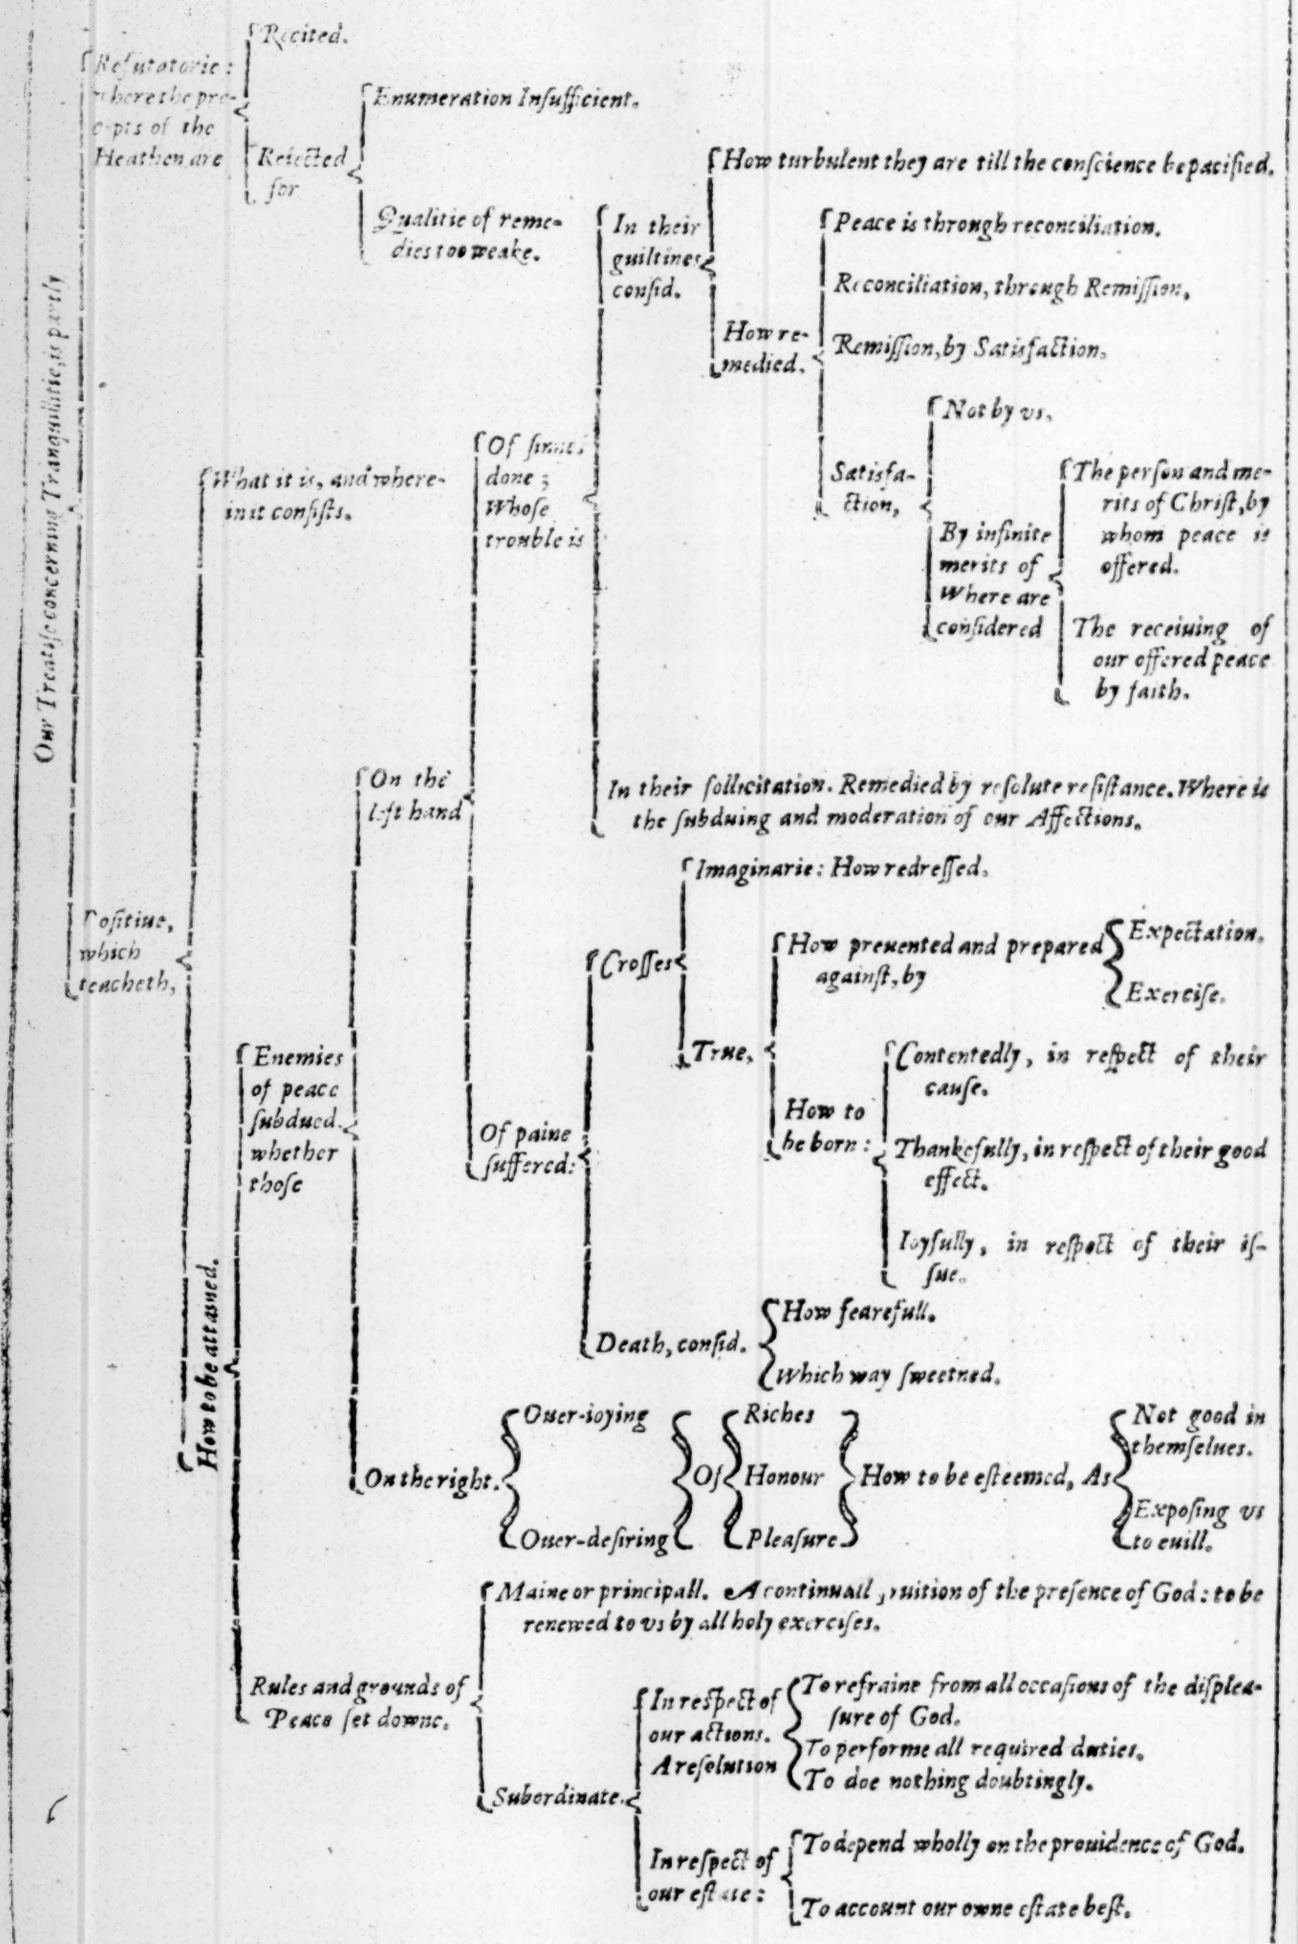
The Analysis or Resolution of this Treatise concerning TRANQVILLITIE.



HEAVEN VPON EARTH:

OR,

Of true Peace of Minde.

SECT. I.

WHEN I had ſtudiouſly read ouer the morall writings of ſome wiſe Heathen, eſpecially thoſe of the Stoicall profeſſion, I muſt confeſſe, I found a little enuie and pitie ſtriuing together within me. I enuied nature in them, to ſee her ſo witty in deuiſing ſuch plauſible refuges for doubting and troubled minds: I pittied them, to ſee that their carefull diſquiſition of true reſt, led them in the end but to meere vnquietneſſe. Wherein me thought, they were as Hounds ſwift of foot, but not exquiſite in ſent, which in an haſty purſuit take a wrong way, ſpending their mouthes, and courſes in vaine. Their praiſe of gheſſing wittily they ſhall not leeſe, their hopes both they loſt, and whoſoeuer followes them. If Seneca could haue had grace to his wit, what wonders would he haue done in this kinde? what Diuine might not haue yeelded him the chaire for precepts of Tranquillity without any diſparagement? As he was, this he hath gained: Neuer any Heathen wrote more diuinely, neuer any Philoſopher more probably. Neither would I euer deſire better Maſter, if to this purpoſe I needed no other miſtris than Nature. But this in truth is a taske, which Nature hath neuer without preſumption vndertaken, and neuer performed without much imperfection. Like to thoſe vaine and wandring Empirickes, which in Tables and pictures make great oſtentation of Cures, neuer approuing their skill to their credulous Patients. And if ſhe could haue truly effected it alone, I know not what employment in this life ſhe ſhould haue left for grace to buſie her ſelfe about, nor what priuilege it ſhould haue beene heere below to be a Chriſtian, ſince this that we ſeeke is the nobleſt worke of the ſoule, and in which alone conſiſts the only heauen of this world; this is the ſumme of all humane deſires: which when we haue attained, then onely we begin to liue, and are ſure we cannot thence-forth liue miſerably. No maruell then if all the Heathen haue diligently ſought after it, many wrote of it, none attained it. Not Athens muſt teach this leſſon, but Ieruſalem.

Cenſure of Philoſophers.

SECT. II.

YEt ſomething Grace ſcorneth not to learne of Nature, as Moſes may take good counſell of a Midianite. Nature hath euer had more skill in the end, than in the way to it; and whether ſhee haue diſcourſed of the good eſtate of the minde, which wee call TRANQVILLITIE, or the beſt, which is happineſſe, hath more happily gheſſed gheſſed at the generall definition of them, than of the meanes to compaſſe them. Shee teacheth vs therefore without controlement, that the Tranquillity of the minde is, as of the Sea and weather, when no wind ſtirreth, when the waues doe not tumultuouſly riſe and fall vpon each other, but when the face both of the Heauen and waters is ſtill, faire, and equable. That it is ſuch an euen diſpoſition of the heart, wherein the ſcales of the minde neither riſe vp towards the beame, through their owne lightneſſe, or the ouer-weening opinion of proſperity, nor are too much depreſſed with any loade of ſorrow; but hanging equall and vnmoued betwixt both, giue a man liberty in all occurrences to enioy himſelfe. Not that the moſt temperate minde can be ſo the maſter of his paſſions, as not ſometimes to ouer-ioy his griefe, or ouer-grieue his ioy, according to the contrary occaſions of both: for not the euenеſt weights, but at their firſt putting into the ballance, ſomewhat ſway both parts thereof, not without ſome ſhew of inequality, which yet after ſome little motion, ſettle themſelues in a meet poyſe. It is enough that after ſome ſudden agitation, it can returne to it ſelfe, and reſt it ſelfe at laſt in a reſolued peace. And this due compoſedneſſe of minde we require vnto our Tranquillitie, not for ſome ſhort fits of good mood, which ſoone after end in diſcontentment, but with the condition of perpetuity. For there is no heart makes ſo rough weather, as not ſometimes to admit of a calme, and whether for that he knoweth no preſent cauſe of his trouble, or for that he knoweth, that cauſe of trouble is counteruailed with as great an occaſion of priuate ioy, or for that the multitude of euills hath bred careleſneſſe, the man that is moſt diſordred, findes ſome reſpits of quietneſſe. The balances that are moſt ill matched in their vnſteddy motions, come to an equality, but ſtay not at it. The franticke man cannot auoid the imputation of madneſſe, though he be ſober for many Moones, if he rage in one. So then the calme minde muſt be ſetled in an habituall reſt, not then firme when there is nothing to ſhake it, but then leaſt ſhaken when it is moſt aſſayled.

What Tranquillity is, and wherein it conſiſts.

Sect. III.

Inſufficiency of humane precepts.

WHence eaſily appeares how vainely it hath beene ſought either in ſuch a conſtant eſtate of outward things, as ſhould giue no diſtaſte to the minde whiles all earthly things varie with the weather, and haue no ſtay but in vncertainty, or in the naturall temper of the ſoule, ſo ordered by humane wiſdome, as that it ſhould not be affected with any caſuall euents to either part; ſince that cannot euer by naturall power be held like to it ſelfe; but one while is cheerefull, ſtirring and ready to vndertake; another while drowſie, dull, comfortleſſe, prone to reſt, weary of it ſelfe, loathing his owne purpoſes, his owne reſolutions. In both which ſince the wiſeſt Philoſophers haue grounded all the rules of their Tranquillity, it is plaine that they ſaw it afarre off, as they did heauen it ſelfe with a deſire and admiration, but knew not the way to it: whereupon alas, how ſlight and impotent are the remedies they preſcribe for vnquietneſſe! For what is it that for the inconſtancie and lazineſſe of the minde ſtill diſpleaſing it ſelfe in what it doth, and for that diſtemper thereof which ariſeth from the fearefull, vnthriuing, and reſtleſſe deſires of it, wee ſhould euer bee imploying our ſelues in ſome publike affaires, chuſing our buſineſſe according to our inclination, and proſecuting what wee haue choſen? wherewith being at laſt cloyed, wee ſhould retire our ſelues, and weare the reſt of our time in priuate ſtudies; that wee ſhould make due comparatiue trials of our owne abilitie; nature of our buſineſſes; diſpoſition of our choſen friends? that in reſpect of Patrimonie wee ſhould bee but careleſly affected, ſo drawing it in as it may be leaſt for ſhew, moſt for vſe; remouing all pompe, bridling our hopes, cutting off ſuperfluities; for croſſes, to conſider that cuſtome will abate and mitigate them, that the beſt things are but chaines and burdens to thoſe that haue them; to thoſe that vſe them, that the worſt things haue ſome mixture of comfort to thoſe that grone vnder them. Or leauing theſe lower rudiments that are giuen to weake

and ſimple nouices, to examine thoſe golden rules of Morality, which are commended to the moſt wiſe and able practitioners, what it is to account himſelfe as a Tenant at will? To fore-imagine the worſt in all caſuall matters? To auoid all idle and impertinent buſineſſes, all pragmaticall medling with affaires of State? not to fix our ſelues vpon any one eſtate, as to bee impatient of a change, to call backe the minde from outward things, and draw it home into it ſelfe? to laugh at and eſteeme lightly of others miſ-demeanours? Not to depend vpon others opinions, but to ſtand on our owne bottomes? to carry our ſelues in an honeſt and ſimple truth, free from a curious hypocriſie, and affectation of ſeeming other than we are, and yet as free from a baſe kinde of careleſneſſe? to intermeddle retiredneſſe with ſocietie, ſo as one may giue ſweetneſſe to the other, and both to vs? So ſlackning the minde that we may not looſen it, and ſo bending as we may not breake it? to make moſt of our ſelues, chearing vp our ſpirits with varietie of recreations, with ſatiety of meales, and all other bodily indulgence, ſauing that drunkenneſſe (mee thinkes) can neither beſeeme a wiſe Philoſopher to preſcribe, nor a vertuous man to practiſe? All theſe in their kindes pleaſe well, profit much, and are as ſoueraigne for both theſe, as they are vnable to effect that for which they are propounded. Nature teacheth thee all theſe ſhould be done, ſhee cannot teach thee to doe them: and yet doe all theſe and no more, let mee neuer haue reſt, if thou haue it. For neither are here the greateſt enemies of our peace ſo much as deſcried afarre off, nor thoſe that are noted are hereby ſo preuented, that vpon moſt diligent practice we can promiſe our ſelues any ſecurity: wherewith who ſo inſtructed, dare confidently giue challenge to all ſinister euents, is like to ſome skilfull Fencer who ſtands vpon his vſuall wards, and plaies well; but if there come a ſtrange fetch of an vnwonted blow, is put beſides the rules of his Art, and with much ſhame ouer-taken. And for thoſe that are knowne, beleeue mee, the minde of man is too weake to beare out it ſelfe hereby againſt all aſſets. There are light croſſes that will take an eaſie repulſe; others yet ſtronger, that ſhake the houſe ſide, but breake not in vpon vs; others vehement, which by force make way to the heart, where they finde none, breaking open the doore of the ſoule that denies entrance. Others violent, that lift the minde off the hindges, or rend the bars of it in peeces: others furious, that teare vp the very foundations from the bottome, leauing no monument behinde them, but ruine. The wiſeſt and moſt reſolute Moraliſt that euer was, lookt pale when he ſhould taſte of his Hemlocke; and by his timorouſneſſe made ſport to thoſe that enuied his ſpeculations. The beſt of the Heathen Emperors (that was honoured with the title of piety) iuſtly magnified that courage of Chriſtians which made them inſult ouer their tormentors, and by their feareleſneſſe of earth-quakes, and deaths, argued the truth of their Religion. It muſt be, it can be none but a diuine power, that can vphold the minde againſt the rage of maine afflictions, and yet the greateſt croſſes are not the greateſt enemies to inward peace. Let vs therefore looke vp aboue our ſelues, and from the rules of an higher Art, ſupply the defects of naturall wiſdome, giuing ſuch infallible directions for tranquillity, that whoſoeuer ſhall follow, cannot but liue ſweetly and with continuall delight, applauding himſelfe at home, when all the world beſides him ſhall be miſerable. To which purpoſe it ſhall be requiſite, firſt to remoue all cauſes of vnquietneſſe, and then to ſet downe the grounds of our happy reſt.

Allowed yet by Seneca in his laſt chapter of Tranquillitie. Senecaes rules reiected as inſufficient.

Diſpoſition of the worke.

Sect. IV.

I Finde on the hand two vniuerſall enemies of Tranquillity; Conſcience of euill done, Senſe or feare of euill ſuffered. The former in one word, we call ſinnes, the latter Croſſes. The firſt of theſe muſt be quite taken away, the ſecond duely tempered ere the heart can be at reſt. For firſt, how can that man be at peace, that is at variance with God and himſelfe? How ſhould peace be Gods gift, if it could be without him, if it could be againſt him? It is the profeſſion of ſinne, although faire-ſpoken at the firſt

Enemies of inward peace diuided into their rankes.

cloſing, to be a perpetuall make-bate betwixt God and man, betwixt a man and himſelfe. And this enmitie, though it doe not continually ſhew it ſelfe, (as the mortalleſt enemies are not alwaies in pitched fields one againſt the other) for that the conſcience is not euer clamorous, but ſome while is ſilent, other-whiles with ſtill murmurings bewraies his miſſ.kes, yet doth euermore worke ſecret vnquietneſſe to the heart. The guilty man may haue a ſeeming truce, a true peace he cannot haue. Looke vpon the face of the guilty heart, and thou ſhalt ſee it pale and ghaſtly; the ſmiles and laughters faint and heartleſſe, the ſpeeches doubtfull, and full of abrupt ſtops and vnſeaſonable turnings; the purpoſes and motions vnſteddy, and ſauouring of much diſtraction, arguing plainly that ſinne is not ſo ſmooth at her firſt motions, as turbulent afterwards: hence are thoſe vaine wearyings of places and companies together with our ſelues; that the galled ſoule doth after the wont of ſicke Patients ſeeke refreſhing in variety; and after many roſſed and turned ſides, complaines of remedileſſe and vnabated torment. Nero after ſo much innocent bloud, may change his bed-chamber, but his Fiends euer attend him, euer are within him, and are as parts of himſelfe. Alas what auailes it to ſeeke outward releeſes, when thou haſt thine executioner within thee? If thou couldeſt ſhift from thy ſelfe, thou mighteſt haue ſome hope of eaſe; now thou ſhalt neuer want furies ſo long as thou haſt thy ſelfe. Yea, what if thou wouldeſt runne from thy ſelfe? Thy ſoule may flie from thy bodie, thy conſcience will not flie from thy ſoule, nor thy ſinne from thy conſcience. Some men indeed in the bitterneſſe of theſe pangs of ſinne, like vnto thoſe fondly impatient fiſhes, that leape out of the panne into the flame, haue leapt out of this priuate hell that is in themſelues, into the common pit, chooſing to aduenture vpon the future paines that they haue feared, rather than to endure the preſent horrors they haue felt: wherein what haue they gained, but to that hell which was within them, a ſecond hell without? The conſcience leaues not where the Fiends begin, but both ioyne together in torture. But there are ſome firme and obdurate fore-heads, whoſe reſolution can laugh their ſinnes out of countenance. There are ſo large and able gorges, as that they can ſwallow and digeſt bloudy murders, without complaint, who, with the ſame hands which they haue ſince their laſt meale embrued in bloud, can freely carue to themſelues large morſels at the next ſitting. Beleeueſt thou that ſuch a mans heart laughs with his face? will not he dare to bee an Hypocrite, that durſt bee a villaine? Theſe glow-wormes, when a night of ſorrow compaſſes them, make a lightſome and fiery ſhew of ioy, when if thou preſſe them, thou findeſt nothing but a cold and crude moiſture. Knoweſt thou not that there are thoſe which count it no ſhame to ſinne, yet count it a ſhame to be checked with remorſe, eſpecially ſo as others eies may deſcrie? to whom repentance ſeemes baſe-mindedneſſe, vnworthy of him that profeſſes wiſdome and valour. Such a man can grieue when none ſees it, but himſelfe can laugh when others ſee it, himſelfe feeles not. Aſſure thy ſelfe that mans heart bleedeth, when his face counterfeits a ſmile; he weares out many waking houres, when thou thinkeſt he reſteth: yea as his thoughts afford him not ſleepe, ſo his very ſleepe affords him not reſt, but while his ſenſes are tyed vp, his ſinne is looſe; repreſenting it ſelfe to him in the vgliеſt ſhape, and frighting him with horrible and helliſh dreames. And if perhaps cuſtome hath bred a careleſneſſe in him, (as wee ſee that vſuall whipping makes the childe not care for the rod) yet an vnwonted extremity of the blow ſhall fetch bloud of the ſoule, and make the backe that is moſt hardened, ſenſible of ſmart: and the further the blow is fetcht through intermiſſion of remorſe, the harder it muſt needs alight. Therefore I may confidently tell the careleſſe ſinner, as that bold Tragedian ſaid to his great Pompey: The time ſhall come wherein thou ſhalt fetch deepe ſighes, and therefore ſhalt ſorrow deſperately, becauſe thou ſorrowedſt not ſooner. The fire of the conſcience may lie for a time ſmothered with a pyle of greene wood, that it cannot bee diſcerned, whoſe moiſture when once it hath maſtered, it ſends vp ſo much greater flame, by how much it had greater reſiſtance. Hope not then to ſtop the mouth of thy conſcience from exclaiming, whiles thy ſinne continues; that endeuour is both vaine and hurtfull; So I haue ſeene them that haue ſtopt the noſthrill for

The torment of an euill conſcience.

The ioy and peace of the guilty but diſſembled.

for bleeding, in hope to ſtay the iſſue, when the bloud hindered in his former courſe, hath broken out of the mouth, or found way downe into the ſtomacke. The conſcience is not pacificable, while ſinne is within to vex it: no more than angry ſwelling can ceaſe throbbing and aching, whiles the thorne or the corrupted matter lies rotting vnderneath. Time, that remedies all other euills of the minde, increaſeth this, which like to bodily diſeaſes proues worſe with continuance, and growes vpon vs with our age.

Sect. V.

THere can be therefore no peace without reconciliation, thou canſt not be friends with thy ſelfe, till with God: for thy conſcience (which is thy beſt friend while thou ſinneſt not) like an honeſt ſeruant takes his Maſters part againſt thee when thou haſt ſinned; and will not looke ſtraight vpon thee, till thou vpon God; not daring to be ſo kinde to thee, as to be vnfaithfull to his Maker: There can be no reconciliation without remiſſion. God can neither forget the iniury of ſin, nor diſſemble hatred. It is for men and thoſe of hollow hearts, to make pretences contrary to their affections: ſoothings and ſmiles, and imbracements where we meane not loue, are from weakneſſe: Either for that we feare our inſufficiency of preſent reuenge, or hope for a fitter opportunitie afterwards, or for that we deſire to make our further aduantage of him to whom we meane euill. Theſe courſes are not incident into an Almighty power; who hauing the command of all vengeance, can ſmite were he liſt without all doubtings or delaies. There can be no remiſſion without ſatisfaction; neither dealeth God with vs as we men with ſome deſperate debters, whom after long dilations of payments, and many daies broken, we altogether let goe for diſabilitie, or at leaſt diſmiſſe them vpon an eaſie compoſition. All ſinnes are debts; all Gods debts muſt be diſcharged. It is a bold word, but a true; God ſhould not be iuſt, if any of his debts ſhould paſſe vnſatisfied. The conceit of the profane vulgar, makes him a God of all mercies; and thereupon hopes for pardon without paiment. Fond and ignorant preſumption, to diſioyne mercy and iuſtice in him to whom they are both eſſentiall; to make mercy exceede iuſtice in him, in whom both are infinite. Dareſt thou hope God can be ſo kinde to thee, as to be vniuſt to himſelfe? God will be iuſt: goe thou on to preſume and periſh. There can be no ſatisfaction by any recompence of ours: an infinite iuſtice is offended, an infinite puniſhment is deſerued by euery ſinne, and euery mans ſinnes are as neere to infinite, as number can make them. Our beſt endeuour is worſe than finite, imperfect, and faulty. If it could be perfect, we owe it all in preſent; what wee are bound to doe in preſent, cannot make amends for what we haue not done in time paſt: which while we offer to God as good payment, we doe with the profane traueller thinke to pleaſe him with empty Date-ſhells in lieu of preſeruation. Where ſhall we then finde a paiment of infinite value, but in him which is onely and all infinite? The dignitie of whoſe perſon being infinite, gaue ſuch worth to his ſatisfaction, that what hee ſuffered in ſhort time, was proportionable to what wee ſhould haue ſuffered beyond all times. He did all, ſuffered all, payed all, he did it for vs, we in him. Where ſhall I begin to wonder at thee, O thou diuine and eternall Peacemaker, the Sauiour of men, the Anointed of God, Mediator betweene God and man, in whom there is nothing which doth not exceed not onely the conceit, but the very wonder of Angels, who ſaw thee in thy humiliation with ſilence, and adore thee in thy glory with perpetuall praiſes and reioycings? Thou waſt for euer of thy ſelfe as God, of the Father, as the Sonne; the eternall Son of an eternall Father; not later in being, not leſſe in dignity, not other in ſubſtance. Begotten without diminution of him that begot thee, while he communicated that wholly to thee, which he retained wholly in himſelfe, becauſe both were infinite without inequality of nature, without diuiſion of eſſence; when being in this eſtate, thine infinite loue and mercy to deſperate mankinde, cauſed thee, O Sauiour, to empty thy ſelfe of thy glory, that thou mighteſt put on our ſhame and miſery.

The remedy of an vnquiet Conſcience.

ſery. Wherefore not ceaſing to be God as thou wert, thou beganſt to be what thou wert not, Man; to the end that thou mighteſt be a perfect Mediator betwixt God and man, which wert both in one perſon; God, that thou mightſt ſatisfie; man, that thou mightſt ſuffer; that ſince man had ſinned, and God was offended, thou which wert God and man, mightſt ſatisfie God for man. None but thy ſelfe, which art the eternall Word, can expreſſe the depth of this myſterie, that God ſhould be clothed with fleſh, come downe to men, and become man, that man might be exalted into the higheſt heauens; and that our nature might be taken into the fellowſhip of the Deitie. That he to whom all powers in heauen bowed, and thought it their honour to be ſeruiceable, ſhould come downe to be a ſeruant to his ſlaues, a ranſome for his enemies; together with our nature taking vp our very infirmities, our ſhame, our torments, and bearing our ſinnes without ſinne. That thou whom the heauens were too ſtrait to containe, ſhouldſt lay thy ſelfe in an obſcure cratch: thou which wert attended of Angels, ſhouldſt be derided of men, reiected of thine owne, perſecuted by Tyrants, tempted with Deuils, betrayed of thy ſeruant, crucified among theeues, and (which was worſe than all theſe) in thine owne apprehenſion, for the time as forſaken of thy Father; That thou whom our ſinnes had pierced, ſhouldſt for our ſinnes both ſweat drops of bloud in the Garden, and powre out ſtreames of bloud vpon the Croſſe. O the inualuable purchaſe of our peace! O ranſome enough for moe worlds! Thou which wert in the counſell of thy Father, the Lambe ſlaine from the beginning of time, cam'ſt now in fulneſſe of time to bee ſlaine by man, for man; being at once the Sacrifice offered, the Prieſt that did offer, and the God to whom it was offered. How graciouſly diddeſt thou both proclaime our peace as a Prophet in the time of thy life vpon earth, and purchaſe it by thy bloud as a Prieſt at thy death, and now confirmeſt and applieſt it as a King in heauen! By thee onely it was procured, by thee it is proffered. O mercy without example, without meaſure! God offers peace to man, the holy ſeekes to the vniuſt, the Potter to the clay, the King to the traitor. Wee are vnworthy that we ſhould be receiued to peace though wee deſired it; what are wee then that we ſhould haue peace offered for the receiuing? An eaſie condition of ſo great a benefit; he requires vs not to earne it, but to accept it of him: what could he giue more? what could he require leſſe of vs?

SECT. VI.

The receit of our peace offered by Faith.

THe purchaſe therefore of our peace was paid at once, yet muſt bee ſeuerally reckoned to euery ſoule whom it ſhall benefit. If wee haue not an hand to take what Chriſts hand doth either hold, or offer, what is ſufficient in him, cannot be effectuall to vs. The ſpirituall hand, whereby we apprehend the ſweet offers of our Sauiour, is faith, which in ſhort is no other than an affiance in the Mediator: receiue peace and bee happy, beleeue and thou haſt receiued. From hence it is that we are intereſſed in all that either God hath promiſed, or Chriſt hath performed. Hence haue we from God both forgiueneſſe and loue, the ground of all either peace or glory. Hence of enemies we become more than friends, ſonnes: and as ſonnes, may both expect and challenge not onely carefull prouiſion and ſafe protection on earth, but an euerlaſting patrimonie aboue. This field is ſo ſpacious, that it were eaſie for a man to loſe himſelfe in it: and if I ſhould ſpend all my pilgrimage in this walke, my time would ſooner end than my way; wherein I would haue meaſured more paſes, were it not that our ſcope is not ſo much to magnifie the benefit of our peace, as to ſeeke how to obtaine it.

A corolary of the benefit of this receit.

Behold now, after we haue ſought heauen and earth, where only the wearied Doue may finde an Oliue of peace. The apprehending of this all-ſufficient ſatisfaction, makes it ours: vpon our ſatisfaction we haue remiſſion; vpon remiſſion, followes reconciliation; vpon our reconciliation, peace. When therefore thy conſcience like a ſterne Sergeant ſhall catch thee by the throat, and arreſt thee vpon Gods debt, let thy only plea plea be, that thou haſt already paid it: Bring forth that bloudie acquittance ſealed to thee from heauen vpon thy true faith, ſtraightway thou ſhalt ſee the fierce and terrible looke of thy conſcience changed into friendly ſmiles, and that rough and violent hand that was ready to dragge thee to priſon, ſhall now louingly embrace thee, and fight for thee againſt all the wrongfull attempts of any ſpirituall aduerſarie. O heauenly Peace, and more than Peace, Friendſhip, whereby alone wee are leagued with our ſelues, and God with vs, which who-euer wants, ſhall finde a ſad Remembrancer in the midſt of his diſſembled iollitie, and after all vaine ſtrifes, ſhall fall into many ſecret dumps, from which his guiltie heart ſhall denie to be cheared, though all the world were his minſtrell! Oh pleaſure worthy to be pitied, and laughter worthy of teares, that is without this! Goe then, fooliſh man, and when thou feeleſt any checke of thy ſinne, ſeeke after thy iocundeſt companions, deceiue the time and thy ſelfe with merry purpoſes, with buſie games, feaſt away thy cares, burie them and thy ſelfe in wine and ſleepe: after all theſe friuolous deferrings, it will returne vpon thee, when thou wakeſt, perhaps ere thou wakeſt, nor will be repelled till it haue ſhewed thee thy hell, nor when it hath ſhewed thee, will yet be repelled. So the ſtricken Deere hauing receiued a deadly arrow, whoſe ſhaft ſhaken out hath left the head behinde it, runnes from one Thicket to another, not able to change his paine with his places, but finding his wounds ſtill the worſe with continuance. Ah foole, thy ſoule feſtereth within, and is affected ſo much more dangerouſly, by how much leſſe it appeareth. Thou maiſt while thy ſelfe with varietie, thou canſt not eaſe thee. Sinne owes thee a ſpight, and will pay it thee, perhaps when thou art in worſt caſe to ſuſtaine it. This ſhifting doth but prouide for a further violence at laſt. I haue ſeene a little ſtreame of no noiſe, which vpon his ſtoppage hath ſwelled vp, and with a loud guſhing hath borne ouer the heape of turues wherewith it was reſiſted. Thy death-bed ſhall ſmart for theſe wilfull adiournings of repentance; whereon how many haue we heard raging of their old neglected ſinnes, and fearefully deſpairing when they haue had moſt need of comfort? In ſumme, there is no way but this: Thy conſcience muſt haue either ſatisfaction or torment. Diſcharge thy ſinne betimes, and be at peace. He neuer breakes his ſleepe for debt, that payes when he takes vp.

The vaine ſhifts of the guilty.

SECT. VII.

NEither can it ſuffice for peace, to haue croſſed the old ſcrole of our ſinnes, if wee preuent not the future; yea the preſent very importunitie of tentation breeds vnquietneſſe. Sinne where it hath got an haunt, looketh for more, as humours that fall towards their old iſſue: and if it be not ſtrongly repelled, doth neere as much vex vs with ſolliciting as with yeelding. Let others enuie their happineſſe, I ſhall neuer thinke their life ſo much as quiet, whoſe doores are continually beaten, and their morning ſleepe broken with early clients, whoſe entries are daily thronged with ſuters preſſing neere for the next audience; much leſſe that through their remiſſe anſwers are daily haunted with traitors or other inſtruments of villanie, offering their miſchieuous ſeruice, and inciting them to ſome peſtilent enterpriſe. Such are tentations to the ſoule. Whereof it cannot be rid, ſo long as it holds them in any hope of entertainement: and ſo long they will hope to preuaile, while wee giue them but a cold and timorous deniall. Suters are drawne on with an eaſie repulſe; counting that as halfe granted, which is but faintly gaine-ſaid. Peremptory anſwers can only put ſinne out of heart for any ſecond attempts. It is euer impudent when it meets not with a bold heart; hoping to preuaile by wearying vs, and wearying vs by intreaties. Let all ſuggeſtions therefore finde thee reſolute: ſo ſhall thy ſoule finde it ſelfe at reſt; for as the Deuill, ſo ſinne his naturall brood, flies away with reſiſtance. To which purpoſe, all our heady and diſordered affections, which are the ſecret factors of ſinne and Satan, muſt bee reſtrained by a ſtrong and yet temperate command of Reaſon and Religion: theſe, if they finde the reynes looſe in their necks (like to the wilde horſes, of that chaſte hunter in the Tragedie)

Sollicitation of ſinne remedied.

The ordering of affections.

gedie) carry vs ouer hills and rockes, and neuer leaue vs till wee be dismembred, and they breathlesse: but contrarily, if they bee pulled in with the sudden violence of a straight hand, they fall to plunging, and careering, and neuer leaue till their saddle bee empty, and euen then dangerously strike at their prostrate Rider. If there bee any exercise of Christian wisdome, it is in the managing of these vnruly affections, which are not more necessary in their best vse, than pernicious in their mis-gouernance. Reason hath alwaies beene busie in vndertaking this so necessary a moderation: wherein although shee haue preuailed with some of colder temper, yet those which haue beene of more stubborne metall, like vnto growne schollers, which scorne the ferule that ruled their minority, haue still despised her weake endeuours. Onely Christianitie hath this power; which with our second birth giues vs a new nature: so that now, if excesse of passions be naturall to vs as men, the order of them is naturall to vs as Christians. Reason bids the angry man say ouer his Alphabet ere he giue his answer; hoping by this intermission of time, to gaine the mitigation of his rage. He was neuer throughly angry, that can endure the recitall of so many idle letters. Christianitie giues not rules, but power to auoid this short madnesse. It was a wise speech that is reported of our best and last Cardinall (I hope) that this Iland either did or shall see; who when a skilfull Astrologer, vpon the calculation of his natiuitie, had foretold him some specialties, concerning his future estate, answered, Such perhaps I was borne, but since that time, I haue beene borne againe, and my second natiuitie hath crossed my first. The power of nature is a good plea for those that acknowledge nothing aboue nature. But for a Christian to excuse his intemperateneſſe, by his naturall inclination, and to say, I am borne cholericke, sullen, amorous, is an Apologie worse than the fault. Wherefore serues Religion, but to subdue or gouerne nature? We are so much Christians, as we can rule our selues, the rest is but forme, and speculation. Yea, the very thought of our profession is so powerfull, that (like vnto that precious stone) being cast into this Sea, it asswageth those inward tempests, that were raised by the affections. The vnregenerate minde is not capable of this power; and therefore through the continuall mutinies of his passions, cannot but be subiect to perpetuall vnquietnesse. There is neither remedy nor hope in this estate. But the Christian soule, that hath inured it selfe to the awe of God, and the exercises of true mortification, by the onely looking vp at his holy profession, cureth the burning venome of these fiery serpents that lurke within him. Hast thou nothing but nature? Resolue to looke for no peace. God is not prodigall to cast away his best blessings on so vnworthy subiects. Art thou a Christian? Doe but remember thou art so; and then if thou dar'st, if thou canst, yeeld to the excesse of passions.

SECT. VIII.

The second maine enemy to Peace, Crosses.

HItherto the most inward and dangerous enemie of our peace: which if wee haue once mastered, the other field shall be fought and wonne with lesse bloud. Crosses disquiet vs either in their present feeling, or their expectation: both of them, when they meet with weake mindes, so extremely distempering them, that the patient for the time is not himselfe. How many haue we knowne, which through a lingring disease, weary of their paine, weary of their liues, haue made their owne hands their executioners? How many meeting with a headstrong griefe, which they could not manage, haue by the violence of it beene carried quite from their wits? How many millions, what for incurable maladies, what for losses, what for defamations, what for sad accidents to their children, rub out their liues in perpetuall discontentment, therefore liuing, because they cannot yet die, not for that they like to liue? If there could be any humane receit prescribed to auoid euils, it would bee purchased at an high rate: but both it is impossible that earth should redresse that which is sent from Heauen; and if it could be done, euen the want of miseries would proue miserable: for the minde cloyed with continuall felicity, would grow a burden to it selfe, loathing that at laſt, which intermiſſion would haue made pleaſant. Giue a free horſe the full reynes, and he will ſoone tire. Summer is the ſweeteſt ſeaſon by all conſents, wherein the earth is both moſt rich with increaſe, and moſt gorgeous for ornament; yet if it were not receiued with interchanges of cold froſts and piercing windes, who could liue? Summer would be no Summer, if Winter did not both lead it in, and follow it: we may not therefore either hope or ſtriue to eſcape all croſſes; ſome we may: what thou canſt, flie from; what thou canſt not, allay and mitigate; in croſſes vniuerſally let this be thy rule, Make thy ſelfe none, eſcape ſome, beare the reſt, ſweeten all.

Sect. IX.

Of croſſes that ariſe from conceit.

APprehenſion giues life to croſſes: and if ſome be ſimply, moſt are as they are taken. I haue ſeene many, which when God hath meant them no hurt, haue framed themſelues croſſes out of imagination, and haue found that inſupportable for weight, which in truth neuer was, neither had euer any but a fancied being. Others againe laughing out heauie afflictions, for which they were bemoaned of the beholders. One receiues a deadly wound, and lookes not ſo much as pale at the ſmart; another heares of many loſſes, and like Zeno, after newes of his ſhipwracke, (as altogether paſſion-leſſe) goes to his reſt, not breaking an houres ſleepe for that, which would breake the heart of ſome others. Greenham that Saint of ours (whom it cannot diſparage that he was reſerued for our ſo looſe an age) can lie ſpread quietly vpon the forme looking for the Chirurgians knife, binding himſelfe as faſt with a reſolued patience, as others with ſtrongeſt cords, abiding his fleſh carued, and his bowels rifled, and not ſtirring more than if he felt not, while others tremble to expect, and ſhrinke to feele but the pricking of a veyne. There can be no remedie for imaginary croſſes but wiſdome, which ſhall teach vs to eſteeme of all euents as they are; like a true glaſſe repreſenting all things to our mindes in their due proportion. So as croſſes may not ſeeme that are not, nor little and gentle ones ſeeme great and intolerable. Giue thy body Ellebore, thy minde good counſell, thine eare to thy friend, and theſe fantaſticall euills ſhall vaniſh away like themſelues.

Sect. X.

Of true and reall croſſes.

IT were idle aduice to bid men auoid euils. Nature hath by a ſecret inſtinct taught brute creatures ſo much, whether wit or ſagacity: and our ſelfe-loue making the beſt aduantage of reaſon, will eaſily make vs ſo wiſe and carefull. It is more worth our labour, ſince our life is ſo open to calamities, and nature to impatience, to teach men to beare what euills they cannot auoid, and how by a well-diſpoſedneſſe of minde we may correct the iniquitie of all hard euents. Wherein it is hardly credible, how much good Art and precepts of reſolution may auaile vs. I haue ſeene one man, by the helpe of a little engine, lift vp that weight alone, which forty helping hands by their cleare ſtrength might haue endeuoured in vaine. Wee liue here in an Ocean of troubles, wherein we can ſee no firme land; one waue falling vpon another, ere the former haue wrought all his ſpight. Miſchiefes ſtriue for places, as if they feared to loſe their roome if they haſted not. So many good things as we haue, ſo many euills ariſe from their priuation; beſides no fewer reall and poſitiue euills that afflict vs. To preſcribe and apply receits to euery particular croſſe, were to write a Salmeron-like commentary vpon Petrarchs remedies; and I doubt whether ſo the worke would be perfect: a life would be too little to write it, and but enough to reade it.

Sect.

Sect. XI.

The first remedy of crosses before they come.

THe same medicines cannot helpe all diseases of the body, of the soule they may. Wee see Fencers giue their schollers the same common rules of position, of warding and weilding their weapon for offence, for defence, against all commers: such vniuersall precepts there are for crosses. In the first whereof, I would prescribe Expectation, that either killeth or abateth euills. For Crosses, after the nature of the Cockatrice, die, if they be foreseene; whether this prouidence makes vs more strong to resist, or by some secret power makes them more vnable to assault vs. It is not credible what a fore-resolued minde can doe, can suffer. Could our English Milo, of whom Spaine yet speaketh since their last peace, haue ouerthrowne that furious Beast, made now more violent through the rage of his baiting, if he had not setled himselfe in his station, and expected? The frighted multitude ran away from that ouer-earnest sport, which begun in pleasure, ended in terrour. If he had turned his backe with the rest, where had beene his safety, where his glory, and reward? Now he stood still, expected, ouercame, by one fact he at once preserued, honoured, enriched himselfe. Euills will come neuer the sooner for that thou lookest for them, they will come the easier: it is a labour well lost, if they come not; and well bestowed, if they doe come. We are sure the worst may come, why should wee bee secure that it will not? Suddennesse findes weake mindes secure, makes them miserable, leaues them desperate. The best way therefore is, to make things present, in conceit before they come, that they may be halfe past in their violence when they doe come: euen as with woodden waiters we learne to play at the sharp. As therefore good Souldiers exercise themselues long at the pale, and there vse those actiuities, which afterwards they shall practise vpon a true aduersarie: so must we present to our selues imaginary crosses, and manage them in our minde, before God sends them in euent. Now I eat, sleepe, digest, all soundly, without complaint: what if a languishing disease should bereaue me of my appetite and rest? that I should see dainties and loath them, surfetting of the very smell, of the thought of the best dishes? that I should count the lingring houres, and thinke Ezechias long day returned, wearying my selfe with changing sides, and wishing any thing but what I am? How could I take this distemper? Now I haue (if not what I would, yet) what I need; as not abounding with idle superfluities, so not straitned with penurie of necessary things. What if pouerty should rush vpon me as an armed man, spoiling mee of all my little that I had, and send me to the fountaine for my best cellar? to the ground for my bed? for my bread to anothers cupbord? for my clothes to the Brokers shop, or my friends wardrobe? How could I brooke this want? I am now at home, walking in my owne grounds, looking on my young plants the hope of posterity, considering the nature, aduantages or feares of my soile, enioying the patrimony of my Fathers. What if for my Religion, or the malicious sentence of some great one, I should be exiled from my Countrey, wandering amongst those, whose habit, language, fashion, my ignorance shall make me wonder at; where the solitude of places, and strangenesse of persons, shall make my life vncomfortable? How could I abide the smell of forraine smoke? how should I take the contempt and hard vsage that waits vpon strangers? Thy prosperity is idle, and ill spent, if it be not medled with such fore-casting, and wisely suspicious thoughts, if it be wholly bestowed in enioying, no whit in preuenting. Like vnto a foolish Citie, which notwithstanding a dangerous situation, spends all her wealth in rich furnitures of chambers, and state-houses; while they bestow not one shouell-full of earth on outward Bulwarks to their defence: this is but to make our enemies the happier, and our selues the more readily miserable. If thou wilt not therefore be oppressed with euils, Expect and Exercise; Exercise thy selfe with conceit of euils: Expect the euils themselues; yea exercise thy selfe in expectation: so while the minde pleaseth it selfe in thinking, Yet I am not thus, it prepareth it selfe against it may be so. And if some that haue beene good at the Foyles, haue proued cowardly at the sharp, yet on the contrary, who euer durst point a single combat in the field, that hath not beene somewhat trained in the Fence-schoole?

Sect.

Sect. XII.

NEither doth it a little blunt the edge of euils, to conſider that they come from a diuine hand, whoſe almighty power is guided by a moſt wiſe prouidence, and tempered with a Fatherly loue. Euen the ſauage creatures will be ſmitten of their keeper, and repine not; if of a ſtranger, they teare him in peeces. He ſtrikes me that made me, that moderates the world; why ſtruggle I with him, why with my ſelfe? Am I a foole, or a Rebell? A foole, if I be ignorant whence my croſſes come: a Rebell, if I know it, and be impatient. My ſufferings are from a God, from my God; he hath deſtin'd me euery dramme of ſorrow that I feele: thus much thou ſhalt abide, and here ſhall thy miſeries be ſtinted. All worldly helps cannot abate them, all powers of hell cannot adde one ſcruple to their weight, that he hath allotted me: I muſt therefore either blaſpheme God in my heart, detracting from his infinite iuſtice, wiſdome, power, mercy, which all ſhall ſtand inuiolable, when millions of ſuch wormes as I am, are gone to duſt; or elſe confeſſe that I ought to be patient. And if I profeſſe I ſhould be that I will not, I befoole my ſelfe, and bewray miſerable impotencie. But (as impatience is full of excuſe) it was thine owne raſh improuidence, or the ſpight of thine enemie that impoueriſht, that defamed thee: it was the malignitie of ſome vnwholeſome diſh, or ſome groſſe corrupted aire, that hath diſtempered thee. Ah fooliſh curre, why doeſt thou bite at the ſtone, which could neuer haue hurt thee, but from the hand that threw it? If I wound thee, what matters it whether with mine owne ſword, or thine, or anothers? God ſtrikes ſome immediatly from heauen with his owne arme, or with the arme of Angels: others hee buffets with their owne hands, ſome by the reuenging ſword of an enemie, others with the fiſt of his dumbe creatures: God ſtrikes in all; his hand moues theirs. If thou ſee it not, blame thy carnall eies. Why doſt thou fault the inſtrument, while thou knoweſt the agent? Euen the dying theefe pardons the executioner, exclaimes on his vniuſt Iudge, or his malicious accuſers. Either then blame the firſt mouer, or diſcharge the meanes: which as they could not haue touched thee, but as from him; ſo from him they haue afflicted thee iuſtly, wrongfully perhaps as in themſelues.

The next remedy of croſſes when they are come. From their Author.

Sect. XIII.

BVt neither ſeemeth it enough to be patient in croſſes, if wee bee not thankfull alſo. Good things challenge more than bare contentment. Croſſes (vniuſtly termed euils) as they are ſent of him that is all gooneſſe, ſo they are ſent for good, and his end cannot bee fruſtrate. What greater good can be to the diſeaſed man, than fit and proper Phyſicke to recure him? Croſſes are the only medicines of ſicke mindes. Thy ſound body carries within it a ſicke ſoule; thou feeleſt it not perhaps: ſo much more art thou ſicke, and ſo much more dangerouſly. Perhaps thou laboureſt of ſome plethorie of pride, or of ſome dropſie of couetouſneſſe, or the ſtaggers of inconſtancy, or ſome feauer of luxurie, or conſumption of enuie, or perhaps of the lethargie of idleneſſe, or of the phrenſie of anger: It is a rare ſoule that hath not ſome notable diſeaſe: onely croſſes are thy remedies. What if they be vnpleaſant? They are phyſicke: it is enough if they be wholeſome. Not pleaſant taſte, but the ſecret vertue commends medicines. If they cure thee, they ſhall pleaſe thee, euen in diſpleaſing; or elſe thou loueſt thy palate aboue thy ſoule. What madneſſe is this? When thou complaineſt of a bodily diſeaſe, thou ſendeſt to the Phyſician, that he may ſend thee not ſauourie, but wholeſome potions: thou receiueſt them in ſpight of thine abhorring ſtomach, and withall both thankeſt and rewardeſt the Phyſician. Thy ſoule is ſicke: thy heauenly Phyſician ſees it, and pitties thee ere thou thy ſelfe; and vnſent to, ſends thee not a plauſible, but a ſoueraigne remedie: thou loatheſt the ſauour, and rather wilt hazard thy life, than offend thy palate; and in ſtead of thankes, repineſt at, reuileſt the Phyſician. How comes it that that we loue our ſelues ſo little (if at leaſt we count our ſoules the beſt or any part) as that we had rather vndergoe death than paine, chuſing rather wilfull ſickneſſe, than an harſh remedie? Surely we men are meere fooles in the eſtimation of our owne good: like children, our choice is lead altogether by ſhew, no whit by ſubſtance. Wee cry after euery well-ſeeming toy, and put from vs ſolid proffers of good things. The wiſe Arbitrator of all things ſees our folly, and corrects it, with-holding our idle deſires, and forcing vpon vs the ſound good we refuſe. It is ſecond folly in vs, if we thanke him not. The fooliſh babe cries for his fathers bright knife, or gilded pilles. The wiſer father knowes that they can but hurt him; and therefore with-holds them after all his teares. The childe thinkes he is vſed but vnkindly. Euery wiſe man, and himſelfe at more yeeres, can ſay, it was vſed but childiſh folly, in deſiring it, in cõplaining that he miſſed it. The loſſe of wealth, friends, health, is ſometimes gaine to vs. Thy body, thy eſtate, is worſe; thy ſoule is better, why complaineſt thou?

The third antidote of croſſes.

Sect. XIV.

The 4. and laſt part, from their iſſue.

NAy, it ſhall not be enough (mee thinkes) if onely wee be but contented and thankfull, if not alſo chearefull in afflictions; if that, as we feele their paine, ſo wee looke to their end; although indeed this is not more requiſite, than rarely found, as being proper onely to the good heart. Euery bird can ſing in a cleare heauen, in a temperate ſpring; that one, as moſt familiar, ſo is moſt commended, that ſings merrie notes in the middeſt of a ſhowre, or the dead of Winter. Euery Epicure can enlarge his heart to mirth in the middeſt of his cups and dalliance; onely the three children can ſing in the furnace, Paul and Silas in the ſtockes, Martyrs at the ſtake. It is from heauen that this ioy comes, ſo contrary to all earthly occaſions, bred in the faithfull heart, through a ſerious and feeling reſpect to the iſſue of what he feeles, the quiet and vntroubled fruit of his righteouſneſſe; glorie, the crowne after his fight; after his minute of paine, eternity of ioy. He neuer lookt ouer the threſhold of heauen, that cannot more reioyce that he ſhall be glorious, than mourne in preſent that he is miſerable.

Sect. XV.

Of the importunitie and terror of Death.

YEa, this conſideration is ſo powerfull, that it alone is able to make a part againſt the feare or ſenſe of the laſt and greateſt of all terribles, Death it ſelfe: which in the conſcience of his owne dreadfulneſſe, iuſtly laughs at all the vaine humane precepts of Tranquillitie, appalling the moſt reſolute, and vexing the moſt cheerefull mindes. Neither prophane Lucretius, with all his Epicurean rules of confidence, nor drunken Anacreon, with all his wanton Odes, can ſhift off the importunate and violent horrour of this Aduerſarie. Seeſt thou the Chaldean Tyrant beſet with the ſacred bowles of Ieruſalem, the late ſpoiles of Gods Temple; and (in contempt of their owner) carowſing healths to his Queenes, Concubines, Peeres, ſinging amids his cups, triumphant carols of praiſe to his molten and carued gods? Wouldeſt thou euer ſuſpect that this high courage could be abated? or that this ſumptuous and preſumptuous banquet (after ſo royall and iocond continuance) ſhould haue any other concluſion, but pleaſure? Stay but one houre longer, and thou ſhalt ſee that face, that now ſhines with a ruddie gloſſe (according to the colour of his liquor) looke pale and gaſtly, ſtained with the colours of feare and death; and that proud hand, which now lifts vp her maſſie Goblets in defiance of God, tremble like a leafe in a ſtorme; and thoſe ſtrong knees, which neuer ſtooped to the burden of their laden body, now not able to beare vp themſelues, but looſened with a ſudden palſie of feare, one knocking againſt the other: and all this, for that Death writes him a letter of ſummons to appeare that night before him; and accordingly ere the next Sunne, ſent two Eunuches for his honorable conueiance into another world. Where now are thoſe delicate morſels, thoſe deep draughts, thoſe merry ditties, wherewith the palate and eare ſo pleaſed themſelues? What is now become of all thoſe cheerefull looks, looſe laughters, ſtately port, reuels, triumphs of the feaſting Court? Why doth none of his gallant Nobles reuiue the fainted courage of their Lord with a new cup? or with ſome ſtirring ieſt ſhake him out of this vnſeaſonable melancholy? O death, how imperious art thou to carnall mindes? aggrauating their miſerie not onely by expectation of future paine, but by the remembrance of the wonted cauſes of their ioy; and not ſuffering them to ſee ought but what may torment them? Euen that monſter of Ceſars, that had beene ſo well acquainted with bloud, and neuer had found better ſport than in cutting of throats; when now it came to his owne turne, how effeminate, how deſperately cowardous did he ſhew himſelfe! to the wonder of all Readers, that he which was euer ſo valiant in killing, ſhould be ſo womaniſhly heartleſſe in dying.

SECT. XVI.

THere are that feare not ſo much to be dead, as to die; the very act of diſſolution frighting them with a tormenting expectation of a ſhort, but intolerable painfulneſſe. Which let if the wiſdome of God had not interpoſed to timorous nature, there would haue beene many more Lucreces, Cleopatraes, Achitophels; and good lawes ſhould haue found little opportunitie of execution, through the wilfull funerals of malefactors. For the ſoule that comes into the body without any (at leaſt ſenſible) pleaſure, departs not from it without an extremitie of paine; which varying according to the manner and meanes of ſeparation, yet in all violent deaths eſpecially retaineth a violence not to be auoided, hard to be endured. And if diſeaſes, which are deſtin'd towards death as their end, bee ſo painfull, what muſt the end and perfection of diſeaſes be? Since as diſeaſes are the maladies of the body, ſo death is the malady of diſeaſes. There are that feare not ſo much to die, as to be dead. If the pang be bitter, yet it is but ſhort: the comfortleſſe ſtate of the dead ſtrikes ſome that could well reſolue for the act of their paſſage. Not the worſt of the Heathen Emperours, made that moanfull dittie on his death-bed, wherein he bewraieth (to all memory) much feeling pittie of his ſoule, for her doubtfull and impotent condition after her parture. How doth Platoes worldling bewaile the miſery of the graue, beſides all reſpect of paine! Woe is mee, that I ſhall lie alone rotting in the ſilent earth, amongſt the crawling Wormes, not ſeeing ought aboue, not ſeene. Very not-being is ſufficiently abhorred of nature, if death had no more to make it fearefull. But thoſe that haue liued vnder light enough, to ſhew them the gates of hell, after their paſſage thorow the gates of death, (and haue learned, that death is not onely horrible for our not-being here, but for being infinitly, eternally miſerable in a future world, nor ſo much for the diſſolution of life, as the beginning of torment) thoſe cannot, without the certaine hope of their immunitie, but carnally feare to die, and helliſhly feare to be dead. For if it be ſuch paine to die, what is it to be euer dying? And if the ſtraining or luxation of one ioynt can ſo afflict vs, what ſhall the racking of the whole body, and the torturing of the ſoule, whoſe animation alone makes the body to feele and complaine of ſmart? And if men haue deuiſed ſuch exquiſite torments, what can ſpirits, more ſubtile, more malicious? And if our momentanie ſufferings ſeeme long, how long ſhall that be that is eternall? And if the ſorrowes indifferently incident to Gods deare ones vpon earth, be ſo extreme, as ſometimes to driue them within ſight of deſpairing, what ſhall thoſe be that are reſerued onely for thoſe that hate him, and that he hateth? None but thoſe who haue heard the deſperate complaints of ſome guiltie Spyra, or whoſe ſoules haue beene a little ſcorched with theſe flames, can enough conceiue of the horror of this eſtate; it being the policy of our common enemy to conceale it ſo long, that we may ſee and feele it at once, leſt we ſhould feare it, before it be too late to be auoided.

The grounds of the feare of death.

Sect. XVII.

Remedy of the last and greatest breach of peace, arising from death.

NOw when this great Aduersary, like a proud Giant, comes stalking out in his fearefull shape, and insults ouer our fraile mortalitie, daring the world to match him with an equall Champion, whiles a whole host of worldlings shew him their backs for feare, the true Christian (armed onely with confidence and resolution of his future happinesse) dares boldly encounter him, and can wound him in the forehead (the wonted seat of terror) and trampling vpon him, can cut off his head with his owne sword, and victoriously returning, can sing in triumph, O death, where is thy sting? An happy victory! Wee die, and are not foiled: yea, we are conquerours in dying: we could not ouercome death, if we died not. That dissolution is well bestowed, that parts the soule from the body, that it may vnite both to God. All our life here (as that heauenly Doctor well tearmes it) is but a vitall death. How aduantagious is that death that determines this false and dying life, and begins a true one, aboue all the titles of happinesse! The Epicure or Sadduce dare not die, for feare of not being. The guiltie and loose worldling dares not die, for feare of being miserable. The distrustfull and doubting semi-Christian dares not die, because he knowes not, whether hee shall be, or be miserable, or not be at all. The resolued Christian dares, and would die, because he knowes he shall be happy; and looking merrily towards heauen (the place of his rest) can vnfainedly say, I desire to be dissolued: I see thee, my home, I see thee, (a sweet and glorious home, after a weary pilgrimage) I see thee; and now after many lingring hopes, I aspire to thee. How oft haue I looked vp at thee, with admiration and rauishment of soule! and by the goodly beames that I haue seene, ghessed at the glory that is aboue them! How oft haue I scorned these dead and vnpleasant pleasures of earth, in comparison of thine! I come now, my ioyes, I come to possesse you: I come through paine and death; yea if hell it selfe were in the way betwixt you and mee, I would passe through hell it selfe to enioy you. And (in truth) if that Heathen Cleombrotus (a follower of the ancient Academie) but vpon onely reading of his Master Platoes discourses of the immortalitie of the soule, could cast downe himselfe head-long from an high rocke, and wilfully breake his necke, that he might be possessed of that immortalitie which he beleeued to follow vpon death; how contented should they be to die, that knew they shall be (more than immortall) glorious? Hee went, not in an hate of the flesh, as the Patrician Heretickes of old; but in a blinde loue to his soule, out of bare opinion: We, vpon an holy loue grounded vpon assured knowledge. He, vpon an opinion of future life: we on knowledge of future glory. He went, vnsent for; we, called for by our Maker. Why should his courage exceed ours, since our ground, our estate so farre exceeds his? Euen this age, within the reach of our memorie, bred that peremptory Italian, which in imitation of old Romane courage (lest, in that degenerated Nation, there should be no step left of the qualities of their Ancestors) entring vpon his torment for killing a Tyrant, cheered himselfe with this confidence; My death is sharpe: my fame shall be euerlasting. The voice of a Romane, not of a Christian. My fame shall be eternall: an idle comfort. My fame shall liue; not my soule liue to see it. What shall it auaile thee to be talkt of, while thou art not? Then fame onely is precious, when a man liues to enioy it. The fame that suruiues the soule, is bootlesse. Yet euen this hope cheered him against the violence of his death. What should it doe vs, that (not our fame, but) our life, our glory after death, cannot die? He that hath Stephens eies to looke into heauen, cannot but haue the tongue of the Saints, Come Lord: How long? That man, seeing the glory of the end, cannot but contemne the hardnesse of the way. But who wants those eies, if he say and sweares that he feares not death, beleeue him not: if he protest this Tranquillitie, and yet feare death, beleeue him not: beleeue him not, if he say he is not miserable.

Sect. XVIII.

THese are enemies on the left hand. There want not some on the right, which with lesse profession of hostilitie, hurt no lesse. Not so easily perceiued, because they distemper the minde, not without some kinde of pleasure. Surfet kils more than famine. These are the ouer-desiring and ouer-ioying of these earthly things. All immoderations are enemies, as to health, so to peace. He that desires, wants as much, as he that hath nothing. The drunken man is as thirstie as the sweating trauellers. Hence are the studies, cares, feares, icalousies, hopes, griefes, enuies, wishes, platformes of atchieuing, alterations of purposes, and a thousand like; whereof each one is enough to make the life troublesome. One is sicke of his neighbours field, whose misshapen angles disfigure his, and hinder his Lordship of entirenesse: what he hath, is not regarded, for the want of what hee cannot haue. Another feeds on crusts, to purchase what he must leaue (perhaps) to a foole, or, (which is not much better) to a prodigall heire. Another, in the extremitie of couetous folly, chuses to die an vnpitied death; hanging himselfe for the fall of the market, while the Commons laugh at that losse, and in their speeches Epitaph vpon him, as on that Pope, He liued as a Wolfe, and died as a Dogge. One cares not what attendance hee dances at all houres, on whose staires he sits, what vices he soothes, what deformities he imitates, what seruile offices he doth, in an hope to rise. Another stomackes the couered head and stiffe knee of his inferiour; angry that other men thinke him not so good as he thinkes himselfe. Another eats his owne heart, with enuy at the richer furniture, and better estate, or more honour of his neighbour; thinking his owne not good, because another hath better. Another vexeth himselfe with a word of disgrace, past from the mouth of an enemy, which he neither can digest, nor cast vp; resoluing, because another will be his enemy, to be his owne. These humours are as manifold, as there are men that seeme prosperous. For the auoiding of all which ridiculous, and yet spightfull inconueniences, the minde must be setled in a perswasion of the worthlesnesse of these outward things. Let it know, that these riches haue made many prouder, none better: That, as neuer man was, so neuer wise man thought himselfe better for enioying them. Would that wise Philosopher haue cast his gold into the sea, if he had not knowne he should liue more happily without it? If hee knew not the vse of riches, he was no wise man: if he knew not the best way to quietnesse, he was no Philosopher: now euen by the voice of their Oracle, he was confessed to be both; yet cast away his gold, that he might bee happy. Would that wise Prophet haue praied as well against riches, as pouertie? Would so many great men (whereof our little Iland hath yeelded nine crowned Kings while it was held of old by the Saxons) after they had continued their life in the Throne, haue ended it in the Cell, and changed their Scepter for a Booke, if they could haue found as much felicitie in the highest estate, as securitie in the lowest? I heare Peter and Iohn (the eldest and deerest Apostles) say, Gold & Siluer haue I none: I heare the Deuill say, All these will I giue thee; and they are mine, to giue. Whether shall I desire to be in the state of these Saints, or that deuill? He was therefore a better husband then a Philosopher, that first tearmed riches Goods: and he mended the title well, that (adding a fit Epithet) called them goods of Fortune; false goods ascribed to a false patron. There is no fortune, to giue or guide riches: there is no true goodnes in riches, to be guided. His meaning then was (as I can interpret it) to teach vs, in this title; that it is a chance, if euer riches were good to any. In summe, who would account those as riches, or those riches as goods, which hurt the owner, disquiet others? which the worst haue; which the best haue not; which those that haue not, want not; which those want, that haue them: which are lost in a night; and a man is not worse, when he hath lost them? It is true of them, that we say of fire and water; They are good seruants, ill masters. Make them thy slaues, they shall be goods indeed: in vse, if not in nature; good to thy selfe, good to others by thee: But if they bee thy masters, thou hast condemned thy selfe to thine owne Gallies. If a seruant rule, he proues a Tyrant. What madnesse is this? thou hast made thy selfe, at once, a slaue and a foole. What if thy chaines be of Gold? or if, with Heliogabalus, thou hast made thee silken halters? thy seruitude may be glorious: it is no lesse miserable.

Sect. XIX.

The second enemy on the right hand, Honour.

HOnour, perhaps, is yet better; such is the confused opinion of those that know little: but a distinct and curious head shall finde an hard taske, to define in what point the goodnesse thereof consisteth. Is it in high descent of bloud? I would thinke so, if nature were tied by any law to produce children like qualitied to their Parents. But, although in the brute creatures thee be euer thus regular, that yee shall neuer finde a young Pigeon hatched in an Eagles nest; neither can I thinke that true, (or if true, it was monstrous) that Nicippus his sheepe should yeane a Lion: yet in the best creature (which hath his forme, and her attending qualities from aboue) with a likenesse of face and features, is commonly found an vnlikenesse of disposition: onely the earthly part followes the seed; wisdome, valour, vertue, are of another beginning. Shall I bow to a molten Calfe, because it was made of golden eare rings? Shall I condemne all honor of the first head (though vpon neuer so noble deseruing) because it can shew nothing, before it selfe, but a white shield? If Cæsar, or Agathocles, bee a Potters sonne, shall I contemne him? Or if wise Lion be the sonne of an infamous Curtizan, shall the censorious Lawyer race him out of the Catalogue, with Partus sequitur ventrem? Lastly, shall I account that good, which is incident to the worst? Either therefore greatnesse must shew some Charter, wherein it is priuileged with succession of vertue; or else the goodnesse of honour cannot consist in bloud. Is it then in the admiration and high opinion that others haue conceiued of thee, which drawes all dutifull respect, and humble offices from them, to thee? O fickle good, that is euer in the keeping of others! especially of the vnstable vulgar, that beast of many heads: whose diuided tongues, as they neuer agree with each other; so seldome (when euer) agree long with themselues. Doe we not see the superstitious Listrians, that ere-while would needs make Paul a God, against his will; and in deuout zeale, drew crowned Bulls to the Altars of their new Iupiter and Mercury? violence can scarce hold them from sacrificing to him: now not many houres after, gather vp stones against him; hauing in their conceits, turned him, from a God, into a malefactor; and are ready to kill him, in stead of killing a sacrifice to him. Such is the multitude; and such the stedfastnesse of their honour. There then onely is true honour, where bloud and vertue meet together: the greatnesse whereof is from bloud; the goodnesse from vertue. Reioyce, yee great men, that your bloud is ennobled with the vertues and deserts of your Ancestors. This onely is yours: this onely challengeth all vnfained respect of your inferiours. Count it praise-worthy, not that you haue, but that you deserue honour. Bloud may bee tainted; the opinion of the vulgar cannot be constant; onely vertue is euer like it selfe, and onely winnes reuerence, euen of those that hate it. Without which, greatnesse is as a Beacon of vice, to draw mens eies the more to behold it: and those that see it, dare lothe it; though they dare not censure it. So, while the knee bendeth, the minde abhorreth; and telleth the body, it honours an vnworthy subiect: within it selfe, secretly comparing that vicious great man (on whom his submisse courtesie is cast away) to some goodly faire bound Senecaes Tragedies, that is curiously gilded without; which if a man open, he shall finde Thyestes the tombe of his owne children; or Oedipus the husband of his owne mother, or some such monstrous part: which he (at once) reades, and hates.

Olympia Dog. Laert.

Sect. XX.

LEt him thinke, that not onely theſe outward things are not in themſelues good, but that they expoſe their owners to miſery. For, beſides that God vſually puniſhes our ouer-louing them, with their loſſe, (becauſe he thinkes them vnworthy Riuals to himſelfe, who challengeth all height of loue, as his onely right) ſo that the way to loſe, is to loue much; the largeneſſe moreouer either of affection, or eſtate, makes an open way to ruine: while a man walkes on plaine ground, he falls not; or, if he fall, he doth but meaſure his length on the ground, and riſe againe without harme: but he that climbeth high, is in danger of falling; and if he fall, of killing. All the ſailes hoiſed, giue vantage to a tempeſt; which (through the Mariners foreſight giuing timely roome thereto) by their fall, deliuer the Veſſell from the danger of that guſt, whoſe rage now paſſeth ouer with onely beating her with waues for anger that he was preuented. So the larger our eſtate is, the fairer marke hath Miſchiefe giuen to hit; and (which is worſe) that which makes vs ſo eaſie to hit, makes our wound more deepe and grieuous. If poore Codrus his houſe burne, he ſtands by and warmes him with the flame, becauſe he knowes it is but the loſſe of an out-ſide; which (by gathering ſome few ſticks, ſtraw, and clay) may with little labour, and no coſt, be repaired. But, when the many loſts of the rich man doe one giue fire to another; he cries out one while of his Counting houſe, another while of his Wardrobe: then of ſome noted Cheſt; and ſtraight of ſome rich Cabinet: and lamenting both the frame and the furniture, is therefore impatient, becauſe he had ſomething.

The ſecond remedy of ouer-ioyed proſperitie.

Sect. XXI.

BVt, if there be any Sorcereſſe vpon earth, it is pleaſure: which ſo inchanteth the minds of men, and worketh the diſturbance of our Peace, with ſuch ſecret delight, that fooliſh men thinke this want of Tranquillitie, happineſſe. She turneth men into ſwine, with ſuch ſweet charmes, that they would not change their brutiſh nature, for their former reaſon. It is a good vnquietneſſe (ſay they) that contenteth: it is a good enemy, that profiteth. Is it any wonder that men ſhould be ſottiſh, when their reaſon is maſtered with ſenſualitie? Thou foole, thy pleaſure contents thee: how much? how long? If ſhe haue not more befriended thee, than euer ſhe did any earthly fauorite: yea, if ſhe haue not giuen thee more, than ſhee hath her ſelfe; thy beſt delight hath had ſome mixture of diſcontentment. For either ſome circumſtance croſſeth thy deſire, or the inward diſtaſte of thy conſcience (checking thine appetite) permits thee not any entire fruition of thy ioy. Euen the ſweeteſt of all flowers hath his thornes: and who can determine whether the ſent be more delectable, or the pricks more irkeſome? It is enough for heauen to haue abſolute pleaſures: which if they could bee found here below; certainly, that heauen, which is now not enough deſired, would then bee feared. God will haue our pleaſures here (according to the faſhion of our ſelues) compounded: ſo as the beſt delights may ſtill ſauour of their earth. See how that great King, which neuer had any match for wiſdome, ſcarce euer any ſuperiour for wealth, trauerſed ouer all this inferiour world, with diligent inquiry, and obſeruation, and all to finde out that goodneſſe of the children of men which they enioy vnder the Sunne; abridging himſelfe of nothing that either his eyes, or his heart could ſuggeſt to him: (as what is it, that he could not either know or purchaſe?) and now comming home to himſelfe, (after the diſquiſition of all naturall and humane things) complaines, that Behold, all is not onely vanitie, but vexation. Goe then, thou wiſe Scholler of experience, and make a more accurate ſearch for that which hee ſought, and miſſed. Perhaps ſome-where (betwixt the talleſt Cedar in Lebanon, and the ſhrubby Hyſop vpon the wall) Pleaſure ſhrouded her ſelfe, that ſhe could not be deſcried ſcried of him; whether through ignorance, or negligence: thine in-ſight may be more piercing, thy meanes more commodious, thy ſucceſſe happier. If it were poſſible for any man to entertaine ſuch hopes, his vaine experience could not make him a greater foole: it could but teach him what he is and knoweth not. And yet ſo imperfect, as our Pleaſures are, they haue their ſatietie: and as their Continuance is not good, ſo their Concluſion is worſe: looke to the end, and ſee how ſudden, how bitter it is. Their onely Courteſie is, to ſalute vs with a farewell; and ſuch a one, as makes their ſalutation vncomfortable. This Dalila ſhewes and ſpeakes faire; but in the end ſhe will bereaue thee of thy ſtrength, of thy ſight, yea of thy ſelfe. Theſe Gnats flie about thine eares, and make thee muſicke awhile; but euermore they ſting, ere they part. Sorrow and Repentance, is the beſt end of Pleaſure: Paine is yet worſe; but the worſt is Deſpaire. If thou miſſe of the firſt of theſe, one of the latter ſhall finde thee; perhaps both. How much better is it for thee, to want a little honie, than to bee ſwolne vp with a venomous ſting?

The vanitie of pleaſure; the third enemy on the right hand.

Thus then, the minde reſolued that theſe earthly things (Honour, Wealth, Pleaſures) are caſuall, vnſtable, deceitfull, imperfect, dangerous; muſt learne to vſe them without truſt, and to want them without griefe; thinking ſtill, If I haue them, I haue ſome benefit with a great charge: If I haue them not; with little reſpect of others, I haue much ſecuritie and eaſe, in my ſelfe: which once obtained, wee cannot fare amiſſe in either eſtate; and without which, we cannot but miſcarrie in both.

Sect. XXII.

Poſitiue rules of our peace.

ALL the enemies of our inward peace, are thus deſcried and diſcomforted. Which done, we haue enough to preſerue vs from miſery: but (ſince wee moreouer ſeeke how to liue well and happily) there yet remaine thoſe Poſitiue Rules whereby our Tranquillitie may be both had, continued, and confirmed. Wherein, I feare not leſt I ſhould ſeeme ouer-diuine, in caſting the Anchor of Quietneſſe ſo deepe as Heauen (the onely ſeat of conſtancy;) whiles it can finde no hold at all vpon earth. All earthly things are full of variableneſſe: and therefore hauing no ſtay in themſelues, can giue none to vs. He that will haue and hold right Tranquillitie, muſt finde in himſelfe a ſweet fruition of God, and a feeling apprehenſion of his preſence; that when hee findes manifold occaſions of vexation in theſe earthly things, he (ouer-looking them all, and hauing recourſe to his Comforter) may finde in him ſuch matter of contentment, that he may paſſe ouer all theſe pettie grieuances with conteimpt: which whoſoeuer wants, may be ſecure, cannot be quiet. The minde of man cannot want ſome refuge, and (as we ſay of the Elephant) cannot reſt, vnleſſe it haue ſomething to leane vpon. The Couetous man, (whoſe heauen is his cheſt) when he heares himſelfe rated and curſed for oppreſſion, comes home; and ſeeing his bagges ſafe, applauds himſelfe againſt all cenſurers. The Glutton, when he loſeth friends or good name; yet ioyeth in his well furniſht table, and the laughter of his Wine: more pleaſing himſelfe in one diſh, than he can bee grieued with all the worlds miſ-carriage. The needy Scholler (whoſe wealth lies all in his braine) cheeres himſelfe againſt iniquitie of times, with the conceit of his knowledge. Theſe ſtarting holes the minde cannot want, when it is hard driuen. Now, when as like to ſome chaſed Siſera, it ſhrowds it ſelfe vnder the harbour of theſe Iaels; although they giue it houſe-roome and milke for a time, yet at laſt either they entertaine it with a naile in the Temples, or (being guiltie to their owne impotency) ſend it out of themſelues, for ſafetie and peace. For, if the Croſſe light in that which it made his refuge (as, if the couetous man be croſſed in his riches) what earthly thing can ſtay him from a deſperate phrenſie? Or, if the Croſſe fall in a degree aboue the height of his ſtay; as if the rich man be ſicke, or dying (wherein, all wealth is either contemned, or remembred with anguiſh) how doe all his comforts (like vermine, from an houſe on fire) runne away from him, and leaue him ouer to his ruine! whiles the Soule, that hath hath placed his refuge aboue, is sure that the ground of his comfort cannot be matched with an earthly sorrow, cannot be made variable by the change of any euent; but is infinitely aboue all casualties, and without all vncertainties. What state is there, wherein this heauenly stay shall not affoord mee, not onely Peace, but Ioy? Am I in prison? or in the hell of prisons (in some darke, low, and desolate dungeon?) Lo there Algerius (that sweet Martyr) findes more light than aboue; and pitties the darknesse of our libertie. We haue but a Sunne to enlighten our world, which euery cloud dimmeth, and hideth from our eies: but the Father of lights (in respect of whom, all the bright starres of heauen are but as the snuffe of a dimme candle) shines into his pit, and the presence of his glorious Angels make that an heauen to him, which the world purposed as an hell of discomfort. What walls can keepe out that infinite Spirit, that fills all things? What darknesse can be where the God of this Sunne dwelleth? What sorrow where he comforteth? Am I wandring in banishment? Can I goe whither God is not? what Sea can diuide betwixt him and mee? then would I feare exile, if I could bee driuen away as well from God, as my countrie. Now he is as much in all earths: His title is alike to all places; and mine in him: His sunne shines to me; his sea or earth beares me vp; his presence cheereth mee, whither-soeuer I goe. He cannot be said to flit, that neuer changeth his Host. He alone is a thousand companions; he alone is a world of friends. That man neuer knew what it was to be familiar with God, that complaines of the want of home, of friends, of companions, while God is with him. Am I contemned of the world? it is enough for me, that I am honoured of God: of both, I cannot. The world would loue me more, if I were lesse friends with God. It cannot hate mee so much as God hates it. What care I to be hated of them, whom God hateth? He is vnworthy of Gods fauour, that cannot thinke it happinesse enough without the worlds. How easie is it for such a man, whiles the world disgraces him, at once to scorne and pittie it, that it cannot thinke nothing more contemptible than it selfe? I am impouerished with losses: That was neuer throughly good, that may be lost. My riches will not leese mee, yea, tho I forgoe all, to my skin, yet haue I not lost any part of my wealth. For, if hee bee rich that hath something; how rich is he, that hath the Maker and owner of all things! I am weake and diseased in body: He cannot miscarry, that hath his Maker for his Physician. Yet, my soule (the better part) is sound; for that cannot bee weake, whose strength God is. How many are sicke in that, and complaine not! I can be content to be let-bloud in the arme or foot, for the curing of the head or heart. The health of the principall part is more ioy to me, than it is trouble to bee distempered in the inferiour. Let me know that God fauours me: then I haue libertie in prison, home in banishment, honour in contempt, in losses wealth, health in infirmitie, life in death; and in all these happinesse. And (surely) if our perfect fruition of God bee our complete heauen: it must needs be, that our inchoate conuersing with him is our heauen imperfectly, and the entrance into the other: which (me thinkes) differs from this, not in the kinde of it, but in the degree. For the continuation of which happy societie (sith strangenesse loseth acquaintance and breedeth neglect) on our part must bee a daily renuing of heauenly familiaritie, by seeking him vp, euen with the contempt of all inferiour distraction; by talking with him in our secret inuocations; by hearing his conference with vs; and by mutuall entertainment of each other in the sweet discourses of our daily meditations. He is a sullen and vnsociable friend that wants words. God shall take no pleasure in vs if wee be silent. The heart that is full of loue, cannot but haue a busie tongue. All our talke with God is either Suites or Thankes. In them the Christian heart powres out it selfe to his Maker; and would not change this priuilege for a world. All his annoyances, all his wants, all his dislikes are powred into the bosome of his inuisible friend; who likes vs still so much more as we aske more, as we complaine more. Oh the easie and happy recourse that the poore soule hath to the high throne of Heauen! we stay not for the holding out of a golden sceptre, to warne our admission, before which our presence should be presumption and death. No houre is vnseasonable, no person too base, no words too homely, no fact too hard, no importunitie too great. We speake familiarly, we

we are heard, answered, comforted. Another while God interchangeably speaks vnto vs by the secret voice of his spirit; or by the audible sound of his word; we heare, adore, answer him; by both which the minde so communicates it selfe to God, and hath God so plentifully communicated vnto it, that hereby it growes to such an habit of heauenlinesse, as that now it wants nothing, but dissolution of full glory.

Sect. XXIII.

The subordinate rules of Tranquillitie. 1. For actions.

OVt of this maine ground once setled in the heart (like as so many riuers from one common sea) flow those subordinate resolutions, which we require as necessary to our peace, whether in respect of our actions, or our estate. For our actions, there must be a secret vow passed in the soule, both of constant refraining from whatsoeuer may offend that maiestie we rest vpon; and aboue this, of true and canonicall obedience to God, without all care of difficultie, and in spight of all contradictions of nature. Not out of the confidence of our owne power, impotent men, who are we, that we should either vow or performe? But as he said; Giue what thou bidst, and bid what thou wilt. Hence the courage of Moses durst venture his hand to take vp the crawling & hissing Serpent. Hence Peter durst walk vpon the pauement of the waues. Hence that heroicall spirit of Luther (a man made of metall fit for so great a worke) durst resolue and professe to enter into that sore-warned Citie, though there had bin as many Deuils in their streets as tiles on their houses. Both these vowes as wee once solemnly made by others; so, for our peace we must renew in our selues. Thus the experienced minde both knowing that it hath met with a good friend, and withall what the price of a friend is; cannot but be carefull to retaine him, & warie of displeasing, and therefore to cut off all dangers of variance, voluntarily takes a double oath of allegeance of it selfe to God; which neither benefit shall induce vs to breake, if we might gaine a world, nor feare vrge vs thereto, though we must lose our selues. The wauering heart that finds continuall combats in it selfe betwixt Pleasure and Conscience, so equally matched that neither gets the day, is not yet capable of peace; and whether euer ouercommeth, is troubled both with resistance and victorie. Barren Rebecca found more ease, than when her twins struggled in her wombe. If Iacob had beene there alone, she had not complained of that painfull contention: One while Pleasure holds the Fort, and conscience assaults it; which when it hath entred at last by strong hand, after many batteries of iudgements denounced; ere long Pleasure either corrupts the watch, or by some cunning stratagem, findes way to recouer her first hold. So, one part is euer attempting, and euer resisting. Betwixt both, the heart cannot haue peace, because it resolues not. For while the soule is held in suspence, it cannot enioy the pleasure it vseth; because it is halfe taken vp with feare; onely a strong and resolute repulse of pleasure is truly pleasant; for therein the Conscience, (filling vs with heauenly delight) maketh sweet triumphs in it selfe; as being now the Lord of his owne dominions, and knowing what to trust to. No man knowes the pleasure of this thought, I haue done well, but he that hath felt it: and he that hath felt it, contemnes all pleasure to it. It is a false slander raised on Christianitie, that it maketh men dumpish and melancholicke: for therefore are we heauie, because we are not enough Christians. We haue religion enough to mislike pleasures, not enough to ouercome them. But if we be once conquerors ouer our selues, aud haue deuoted our selues wholly to God, there can be nothing but heauenly mirth in the soule. Loe here, yee Philosophers, the true musicke of Heauen, which the good heart continually heareth, and answers it in the iust measures of ioy. Others may talke of mirth, as a thing they haue heard of, or vainely fancied; onely the Christian feeles it; and in comparison thereof scorneth the idle, ribaldish, and scurrilous mirth of the prophane.

Sect. XXIV.

And this reſolution which we call for, muſt not onely exclude manifeſtly euill actions, but alſo doubting and ſuſpenſion of minde in actions ſuſpected, and queſtionable; wherein the iudgement muſt euer giue confident determination one way. For this Tranquillitie conſiſteth in a ſteadineſſe of the minde: and how can that veſſell which is beaten vpon, by contrary waues and winds (and tottereth to either part) be ſaid to keepe a ſteadie courſe? Reſolution is the onely mother of ſecuritie. For inſtance: I ſee, that Vſury which was wont to be condemned for no better than a Legall theft, hath now obtained (with many) the reputation of an honeſt Trade; and is both vſed by many, and by ſome defended. It is pittie that a bad practice ſhould finde any learned or religious Patron. The ſumme of my patrimony lieth dead by me, ſealed vp in the bagge of my Father: my thriftier friends aduiſe mee to this eaſie and ſure improuement. Their counſell and my gaine preuaile; my yeerely ſummes come in with no coſt but of time, wax, parchment: my eſtate likes it well, better than my conſcience; which tells me ſtill, he doubts, my trade is too eaſie to be honeſt: Yet I continue my illiberall courſe not without ſome ſcruple and contradiction: ſo as my feare of offence hinders the ioy of my profit, and the pleaſure of my gaine, hartens me againſt the feare of iniuſtice; I would be rich with eaſe; and yet I would not be vncharitable, I would not bee vniuſt. All the while I liue in vnquiet doubts, and diſtraction: Others are not ſo much entangled in my bonds, as I in my owne. At laſt, that I may be both iuſt and quiet, I conclude to referre this caſe wholly to the ſentence of my inward Iudge, the Conſcience: the Aduocates Gaine and Iuſtice plead on either part at this barre with doubtfull ſucceſſe. Gaine informes the Iudge of a new and nice diſtinction, of toothleſſe, and biting Intereſt, and brings preſidents of particular caſes of Vſury ſo farre from any breach of charitie or iuſtice, that both parts therein confeſſe themſelues aduantaged. Iuſtice pleads euen the moſt-toothleſſe vſury to haue ſharpe gums, and findes in the moſt harmeleſſe and profitable practice of it, an inſenſible wrong to the common body; beſides the infinite wracks of priuate eſtates. The weake Iudge ſuſpends in ſuch probable allegations, and demurreth; as being ouercome of both, and of neither part: and leaues me yet no whit more quiet, no whit leſſe vncertaine. I ſuſpend my practice accordingly; being ſure it is good not to doe, what I am not ſure is good to be done: and now Gaine ſollicits me as much as Iuſtice did before. Betwixt both I liue troubleſomely: nor euer ſhall doe other, till (in a reſolute deteſtation) I haue whipped this euill Merchant out of the Temple of my heart. This rigour is my peace. Before, I could not be well, either full or faſting. Vncertaintie is much paine, euen in a more tolerable action. Neither is it (I thinke) eaſie to determine, whether it be worſe to doe a lawfull act with doubting, or an euill with reſolution: ſince that which in it ſelfe is good, is made euill to me by my doubt: and what is in nature euill, is in this one point not euill to me, that I doe it vpon a verdict of a Conſcience: ſo now my iudgement offends in not following the truth: I offend not in that I follow my iudgement: Wherein if the moſt wiſe God had left vs to roue onely according to the aime of our owne coniectures, it ſhould haue beene leſſe faulty to be Sceptickes in our actions, and either not to iudge at all, or to iudge amiſſe: but now that hee hath giuen vs a perfect rule of eternall equitie, and truth, whereby to direct the ſentences of our iudgement; that vncertaintie which alloweth no peace to vs, will affoord vs no excuſe before the tribunall of Heauen: wherefore, then onely is the heart quiet, when our actions are grounded vpon iudgement, and our iudgement vpon truth.

2. Rule for our actions.

Sect.

Sect. XXV.

Rules for estate.
1. Reliance vpon the prouidence of God.

FOr his estate, the quiet minde must first roll it selfe vpon the prouidence of the Highest. For, whosoeuer so casts himselfe vpon these outward things, that in their prosperous estate he reioiceth, and (contrarily) is cast downe in their miscariage; I know not whether he shall finde more vncertaintie of rest, or more certaintie of vnquietnesse; since hee must needs bee like a light vnballaced Vessell, that rises and falls with euery waue, and depends onely on the mercie of wind and water: But who relies on the ineuitable decree, and all-seeing prouidence of God, (which can neither be crossed with second thoughts, nor with euents vnlooked for,) layes a sure ground of Tranquillitie. Let the world tosse how it list, and varie it selfe (as it euer doth) in stormes and calmes; his rest is pitched aloft, aboue the sphere of changeable mortalitie. To begin, is harder than to prosecute: What counsell had God in the first moulding of thee in the wombe of thy mother? what aid shall he haue in repairing thee from the wombe of the earth? And if he could make, and shall restore thee without thee, why shall he not much more (without thy indeuour) dispose of thee? Is God wise enough to guide the Heauens, and to produce all creatures in their kindes and seasons? And shall hee not bee able to order thee alone? Thou sayest, I haue friends, and (which is my best friend) I haue wealth to make both them and me; and wit to put both to best vse. O the broken reedes of humane confidence! Who euer trusted on friends that could trust to himselfe? Who euer was so wise, as not sometimes to be a foole in his owne conceit? oft times in the conceit of others? Who was euer more discontent, than the wealthie? Friends may bee false: Wealth cannot but be deceitfull: Wit hath made many fooles. Trust thou to that, which (if thou wouldest) cannot faile thee. Not that thou desirest shall come to passe; but that which God hath decreed. Neither thy feares, nor thy hopes, nor vowes shall either forslow or alter it. The vnexperienced passenger, when he sees the Vessell goe amisse or too farre, layes fast hold on the contrary part, or on the Mast for remedie: the Pilot laughs at his folly; knowing, that (whatsoeuer he labours) the Barke will goe which way the wind and his sterne directeth it. Thy goods are embarked: Now thou wishest a direct North-wind to driue thee to the Strayts; and then a West, to runne in: and now, when thou hast emptied and laded againe, thou callest as earnestly for the South, and South-East, to returne; and lowrest, if all these answer thee not: As if Heauen and Earth had nothing else to doe, but to wait vpon thy pleasure; and serued onely, to bee commanded seruice by thee. Another that hath contrary occasion, askes for winds quite opposite to thine. He that sits in Heauen, neither fits thy fancie nor his: but bids his winds spet sometimes in thy face; sometimes to fauour thee with a side blast; sometimes, to be boistrous; otherwhiles, to be silent, at his owne pleasure. Whether the Mariner sing or curse, it shall goe, whither it is sent. Striue, or lie still, thy destinie shall runne on; and what must be, shall be: Not that wee should hence exclude benefit of meanes (which are alwaies necessarily included in this wise preordination of all things) but perplexitie of cares, and wrestling with prouidence. Oh, the idle and ill-spent cares of curious men, that consult with starres, and spirits for their destinies, vnder colour of preuention! If it be not thy destinie; why wouldst thou know it, what needst thou resist it? If it bee thy destinie; why wouldst thou know that thou canst not preuent? That which God hath decreed, is already done in Heauen, and must be done on Earth. This kinde of expectation doth but hasten slow euils, and prolong them in their continuance: hasten them, not in their euent, but in our conceit. Shortly then, if thou swimmest against the streame of this prouidence, thou canst not escape drowning; euery waue turnes thee ouer, like a Porkpisce before a tempest: But if thou swimmest with the streame, doe but cast thine armes abroad, thou passest with safetie, and with ease: it both beares thee vp, and carries thee on to the Hauen (whither God hath determined thine arriuall) in peace.

Sect.

Sect. XXVI.

NExt to this, the minde of the vnquiet man must bee so wrought by these former resolutions, that it be throughly perswaded, The estate wherein he is, is best of all; if not in it selfe, yet to him: Not out of pride, but out of contentment: Which whosoeuer wanteth, cannot but bee continually vexed with enuie, and racked with ambition. Yea, if it were possible to be in Heauen without this, he could not be happy, for it is as impossible, for the minde at once to long after and enioy, as for a man to feed and sleepe at once. And this is the more to be striuen for, because we are all naturally prone to afflict our selues with our owne frowardnesse: ingratefully contemning all we haue, for what we would haue. Euen the best of the Patriarkes could say, O Lord, what wilt thou giue me, since I goe childlesse? The bond-man desires now, nothing but libertie: that alone would make him happy. Once free (forgetting his former thought) he wishes some wealth, to make vse of his freedome; and saies, it were as good be straited in place, as in abilitie. Once rich, he longeth after Nobilitie, thinking it no praise, to bee a wealthie peasant. Once noble, he begins to deeme it a base matter to be subiect: nothing can now content him but a Crowne. Then it is a small matter to rule, so long as he hath but little dominions, and greater neighbours. Hee would therefore be an Vniuersall Monarch: whither then? surely, it vexeth him as much, that the earth is so small a globe, so little a mole-hill; and that there are no more worlds to conquer. And now that he hath attained the highest dignitie amongst men, he would needs be a God, conceits his immortalitie, erects Temples to his owne name, commands his dead Statues to be adored, and (not thus contented) is angry that hee cannot command heauen, and controll nature. O vaine fooles! whither doth our restlesse ambition climbe? What shall be at length the period of our wishes? I could not blame these desires, if contentment consisted in hauing much: but, now that he onely hath much, that hath contentment, (& that it is as easily obtained in a low estate,) I can account of these thoughts no better than proudly fooliſh. Thou art poore: what difference is there betwixt a greater man and thee? saue that he doth his businesses by others; thou doest them thy selfe. Hee hath Caters, Cookes, Bayliues, Stewards, Secretaries, and all other officers for his seuerall seruices: thou prouidest, dressest, gatherest, receiuest, expendest, writest for thy selfe. His patrimonie is large: thine earnings small. If Briareus feed fiftie bellies with his hundred hands; what is he the better, than he that with two hands feedeth one? He is serued in siluer: thou in vessell of the same colour, of lesser price; as good for vse, though not for value. His dishes are more daintie, thine as well relliſhed to thee, and no lesse wholsome. Hee eats Oliues, thou Garlike: hee mislikes not more the smell of thy sawce, than thou dost the taste of his. Thou wantest somewhat that he hath: he wisheth something which thou hast, and regardest not. Thou couldst bee content to haue the rich mans purse, but his gout thou wouldst not haue: He would haue thy health, but not thy fare. If we might picke out of all mens estates, that which is laudable, omitting the inconueniences, wee would make our selues complete: but if we must take all together, we should perhaps little aduantage our selues with the change. For the most wise God hath so proportion'd out euery mans condition, that hee hath some iust cause of sorrow inseparably mixed with other contentments, and hath allotted to no man liuing, an absolute happinesse, without some grieuances; nor to any man such an exquisite miserie, as that hee findeth not somewhat wherein to solace himselfe: the weight whereof varies, according to our estimation of them. One hath much wealth, but no childe to inherit it: hee enuies at the poore mans fruitfulnesse, which hath many heires, and no lands; and could be content, with all his abundance to purchase a successor of his owne loynes. Another hath many children, little maintenance: he commendeth the careless quietnesse of the barren, and thinkes, fewer mouthes and more meat would doe better. The labouring man hath the blessing of a strong body, fit to digest any fare, to endure any labour: yet hee wisheth himselfe weaker, weaker, on condition hee might bee wealthier. The man of nice education hath a feeble ſtomacke; and (raſping ſince his laſt meale) doubts, whether hee ſhould eat of his beſt diſh, or nothing: this man repines at nothing more, than to ſee his hungry Plough-man feed on a cruſt; and wiſheth to change eſtates, on condition hee might change bodies with him. Say that God ſhould giue thee thy wiſh: what wouldeſt thou deſire? Let mee (thou ſaieſt) be wiſe, healthfull, rich, honourable, ſtrong, learned, beautifull, immortall. I know thou loueſt thy ſelfe ſo well, that thou canſt wiſh all theſe and more. But ſay that God hath ſo ſhared out theſe gifts (by a moſt wiſe and iuſt diſtribution) that thou canſt haue but ſome of theſe, perhaps but one; which wouldeſt thou ſingle out for thy ſelfe? Any thing, beſide what thou haſt: If learned, thou wouldeſt bee ſtrong; if ſtrong, honourable; if honourable, long-liued: Some of theſe thou art already. Thou foole! cannot God chooſe better for thee, than thou for thy ſelfe? In other matches thou truſteſt the choice of a skilfuller chapman: when thou ſeeſt a goodly horſe in the Faire (though his ſhape pleaſe thine eie well) yet thou dareſt not buy him, if a cunning Horſe-maſter ſhall tell thee he is faultie; and art willing to take a plainer and ſounder, on his commendation, againſt thy fancie. How much more ſhould we in this caſe, allow his choice that cannot deceiue vs; that cannot bee deceiued? But, thou knoweſt that other thou deſireſt, to be better than what thou haſt: Better perhaps for him that hath it; not better for thee. Libertie is ſweet and profitable to thoſe that can vſe it: but fetters are better for the franticke man. Wine is good nouriſhment for the healthfull; poyſon to the aguiſh. It is good for a ſound body to ſleepe in a whole skinne; but hee that complaines of ſwelling ſores, cannot ſleepe till it be broken. Hemlocke to the Goat, and Spiders to the Monkey, turne to good ſuſtenance; which to other creatures are accounted deadly. As in diets, ſo in eſtimation of good and euill, of greater and leſſer good, there is much varietie. All palats commend not one diſh; and what one commends for moſt delicate, another reiects for vnſauourie. And if thou know what diſh is moſt pleaſant to thee, thy Phyſician knowes beſt which is wholſome. Thou wouldſt follow thine appetite too much; and (as the French haue in their Prouerbe) wouldſt dig thy owne graue with thy teeth: thy wiſe Phyſician ouer-ſees and ouer-rules thee. Hee ſees, if thou wert more eſteemed, thou wouldſt be proud; if more ſtrong, licentious; if richer, couetous; if healthfuller, more ſecure: but thou thinkeſt not thus hardly of thy ſelfe. Fond man! what knoweſt thou future things? beleeue thou him, that onely knowes what would bee, what will be. Thou wouldeſt willingly goe to heauen; what better guide canſt thou haue, than him that dwels there? If hee leade thee thorow deepe ſloughs, and brakie thickets; know, that he knowes this the neerer way, though more comberſome. Can there be in him any want of wiſdome, not to foreſee the beſt? Can there be any want of power, not to effect the beſt? any want of loue, not to giue thee what hee knowes is beſt? How canſt thou then faile of the beſt? Since what his power can doe, and what his Wiſdome ſees ſhould be done, his Loue hath done, becauſe al are infinite. Hee willeth not things, becauſe they are good: but they are good, becauſe hee wills them. Yea, if ought had beene better, this had not beene. God willeth what hee doth: and if thy will accord not with his, whether wilt thou condemne of imperfection?

The second rule for estate. A perswasion of the goodnes and fitnesse of it for vs.

Sect. XXVII.

The concluſion of the whole.

I Haue chalked out the way of Peace: What remaineth, but that we walke along in it? I haue conducted my Reader to the Mine, yea, to the Mint of Happineſſe; and ſhewed him thoſe glorious heapes, which may eternally enrich him: If (now) hee ſhall goe away with his hands and skirt empty; how is he but worthy of a miſerable want?

Who

Who ſhall pity vs, while we haue no mercy on our ſelues? Wilfull diſtreſſe hath neither remedie, nor compaſſion. And to ſpeake freely, I haue oft wondered at this painefull folly of vs men, who in the open view of our peace (as if we were condemned to a neceſſarie and fatall vnquietneſſe) liue vpon our owne racke, finding no more ioy, than if we were vnder no other hands, but our executioners. One droupeth vnder a fained euill; another augments a ſmall ſorrow through impatience; another drawes vpon himſelfe an vncertaine euill through feare; one ſeekes true contentment, but not enough; another hath iuſt cauſe of ioy, and perceiues it not: One is vexed, for that his grounds of ioy are matched with equall grieuances; another cannot complaine of any preſent occaſion of ſorrow, yet liues ſullenly, becauſe he findes not any preſent cauſe of comfort; one is haunted with his ſinne; another diſtracted with his paſſion: amongſt all which, he is a miracle of all men that liues, not ſome-way diſcontented. So we liue not while we doe liue, onely for that we want either wiſdome, or will, to husband our liues to our owne beſt aduantage. O the inequality of our cares! Let riches or honour be in queſtion, we ſue to them, we ſeeke for them with importunity, with ſeruile ambition: our paines needs no ſollicitor; yea, there is no way wrong that leads to this end: wee abhorre the patience to ſtay till they inquire for vs. And if euer (as it rarely happens) our deſert and worthineſſe winnes vs the fauour of this proffer, we meet it with both hands, not daring with our modeſt denyals to whet the inſtancie, and double the intreaties of ſo welcome ſuiters. Yet loe, here the onely true and precious riches, the higheſt aduancement of the ſoule, peace and happineſſe, ſeekes for vs, ſues to vs for acceptation; our anſwers are coy and ouerly, ſuch as we giue to thoſe clyents that looke to gaine by our fauours. If our want were through the ſcarcitie of good, we might yet hope for pity to eaſe vs: but now that it is through negligence, and that wee periſh with our hands in our boſome, we are rather worthy of ſtripes, for the wrong wee doe our ſelues, than of pity for what we ſuffer. That wee may and will not, in opportunitie of hurting others, is noble and Chriſtian: but in our owne benefit ſluggiſh, and fauouring of the worſt kinde of vnthriftineſſe.

Saieſt thou then, this peace is good to haue, but hard to get? It were a ſhameſull neglect that hath no pretence. Is difficulty ſufficient excuſe to hinder thee from the purſuit of riches, of preferment, of learning, of bodily pleaſures? Art thou content to ſit ſhrugging in a baſe cottage, ragged, famiſhed, becauſe houſe, clothes, and food will neither be had without money, nor money without labour, nor labour without trouble and painfulneſſe? Who is ſo mercifull, as not to ſay that a whip is the beſt almes for ſo lazie and wilfull need? Peace ſhould not be good, if it were not hard: Goe, and by this excuſe ſhut thy ſelfe out of heauen at thy death, and liue miſerably till thy death, becauſe the good of both worlds is hard to compaſſe. There is nothing but miſery on earth and hell below, that thou canſt come too without labour: And if wee can bee content to caſt away ſuch immoderate and vnſeaſonable paines vpon theſe earthly trifles as to weare our bodies with violence, and to encroach vpon the night for time to get them; what madneſſe ſhall it ſeeme in vs, not to afford a leſſe labour to that which is infinitely better, and which onely giues worth and goodneſſe to the other? Wherefore if we haue not vowed enmity with our ſelues, if we be not in loue with miſery and vexation, if wee bee not obſtinately careleſſe of our owne good; let vs ſhake off this vnthriftie, dangerous, and deſperate negligence, and quicken theſe dull hearts to a liuely and effectuall ſearch of what onely can yeeld them ſweet and abiding contentment: which once attained, how ſhall we inſult ouer euils, and bid them doe their worſt? How ſhall we vnder this calme and quiet day, laugh at the rough weather and vnſteady motions of the world? How ſhall heauen and earth ſmile vpon vs, and wee on them; commanding the one, aſpiring to the other? How pleaſant ſhall our life bee, while neither ioyes nor ſorrowes can diſtemper it with exceſſe? yea while the matter of ioy that is within vs, turnes all the moſt ſad occurrences into pleaſure? How deare and welcome ſhall our death bee, that ſhall but lead vs from one heauen to another, from peace to glory? Goe now, yee vaine and idle worldlings, and pleaſe your ſelues in the large extent of your rich Mannors, or in the homage of those whom baseneſſe of minde hath made ſlaues to your greatneſſe, or in the price and faſhions of your full ward-robe, or in the wanton varieties of your delicate Gardens, or in your coffers full of red and white earth; or if there be any other earthly thing, more alluring, more precious, enioy it, poſſeſſe it, and let it poſſeſſe you:

Let mee haue onely my Peace; and let me neuer want it, till I enuie you.

TO THE RIGHT WORSHIPFVLL, SIR

RICHARD LEA, Knight, all increase of true honour with God and men.

SIR, euer since I began to bestow my selfe vpon the common good, studying wherein my labours might be most seruiceable; I still found they could be no way so well improued, as in that part which concerneth deuotion, and the practice of true pietie. For on the one side I perceiued the number of Polemicall bookes, rather to breed, than end strifes; and those which are doctrinall, by reason of their multitude, rather to oppresse than satisfie the Reader; wherein, if we write the same things, wee are iudged tedious; if different, singular. On the other part, respecting the Reader, I saw the braines of men neuer more stuffed, their tongues neuer more stirring, their hearts neuer more emptie, nor their hands more idle. Wherefore, after those sudden Meditations which passed me without rule, I was easily induced by their successe (as a small thing moues the willing) to send forth this Rule of Meditation; and after my Heauen vpon Earth, to discourse (although by way of example) of Heauen aboue. In this Art of mine, I confesse to haue receiued more light from one obscure nameless Monke, which wrote some 112. yeeres agoe, than from the directions of all other Writers.

ters. I would his humilitie had not made him niggardly of his name, that we might haue knowne whom to haue thanked. It had beene easie to haue framed it with more curiosity: but God and my soule know, that I made profit the scope of my labour, and not applause; and therefore (to chuse) I wished rather to bee rude than vnprofitable. If now the simplicitie of any Reader shall bereaue him of the benefit of my precepts, I know hee may make his vse of my examples. Why I haue honoured it with your name, I need not giue account to the world, which alreadie knoweth your worth and deserts; and shall see by this, that I acknowledge them. Goe you on happily (according to the heauenly aduice of your Iunius) in your worthy and glorious profession, still bearing your selfe as one that knoweth vertue the trueſt Nobilitie, and Religion the best vertue. The God whom you serue, shall honour you with men, and crowne you in heauen. To his grace I humbly commend you: requesting you only to accept the worke, and continue your fauour to the Author.

Your VVorships humbly deuoted,

THE ART OF DIVINE MEDITATION.

CHAP. I.

IT is not, I ſuppoſe, a more bold than profitable labour, after the endeuours of ſo many contemplatiue men, to teach the Art of Meditation: An heauenly buſineſſe, as any belongeth either to man or Chriſtian; and ſuch as whereby the ſoule doth vnſpeakably benefit it ſelfe. For by this doe we ranſacke our deepe and falſe hearts, finde out our ſecret enemies, buckle with them, expell them, arme our ſelues againſt their re-entrance. By this, we make vſe of all good meanes, fit our ſelues to all good duties; by this we deſcrie our weakneſſe, obtaine redreſſe, preuent tentations, cheare vp our ſolitarineſſe, temper our occaſions of delight, get more light vnto our knowledge, more heat to our affections, more life to our deuotion. By this we grow to be (as we are) ſtrangers vpon earth; and, out of a right eſtimation of all earthly things, into a ſweet fruition of inuiſible comforts. By this, we ſee our Sauiour with Steuen, wee talke with God as Moſes, and by this we are rauiſhed with bleſſed Paul into Paradiſe, and ſee that Heauen which we are loth to leaue, which we cannot vtter. This alone is the remedie of ſecurity and worldlineſſe, the paſtime of Saints, the ladder of heauen, and in ſhort, the beſt improuement of Chriſtianity. Learne it who can, and neglect it who liſt; he ſhall neuer finde ioy, neither in God nor in himſelfe, which doth not both know and practiſe it. And how-euer of old ſome hidden Cloyſters haue ingroſſed it to themſelues, and confined it within their Celles, who indeed profeſſing nothing but contemplation, through their immunity from thoſe cares which accompany an actiue life, might haue the beſt leiſure to this buſineſſe: yet ſeeing there is no man ſo taken vp with action, as not ſometimes to haue a free minde; and there is no reaſonable minde ſo ſimple, as not to be able both to diſcourſe ſomewhat and to better it ſelfe by her ſecret thoughts; I deeme it an enuious wrong to conceale that from any, whoſe benefit may bee vniuerſall. Thoſe that haue but a little ſtocke, had need to know the beſt rules of thrift.

The benefit and vſes of Meditation.

Which are vniuerſal to all Chriſtians, and not to be appropriated to ſome profeſſions.

CHAP. II.

THe rather, for that whereas our Diuine Meditation is nothing elſe but a bending of the minde vpon ſome ſpirituall obiect, through diuers formes of diſcourſe, vntill our thoughts come to an iſſue: and this muſt needs be either Extemporall, and occaſioned by outward occurrences offered to the minde; or deliberate, and wrought out of our owne heart: which againe is either in matter of Knowledge, ledge, for the finding out of some hidden truth, and conuincing of an heresie by profound trauersing of reason; or in matter of Affection, for the enkindling of our loue to God: the former of these two last, wee sending to the Schooles and Masters of Controuersies, search after the latter; which is both of larger vse, and such as no Christian can excuse, as either vnnecessary, or ouer-difficult: for, both euery Christian had need of fire put to his affections, and weaker iudgements are no lesse capable of this diuine heat, which proceeds not so much from reason, as from faith.

The deſcription and kindes of Meditation.

One saith (and I beleeue him) that Gods Schoole is more of Affection, than Vnderstanding: Both lessons very needfull, very profitable; but for this age, especially the latter: for if there be some that haue much zeale, little knowledge, there are more that haue much knowledge without zeale. And he that hath much skill, and no affection, may doe good to others by information of iudgement, but shall neuer haue thanke either of his owne heart, or of God, who vseth not to cast away his loue on those, of whom he is but knowne, not loued.

Chap. III.

Concerning Meditation Extemporall.

OF Extemporall Meditation there may be much vse, no rule: forasmuch as our conceits herein varie according to the infinite multitude of obiects, and their diuers manner of proffering themselues to the minde; as also for the suddennesse of this act. Man is placed in this Stage of the world, to view the seuerall natures and actions of the creature; to view them, not idly, without his vse, as they doe him: God made all these for man, and man for his owne sake. Both these purposes were lost, if man should let the creatures passe carelesly by him, onely seene, not thought vpon. He only can make benefit of what he sees; which if he doe not, it is all one, as if he were blinde or brute. Whence it is, that wise Salomon putteth the sluggard to schoole vnto the Ant; and our Sauiour sendeth the distrustfull to the Lillie of the field.

In this kinde was that Meditation of the diuine Psalmist, which vpon the view of the glorious frame of the Heauens, was led to wonder at the mercifull respect God hath to so poore a creature as man. Thus our Sauiour tooke occasion of the water fetcht vp solemnly to the Altar, from the Well of Shilo, on the day of the great Hosannah, to meditate and discourse of the Water of life. Thus holy and sweet Augustine, from occasion of the water-course neere to his lodging, running among the pebbles, sometimes more silently, sometimes in a baser murmure, and sometimes in a shriller note, entred into the thought and discourse of that excellent order which God hath setled in all these inferiour things. Thus that learned and heauenly soule of our late Estye, when we sate together and heard a sweet consort of Musicke, seemed vpon this occasion carried vp for the time beforehand to the place of his rest, saying, not without some passion, What Musicke may wee thinke there is in heauen? Thus lastly (for who knowes not that examples of this kinde are infinite?) that faithfull and reuerend Deering, when the Sunne shined on his face now lying on his death-bed, fell into a sweet Meditation of the glory of God, and his approching ioy. The thoughts of this nature are not only lawfull, but so behouefull, that we cannot omit them, without neglect of God, his creatures, our selues. The creatures are halfe lost, if we only employ them, not learne something of them. God is wronged, if his creatures be vnregarded; our selues most of all, if we reade this great volume of the creatures, and take out no lesson for our instruction.

Chap. IV.

Cautions of Extemporall Meditation.

WHerein yet caution is to be had, that our meditations bee not either too farre fetcht, or sauouring of superstition. Farre fetcht I call those, which haue not a faire and easie resemblance vnto the matter from whence they are raised; in which case our thoughts proue loose and heartlesse, making no memorable rable impreſſion in the minde. Superſtitious, when we make choiſe of thoſe grounds of Meditation, which are forbidden vs as Teachers of Vanitie; or imploy our owne deuices (though well grounded) to an vſe aboue their reach; making them, vpon our owne pleaſures, not onely furtherances, but parts of Gods worſhip; in both which, our Meditations degenerate, and grow rather perilious to the ſoule. Whereto adde, that the minde be not too much cloyed with too frequent iteration of the ſame thought; which at laſt breeds a wearineſſe in our ſelues, and an vnpleaſantneſſe of that conceit, which at the firſt entertainment promiſed much delight. Our nature is too ready to abuſe familiaritie in any kinde: and it is with Meditations, as with Medicines; which with ouer-ordinarie vſe, loſe their ſoueraignty; and ſtill, in ſtead of purging. God hath not ſtraited vs for matter, hauing giuen vs the ſcope of the whole world; ſo that there is no creature, euent, action, ſpeech, which may not afford vs new matter of Meditation. And that which we are wont to ſay of fine wits, wee may as truly affirme of the Chriſtian heart, that it can make vſe of any thing. Wherefore as trauellers in a forraine countrey make euery ſight a leſſon; ſo ought wee in this our pilgrimage. Thou ſeeſt the heauen rolling aboue thine head, in a conſtant and vnmoueable motion; the ſtarres ſo ouerlooking one another, that the greateſt ſhew little, the leaſt greateſt, all glorious: the aire full of the bottles of raine, or fleeces of ſnow, or diuers formes of fiery Exhalations: the Sea vnder one vniforme face, full of ſtrange and monſtrous ſhapes beneath: the earth ſo adorned with varietie of plants, that thou canſt not but tread on many at once with euery foot; beſides the ſtore of creatures that flie aboue it, walke vpon it, liue in it. Thou idle Truant, doeſt thou learne nothing of ſo many maſters? Haſt thou ſo long read theſe capitall letters of Gods great Booke, and canſt thou not yet ſpell one word of them? The brute creatures ſee the ſame things, with as cleere, perhaps better eies. If thine inward eies ſee not their vſe, as well as thy bodily eies their ſhape, I know not whether is more reaſonable or leſſe brutiſh.

Chap. V.

Of Meditation deliberate.

Deliberate Meditation is that wee chiefly inquire for; which both may bee well guided, and ſhall be not a little furthered by precepts; part whereof the labours of others ſhall yeeld vs, and part, the plaineſt miſtreſſe, Experience: wherein order requires of vs firſt, the qualities of the perſon fit for meditation, then the circumſtances, manner, and proceedings of the worke.

Wherein firſt, the qualities of the perſon. Of whom is required: Firſt, that hee bee pure from his ſinnes.

The hill of Meditation may not be climbed with a prophane foot; but as in the deliuery of the Law, ſo here, no beaſt may touch Gods hill, leſt he die; only the pure of heart haue promiſe to ſee God. Sinne dimmeth and dazeleth the eie, that it cannot behold ſpirituall things. The Guard of heauenly Souldiers was about Eliſhaes ſeruant before; hee ſaw them not before, through the ſcales of his infidelity. The ſoule muſt therefore bee purged, ere it can profitably meditate. And as of old they were wont to ſearch for, and thruſt out malefactors from the preſence, ere they went to ſacrifice; ſo muſt we our ſins, ere we offer our thoughts to God. Firſt, ſaith Dauid, I will waſh my hands in innocencie, then I will compaſſe thine Altar. Whereupon not vnfitly did that worthy Chancellour of Paris make the firſt ſtaire of his Ladder of Contemplation, Humble Repentance. The cloth that is white (which is wont to be the colour of innocencie) is capable of any Dye; the blacke, of none other. Not that wee require an abſolute perfection, (which, as it is incident vnto none, ſo if it were, would exclude all need and vſe of Meditation) but rather an honeſt ſinceritie of the heart, not willingly ſinning, willingly repenting when we haue ſinned: which who ſo findes in himſelfe, let him not thinke any weakneſſe a lawfull barre to Meditation. He that pleads this excuſe, is like ſome ſimple man, which being halfe ſtarued with cold, refuſeth to come neere the fire, becauſe hee findeth not heat enough in himſelfe.

Chap. VI.

Secondly, that he bee free from worldly thoughts.

Neither may the ſoule that hopeth to profit by meditation, ſuffer it ſelfe for the time intangled with the world; which is all one, as to come to Gods flaming buſh on the hill of viſions, with our ſhooes on our feet. Thou ſeeſt the bird, whoſe feathers are limed, vnable to take her former flight: ſo are we, when our thoughts are clinged together by the world, to ſoare vp to our heauen in Meditation. The paire of brothers muſt leaue their nets, if they will follow Chriſt; Eliſha his oxen, if hee will attend a Prophet. It muſt bee a free and a light minde that can aſcend this Mount of Contemplation, ouercomming this height, this ſteepeneſſe. Cares are an heauy load, and vneaſie: theſe muſt bee laid downe at the bottome of this hill, if wee euer looke to attaine the top. Thou art loaded with houſhold cares, perhaps publike; I bid thee not caſt them away: euen theſe haue their ſeaſon, which thou canſt not omit without impietie: I bid thee lay them downe at thy Cloſet doore, when thou attempteſt this worke. Let them in with thee, thou ſhalt finde them troubleſome companions, euer diſtracting thee from thy beſt errand. Thou wouldeſt thinke of heauen; thy Barne comes in thy way, or perhaps thy Count-Booke, or thy Coffers, or it may be, thy minde is beforehand trauelling vpon the morrowes iourney. So, while thou thinkeſt of many things, thou thinkeſt of nothing; while thou wouldeſt goe many waies, thou ſtandeſt ſtill. And as in a crowde, while many preſſe forward at once thorow one doore, none proceedeth; ſo when variety of thoughts tumultuouſly throng in vpon the minde, each proueth a barre to the other, and all an hinderance to him that entertaines them.

Chap. VII.

Thirdly, that he be constant: and that, firſt, in time and matter.

And as our Clyent of Meditation muſt both bee pure and free in vndertaking this taske, ſo alſo conſtant in continuing it; Conſtant both in time and in matter: both in a ſet courſe and houre reſerued for this worke, and in an vnwearied proſecution of it once begunne. Thoſe that meditate by ſnatches and vncertaine fits, when onely all other employments forſake them, or when good motions are thruſt vpon them by neceſſitie, let them neuer hope to reach to any perfection. For theſe feeble beginnings of luke-warme grace, which are wrought in them by one fit of ſerious Meditation, are ſoone extinguiſhed by intermiſſion, and by miſ-wonting periſh: This daies meale (though large and liberall) ſtrengthens thee not for to morrow: the body languiſheth, if there bee not a daily ſupply of repaſt. Thus feede thy ſoule by Meditation; Set thine houres and keepe them, and yeeld not to an eaſie diſtraction. There is no hardneſſe in this practice, but in the beginning; vſe ſhall giue it not eaſe onely, but delight. Thy companion entertaineth thee this while in louing diſcourſes, or ſome inexpected buſineſſe offers to interrupt thee. Neuer any good worke ſhall want ſome hinderance: Either breake through the lets, except it be with inciuility or loſſe; or if they bee importunate, pay thy ſelfe the time that was vnſeaſonably borrowed; and recompence thine omitted houres with the double labours of another day: For thou ſhalt finde, that deferring breeds (beſide the loſſe) an indiſpoſition to good; So that what was before pleaſant to thee, being omitted, to morrow growes harſh; the next day vnneceſſary; afterward odious. To day thou canſt, but wilt not; to morrow thou couldeſt, but liſteſt not; the next day thou neither wilt nor canſt bend thy minde on theſe thoughts. So I haue ſeene friends that vpon neglect of dutie grow ouerly: vpon ouerlineſſe, ſtrange; vpon ſtrangeneſſe, to vtter defiance. Thoſe, whoſe very trade is Diuinitie, (mee thinkes) ſhould omit no day without his line of Meditation: thoſe which are ſecular men, not many; remembring that they haue a common calling of Chriſtianitie to attend, as well as a ſpeciall vocation in the world: and that other being more noble and important, may iuſtly challenge both often and diligent ſeruice.

Sect.

Chap. VIII.

And as this constancie requires thee to keepe day with thy selfe, vnlesse thou wilt prone bankrupt in good exercises; so also that thy minde should dwell vpon the same thought without flitting, without wearinesse, vntill it haue attained to some issue of spirituall profit: otherwise it attempteth much, effecteth nothing. What auaileth it to knock at the doore of the heart, if we depart ere we haue an answer? What are we the warmer, if we passe hastily along by the heart, and stay not at it? Those that doe onely trauell thorow Africke, become not Blackmores: but those which are borne there, those that inhabit there. We account those damosels too light of their loue, which betroth themselues vpon the first sight, vpon the first motion: and those we deeme of much price, which require long and earnest solliciting. Hee deceiueth himselfe that thinketh grace so easily wonne; there must be much suit and importunity, ere it will yeeld to our desires: Not that wee call for a perpetuity of this labour of Meditation; Humane frailty could neuer beare so great a toile. Nothing vnder Heauen is capable of a continuall motion without complaint. It is enough for the glorified spirits aboue, to be euer thinking, and neuer weary. The minde of man is of a strange metall; if it be not vsed, it rusteth; if vsed hardly, it breaketh: briefly, is sooner dulled than satisfied with a continuall Meditation. Whence it came to passe, that those ancient Monkes, who intermedled bodily labour with their contemplations, proued so excellent in this diuine businesse; when those at this day, which hauing mewed and mured vp themselues from the world, spend themselues wholly vpon their Beads and Crucifix, pretending no other worke but Meditation, haue cold hearts to God, and to the world shew nothing but a dull shadow of deuotion: for, that, if the thoughts of these latter were as diuine as they are superstitious; yet being, without all interchangeablenesse, bent vpon the same discourse, the minde must needs grow weary, the thoughts remisse and languishing, the obiects tedious: while the other refreshed themselues with this wise variety, employing the hands, while they called off the minde, as good Comœdians so mixe their parts, that the pleasantnesse of the one, may temper the austerenesse of the other; whereupon they gained both enough to the body, and to the soule more than if it had beene all the while busied.

Secondly, that he be constant in the continuance.

Besides, the excellency of the obiect letteth this assiduity of Meditation, which is so glorious, that like vnto the Sunne, it may abide to haue an eye cast vp to it for a while, will not be gazed vpon; whosoeuer ventureth so farre, loseth both his hope and his wits. If we hold with that blessed Monica, that such like cogitations are the food of the minde, yet euen the minde also hath her satiety, and may surfet of too much. It shall be sufficient therefore, that we persuere in our Meditation, without any such affectation of perpetuity, and leaue without a light fickleneſse; making alwaies not our Houre-glasse, but some competent increase of our deuotion, the measure of our continuance; knowing, that as for Heauen, so for our pursuit of grace, it shall auaile vs little to haue begun well, without perseuerance: and withall, that the soule of man is not alwaies in the like disposition: but sometimes is longer in setling, through some vnquietnesse, or more obstinate distraction; sometimes heauier, and sometimes more actiue, and nimble to dispatch. * Gerson (whose authority I rather vse, because our aduersaries disclaime him for theirs) professeth, hee hath beene sometimes foure houres together working his heart, ere he could frame it to purpose. A singular patterne of vnwearied constancy, of an vnconquerable spirit; whom his present vnfitnesse did not so much discourage, as it whetted him to striue with himselfe till he could ouercome. And surely other victories are hazzardous, this certaine, if we will persist to striue: other fights are vpon hope, this vpon assurance; whiles our successe dependeth vpon the promise of God, which cannot disappoint vs. Persist therefore, and preuaile: persist till thou hast preuailed: so that which thou beganst with difficulty, shall end in comfort.

* Sauing our iust quarrell against him for the Councell of Constance.

Chap. IX.

Of the Circumstance of Meditation.

And therein, First, of the place.

FRom the qualities of the Person, we descend towards the action it selfe: where first we meet with those circumstances which are necessary for our prediſpoſition to the worke; Place, Time, Site of the body.

Solitarineſſe of Place is fitteſt for Meditation. Retire thy ſelfe from others, if thou wouldſt talke profitably with thy ſelfe. So Iesvs meditates alone in the Mount, Iſaac in the fields, Iohn Baptiſt in the Deſart, Dauid on his bed, Chryſoſtome in the Bath, each in ſeuerall places; but all ſolitary. There is no place free from God, none to which he is more tied: one findes his Cloſet moſt conuenient, where his eyes being limited by the knowne walls, call the minde after a ſort from wandring abroad. Another findeth his ſoule more free, when it beholdeth his heauen aboue and about him. It matters not ſo we be ſolitary and ſilent. It was a witty and diuine ſpeech of Bernard, that the Spouſe of the ſoule, Christ Iesvs, is baſhfull, neither willingly commeth to his Bride in the preſence of a multitude. And hence is that ſweet inuitation which wee finde of her: Come, my welbeloued, let vs goe forth into the fields: let vs lodge in the villages: Let vs goe vp early to the Vines: let vs ſee if the Vine flouriſh, whether it hath diſcloſed the firſt Grape, or whether the Pomegranates bloſſome; there will I giue thee my loue. Abandon therefore all worldly ſociety, that thou maieſt change it for the company of God and his Angels; the ſociety, I ſay, of the world, not outward onely, but inward alſo. There be many that ſequeſter themſelues from the viſible company of men, which yet carry a world within them; who being alone in body, are haunted with a throng of fancies: as Ierome, in his wildeſt Deſart, found himſelfe too oft in his thoughts amongſt the dances of the Roman Dames. This company is worſe than the other: for it is more poſſible for ſome thoughtfull men to haue a ſolitary minde in the midſt of a market, than for a man thus diſpoſed to be alone in a wilderneſſe. Both companies are enemies to Meditations; whither tendeth that ancient counſell of a great Maſter in this Art, of three things requiſite to this buſineſſe, Secrecy, Silence, Reſt: whereof the firſt excludeth company, the ſecond noiſe, the third motion. It cannot be ſpoken how ſubiect we are in this worke, to diſtraction, like Salomons old man, whom the noiſe of euery bird wakeneth: ſenſuall delights we are not drawne from with the three-fold cords of iudgement; but our ſpirituall pleaſures are eaſily hindred. Make choice therefore of that place, which ſhall admit the feweſt occaſions of with-drawing thy ſoule from good thoughts: wherein alſo euen change of places is ſomewhat preiudiciall; and I know not how it falls out, that we finde God neerer vs in the place where we haue beene accuſtomed familiarly to meet him: not for that his preſence is confined to one place aboue others, but that our thoughts are, through cuſtome more eaſily gathered to the place where we haue ordinarily conuerſed with him.

Chap. X.

Secondly, of the time.

ONe Time cannot be preſcribed to all: for neither is God bound to houres, neither doth the contrary diſpoſition of men agree in one choice of opportunities: the golden houres of the morning ſome finde fitteſt for Meditation, when the body newly raiſed, is well calmed with his late reſt, and the ſoule hath not as yet had from theſe outward things any motiues of alienation. Others finde it beſt to learne wiſdome of their reines in the night; hoping with Iob, that their bed will bring them comfort in their Meditation; when both all other things are ſtill, and themſelues, wearied with theſe earthly cares, doe out of a contempt of them, grow into greater liking and loue of heauenly things. I haue euer found Iſaacs time fitteſt, who went out in the euening euening to meditate. No precept, no practice of others can prescribe to vs in this circumstance. It shall be enough, that first we set our selues a time: secondly, that we set apart that time, wherein we are aptest for this seruice. And as no time is preiudiced with vnfitnesse, but euery day is without difference seasonable for this worke, so especially Gods Day. No day is barren of grace to the searcher of it, none alike fruitfull to this; which being by God sanctified to himselfe, and to be sanctified by vs to God, is priuileged with blessings aboue others: for the plentifull instruction of that Day stirreth thee vp to this action, and fills thee with matter; and the zeale of thy publike seruice warmeth thy heart to this other businesse of deuotion. No MANNA fell to the Israelites on their Sabbath; our spirituall MANNA falleth on ours, most frequent: if thou wouldst haue a full soule, gather as it falls; gather it by hearing, reading, meditation: spirituall idlenesse is a fault this Day, perhaps not lesse than bodily worke.

CHAP. XI.

NEither is there lesse variety in the Site and gesture of the body: the due composednesse whereof is no little aduantage to this exercise; euen in our speech to God, we obserue not alwaies one and the same position; sometimes wee fall groueling on our faces; sometimes we bow our knees; sometimes stand on our feet; sometimes we lift vp our hands, sometimes cast downe our eies. God is a Spirit, who therefore being a seuere obseruer of the disposition of the soule, is not scrupulous for the body; requiring not so much, that the gesture thereof should be vniforme, as reuerent. No maruell therefore though in this, all our teachers of Meditation haue commended seueral positions of body, according to their disposition and practice. * One, sitting with the face turned vp to heauen-ward, according to the precept of the Philosopher, who taught him, that by sitting and resting, the minde gathereth wisdome. * Another, leaning to some Rest, towards the left side, for the greater quieting of the heart. * A third, standing with the eies lift vp to Heauen, but shut, for feare of distractions. But of all other (me thinketh) Isaacs choice the best, who meditated walking. In this let euery man be his owne master; so be we vse that frame of body that may both testifie reuerence, and in some cases helpe to stirre vp further deuotion; which also must needs be varied according to the matter of our Meditation. If we thinke of our sinnes, Ahabs soft pace, the Publicans deiected eies, and his hand beating his brest, are more seasonable. If of the ioyes of heauen, Steuens countenance fixed aboue, and Dauids hands lift vp on high, are most fitting. In all which, the body, as it is the instrument and vassall of the soule, so will easily follow the affections thereof; and in truth then is our deuotion most kindly, when the body is thus commanded his seruice by the Spirit, and not suffered to goe before it, and by his forwardnesse to prouoke his master to emulation.

CHAP. XII.

NOw time and order call vs from these circumstances, to the matter and subiect of Meditation: which must be Diuine and Spirituall; not euill, nor worldly. O the carnall and vnprofitable thoughts of men! We all meditate; one, how to doe ill to others; another, how to doe some earthly good to himselfe: another, to hurt himselfe, vnder a colour of good, as how to accomplish his lewd desires, the fulfilling whereof proueth the bane of the soule; how he may sinne vnseene, and goe to hell with the least noise of the world. Or perhaps, some better mindes bend their thoughts vpon the search of naturall things; the motions of euery heauen, and of euery starre; the reason and course of the ebbing and flowing of the Sea; the manifold kinds of simples that grow out of the earth, and creatures that creepe vpon it; with all their strange qualities, and operations. Or perhaps, the seuerall formes of gouernment, and rules of State take vp their busie heads: so that while they would be acquainted with the whole world, they are strangers at home, and while they seeke to know all other things, they remaine vnknowne of themselues. The God that made them, the vilenesse of their nature, the danger of their sinnes, the multitude of their imperfections, the Sauiour that bought them, the Heauen that he bought for them, are in the meane time as vnknowne, as vnregarded, as if they were not.

Of the matter and subiect of our meditation

Thus doe foolish children spend their time and labour, in turning ouer leaues to looke for painted babes, not at all respecting the solid matter vnder their hands. We fooles, when will we be wise, and turning our eies from vanity, with that sweet Singer of Israel, make Gods statutes our song and meditation in the house of our pilgrimage?

Earthly things proffer themselues with importunity. Heauenly things must with importunity be sued to. Those, if they were not so little worth, would not be so forward, & being forward, need not any Meditation to solicit them: These, by how much more hard they are to intreat, by so much more precious they are being obtained; and therefore worthier our endeuor. As then we cannot goe amisse, so long as we keep our selues in the tracke of Diuinitie; while the soule is taken vp with the thoughts, either of the Deitie in his essence, and persons (sparingly yet in this point, and more in faith and admiration than inquiry) or of his attributes, his Iustice, Power, Wisdome, Mercy, Truth; or of his workes, in the creation, preseruation, gouernment of all things; according to the Psalmist, I will meditate of the beauty of thy glorious Maiesty, and thy wonderfull workes: so, most directly in our way, and best-fitting our exercise of Meditation, are those matters in Diuinitie, which can most of all worke compunction in the heart, and most stirre vs vp to deuotion. Of which kinde, are the Meditations concerning Christ Iesus our Mediator, his Incarnation, Miracles, Life, Passion, Buriall, Resurrection, Ascension, Intercession, the benefit of our Redemption, the certainty of our Election, the graces and proceeding of our Sanctification, our glorious estate in Paradise lost in our first Parents, our present vilenesse, our inclination to sinne, our seuerall actuall offences, the tentations and sleights of euill Angels, the vse of the Sacraments, nature and practice of Faith and Repentance: the miseries of our life, with the frailty of it; the certainty and vncertainty of our death, the glory of Gods Saints aboue, the awfulnesse of iudgement, the terrors of hell, and the rest of this quality: wherein both it is fit to haue variety (for that euen the strongest stomacke doth not alwaies delight in one dish) and yet so to change, that our choice may be free from wildnesse and inconstancy.

Chap. XIII.

The order of the worke it selfe.

NOw after that we haue thus orderly suited the person and his qualities, with the due circumstances of time, place, disposition of body, and substance of the matter discussed, I know not what can remaine, besides the maine businesse it selfe, and the manner and degrees of our prosecution thereof; which aboue all other calleth for an intentiue Reader, and resolute practice. Wherein that we may auoid all niceneſse and obscurity (since wee striue to profit) we will giue direction for the Entrance, Proceeding, Conclusion of this Diuine worke.

Chap. XIIII.

The entrance into the worke

A Goodly building must shew some magnificence in the gate; and great personages haue seemely Vshers to goe before them; who by their vncouered heads command reuerence and way. Euen very Poets of old had wont, before their Ballads

Ballads to implore the aid of their gods. And the heathen Romans entred not vpon any publike ciuill busineſſe, without a ſolemne apprecation of good ſucceſſe: How much leſſe ſhould a Chriſtian dare to vndertake a ſpirituall worke of ſuch importance, not hauing craued the aſſiſtance of his God? which (me thinkes) is no leſſe, than to profeſſe he could doe well without Gods leaue. When we thinke ciuill, it is from our ſelues: when good, from God. As Prayer is our ſpeech to God, ſo is each good Meditation (according to Bernard) Gods ſpeech to the heart: The heart muſt ſpeake to God, that God may ſpeake to it. Prayer therefore and Meditation, are as thoſe famous twinnes in the ſtory, or as two louing Turtles, whereof ſeparate one, the other languiſheth.

1 The common entrance, which is Prayer.

Prayer maketh way for Meditation. Meditation giueth matter, ſtrength, and life to our prayers. By which, as all other things are ſanctified to vs, ſo we are ſanctified to all holy things. This is as ſome royall Eunuch to perfume and dreſſe our ſoules, that they may be fit to conuerſe with the King of Heauen.

But the prayer that leadeth in Meditation, would not be long, requiring rather that the extenſion and length ſhould be put into the vigour and feruency of it; for that is not here intended to be the principall buſineſſe, but an introduction to another; and no otherwiſe, than as a Portall to this building of Meditation: The matter whereof ſhall be, that the courſe of our Meditation may be guided aright and bleſſed; that all diſtractions may be auoided; our iudgement enlightned, our inuentions quickned, our wills rectified, our affections whetted to heauenly things, our hearts enlarged to Godward, our deuotion enkindled; ſo that we may finde our corruptions abated, our graces thriuen, our ſoules and liues euery way bettered by this exerciſe.

Chap. XV.

Particular and proper entrance into the matter, which is in our choice thereof.

SVch is the common entrance into this worke: there is another yet more particular and proper; wherein the minde, recollecting it ſelfe, maketh choice of that Theme or matter whereupon it will beſtow it ſelfe for the preſent; ſettling it ſelfe on that which it hath choſen: which is done by an inward inquiſition made into our heart, of what we both doe, and ſhould thinke vpon: reiecting what is vnexpedient and vnprofitable. In both which, the Soule, like vnto ſome noble Hawke, lets paſſe the Crowes, and Larkes, and ſuch other worthleſſe Birds that croſſe her way, and ſtoopeth vpon a Fowle of price, worthy of her flight: after this manner.

What wilt thou muſe vpon, O my ſoule? thou ſeeſt how little it auaileth thee to wander and roue about in vncertainties: thou findeſt how little ſauour there is in theſe earthly things, wherewith thou haſt wearied thy ſelfe; Trouble not thy ſelfe any longer (with Martha) about the many and needleſſe thoughts of the world: None but heauenly things can afford thee comfort: vp then, my ſoule, and minde thoſe things that are aboue, whence thy ſelfe art: Amongſt all which, wherein ſhouldeſt thou rather meditate than of the life and glory of Gods Saints? A worthier imployment thou canſt neuer finde, than to thinke vpon that eſtate thou ſhalt once poſſeſſe, and now deſireſt.

Chap. XVI.

The proceeding of our Meditation.

HItherto the entrance; after which, our Meditation muſt proceed in due order, not troubledly, not prepoſterouſly: It begins in the vnderſtanding, endeth in the affection; It begins in the braine, deſcends to the heart; Begins on earth, aſcends to Heauen; Not ſuddenly, but by certaine ſtaires and degrees, till we come to the higheſt.

I haue found a ſubtill ſcale of Meditation, admired by ſome Profeſſors of this Art, aboue all other humane deuices, and farre preferred by them to the best directions of Origen, Austen, Bernard, Hugo Bonauenture, Gerson, and whosoeuer hath beene reputed of greatest perfection in this skill. The seuerall staires whereof (lest I should seeme to defraud my Reader through enuy) I would willingly describe, were it not that I feared to scarre him rather with the danger of obscurity, from venturing further vpon this so worthy a businesse: yet lest any man perhaps might complaine of an vnknowne losse, my Margent shall finde roome for that which I hold too knotty for my Text.

And therein a Method allowed by some Authors reiected by vs.

* In all which, (after the incredible commendations of some practitioners) I doubt not but an ordinarie Reader will easily espie a double fault at the least, Darknesse and Coincidence: that they are both too obscurely deliuered, and that diuers of them fall into other, not without some vaine superfluity. For this part therefore which concerneth the vnderstanding, I had rather to require onely a deepe and firme Consideration of the thing propounded: which shall bee done if we follow it in our discourse, through all, or the principall of those places which naturall reason doth affoord vs: wherein, let no man pleade ignorance, or feare difficulty: wee are all thus farre borne Logicians; neither is there, in this, so much neede of skill, as of industry. In which course yet, wee may not bee too curious, in a precise search of euery place and argument, without omission of any (though to bee fetcht in with racking the inuention.) For as the minde, if it goe loose and without rule, roues to no purpose; so if it be too much fettered, with the gieues of strict regularitie, moueth nothing at all.

The Scale of Meditation of an Author, ancient, but nameleſſe.

* Degrees of Preparation.

1 Question. What I { thinke. / should thinke.

2 Excussion. A repelling of what I should not thinke.

3 Choice, or Election. Of what most { necessary. / expedient. / comely.

* Degrees of proceeding in the vnderstanding.

4 Commemoration. An actuall thinking vpon the matter elected.

5 Consideration. A redoubled Commemoration of the same, till it be fully knowne.

6 Attention. A fixed and earnest consideration whereby it is fastned in the minde.

7 Explanation. A clearing of the thing considered by similitudes.

8 Tractation. An extending the thing considered to other points, where all questions of doubts are discussed.

9 Diiudication. An estimation of the worth of the thing thus handled.

10 Cansation. A confirmation of the estimation thus made.

11 Rumination. A sad and serious Meditation of all the former, till it may work vpon the affections.

From hence to the degrees of affection.

Chap. XVII.

Premonitions concerning our proceeding in the first part of Meditation.

ERe I enter therefore into any particular tractation, there are three things whereof I would premonish my Reader, concerning this first part, which is in the vnderstanding. First, that I desire not to binde euery man to the same vniforme proceeding in this part: Practice and custome may perhaps haue taught other courses more familiar, and not lesse direct. If then we can, by any other method, worke in our hearts so deepe an apprehension of the matter meditated, as it may duly stirre the affections, it is that onely we require.

Secondly, that whosoeuer applieth himselfe to this direction, thinke him not necessarily sarily tied to the prosecution of all these Logicall places, which hee findeth in the sequele of our Treatise, so as his Meditation should be lame and imperfect without the whole number: for there are some Themes will not beare all these; as, when we meditate of God, there is no roome for Causes or Comparisons, and others yeeld them with such difficulty, that their search interrupteth the chiefe worke intended. It shall be sufficient, if we take the most pregnant, and most voluntary.

Thirdly, that when we sticke in the disposition of any the places following (as if, meditating of Sinne, I cannot readily meet with the Materiall and Formall Causes, or the Appendances of it) we racke not our mindes too much with the inquiry thereof; which were to striue more for Logique, than deuotion: but without too much disturbance of our thoughts, quietly passe ouer to the next. If we breake our teeth with the shell, wee shall finde small pleasure in the kernell.

Now then for that my only feare is, lest this part of my discourse shall seeme ouerperplexed vnto the valearned Reader; I will in this whole processe, second my rule with his example, that so what might seeme obscure in the one, may by the other be explained; and the same steps he seeth me take in this, he may accordingly tread in any other Theme.

Chap. XVIII.

The practice of Meditation; wherein, First, we begin with some description of that we meditate of.

FIrst therefore it shall be expedient to consider seriously, what the thing is whereof we meditate.

What then, O my soule, is the life of the Saints, whereof thou studiest? Who are the Saints, but those which hauing beene weakly holy vpon earth, are perfectly holy aboue? which euen on earth were perfectly holy in their Sauiour, now are so in themselues? which ouercomming on earth, are truly canonized in Heauen? What is their life, but that blessed estate aboue, wherein their glorified soule hath a full fruition of God?

Chap. XIX.

Secondly, follows an easie and voluntary diuision of the matter meditated.

THe nature whereof, after we haue thus shadowed out to our selues by a description, not curious alwaies, and exactly framed according to the rules of Art, but sufficient for our owne conceit; the next is (if it shall seeme needfull, or if the matter will beare, or offer it) some easie and voluntary diuision, whereby our thoughts shall haue more roome made for them, and our proceeding shall be more distinct.

There is a life of nature, wherein thou, my soule, dwellest in this body, and informest thine earthly burthen. There is a life of grace, when the Spirit of God dwells in thee. There is a life of glory, when the body being vnited to thee, both shall be vnited to God: or when, in the meane time, being separated from thy companion, thou inioyest God alone. This life of thine therefore, as the other, hath his ages, hath his statures; for it entreth vpon his birth, when thou passest out of thy body, and changest this earthly house for an Heauenly: It enters into his full vigour, when at the day of the common resurrection, thou resumest this thy companion, vnlike to it selfe, like to thee, like to thy Sauiour, immortall now, and glorious. In this life here may be degrees; there can be no imperfection. If some be like the skie, others like the Starres, yet all shine. If some sit at their Sauiours right hand, others at his left, all are blessed. If some vessels hold more, all are full; none complaineth of want, none enuieth at him that hath more.

Chap.

Chap. XX.

3 A consideration of the causes thereof in all kinds of them.

WHich done, it shall be requisit for our perfecter vnderstanding, and for the laying grounds of matter for our affection, to carry it thorow those other principall places, and heads of reason, which Nature hath taught euery man, both for knowledge and amplification: the first whereof are the Causes, of all sorts.

Whence is this eternall life, but from him which onely is eternall, which onely is the fountaine of life, yea life it selfe? Who but the same God that giues our temporall life, giueth also that eternall? The Father bestoweth it, the Sonne meriteth it, the Holy Ghost seales and applieth it. Expect it onely from him, O my soule, whose free election gaue thee the first title to it, to be purchased by the bloud of thy Sauiour. For thou shalt not therefore be happy, because he saw that thou wouldst be good; but therefore art thou good, because he hath ordained, thou shalt be happy. Hee hath ordained thee to life; he hath giuen thee a Sauiour to giue this life vnto thee; faith, whereby thou mightest attaine to this Sauiour; his Word, by which thou mightst attaine to this faith; what is there in this not his? And yet not his so simply, as that it is without thee: without thy merit indeed, not without thine act. Thou liuest here through his blessing, but by bread; thou shalt liue aboue through his mercy, but by thy faith below, apprehending the Author of thy life. And yet as he will not saue thee without thy faith, so thou canst neuer haue faith without his gift. Looke vp to him therefore, O my soule, as the beginner and finisher of thy salvation; and while thou magnifiest the Author, be rauished with the glory of the worke: which farre passeth both the tongue of Angels, and the heart of man it can be no good thing that is not there. How can they want water that haue the spring? Where God is enioyed, in whom only all things are good, what good can bee wanting? And what perfection of blisse is there, where all goodnesse is met and vnited? In thy presence is fulnesse of ioy, and at thy right hand are pleasures for euermore. O blessed reflection of glory! We see there, as we are seene: in that we are seene, it is our glory; in that we see, it is Gods glory; therefore doth he glorifie vs, that our glory should be to his. How worthy art thou, O Lord, that through vs thou shouldest looke at thy selfe!

Chap. XXI.

4 The Consideration of the Fruits and Effects.

THe next place shal be the fruits and effects following vpon their seuerall causes: which also affoords very feeling and copious matter to our meditation; wherein it shall be euer best, not so much to seeke for all, as to chuse out the chiefest.

No marueil then if from this glory proceed vnspeakable ioy, and from this ioy the sweet songs of praise and thanksgiuing. The Spirit bids vs, when we are merry, sing: How much more then, when we are merry without all mixture of sorrow, beyond all measure of our earthly affections, shall we sing ioyfull Hallelu-iahs, and Hosannahs to him that dwelleth in the highest Heauens? our hearts shall be so full, that we cannot chuse but sing, and wee cannot but sing melodiously. There is no iar in this Musicke, no end of this song. O blessed change of the Saints! They doe nothing but weepe below, and now nothing but sing aboue. We sowed in teares, reape in ioy; there was some comfort in those teares, when they were at worst; but there is no danger of complaint in this heauenly mirth. If we cannot sing here with Angels, On earth peace, yet there wee shall sing with them, Glory to God on high; and ioyning our voices to theirs, shall make vp that celestiall consort, which none can either heare or beare part in, and not be happy.

Chap. XXII.

5 Consideration of the Subiect wherein, or whereabout it is.

AFter which comes to be considered the Subiect, either wherein that is, or whereabout that is imploied, which we meditate of: As, exhibited? which is no other than the Paradise of God. Here below we dwell, or rather we wander in a continued wildernes; there we shall rest vs in the true Eden: I am come into my Garden, my Sister, my Spouse. Kings vse not to dwell in Cottages of Clay; but in Royall Courts fit for their estate: How much more shall the King of Heauen, who hath prepared for men so faire mansions on earth, make himselfe an habitation suitable to his Maiestie? Euen earthly Princes haue dwelt in Cedar and Yuory: But the great Citie, Holy Ierusalem, the Palace of the Highest, hath her walls of Iasper, her building of gold, her foundation of precious stones, her gates of pearle: How glorious things are spoken of thee, O thou City of God! We see but the pauement, and yet how goodly it is! The beleeuing Centurion thought himselfe vnworthy that Christ should come vnder his roofe: yet wert thou, O Sauiour, in thine humbled estate, in the forme of a seruant: How then shall I thinke my selfe worthy to come vnder this roofe of thine, so shining and glorious? O, if this clay of mine may come to this honour aboue, let it bee trampled vpon and despised on earth.

And indeed, what lesse happinesse doth the very place promise, wherein this glory is exhibited?

Chap. XXIII.

6 Consid. of the Appendances and Qualities of it.

Sixtly, shall follow the Appendances and Qualities, which cleaue vnto the subiect whereof we meditate: As,

But were the place lesse noble and maiesticall; yet the company which it affordeth, hath enough to make the soule blessed. For, not the place giueth ornament to the guest, so much as the guest to the place. How loth are we to leaue this earth, onely for the society of some few friends in whom we delight, which yet are subiect euery day to mutuall dislikes? what pleasure shall we then take in the enioying of the Saints; when there is nothing in them not amiable, nothing in vs that may coole the feruour of our loue? There shalt thou, my soule, thy selfe glorified, meete with thy deare Parents and friends alike glorious, neuer to be seuered: There thou shalt see and conuerse with those ancient Worthies of the former World; the blessed Patriarchs and Prophets, with the crowned Martyrs and Confessors; with the holy Apostles, and the Fathers of that Primitiue, and this present Church, shining each one according to the measure of his blessed labours. There shalt thou liue familiarly in the sight of those Angels, whom now thou receiuest good from, but seest not. There (which is the head of all thy felicity,) thine eies shall see Him whom now thine heart longeth for, (that Sauiour of thine) in the onely hope of whom now thou liuest. Alas, how dimly, and afarre off doest thou now behold him? How imperfectly doest thou enioy him, while euery temptation bereaues thee, for the time, of his presence? I sought him whom my soule loueth: I sought him, but found him not; his backe is now towards thee many times through thy sinnes, and therefore thou hardly discernest him. Other-while and often thy backe is turned vnto him through negligence, that when thou mightest obscurely see him, thou doest not: now thou shalt see him, and thine eies thus fixed shall not bee remoued. Yet neither could this glory make vs happy, if being thus absolute, it were not perpetuall. To bee happy, is not so sweet a state, as it is miserable to haue beene happy. Left ought therefore should be wanting, behold, this felicity knoweth no end, feareth no intermission, and is as eternall for the continuance, as he that had no beginning. O blessednesse truly infinite! Our earthly ioyes doe scarce euer begin; but when they begin, their end bordereth vpon their beginning. One houre seeth vs oft-times ioyfull and miserable: here alone is nothing but eternity. If then the Diuine Prophet thought here one day in Gods earthly house, better than a thousand other-where; what shall I compare to thousands of millions of yeeres in Gods heauenly Temple? Yea, millions of yeeres are not so much as a minute to eternity, and that other house not a cottage to this.

Chap. XXIV.

7 Of that which is diuerse from it, or contrary to it.

Seuenthly, our thoughts, leauing a while the consideration of the thing as it is in it selfe, shall descend vnto it as respectiuely with others; and therefore first shall meditate of that which is diuerse from it, or contrarie vnto it.

What

What doest thou here then, O my soule? What doest thou here groueling vpon earth? where the best things are vanity, the rest no better than vexation. Looke round about thee, and see whether thine eies can meet with any thing but either sinnes or miseries. Those few and short pleasures thou seest, end euer sorrowfully; and in the meane time are intermingled with many grieuances. Here thou heares one cry out of a sicke body, whereof there is no part which affords not choice of diseases. This man layeth his hand vpon his consuming lungs, and complaineth of short wind: that other, vpon his rising spleene: a third shaketh his painfull head: another roares out for the torment of his reines or bladder: another for the racking of his gowty ioints: one is distempered with a watery Dropsie, another with a windie Collicke, a third with a fiery Ague, a fourth with an earthen Melancholy; one grouels and soweth with the falling sickneſſe; another lyeth bed-rid halfe senseleſſe with a dead Palſie. There are but few bodies that complaine not of some disease; and that thou mayest not looke farre, it is a wonder if thy selfe feele not always one of these euills within thee. There, thou heares another lament his losse: either his estate is impaired by suretiſhip, or stealth, or ſhipwracke, or oppreſſion; or his childe is vnruly, or miscarried; or his wife dead, or diſloyall; another tormented with paſſions; each one is some way miserable. But, that which is yet more irkesome, thy one eare is beaten with curſings and blaſphemies; thy other with scorneful, or wanton, or murthering ſpeeches; thine eyes see nothing but pride, filthineſſe, profaneneſſe, bloud, exceſſe; and whatsoeuer else might vex a righteous ſoule: and if all the world beſides were innocent, thou findest enough within thy selfe to make thy selfe wearie, and thy life lothsome. Thou needest not fetch cause of complaint from others; thy corruptions yeeld thee too much at home; euer ſinning, euer preſuming; ſinning euen when thou haſt repented: yea, euen while thou repenteſt, ſinning. Goe to now, my ſoule, and ſolace thy selfe here below, & ſuffer thy life beſotted with these goodly contentments; worthy of no better, while thou fixeſt thy ſelfe on these: ſee if thou canſt finde any of these aboue; and if thou canſt meet with any diſtemper, any loſſe, any ſinne, any complaint, from thy ſelfe or any other aboue, deſpiſe thine Heauen as much as now thou loueſt the earth. Or if all this cannot enough commend vnto thee the ſtate of Heauenly Glory, caſt downe thine eyes yet lower, into that deepe and bottomleſſe pit, full of horror, full of torment, where there is nothing but flames, and teares, and ſhrikes, and gnaſhing of teeth, nothing but Fiends and tortures: where there is palpable darkneſſe, and yet perpetuall fire; where the damned are euer boyling, neuer conſumed; euer dying, neuer dead; euer complaining, neuer pitied; where the Glutton, that once would not giue a cruſt of bread, now begs for one drop of water; and yet alas, if whole riuers of water ſhould fall into his mouth, how ſhould they quench thoſe riuers of Brimſtone that feed this flame? where there is no intermiſſion of complaints, no breathing from paine, and after millions of yeeres, no poſſibility of comfort. And if the rod wherewith thou chaſtiſeſt thy children, O Lord, euen in this life, be ſo ſmart and galling, that they haue beene brought downe to the brim of deſpaire, and in the bitterneſſe of their ſoule haue intreated death to releaſe them: What ſhall I thinke of their plagues, in whoſe righteous confuſion thou inſulteſt, and ſaieſt; Aha, I will auenge mee of mine enemies? Euen that thou ſhalt not be thus miſerable, O my ſoule, is ſome kinde of happineſſe: but that thou ſhalt be as happy, as the reprobate are miſerable, how worthy is it of more eſtimation, than thy ſelfe is capable of?

Chap. XXV.

3 Of comparisons and similitudes whereby it may be most fitly set forth.

After this oppoſition, the minde ſhall make compariſon of the matter meditated, with what may neereſt reſemble it; and ſhall illuſtrate it with fitteſt ſimilitudes, which giue no ſmall light to the vnderſtanding, nor leſſe force to the affection.

Wonder then, O my ſoule, as much as thou canſt, at this glory; and in comparison thereof, contemne this earth, which now thou treadeſt vpon; whoſe ioyes if they were perfect, are but ſhort; and if they were long, are imperfect. One day when thou art aboue, looking downe from the height of thy glory, and ſeeing the ſonnes of men creeping like ſo many Ants on this Molehill of earth, thou ſhalt thinke, Alas, how baſely I once liued! Was yonder ſilly dungeon the place I ſo loued, and was ſo loth to leaue! Thinke ſo now before hand; and ſince of heauen thou canſt not, yet account of thy earth as it is worthy: How heartleſſe and irkeſome are yee, O yee beſt earthly pleaſures, if ye be matched with the leaſt of thoſe aboue? How vile are you, O yee ſumptuous buildings of Kings, euen if all the entrailes of the earth had agreed to enrich you, in compariſon of this frame not made with hands? It is not ſo high aboue the earth in diſtance of place, as in worth and Maieſty. Wee may ſee the face of Heauen from the heart of the earth; but from the neereſt part of the earth who can ſee the leaſt glory of Heauen? The three Diſciples, on Mount Tabor, ſaw but a glimpſe of this glory ſhining vpon the face of their Sauiour; and yet being rauiſhed with the ſight, cried out, Maſter, it is good being here; and, thinking of building of three Tabernacles (for Chriſt, Moſes, Elias) could haue beene content themſelues to haue lien without ſhelter, ſo they might alwaies haue enioyed that ſight. Alas, how could earthly Tabernacles haue fitted thoſe heauenly bodies? They knew what they ſaw; what they ſaid, they knew not. Loe, theſe three Diſciples were not transfigured; yet how deeply they were affected euen with the glory of others! How happy ſhall we be, when our ſelues ſhall be changed into glorious? and ſhall haue Tabernacles not of our owne making, but prepared for vs by God? and yet not Tabernacles, but eternall Manſions. Moſes ſaw God but a while, and ſhined: how ſhall we ſhine, that ſhall behold his face for euer? What greater honour is there than in Soueraignty? What greater pleaſure than in feaſting? This life is both a Kingdome and a feaſt. A Kingdome: Hee that ouercomes, ſhall rule the Nations, and ſhall ſit with me in my Throne: O bleſſed promotion! Oh large dominion, and royall ſeat! to which Salomons Throne of Yuory was not worthy to become a foot-ſtoole. A feaſt: Bleſſed are they that are called to the Marriage-ſupper of the Lmabe. Feaſts haue more than neceſſity of prouiſion, more than ordinary diet; but marriage-feaſts yet more than common abundance; but the Marriage-feaſt of the Sonne of God to his bleſſed Spouſe the Church, muſt ſo farre exceed in all heauenly munificence and variety, as the perſons are of the greater ſtate and Maieſty. There is new wine, pure Manna, and all manner of ſpirituall dainties; and with the continuall cheere, a ſweet and anſwerable welcome; while the Bridegroome louingly cheereth vs vp, Eat, O friends, drinke, and make you merry, O welbeloued: yea, there ſhalt thou be, my ſoule, not a gueſt, but (how vnworthy ſoeuer) the Bride herſelfe, whom he hath euerlaſtingly eſpouſed to himſelfe in truth and righteouſneſſe. The contract is paſſed here below, the marriage is conſummate aboue, and ſolemnized with a perpetuall feaſt: ſo that now thou maiſt ſafely ſay, My welbeloued is mine, and I am his: Wherefore hearken, O my ſoule, and conſider and incline thine eare, forget alſo thine owne people, and thy fathers houſe, (thy ſuppoſed home of this world) ſo ſhall the King haue pleaſure in thy beauty; for hee is the Lord, and worſhip thou him.

Chap. XXVI.

9 The Titles and Names of the thing conſidered.

THe very Names and Titles of the matter conſidered, yeeld no ſmall ſtore to our Meditation: which being commonly ſo impoſed, that they ſecretly comprehend the nature of the thing which they repreſent, are not vnworthy of our diſcourſe.

What need I ſeeke thoſe reſemblances, when the very name of life implieth ſweetneſſe to men on earth, euen to them which confeſſe to liue with ſome diſcontentment? Surely the light is a pleaſant thing, and it is good to the eies to ſee the Sunne: yet when Temporall is added to Life, I know not how this addition detracteth ſomething, and doth greatly abate the pleaſure of Life; for thoſe which ioy to thinke of Life, grieue to thinke it but Temporall: ſo vexing is the end of that whoſe continuance was delightfull. But now when there is an addition (aboue Time) of Eternity, it maketh life ſo much more ſweet as it is moſt laſting; and laſting infinitely, what can it giue leſſe than an infinite contentment? Oh dying and falſe life, which wee enioy here, and ſcarce a ſhadow and counterfeit of that other! What is more eſteemed than glory? which is ſo precious to men of ſpirit, that it makes them prodigall of their bloud, proud of their wounds, careleſſe of themſelues: and yet (alas) how pent & how fading is this glory, affected with ſuch dangers and and death? hardly after all Trophees and monuments, either knowne to the next Sea, or ſuruiuing him that dieth for it: It is true glory to triumph in heauen, where is neither enuy nor forgetfulnes.

What is more deare to vs than our Country? which the worthy and faithfull Patriots of all times haue reſpected aboue their parents, their Children, their liues; counting it only happy to liue in it, and to die for it. The baniſht man pines for the want of it: the traueller digeſteth all the tediouſneſſe of his way, all the ſorrowes of an ill iourney, in the onely hope of home; forgetting all his forraine miſeries, when he feeleth his owne ſmoke. Where is our Country but aboue? Thence thou cameſt, O my ſoule; thither thou art going, in a ſhort, but weary pilgrimage. O miſerable men, if we account our ſelues at home in our pilgrimage; if in our iourney, we long not for home! Doeſt thou ſee men ſo in loue with their natiue ſoile, that euen when it is all deformed with the deſolations of warre, and turned into rude heapes, or while it is euen now flaming with the fire of ciuill broiles, they couet yet ſtill to liue in it, preferring it to all other places of more peace and pleaſure? and ſhalt thou, ſeeing nothing but peace and bleſſednes ſe at home, nothing but trouble abroad, content thy ſelfe with a faint wiſh of thy diſſolution? If heauen were thy Iayle, thou couldeſt but thinke of it vncomfortably. Oh what affection can be worthy of ſuch an home?

Chap. XXVII.

10. Conſid. of fit teſtimonies of Scripture, concerning our Theme.

LAſtly, if wee can recall any pregnant Teſtimonies of Scripture concerning our Theme, thoſe ſhall fitly conclude this part of our Meditation. Of Scripture; for that in theſe matters of God, none but diuine authority can command aſſent, and ſettle the conſcience. Witneſſes of holy men may ſerue for colours; but the ground muſt be onely from God.

There it is (ſaith the Spirit of God, which cannot deceiue thee) that all teares ſhall bee wiped from our eies; there ſhall be no more death, nor ſorrow, nor crying, neither ſhall there bee any more paine: yea, there ſhall not onely bee an end of ſorrowes, but an abundant recompence for the ſorrowes of our life; as he that was rapt vp into the third Heauen, and there ſaw what cannot be ſpoken, ſpeaketh yet thus of what he ſaw: I count, that the afflictions of this preſent time are not worthy of the glory which ſhall bee ſhewed to vs: It was ſhewed vnto him what ſhould hereafter be ſhewed vnto vs; and he ſaw, that if all the world full of miſeries were laid in one ballance, and the leaſt glory of heauen in another, thoſe would be incomparably light, yea (as that diuine Father) that one daies felicity aboue, were worth a thouſand yeeres torment below; what then can be matched with the eternity of ſuch ioyes? Oh how great therefore is this thy goodneſſe, O Lord, which thou haſt laid vp for them that feare thee, and done to them that truſt in thee, before the ſonnes of men!

Chap. XXVIII.

Of our ſecond part of Meditation: which is in the affections.

THe moſt difficult and knotty part of Meditation thus finiſhed, there remaineth that which is both more liuely, and more eaſie vnto a good heart, to be wrought altogether by the affections: which if our diſcourſes reach not vnto, they proue vaine and to no purpoſe. That which followeth therefore, is the very ſoule of Meditation, whereto all that is paſt ſerueth but as an inſtrument. A man is a man by his vnderſtanding part: but he is a Chriſtian by his will and affections. Seeing therefore, that all our former labour of the braine is onely to affect the heart, after that the minde hath thus trauerſed the point propoſed through all the heads of reaſon, it ſhall endeuour to finde in the firſt place ſome feeling touch, and ſweet relliſh in that which it hath thus chewed; which fruit, through the bleſſing of God, will voluntarily follow vpon a ſerious Meditation. Dauid ſaith, Oh taſte, and ſee how ſweet the Lord is. In Meditation we doe both ſee and taſte; but we ſee before we taſte: ſight, is of the vnderſtanding: taſte, taste, of the affection; neither can we see, but we must taste; we cannot know aright, but we must needs be affected. Let the heart therefore first conceiue and feele in it selfe the sweetnesse or bitternesse of the matter meditated: which is neuer done, without some passion; nor expressed, without some hearty exclamation.

Wherein is required a Taſte and reliſh of what we haue thought vpon.

Oh blessed estate of the Saints! O glory not to be expressed, euen by those which are glorified! O incomprehensible saluation! What sauour hath this earth to thee? Who can regard the world, that beleeueth thee? Who can thinke of thee, and not be rauished with wonder and desire? Who can hope for thee, and not reioyce? Who can know thee, and not be swallowed vp with admiration at the mercy of him that bestoweth thee? O blessednesse worthy of Christs bloud to purchase thee! Worthy of the continuall songs of Saints and Angels to celebrate thee! How should I magnifie thee! How should I long for thee? How should I hate all this world for thee!

Chap. XXIX.

Secondly, a Complaint, bewailing our wants and vntowardnesse.

After this Taste shall follow a Complaint, wherein the heart bewaileth to it selfe his owne pouertie, dulnesse, and imperfection; chiding and abasing it selfe in respect of his wants and indisposition: wherein Humiliation truly goeth before glory. For the more we are cast downe in our conceit, the higher shall God lift vs vp at the end of this exercise, in spirituall reioycing.

But alas, where is my loue? Where is my longing? Where art thou, O my soule? What beauinesse hath ouertaken thee? How hath the world bewitched and possessed thee, that thou art become so careless of thine home, so senseless of spirituall delights, so fond vpon these vanities? Doest thou doubt whether there be an heauen? or whether thou haue a God, and a Sauiour there? O farre be from thee this Atheisme; farre be from thee the least thought of this desperate impiety. Woe were thee, if thou beleeuedst not: But, O thou of little Faith, doest thou beleeue there is happinesse, and happinesse for thee, and desirest it not, and delightest not in it? Alas, how weake and vnbeleeuing is thy beleefe! How cold and faint are thy desires? Tell me, what such goodly entertainment hast thou met withall here on earth, that was worthy to with-draw thee from these heauenly ioyes? What pleasure in it euer gaue thee contentment? or what cause of dislike findest thou aboue? Oh no, my soule, it is onely thy miserable drowsinesse, onely thy securitie: The world, the world hath besotted thee, hath vndone thee with carelesnesse. Alas, if thy delight be so cold, what difference is there in thee from an ignorant Heathen, that doubts of another life: yea, from an Epicure, that denies it? Art thou a Christian, or art thou none? If thou bee what thou professest, away with this dull and senseless worldlinesse; away with this earthly vncheerefulnesse; shake off at last this prophane and godlesse securitie, that hath thus long weighed thee downe from mounting vp to thy ioyes. Looke vp to thy God, and to thy Crowne, and say with confidence, O Lord, I haue waited for thy saluation.

Chap. XXX.

Thirdly, an hearty Wish of the soule, for what it complaineth to want.

After this Complaint, must succeed an hearty and passionate Wish of the soule, which ariseth cleerely from the two former degrees: For, that which a man hath found sweet, and comfortable, and complaines that he still wanteth, hee cannot but wish to enioy.

O Lord, that I could wait and long for thy saluation! Oh that I could minde the things aboue; that as I am a stranger indeed, so I could be also in affection! Oh that mine eies, like the eies of thy first Martyr, could by the light of Faith see but a glimpse of heauen! Oh that my heart could be rapt vp thither in desire! How should I trample vpon these poore vanities of the earth! How willingly should I endure all sorrowes, all torments! How scornfully should I passe by all pleasures! How should I be in trauaile of my dissolution! Oh when shall that blessed day come, when all this wretched worldlinesse remoued, I shall solace my selfe in my God? Behold, as the Hart brayeth braieth for the riuers of waters, ſo panteth my ſoule after thee, O God: My ſoule thirſteth for God, euen for the liuing God; Oh when ſhall I come and appeare before the preſence of God?

CHAP. XXXI.

4. An humble Confeſſion of our diſability to effect what we wiſh.

AFter this Wiſhing, ſhall follow humble Confeſſion, by iuſt order of nature: for, hauing bemoaned our want, and wiſhed ſupply, not finding this hope in our ſelues, we muſt needs acknowledge it to him, of whom onely we may both ſeeke and finde; wherein it is to be duly obſerued, how the minde is by turnes depreſſed, and lifted vp: Being lifted vp with our taſte of ioy, it is caſt downe with Complaint: lift vp with Wiſhes, it is caſt downe with Confeſſion; which order doth beſt hold it in vre, and iuſt temper; and maketh it more feeling of the comfort which followeth in the concluſion. This Confeſſion muſt derogate all from our ſelues, and aſcribe all to God.

Thus I deſire, O Lord, to bee aright affected towards thee and thy glory; I deſire to come to thee: but, alas, how weakly? how heartleſly? Thou knoweſt that I can neither come to thee, nor deſire to come, but from thee. It is Nature that holds me from thee; this treacherous Nature fauours it ſelfe, loueth the world, hateth to thinke of a diſſolution, and chuſeth rather to dwell in this dungeon with continuall ſorrow and complaint, than to endure a parting, although to libertie and ioy. Alas, Lord, it is my miſery that I loue my paine. How long ſhall theſe vanities thus beſot me? It is thou onely that canſt turne away mine eies from regarding theſe follies, and my heart from affecting them: thou onely, who as thou ſhalt one day receiue my ſoule into heauen, ſo now before-hand canſt fix my ſoule vpon heauen and thee.

CHAP. XXXII.

5. An earneſt Petition for that which we confeſſe to want.

AFter Confeſſion, naturally followes Petition; earneſtly requeſting that at his hands, which wee acknowledge our ſelues vnable, and none but God able to performe.

O carrie it vp therefore, thou that haſt created and redeemed it, carry it vp to thy glory: Oh let me not alwaies be thus dull and brutiſh; let not theſe ſcales of earthly affection alwaies dim and blinde mine eies: Oh thou that laiedſt clay vpon the blinde mans eies, take away this clay from mine eies, where-with (alas) they are ſo dawbed vp, that they cannot ſee heauen. Illuminate them from aboue, and in thy light let mee ſee light. Oh thou that haſt prepared a place for my ſoule, prepare my ſoule for that place; prepare it with holineſſe, prepare it with deſire: and euen while it ſoiourneth on earth, let it dwell in heauen with thee, beholding euer the beautie of thy face, the glory of thy Saints, and of it ſelfe.

CHAP. XXXIII.

6. A vehement Enforcement of our petition.

AFter Petition ſhall follow the Enforcement of our requeſt, from argument and importunate obſecration; wherein we muſt take heed of complementing in termes with God, as knowing that he will not be mocked by any faſhionable forme of ſuit, but requireth holy and feeling intreaty.

How graciouſly haſt thou proclaimed to the world, that who-euer wants wiſdome, ſhall aske it of thee, which neither denieſt nor vpbraideſt! O Lord, I want heauenly wiſdome, to conceiue aright of heauen; I want it, and aske it of thee; giue me to aske it inſtantly, and giue me according to thy promiſe abundantly. Thou ſeeſt, it is no ſtrange fauour that I begge of thee: no other than that which thou haſt richly beſtowed vpon all thy valiant Martyrs, Confeſſors, Seruants, from the beginning: who neuer could haue ſo cheerefully embraced death and torment, if through the middeſt of their flames and paine they had not ſeene their Crowne of glory. The poore Theefe on the Croſſe had no ſooner craued thy remembrance when thou cameſt to thy King.

Kingdome, than thou promisedst to take him with thee into heauen. Presence was better to him than remembrance. Behold, now thou art in thy Kingdome, I am on earth; remember thine vnworthy seruant, and let my soule in conceit, in affection, in conuersation, be this day and for euer with thee in Paradise. I see, man walketh in a vaine shadow, and disquieteth himselfe in vaine: they are pittifull pleasures he enioyeth, while he forgetteth thee; I am as vaine, make me more wise: Oh let mee see heauen, and I know, I shall neuer enuie, nor follow them. My times are in thine hand: I am no better than my fathers, a stranger on earth. As I speake of them, so the next, yea this generation shall speake of me as one that was. My life is a bubble, a smoake, a shadow, a thought: I know, it is no abiding in this thorow-fare: Oh suffer me not so mad, as while I passe on the way, I should forget the end. It is that other life that I must trust to: With thee it is that I shall continue: Oh let mee not be so foolish, as to settle my selfe on what I must leaue, and to neglect eternitie. I haue seene enough of this earth, and yet I loue it too much. O let me see heauen another while, and loue it so much more than the earth, by how much the things there are more worthy to be loued. Oh God, looke downe on thy wretched Pilgrim; and teach me to looke vp to thee, and to see thy goodnesse in the Land of the liuing. Thou that boughtest heauen for me, guide me thither; and for the price that it cost thee, for thy mercies sake, in spight of all tentations, enlighten thou my soule, direct it, crowne it.

Chap. XXXIV.

7. A cheerefull Confidence of obtaining what we haue requested and enforced.

After this Enforcement, doth follow Confidence; wherein the soule, after many doubtfull and vnquiet bickerings, gathereth vp her forces, and cheerefully rowzeth vp it selfe; and like one of Dauids Worthies, breaketh thorow a whole Armie of doubts, and fetcheth comfort from the Well of life, which, though in some latter, yet in all is a sure reward from God of sincere Meditation.

Yea be thou bold, O my soule, and doe not meerely craue, but challenge this fauour of God, as that which he oweth thee, he oweth it thee, because he hath promised it, and by his mercy hath made his gift, his debt: Faithfull is he that hath promised, which will also doe it. Hath he not giuen thee not onely his hand in the sweet hopes of the Gospell, but his seale also in the Sacraments? Yea, besides prom se, hand, seale, hath he not giuen thee a sure earnest of thy saluation, in some weake, but true graces? Yet more, hath he not giuen thee, besides Earnest, possession? while he that is the Truth and Life, saith, He that beleeueth hath euerlasting life, and hath passed from death to life. Canst thou not then be content to cast thy selfe vpon this blessed issue; If God be mercifull, I am glorious; I haue thee already, Oh my life? God is faithfull, and I doe beleeue: who shall separate me from the loue of Christ? from my glory with Christ? Who shall pull me out of my heauen? Goe to then, and returne to thy rest, O my soule; make vse of that heauen wherein thou art, and be happy.

Thus we haue found, that our Meditation, like the wind, gathereth strength in proceeding; and as naturall bodies, the neerer they come to their places, moue with more celeritie; so doth the soule in this course of Meditation, to the vnspeakable benefit of it selfe.

Chap. XXXV.

The Conclusion of our Meditation, in what order it must be.

First, with Thanksgiuing.

The Conclusion remaineth: wherein we must aduise (like as Physicians doe in their sweats and exercise) that we cease not ouer-suddenly, but leaue off by little and little. The minde may not be suffered to fall head-long from this height, but must also descend by degrees.

The first whereof, after our Confidence, shall bee an heartie Gratulation, and thanksgiuing. For, as man naturally cannot be miserable, but he must complaine, and craue remedie; so the good heart cannot finde it selfe happy, and not be thankfull: and this thankfulnesse which it feeleth and expresseth, maketh it yet more good, and affecteth it more.

What ſhall I then doe to thee for this mercy, O thou Sauiour of men? What ſhould I render to my Lord, for all his benefits? Alas! what can I giue thee, which is not thine owne before? Oh that I could giue thee but all thine! Thou giueſt me to drinke of this cup of ſaluation: I will therefore take the cup of ſaluation, and call vpon the name of the Lord: Praiſe thou the Lord, O my ſoule; and all that is within mee, praiſe his holy name. And ſince here thou beginneſt thine heauen, begin here alſo that ioyfull ſong of thankſgiuing, which there thou ſhalt ſing more ſweetly, and neuer end.

Chap. XXXVI.

Secondly, with Recommendation of our ſoules and waies to God.

After this Thankſgiuing, ſhall follow a faithfull recommendation of our ſelues to God; wherein the ſoule doth cheerefully giue vp it ſelfe, and repoſe it ſelfe wholly vpon her Maker, and Redeemer; committing her ſelfe to him in all her waies, ſubmitting her ſelfe to him in all his waies, deſiring in all things to glorifie him, and to walke worthy of her high and glorious calling.

Both which latter ſhall be done (as I haue euer found) with much life and comfort, if for the full concluſion, we ſhall lift vp our heart and voice to God, in ſinging ſome Verſicle of Dauids diuine Pſalmes, anſwerable to our diſpoſition, and matter; whereby the heart cloſes vp it ſelfe with much ſweetneſſe and contentment.

This courſe of Meditation thus heartily obſerued, let him that practiſeth it, tell mee whether hee finde not that his ſoule, which at the beginning of this exerciſe did but creepe and grouell vpon earth, doe not now in the concluſion ſoare aloft in heauen; and being before aloofe off, doe not now finde it ſelfe neere to God, yea with him and in him.

Chap. XXXVII.

An Epilogue.

THus haue I endeuoured (Right Worſhipfull Sir) according to my ſlender facultie, to preſcribe a method of Meditation: not vpon ſo ſtrict tearmes of neceſſitie, that whoſoeuer goeth not my way, erreth. Diuers paths leade oft times to the ſame end; and euery man aboundeth in his owne ſenſe. If experience and cuſtome hath made another forme familiar to any man, I forbid it not: as that learned Father ſaid of his Tranſlation, Let him vſe his owne, not contemne mine. If any man be to chuſe, and begin, let him practiſe mine, till he meet with a better Maſter: If another courſe may be better, I am ſure this is good. Neither is it to be ſuffered, that like as fantaſticall men, while they doubt what faſhioned ſute they ſhould weare, put on nothing; ſo, that we Chriſtians ſhould neglect the matter of this worthy buſineſſe, while wee nicely ſtand vpon the forme thereof. Wherein giue mee leaue to complaine with iuſt ſorrow and ſhame, that if there be any Chriſtian dutie, whoſe omiſſion is notoriouſly ſhamefull, and preiudiciall to the ſoules of Profeſſors, it is this of Meditation. This is the very end God hath giuen vs our ſoules for: we miſſe-ſpend them, if we vſe them not thus. How lamentable is it, that we ſo imploy them, as if our facultie of diſcourſe ſerued for nothing but our earthly prouiſion? as if our reaſonable and Chriſtian minds were appointed for the ſlaues and drudges of this body, onely to bee the Caters and Cookes of our Appetite?

Reprouing the neglect of Meditation.

The world filleth vs, yea cloieth vs: we finde our ſelues worke enough to thinke; What haue I yet? How may I get more? What muſt I lay out? What ſhall I leaue for poſteritie? How may I preuent the wrong of mine Aduerſary? How may I returne it? What anſwers ſhall I make to ſuch allegations? What entertainment ſhall I giue to ſuch friends! What courſes ſhall I take in ſuch ſuits? In what paſtime ſhall I ſpend this day? In what the next? What aduantage ſhall I reape by this practice, what loſſe? What was ſaid, anſwered, replied, done, followed?

Goodly thoughts, and fit for ſpirituall minds! Say there were no other world; how how could we ſpend our cares otherwiſe? Vnto this onely neglect, let mee aſcribe the commonneſſe of that Laodicean temper of men, or (if that be worſe) of the dead coldneſſe which hath ſtricken the hearts of many, hauing left them nothing but the bodies of men, and viſors of Chriſtians; to this onely, They haue not meditated. It is not more impoſſible to liue without an heart, than to bee deuout without Meditation. Would God therefore my words could be in this (as the Wiſe-man ſaith the words of the wiſe are) like vnto Goades in the ſides of euery Reader, to quicken him vp out of this dull and lazie ſecuritie, to a cheerefull practice of this Diuine Meditation. Let him curſe mee vpon his death-bed, if looking backe from thence to the beſtowing of his former times, hee acknowledge not theſe houres placed the moſt happily in his whole life; if he then wiſh not hee had worne ont more daies in ſo profitable and heauenly a worke.

Exhorting to the vſe of Meditation.

A MEDITATION OF DEATH, ACCORDING to the former Rules.

The Entrance.

AND now, my ſoule, that thou haſt thought of the end, what can fit thee better than to thinke of the way? And though the forepart of the way to Heauen bee a good life, the latter and more immediate is death: ſhall I call it the way, or the gate of life? Sure I am, that by it onely we paſſe into that bleſſedneſſe, whereof we haue ſo thought, that we haue found it cannot be thought of enough.

The Deſcription.

What then is this death, but the taking downe of theſe ſticks, whereof this earthly Tent is compoſed? The ſeparation of two great and old friends till they meet againe? The Gaole-deliuerie of a long priſoner? Our iourney into that other world, for which wee, and this thorow-fare were made? Our paiment of our firſt debt to Nature, the ſleepe of the body, and the awaking of the ſoule?

The Diuiſion.

But leſt thou ſhouldeſt ſeeme to flatter him, whoſe name and face hath euer ſeemed terrible to others, remember that there are more deaths than one: If the firſt death bee not ſo fearefull as hee is made, (his horrour lying more in the conceit of the beholder, than in his owne aſpect) ſurely, the ſecond is not made ſo fearefull as hee is. No liuing eye can behold the terrours thereof: it is as impoſſible to ſee them, as to feele them, and liue. Nothing but a name is common to both: The firſt hath men, caſualties, diſeaſes, for his executioners: the ſecond, Deuils. The power of the firſt is in the graue: the ſecond, in hell. The worſt of the firſt, is ſenſleſneſſe; the eaſieſt of the ſecond, is, a perpetuall ſenſe of all the paine that can make a man exquiſitely miſerable.

The Cauſes.

Thou ſhalt haue no buſineſſe, O my ſoule, with the ſecond death: Thy firſt Reſurrection hath ſecured thee: Thanke him that hath redeemed thee, for thy ſafetie. And how can I thanke thee enough, O my Sauiour, which haſt ſo mercifully bought off my torment, with thy owne; and haſt drunke off that bitter potion of thy Fathers wrath, whereof the very taſte had beene our death? Yea, ſuch is thy mercie, O thou Redeemer of men, that thou haſt not onely ſubdued the ſecond death, but reconciled the firſt; ſo as thy children taſte not at all of the ſecond, and finde the firſt ſo ſweetned to them by thee, that they complaine of bitterneſſe. It was not thou, O God, that madeſt death; our hands are they that were guiltie of this euill. Thou ſaweſt all thy worke that it was good; we brought forth ſinne, and ſinne brought forth death. To the diſcharge of thy Iuſtice and Mercie, we acknowledge this miſerable conception; and needs muſt that childe be vgly, that hath ſuch parents. Certainly, if Being and Good be (as they are) of an equall extent, then the diſſolution of our Being muſt needs in it ſelfe be euill. How ful of darkeneſſe and horrour then is the priuation of this vitall light? eſpecially ſince thy wiſdome intended it to the reuenge of ſinne, which is no leſſe than the violation of an infinite Iuſtice? it was thy iuſt pleaſure to plague vs with this brood of our owne begetting: Behold, that death which was not till then in the world, is now in euery thing: one great Conqueror findes it in a Slate, another findes it in a Flie; one findes it in the kernel of a Grape, another in the pricke of a thorne; one in the taſte of an herbe, another in the

ſmell of a flower; one in a bit of meat, another in a mouthfull of aire; one in the very ſight of a danger, another in the conceit of what might haue beene: Nothing in all our life is too little to hide death vnder it: There need no cords, nor kniues, nor ſwords, nor Peeces: we haue made our ſelues as many waies to death, as there are helps of liuing.

But if we were the authors of our death, it was thou that didſt alter it: our diſobedience made it, and thy mercie made it not to be euill. It had beene all one to thee, to haue taken away the very Being of death from thine owne: but thou thoughteſt it beſt to take away the ſting of it onely, as good Phyſicians, when they would apply their Leeches, ſcowre them with Salt and Nettles, and when their corrupt bloud is voided, imploy them to the health of the patient. It is more glory to thee, that thou haſt remoued enmitie from this Eſau, that now he meets vs with kiſſes in ſtead of frownes: and if wee receiue a blow from this rough hand, yet that very ſtripe is healing. Oh how much more powerfull is thy death, than our ſinne! O my Sauiour, how haſt thou perfumed and ſoftened this bed of my graue by dying? How can it grieue mee to tread in thy ſteps to glory?

Our ſinne made death our laſt enemie; thy goodneſſe hath made it the firſt friend that we meet with, in our paſſage to another world: For as thee that receiues vs from the knees of our mother, in our firſt entrance to the light, waſheth, cleanſeth, dreſſeth vs, and preſents vs to the breſt of our nurſe, or the armes of our mother, challenges ſome intereſt in vs when we come to our growth; ſo death, which in our paſſage to that other life, is the firſt that receiues and preſents our naked ſoules to the hands of thoſe Angels, which carry it vp to her glorie, cannot but thinke this office friendly and meritorious. What if this guide leade my carcaſe through corruption and rottenneſſe, when my ſoule in the very inſtant of her ſeparation knowes it ſelfe happy? What if my friends mourne about my bed and coffin, when my ſoule ſees the ſmiling face and louing embracements of him that was dead, and is aliue? What care I, who ſhuts theſe earthen eyes, when death opens the eye of my ſoule, to ſee as I am ſeene? What if my name be forgotten of men, when I liue aboue with the God of Spirits? The Effects.

If death would be ſtill an enemie, it is the worſt part of mee that he hath any thing to doe withall: the beſt is aboue his reach, and gaines more than the other can leeſe. The worſt peece of the horrour of death is the graue; and ſet aſide infidelitie, what ſo great miſerie is this? That part which is corrupted, feeles it not; that which is free from corruption, feeles an abundant recompence, and foreſees a ioyfull reparation. What is here but a iuſt reſtitution? We carry heauen and earth wrapt vp in our boſomes; each part returnes homeward: And if the exceeding glory of heauen cannot counteruaile the doleſomneſſe of the graue, what doe I beleeuing? But if the beautie of that celeſtiall Sanctuarie doe more than equalize the horrour of the bottomleſſe pit, how can I ſhrinke at earth like my ſelfe, when I know my glorie? And if examples can moue thee any whit, looke behinde thee, O my ſoule, and ſee which of the Worthies of that ancient latter world, which of the Patriarchs, Kings, Prophets, Apoſtles, haue not trod in theſe red ſteps. Where are thoſe millions of generations, which haue hitherto peopled the earth? How many paſſing-bels haſt thou heard for they knowne friends? How many ſicke beds haſt thou viſited? How many eies haſt thou ſeene cloſed? How many vaine men haſt thou ſeene that haue gone into the field to ſeeke death, in hope to finde an honour as fooliſh as themſelues? How many poore creatures haſt thou mulcted with death for thine owne pleaſure? And canſt thou hope that that God will make a by-way and a Poſterne for thee alone, that thou maieſt paſſe to the next world, not by the gates of death, not by the bottome of the graue? The Subiect.

What then doeſt thou feare, O my ſoule? There are but two ſtages of death, the bed and the graue: This latter, if it haue ſenſleſneſſe, yet it hath reſt: The former, if it haue paine, yet it hath ſpeedineſſe; and when it lights vpon a faithfull heart, meets with many and ſtrong antidotes of comfort. The euill that is euer in motion, is not fearefull: That which both time and eternitie finde ſtanding where it was, is worthy of terrour. Well may thoſe tremble at death, which finde more diſtreſſe within, than without, whoſe The Adiunct.

whose consciences are more sicke, and neerer to death, than their bodies. It was thy Fathers wrath that did so terrifie thy soule, O my Sauiour, that it put thy body into a bloudy sweat. The mention and thought of thy death ended in a Psalme, but this began in an agonie. Then didst thou sweat out my feares. The power of that agonie doth more comfort all thine, than the Angels could comfort thee. That very voice deserued an eternall separation of horrour from death, where thou saidst, My God, my God, why hast thou forsaken me? Thou hadst not complained of being left, if thou wouldest haue any of thine left destitute of comfort in their parting. I know not whom I can feare, while I know whom I haue beleeued; how can I be discouraged with the sight of my losse, when I see so cleere an aduantage?

The Contrary.

What discomfort is this, to leaue a fraile body, to bee ioyned vnto a glorious head? To forsake vaine pleasures, false honours, bootlesse hopes, vnsatisfying wealth, stormie contentments, sinfull men, perillous tentations, a sea of troubles, a gallie of seruitude, an euill world, and a consuming life; for Freedome, Rest, Happinesse, Eternitie? And if thou wert sentenced, O my soule, to liue a thousand yeeres in this body, with these infirmities, how wouldest thou be wearie, not of being only, but of complaining? Whiles, ere the first hundred, I should bee a childe; ere the second, a beast; a stone, ere the third; and therefore should be so farre from finding pleasure in my continuance, that I should not haue sense enough left, to feele my selfe miserable. And when I am once gone, what difference is there betwixt the aged'st of the first Patriarchs, and mee, and the childe that did but liue to be borne, saue onely in what was; and that which was, is not? And if this body had no weakenesse, to make my life tedious, yet what a torment is it, that while I liue, I must sinne? Alas, my soule, euery one of thy knowne sinnes, is not a disease, but a death. What an enemie art thou to thy selfe, if thou canst not be content, that one bodily death should excuse thee from many spirituall; to cast off thy body, that thou maiest be stripped of the ragges, yea the fetters of thy sinne, and cloathed with the Robes of glorie? Yet these termes are too hard: Thou shalt not bee cast off, O my body; rather thou shalt be put to making: this change is no lesse happy for thee, than for thy partner. This very skinne of thine, which is now tawnie, and wrinkled, shall once shine; this earth shall bee heauen, this dust shall bee glorious. These eyes, that are now wearie of being witnesses of thy sinnes and miseries, shall then neuer be wearie of seeing the beautie of thy Sauiour, and thine owne in his. These eares, that haue beene now tormented with the impious tongues of men, shall first heare the voice of the Sonne of God, and then the voices of Saints and Angels in their songs of Alleluia. And this tongue, that now complaines of miseries, and feares, shall then beare a part in that diuine harmonie.

The comparisons.

In the meane time, thou shalt but sleepe in this bed of earth: hee that hath tried the worst of death, hath called it no worse; very Heathens haue termed them cousins; and it is no vnusuall thing for cousins of bloud, to carrie both the same names, and features. Hast thou wont, O my body, when the day hath wearied thee, to lie downe vnwillingly to thy rest? Behold in this sleepe there is more quietnesse, more pleasure of visions, more certaintie of waking, more cheerefulnesse in rising: why then art thou loth to thinke of laying off thy ragges, and reposing thy selfe? Why art thou like a childe, vnwilling to goe to bed? Hast thou euer seene any bird, which when the cage hath beene opened, would rather sit still, and sing within her grates, than flie forth vnto her freedome in the woods? Hast thou euer seene any prisoner, in loue with his bolts and fetters? Did the Chiefe of the Apostles, when the Angell of God shined in his Iayle, and strooke him on the side, and loosed his two chaines, and bade him, Arise quickly, and opened both the woodden, and Iron gate, say, What, so soone? yet, a little sleepe? What madnesse had it beene, rather to slumber betwixt his two Keepers, than to follow the Angell of God into libertie? Hast thou euer seene any Mariner that hath saluted the sea with songs, and the Hauen with teares? What shall I say to this diffidence, O my soule, that thou art vnwilling to thinke of rest after thy toile, of freedome after thy durance, of the Hauen after an vnquiet and tempestuous passage? How many are there that seeke death, death, and cannot finde it? meerely out of the irkſomeneſſe of life. Hath it found thee, and offered thee better conditions, not of immunitie from euils, but of poſſeſſion of more good, than thou canſt thinke, and wouldeſt thou now flie from happineſſe, to be rid of it?

The Names.

What? Is it a name that troubles thee? what if men would call ſleepe death, wouldſt thou be afraid to cloſe thine eies? what hurt is it then, if he that ſent the firſt ſleepe vpon man, whileſt hee made him an helper, ſend this laſt and ſoundeſt ſleepe vpon mee, whiles he prepares my ſoule for a glorious Spouſe to himſelfe? It is but a parting, which we call death; as two friends, when they haue lead each other on the way, ſhake hands till they returne from their iourney: If either could miſcarry, there were cauſe of ſorrow; now they are more ſure of a meeting, than of a parture; what folly is it, not to be content to redeeme the vnſpeakable gaine of ſo deare a friend, with a little intermiſſion of enioying him? He will returne laden with the riches of heauen, and will fetch his old partner to the participation of this glorious wealth. Goe then, my Soule, to this ſure and gainefull traffique, and leaue my other halfe in an harbour as ſafe, though not ſo bleſſed; yet ſo ſhalt thou be ſeparated, that my very duſt ſhall be vnited to thee ſtill, and to my Sauiour in thee.

The Teſtimonies.

Wert thou vnwilling at the command of thy Creator to ioine thy ſelfe at the firſt with this body of mine: why art thou then loth to part with that, which thou haſt found, though intire, yet troubleſome? Doeſt thou not heare Salomon ſay, The day of death is better than the day of thy birth? doſt thou not beleeue him? or art thou in loue with the worſe, and diſpleaſed with the better? If any man could haue found a life worthy to be preferred vnto death, ſo great a King muſt needs haue done it; now in his very Throne, he commends his Coffin. Yea, what wilt thou ſay to thoſe Heathens, that mourned at the birth, and feaſted at the death of their children? They knew the miſeries of liuing as well as thou, the happineſſe of dying they could not know; and if they reioiced out of a conceit of ceaſing to be miſerable; how ſhouldeſt thou cheere thy ſelfe in an expectation, yea an aſſurance of being happy? He that is the Lord of life, and tried what it was to die, hath proclaimed them bleſſed that die in the Lord. Thoſe are bleſſed, I know, that liue in him, but they reſt not from their labours; Toyle and ſorrow is betweene them, and a perfect enioying of that bleſſedneſſe, which they now poſſeſſe onely in hope and inchoation; when death hath added reſt, their happineſſe is finiſhed.

The taſte of our Meditation.

O death, how ſweet is that reſt, wherewith thou refreſheſt the weary Pilgrims of this vale of mortalitie? How pleaſant is thy face to thoſe eies, that haue acquainted themſelues with the ſight of it, which to ſtrangers is grim, and gaſtly? How worthy art thou to be welcome vnto thoſe that know whence thou art, and whither thou tendeſt? who that knowes thee, can feare thee? who that is not all nature, would rather hide himſelfe amongſt the baggage of this vile life, than follow thee to a Crowne? what indifferent iudge that ſhould ſee life painted ouer, with vaine ſemblances of pleaſures, attended with troupes of ſorrowes on the one ſide, and on the other with vncertaintie of continuance, and certaintie of diſſolution; and then ſhould turne his eyes vnto death, and ſee her blacke, but comely, attended on the one hand with a momentanie paine, with eternitie of glorie on the other, would not ſay, out of choice, that which the Prophet ſaid out of paſſion, It is better for me to die than to liue?

The Complaint.

But, O my Soule, what ailes thee to bee thus ſuddenly backward, and fearefull? No heart hath more freely diſcourſed of death, in ſpeculation; no tongue hath more extolled it in abſence. And now, that it is come to thy beds-ſide, and hath drawne thy curtaines, and takes thee by the hand, and offers thee ſeruice, thou ſhrinkeſt inward, and by the paleneſſe of thy face, and wildneſſe of thine eye, bewraieſt an amazement at the preſence of ſuch a gheſt. That face, which was ſo familiar to thy thoughts, is now vnwelcome to thine eies; I am aſhamed of this weake irreſolution. Whitherto haue tended all thy ſerious meditations? what hath Chriſtianitie done to thee, if thy feares bee ſtill heatheniſh? Is this thine imitation of ſo many worthy Saints of God, whom thou haſt ſeene entertaine the violenteſt deaths with ſmiles and ſongs? Is this the fruit of thy long long and frequent inſtruction: Did'ſt thou thinke death would haue beene content with words? didſt thou hope it would ſuffice thee to talke, while all other ſuffer? Where is thy faith? Yea, where art thou thy ſelfe, O my ſoule? Is heauen worthy of no more thankes, no more ioy? Shall Heretikes, ſhall Pagans giue death a better welcome than thou? Hath thy Maker, thy Redemer ſent for thee, and art thou loth to goe? hath hee ſent for thee, to put thee in poſſeſſion of that glorious Inheritance, which thy wardſhip hath cheerefully expected, and art thou loth to goe? Hath God with this Sergeant of his, ſent his Angels to fetch thee, and art thou loth to goe? Rouze vp thy ſelfe for ſhame, O my ſoule: and if euer thou haſt truly beleeued, ſhake off this vnchriſtian diffidence, and addreſſe thy ſelfe ioyfully for thy glory.

The Wiſh. Yea, O my Lord, it is thou, that muſt raiſe vp this faint and drooping heart of mine; thou onely canſt rid me of this weake and cowardly diſtruſt; Thou that ſendeſt for my ſoule, canſt prepare it for thy ſelfe; thou onely canſt make thy meſſenger welcome to me. O that I could but ſee thy face through death! Oh that I could ſee death, not as it was, but as thou haſt made it! Oh that I could heartily pledge thee, my Sauiour, in this cup, that ſo I might drinke new wine with thee, in thy Fathers Kingdome!

The Confeſſion. But alas, O my God, nature is ſtrong and weake in mee, at once: I cannot wiſh to welcome death, as it is worthy; when I looke for moſt courage, I finde ſtrongeſt temptations: I ſee and confeſſe, that when I am my ſelfe, thou haſt no ſuch coward as I: Let me alone, and I ſhall ſhame that name of thine, which I haue profeſſed: euery ſecure worldling ſhall laugh at my feebleneſſe. O God, were thy Martyrs thus haled to their ſtakes? might they not haue beene looſed from their rackes, and choſe to die in thoſe torments? Let it be no ſhame for thy ſeruant, to take vp that complaint which thou mad'ſt of thy better Attendants; The ſpirit is willing, but the fleſh is weake.

The Petition and enforcement. O thou God of ſpirits, that haſt coupled theſe two together, vnite them in a deſire of their diſſolution; weaken this fleſh to receiue, and encourage this ſpirit either to deſire, or to contemne death; and now, as I grow neerer to my home, let me increaſe in the ſenſe of my ioyes: I am thine, ſaue me, O Lord; It was thou that didſt put ſuch courage into thine ancient, and late witneſſes, that they either inuited, or challenged death; and held their perſecutors their beſt friends, for letting them looſe from theſe gieues of fleſh. I know, thine hand is not ſhortned; neither any of them hath receiued more prooſes of thy former mercies; Oh let thy goodneſſe inable me to reach them in the comfortable ſteddineſſe of my paſſage: Doe but draw this vaile a little, that I may ſee my glory, and I cannot but be inflamed with the deſire of it: It was not I, that either made this body for the earth, or this ſoule for my body, or this heauen for my ſoule, or this glorie of heauen, or this entrance into glory: All is thine owne worke; Oh perfect what thou haſt begun, that thy praiſe, and my happineſſe may be conſummate at once.

The aſſurance, or Confidence. Yea, O my ſoule, what need'ſt thou wiſh the God of mercies to be tender of his owne honour? Art thou not a member of that body, whereof thy Sauiour is the Head? canſt thou drowne, when thy Head is aboue? was it not for thee, that hee triumpht ouer death? Is there any feare in a foyled aduerſarie? Oh my Redeemer, I haue already ouercome in thee: how can I miſcarrie in my ſelfe? O my ſoule, thou haſt marched valiantly! Behold, the Damoſels of that heauenly Ieruſalem come forth with Timbrels and Harps to meet thee, and to applaud thy ſucceſſe: And now, there remaines nothing for thee, but a Crowne of righteouſneſſe, which that righteous Iudge ſhall giue thee, at that Day: Oh Death, where is thy ſting? Oh graue, where is thy victorie?

The Thankſgiuing. Returne now vnto thy reſt, O my ſoule; for the Lord hath beene beneficiall vnto thee. O Lord God, the ſtrength of my ſaluation, thou haſt couered my head in the day of battell: O my God, and King, I will extoll thee, and will bleſſe thy name for euer, and euer. I will bleſſe thee daily, and praiſe thy Name for euer and euer. Great is the Lord, and moſt worthy to be praiſed, and his greatneſſe is incomprehenſible: I will meditate of the beautie of thy glorious Maieſtie, and thy wonderfull workes: Hoſanna, thou that dwelleſt in the higheſt heauens. Amen.

HOLY OBSERVATIONS.

Lib. I.

By Ios. Hall.

London,
Printed for Thomas Pavier, Miles Flesher and John Haviland. 1624.

TO THE RIGHT HONOVRABLE, EDWARD LORD DENNY, BARON OF WALTHAM, MY most bountifull Patron; Grace and Peace.

RIGHT HONOVRABLE,

THis aduantage a Scholar hath aboue others, that hee cannot be idle, and that he can worke without instruments. For, the minde inured to contemplation, will set it selfe on worke, when other occasions faile: and hath no more power not to studie, than the eye which is open, hath, not to see some thing; in which businesse it carries about his owne Librarie, neither can complaine to want Bookes while it enioyeth it selfe.

I could not then neglect the commoditie of this plentifull leasure in my so easie attendance here; but (though besides my course, and ~~without the helpe of others writings~~) must needs busie my selfe in such thoughts as I haue euer giuen account of, to your Lordship: such as I hope shall not be vnprofitable, nor vnwelcome to their Patron, to their Readers. I send them forth from hence, vnder your Honourable name; to shew you that no absence, no imployment can make mee forget my due respect to your Lordship: to whom (next vnder my gracious Master) I haue deseruedly bequeathed my selfe and my endeuours. Your goodnesse hath not wont to magnisie it selfe more in giuing, than in receiuing such like holy presents: the knowledge whereof hath intitled you to more labours of this nature (if I haue numbred aright) than any of your Peeres. I misdoubt not either your acceptation, or their vse. That God, who hath aboue all his other fauours giuen your Lordship, euen in these careless times, an heart truly religious, giue you an happy increase of all his heauenly graces by my vnworthy seruice. To his gracious care I daily commend your Lordship with my Honourable Lady; wishing you both, all that little ioy earth can affoord you, and fulnesse of glory aboue.

Non-such. July 3.

Your Lordships

Most humbly deuoted for euer in all dutie and obseruance,

IOS. HALL.

HOLY OBSERVATIONS.

1

AS there is nothing sooner drie than a teare; so there is nothing sooner out of season than worldly sorrow: which if it bee fresh and full bleeding, findes some to comfort and pittie it; if stale and stanned over with time, is rather entertained with smiles, than commiseration: But the sorrow of repentance comes never out of time. All times are alike vnto that Eternitie, whereto wee make our spirituall mones: That which is past, that which is future, are both present with him. It is neither weake nor vncomely, for an old man to weepe for the sinnes of his youth. Those teares can never be shed either too soone, or too late.

Some men liue to bee their owne executors for their good name; which they see (not honestly) buried, before themselues die. Some other of great place, and ill desert, part with their good name and breath, at once. There is scarce a victorious man, whose name is not rotten before his carcasse. Contrarily, the good mans name is oft times heire to his life; either borne after the death of the parent, for that enuie would not suffer it to come forth before: or perhaps so well growne vp in his life time, that the hope thereof is the staffe of his age, and ioy of his death. A wicked mans name may be feared a while; soone after, it is either forgotten or cursed: The good man either sleepeth with his body in peace, or waketh (as his soule) in glory.

Oft times those which shew much valour while there is equall possibilitie of life, when they see a present necessitie of death, are found most shamefully timorous. Their courage was before grounded vpon hope: that, cut off, leaues them at once desperate and cowardly: whereas men of feebler spirits meet more cheerefully with death; because though their courage be lesse, yet their expectation was more.

I haue seldome seene the sonne of an excellent and famous man, excellent: But that an ill bird hath an ill egge, is not rare; children possessing as the bodily diseases, so the vices of their Parents. Vertue is not propagated: Vice is; euen in them which haue it not reigning in themselues. The graine is sowne pure, but comes vp with chaffe and huske. Hast thou a good sonne? He is Gods, not thine. Is he euill? Nothing but his sinne is thine. Helpe by thy praiers and endeuours to take away that which thou hast giuen him, and to obtaine from God that which thou hast, and canst not giue: Else thou maiest name him a possession; but thou shalt finde him a losse.

Theſe things be comely and pleaſant to ſee, and worthy of honour from the beholder: A young Saint, an old Martyr, a religious Souldier, a conſcionable Stateſman, a great man courteous, a learned man humble, a ſilent woman, a childe vnderſtanding the eie of his Parent, a merry companion without vanitie, a friend not changed with honour, a ſicke man cheerefull, a ſoule departing with comfort and aſſurance.

I haue oft obſerued in merry meetings ſolemnly made, that ſomewhat hath falne out croſſe, either in the time, or immediatly vpon it; to ſeaſon (as I thinke) our immoderation in deſiring or enioying our friends: and againe, euents ſuſpected, haue proued euer beſt; God herein bleſſing our awfull ſubmiſſion with good ſucceſſe. In all theſe humane things, indifferencie is ſafe. Let thy doubts be euer equall to thy deſires: ſo thy diſappointment ſhall not bee grieuous, becauſe thy expectation was not peremptorie.

You ſhall rarely finde a man eminent in ſundry faculties of minde, or ſundry manuarie trades. If his memorie be excellent, his fantaſie is but dull: if his fancie bee buſie and quicke, his iudgement is but ſhallow: If his iudgement bee deepe, his vtterance is harſh: which alſo holds no leſſe in the actiuities of the hand. And if it happen that one man be qualified with skill of diuers trades, and practiſe this varietie, you ſhall ſeldome finde ſuch one thriuing in his eſtate: with ſpirituall gifts it is otherwiſe; which are ſo chained together, that who excels in one, hath ſome eminencie in more, yea, in all. Looke vpon faith: ſhee is attended with a Beuie of Graces: Hee that beleeues, cannot but haue hope: if hope, patience. Hee that beleeues and hopes, muſt needs finde ioy in God: if ioy, loue of God; hee that loues God, cannot but loue his brother: his loue to God, breeds pietie and care to pleaſe, ſorrow for offending, feare to offend: his loue to men, fidelitie and Chriſtian beneficence. Vices are ſeldome ſingle; but vertues goe euer in troupes: they goe ſo thicke, that ſometimes ſome are hid in the crowd; which yet are, but appeare not. They may bee ſhut out from ſight; they cannot be ſeuered.

The Heauen euer moues, and yet is the place of our reſt: Earth euer reſts, and yet is the place of our trouble. Outward motion can be no enemie to inward reſt; as outward reſt may well ſtand with inward vnquietneſſe.

None liue ſo ill, but they content themſelues in ſomewhat: Euen the begger likes the ſmell of his diſh. It is a rare euill that hath not ſomething to ſweeten it, either in ſenſe, or in hope: Otherwiſe men would grow deſperate, mutinous, enuious of others, weary of themſelues. The better that thing is wherein we place our comfort, the happier wee liue: and the more we loue good things, the better they are to vs. The worldlings comfort, though it be good to him becauſe hee loues it; yet becauſe it is not abſolutely and eternally good, it failes him: wherein the Chriſtian hath iuſt aduantage of him, while he hath all the ſame cauſes of ioy refined and exalted; beſides, more and higher, which the other knowes not of: the worldling laughs more, but the Chriſtian is more delighted. Theſe two are eaſily ſeuered. Thou ſeeſt a goodly picture, or an heape of thy gold: thou laugheſt not, yet thy delight is more than in a ieſt that ſhaketh thy ſpleene. As griefe, ſo ioy is not leſſe when it is leaſt expreſſed.

10

I haue ſeene the worſt natures, and moſt depraued minds, not affecting all ſinnes: but ſtill

still some they haue condemned in others, and abhorred in themselues. One exclaimes on couetousnesse, yet he can too well abide riotous good fellowship. Another inueighs against drunkennesse and excesse, not caring how cruell hee bee in vsurie and oppression. One cannot endure a rough and quarrelous disposition, yet giues himselfe ouer to vncleane and lasciuious courses. Another hates all wrongs, saue wrong to God. One is a ciuill Atheist, another a religious Vsurer, a third an honest Drunkard, a fourth an vnchaste Iusticer, a fift a chaste Quarreller. I know not whether euery Deuill excell in all sinnes: I am sure, some of them haue denomination from some sinnes more speciall. Let no man applaud himselfe for those sinnes he wanteth, but condemne himselfe rather for that sinne he hath. Thou censurest another mans sinne, hee thine; God curseth both.

11

Gold is the heauiest of all metals: It is no wonder that the rich man is vsually carried downeward to his place. It is hard for the soule, clogged with many weights, to ascend to heauen: It must be a strong and nimble soule, that can carrie vp it selfe, and such a load; yet Adam and Noah flew vp thither with the double Monarchie of the world, the Patriarkes with much wealth, many holy Kings with massie Crownes and Scepters. The burden of couetous desires is more heauie to an emptie soule, than much treasure to the full. Our affections giue poize or lightnesse to earthly things. Either abate of thy load, if thou finde it too pressing, whether by hauing lesse, or louing lesse: or adde to thy strength and actiuitie, that thou maiest yet ascend. It is more commendable, by how much more hard, to climbe into heauen with a burden.

12

A Christian in all his waies must haue three guides: Truth, Charitie, Wisdome: Truth to goe before him; Charitie and Wisdome on either hand. If any of the three bee absent, he walkes amisse. I haue seene some doe hurt by following a truth vncharitably. And others, while they would saluе vp an errour with loue, haue failed in their wisdome, and offended against iustice. A charitable vntruth, and an vncharitable truth, and an vnwise menaging of truth or loue, are all to be carefully auoided of him, that would goe with a right foot in the narrow way.

13

God brought man forth at first, not into a wildernesse, but a Garden; yet then hee expected the best seruice of him. I neuer finde that hee delights in the miserie, but in the prosperitie of his seruants. Cheerefulnesse pleases him better than a deiected and dull heauinesse of heart. If wee can be good with pleasure, hee grudgeth not our ioy: If not, it is best to stint our selues? not for that these comforts are not good, but because our hearts are euill: faulting not their nature, but our vse and corruption.

14

The homeliest seruice that we doe in an honest calling, though it be but to plow, or digge, if done in obedience, and conscience of Gods commandement, is crowned with an ample reward; whereas the best workes for their kinde (preaching, praying, offering Euangelicall sacrifices) if without respect of Gods iniunction and glory, are loaded with curses. God loueth aduerbs; and cares not how good, but how well.

The golden infancie of some hath proceeded to a brazen youth, and ended in a leaden age. All humane maturities haue their period: onely grace hath none. I durst neuer lay too much hope on the forward beginnings of wit and memorie, which haue been applauded in children. I knew, they could but attaine their vigor; and that if sooner, no whit the better: for the earlier is their perfection of wisdome, the longer shall be their witleſſe age. Seaſonableneſſe is the beſt in all theſe things which haue their ripeneſſe and decay. We can neuer hope too much of the timely bloſſomes of grace, whoſe ſpring is perpetuall, and whoſe harueſt begins with our end.

A man muſt giue thanks for ſomewhat which he may not pray for. It hath beene ſaid of Courtiers, that they muſt receiue iniuries, and giue thanks. God cannot wrong his, but he will croſſe them; thoſe croſſes are beneficiall; all benefits challenge thanks: yet I haue read, that Gods children haue with condition prayed againſt them, neuer for them. In good things, wee pray both for them, and their good vſe: in euill, for their good vſe, not themſelues; yet we muſt giue thanks for both. For there is no euill of paine which God doth not; nothing that God doth, is not good; no good thing but is worthy of thanks.

17

One halfe of the world knowes not how the other liues: and therefore the better ſort pittie not the diſtreſſed; and the miſerable enuie not thoſe which fare better, becauſe they know it not. Each man iudges of others conditions, by his owne. The worſt ſort would bee too much diſcontented, if they ſaw how farre more pleaſant the life of others is. And if the better ſort (ſuch we call thoſe which are greater) could looke downe to the infinite miſeries of inferiours, it would make them either miſerable in compaſſion, or proud in conceit. It is good, ſometimes, for the delicate rich man to looke into the poore mans Cupbord: and ſeeing God in mercie giues him not to know their ſorrow by experience, to know it yet in ſpeculation: This ſhall teach him more thanks to God, more mercie to men, more contentment in himſelfe.

18

Such as a mans praier is for another, it ſhall be in time of his extremitie for himſelfe: for though he loue himſelfe more than others, yet his apprehenſion of God is alike for both. Such as his praier is in a former extremitie, it ſhall be alſo in death: this way we, may haue experience euen of a thing future: If God haue beene farre off from thee in a fit of thine ordinarie ſickneſſe, feare leſt he will not be neerer thee in thy laſt: what differs that from this, but in time? Correct thy dulneſſe vpon former proofes; or elſe at laſt thy deuotion ſhall want life before thy body.

19

Thoſe that come to their meat as to a medicine (as Auguſtine reports of himſelfe) liue in an auſtere and Chriſtian temper, and ſhall bee ſure not to ioy too much in the creature, nor to abuſe themſelues: Thoſe that come to their medicine as to meat, ſhall be ſure to liue miſerably, and die ſoone. To come to meat, if without a gluttonous appetite and palate, is allowed to Chriſtians: To come to meat as to a ſacrifice vnto the belly, is a moſt baſe and brutiſh idolatrie.

20

The worſt that euer were, euen Cain and Iudas, haue had ſome Fautors that haue honoured them for Saints: and the Serpent that beguiled our firſt Parents, hath in that name had diuine honour and thanks. Neuer any man trod ſo perillous and deepe ſteps, but ſome haue followed, and admired him. Each maſter of Hereſie hath found ſome clients; euen hee, that taught all mens opinions were true. Againe, no man hath beene ſo exquiſite, but ſome haue detracted from him, euen in thoſe qualities, which haue ſeemed moſt worthy of wonder to others. A man ſhall bee ſure to be backed by ſome, either in good or euill, and by ſome ſhouldred in both. It is good for a man not to ſtand vpon his Abbetters, but his quarrell, and not to depend vpon others, but himſelfe.

21

We ſee thouſands of creatures die for our vſe, and neuer doe ſo much as pittie them: why doe we thinke much to die once for God? They are not ours ſo much as we are his; nor our pleaſure ſo much to vs, as his glory to him: their liues are loſt to vs, ours but changed to him.

22

Much ornament is no good ſigne: painting of the face argues an ill complexion of body, a worſe minde. Truth hath a face both honeſt and comely, and lookes beſt in her owne colours: but, aboue all, Diuine Truth is moſt faire, and moſt ſcorneth to borrow beautie of mans wit or tongue: ſhee loueth to come forth in her natiue grace, like a princely Matrone; and counts it the greateſt indignitie, to bee dallied with as a wanton Strumpet: ſhe lookes to command reuerence, not pleaſure: ſhe would bee kneeled to, not laughed at. To pranke her vp in vaine dreſſes and faſhions, or to ſport with her in a light and youthfull manner, is moſt abhorring from her nature: they know her not, that giue her ſuch entertainment; and ſhall firſt know her angry, when they doe know her. Againe, ſhe would be plaine, but not baſe, not ſluttiſh: ſhe would be clad, not garithly, yet not in ragges: ſhe likes as little to be ſet out by a baſe foile, as to ſeeme credited with gay colours. It is no ſmall wiſdome to know her iuſt guiſe, but more to follow it; and ſo to keepe the meane, that while we pleaſe her, we diſcontent not the beholders.

23

In worldly carriage, ſo much is a man made of, as he takes vpon himſelfe: but ſuch is Gods bleſſing vpon true humilitie, that it ſtill procureth reuerence. I neuer ſaw Chriſtian leſſe honoured for a wiſe neglect of himſelfe. If our deiection proceed from the conſcience of our want, it is poſſible we ſhould be as little eſteemed of others, as of our ſelues: but if we haue true graces, and prize them not at the higheſt, others ſhall value both them in vs, and vs for them, and with vſury giue vs that honour we with-held modeſtly from our ſelues.

24

He that takes his full libertie in what he may, ſhall repent him: how much more in what he ſhould not? I neuer read of Chriſtian that repented him of too little worldly delight. The ſureſt courſe I haue ſtill found in all earthly pleaſures, to riſe with an appetite, and to be ſatisfied with a little.

25

There is a time when Kings goe not forth to warfare: our ſpirituall warre admits no intermiſſion: it knowes no night, no winter, abides no peace, no truce. This calls vs not into garriſon, where we may haue eaſe and reſpit, but into pitched fields continually: we ſee our enemies in the face alwaies, and are alwaies ſeene and aſſaulted; euer reſiſting, euer defending, receiuing and returning blowes. If either wee be negligent or weary, we die: what other hope is there while one fights, and the other ſtands ſtill? We can neuer haue ſafetie and peace, but in victory. There muſt our reſiſtance be couragious and conſtant, where both yeelding is death, and all treaties of peace mortall.

26

Neutralitie in things good or euill, is both odious, and preiudiciall; but in matters of an indifferent nature is ſafe and commendable. Herein taking of parts maketh ſides, and breaketh vnitie. In an vniuſt cauſe of ſeparation, he that fauoureth both parts may (perhaps) haue leaſt loue of either ſide, but hath moſt charitie in himſelfe.

27

Nothing is more abſurd than that Epicurean reſolution, Let vs eat and drinke, to morrow row we ſhall die: As if we were made onely for the paunch, and liued that we might liue: yet there was neuer any naturall man found ſauour in that meat which he knew ſhould be his laſt: whereas they ſhould ſay, Let vs faſt and pray, to morrow we ſhall die: for, to what purpoſe is the bodie ſtrengthned, that it may periſh? Whoſe greater ſtrength makes our death more violent. No man beſtowes a coſtly roofe on a ruinous tenement: that mans end is eaſie and happy, whom death findes with a weake bodie, and a ſtrong ſoule.

Sometime, euen things in themſelues naturally good, are to bee refuſed for thoſe, which (being euill) may be an occaſion to a greater good. Life is in it ſelfe good, and death euill: elſe Dauid, Elias, and many excellent Martyrs would not haue fled, to hold life, and auoid death; nor Ezechiah haue praied for it, nor our Sauiour haue bidden vs to flee for it, nor God promiſed it to his for a reward: yet if in ſome caſes we hate not life, we loue not God, nor our ſoules. Herein, as much as in any thing, the peruerſeneſſe of our nature appeares, that we wiſh death, or loue life vpon wrong cauſes: wee would liue for pleaſure, or we would die for paine; Iob for his ſores, Elias for his perſecution, Ionas for his Gourd would preſently die, and will needs out-face God that it is better for him to die than to liue: wherein we are like to garriſon-ſouldiers, that while they liue within ſafe walls, and ſhew themſelues once a day rather for ceremonie and pompe, than need or danger, like warfare well enough; but if once called forth to the field, they wiſh themſelues at home.

29

Not onely the leaſt, but the worſt is euer in the bottome: what ſhould God doe with the dregges of our age? When ſinne will admit thee his Client no longer, then God ſhall be beholden to thee for thy ſeruice: Thus is God dealt with in all other offerings: The worſt and leaſt ſheafe muſt be Gods Tenth: The deformedſt or ſimpleſt of our children muſt bee Gods Miniſters: the vncleanlieſt and moſt careleſſe houſe muſt be Gods Temple: The idleſt and ſleepieſt houres of the day muſt be reſerued for our praiers: The worſt part of our age for deuotion. We would haue God giue vs ſtill of the beſt, and are ready to murmure at euery little euill he ſends vs: yet nothing is bad enough for him, of whom we receiue all. Nature condemnes this inequalitie; and tels vs, that he which is the Author of good, ſhould haue the beſt; and he which giues all ſhould haue his choice.

30

When we goe about an euill buſineſſe, it is ſtrange how readie the deuill is to ſet vs forward; how carefull, that we ſhould want no furtherances. So that if a man would be lewdly witty, hee ſhall be ſure to be furniſhed with ſtore of profane ieſts, wherein a looſe heart hath double aduantage of the conſcionable. If he would be voluptuous, he ſhall want neither obiects nor opportunities. The currant paſſage of ill enterpriſes is ſo farre from giuing cauſe of encouragement, that it ſhould iuſtly fright a man to looke backe to the Author; and to conſider that he therefore goes faſt, becauſe the deuill driues him.

In the choice of companions for our conuerſation, it is good dealing with men of good natures: for though grace exerciſeth her power in bridling nature, yet (ſith wee are ſtill men, at the beſt) ſome ſwinge ſhe will haue in the moſt mortified. Auſteritie, ſullenneſſe, or ſtrangeneſſe of diſpoſition, and whatſoeuer qualities may make a man vnſociable, cleaue faſter to our nature, than thoſe which are morally euill. True Chriſtian loue may be ſeparated from acquaintance, and acquaintance from intireneſſe: Theſe are not qualities to hinder our loue, but our familiaritie.

32 Ignorance,

32

Ignorance, as it makes bold, intruding men careleſly into vnknowne dangers; ſo alſo it makes men oft-times cauſeleſly fearefull. Herod feared Chriſts comming, becauſe he miſtooke it: If that Tyrant had knowne the manner of his ſpirituall Regiment, he had ſpared both his owne fright and the bloud of other. And hence it is that we feare death, becauſe we are not acquainted with the vertue of it. Nothing but innocencie and knowledge can giue ſound confidence to the heart.

33

Where are diuers opinions, they may be all falſe; there can bee but one true: and that one truth oft-times muſt be fetcht by peece-meale out of diuers branches of contrary opinions. For, it falls out not ſeldome, that Truth is through ignorance or raſh vehemency, ſcattered into ſundry parts; and like to a little Siluer melted amongſt the ruines of a burnt houſe, muſt be tried out from heaps of much ſuperfluous aſhes. There is much paines in the ſearch of it; much skill in finding it: the value of it once found, requites the coſt of both.

34

Affectation of ſuperfluitie, is in all things a ſigne of weakneſſe: As, in words, he that vſeth circumlocutions to expreſſe himſelfe, ſhewes want of memory, and want of proper ſpeech: And much talke argues a braine feeble and diſtempered. What good can any earthly thing yeeld vs beſide his vſe? and what is it but vanitie, to affect that which doth vs no good? and what vſe is it in that which is ſuperfluous? It is a great skill to know what is enough, and great wiſdome to care for no more.

35

Good things, which in abſence were deſired, now offering themſelues to our preſence, are ſcarce entertained; or at leaſt not with our purpoſed cheerefulneſſe. Chriſts comming to vs, and our going to him, are in our profeſſion well eſteemed, much wiſhed: but when he ſingleth vs out by a direct meſſage of death, or by ſome fearefull ſigne giueth likelihood of a preſent returne, we are as much affected with feare, as before with deſire. All changes, although to the better, are troubleſome for the time, vntill our ſetling: There is no remedy hereof but inward preuention: Our minde muſt change, before our eſtate be changed.

36

Thoſe are greateſt enemies to Religion, that are not moſt irreligious. Atheiſts, though in themſelues they bee the worſt, yet are ſeldome found hot Perſecuters of others: whereas thoſe which in ſome one fundamentall point bee hereticall, are commonly moſt violent in oppoſitions. One hurts by ſecret infection, the other by open reſiſtance: One is careleſſe of all truth, the other vehement for ſome vntruth. An Atheiſt is worthy of more hatred, an Heretike of more feare; both of auoidance.

37

Waies, if neuer vſed, cannot but bee faire; if much vſed, are made commodiouſly paſſable; if before oft vſed, and now ſeldome, they become deepe and dangerous. If the heart be not at all inured to meditation, it findeth no fault with it ſelfe; not for that it is innocent, but ſecure, if often, it findeth comfortable paſſage for his thoughts; if rarely, and with intermiſſion, tedious and troubleſome. In things of this nature, we onely eſcape complaint, if we vſe them either alwaies or neuer.

Our ſenſuall hand holds faſt whatſoeuer delight it apprehendeth: our ſpirituall hand eaſily easily remitteth; because appetite is stronger in vs than grace: whence it is, that we so hardly dehort our selues of earthly pleasures, which wee haue once entertained; and with such difficultie draw our selues to a constant course of faith, hope, and spirituall loue, or to the renued acts of them once intermitted. Age is naturally weake, and youth vigorous; but in vs the contrary is strong, the new plant and feeble: the fault is not in grace, but in vs: Faith doth not want strength, but we want faith.

It is not good in worldly estates for a man to make himselfe necessary; for hereupon he is both more toiled, and more suspected: but in the sacred Common-wealth of the Church, earnest care cannot be engaged too deeply by his seruice. The ambition of spirituall well-doing breeds no danger: He that doth best, and may worst be spared, is happiest.

40

It was a fit comparison of worldly cares, to thornes: for as they choke the Word, so they pricke our soules: Neither the Word can grow vp amongst them, nor the heart can rest vpon them: Neither body nor soule can finde ease while they are within, or close to vs. Spirituall cares are as sharp; but more profitable: they paine vs, but leaue the soule better. They breake our sleepe, but for a sweeter rest: we are not well, but either while we haue them, or after we haue had them. It is as impossible to haue spirituall health without these, as to haue bodily strength with the other.

41

In temporall goe withall things, it is best to liue in doubt; not making full account of that which wee hold in so weake a tenure: In spirituall, with confidence; not fearing that which is warranted to vs by an infallible promise and sure earnest. He liues more contentedly, that is most secure for this world, most resolute for the other.

42

God hath in nature giuen euery man inclinations to some one particular calling; which if he follow, he excels; if he crosse, hee proues a non-proficient, and changeable: but all mens natures are equally indisposed to grace, and to the common vocation of Christianity: we are all borne Heathens. To doe well, Nature must in the first be obserued and followed, in the other crossed and ouercome.

43

Good-man is a title giuen to the lowest; whereas all Titles of Greatnesse, Worship, Honor, are obserued and attributed with choice. The speech of the World bewraies their minde, and shewes the common estimation of goodnesse compared with other qualities. The World therefore is an ill Herald, and vnskilfull in the true stiles. It were happie that Goodnesse were so common; and pitty that it either should not stand with Greatnesse, or not be preferred to it.

44

Amongst all actions, Satan is euer busiest in the best, and most in the best part of the best; as in the end of Prayer, when the heart should close vp it selfe with most comfort. He neuer feares vs, but when we are well employed: and the more likelihood he sees of our profit, the more is his enuy and labour to distract vs. We should loue our selues, as much as he hates vs; and therefore striue so much the more towards our good, as his malice striueth to interrupt it. We doe nothing, if we contend not, when we are resisted. The good soule is euer in contradiction; denying what is granted, and contending for that which is denied: suspecting when it is gaine-said, and fearing libertie.

God fore-warnes ere he try, because he would be preuented: Satan steales vpon vs sudden-ſuddenly by temptations, becauſe he would foile vs. If we relent not vpon Gods premonition, and meet not the lingring paſe of his puniſhments, to fore-ſtall them, he puniſheth more, by how much his warning was more euident and more large. Gods trials muſt be met when they come: Satans muſt be ſeene before they come; and if we be not armed ere we be aſſaulted, we ſhall be foiled ere we can be armed.

It is not good to be continuall in denunciation of iudgement: The noiſe to which we are accuſtomed (though lowd) wakes vs not; whereas a leſſe (if vnuſuall) ſtirreth vs. The next way to make threatnings contemned, is to make them common. It is a profitable rod that ſtrikes ſparingly, and frights ſomewhat oftner than it ſmiteth.

47

Want of vſe cauſeth diſabilitie, and cuſtome perfection. Thoſe that haue not vſed to pray in their Cloſet, cannot pray in publike, but coldly and in forme. He that diſcontinues meditation, ſhall be long in recouering; whereas the man inured to theſe exerciſes (who is not dreſſed till he haue praied, nor hath ſupped till hee haue meditated) doth both theſe well, and with eaſe. He that intermits good duties, incurres a double loſſe: of the bleſſing that followeth good; of the facultie of doing it.

48

Chriſtianity is both an eaſie yoke, and an hard; hard to take vp; eaſie to beare when once taken. The heart requires much labour, ere it can be induced to ſtoope vnder it; and findes as much contentment when it hath ſtooped. The worldling thinkes Religion ſeruilitie; but the Chriſtian knowes whoſe ſlaue he was, till hee entred into this ſeruice; and that no bondage can be ſo euill, as freedome from theſe bonds.

49

It is a wonder how full of ſhifts Nature is; ready to turne ouer all good purpoſes. If we thinke of death, ſhe ſuggeſts ſecretly; Tuſh, it ſhall not come yet: If of iudgement for ſinne; This concernes not thee; it ſhall not come at all: If of heauen, and our labour to reach it; Trouble not thy ſelfe; it will come ſoone enough alone. Addreſſe thy ſelfe to pray; It is yet vnſeaſonable; ſtay for a better opportunitie: To giue almes; Thou knoweſt not thy owne future wants: To reproue; What needſt thou thruſt thy ſelfe into wilfull hatred? Euery good action hath his let: He can neuer be good, that is not reſolute.

50

All Arts are Maids to Diuinitie; therefore they both vaile to her, and doe her ſeruice, and ſhe, like a graue Miſtreſſe, controlles them at pleaſure: Naturall Philoſophy teacheth, that of nothing can bee nothing made; and that from the priuation to the habit, is no returne: Diuinitie takes her vp for theſe; and vpon ſupernaturall principles, teaches her a Creation, a Reſurrection. Philoſophy teaches vs to follow ſenſe, as an infallible guide: Diuinitie tels her, that Faith is of things not ſeene. Logick teaches vs firſt to diſcourſe, then to reſolue: Diuinitie, to aſſent without arguing. Ciuill Law teacheth, that long cuſtome preſcribeth: Diuinitie, that old things are paſſed. Morall Philoſophy, that tallying of iniuries is iuſtice: Diuinitie, that good muſt be returned for ill. Policy, that better is a miſchiefe than an inconuenience: Diuinitie, that we may not doe euill, that good may enſue. The Schoole is well ordred, while Diuinitie keepes the Chaire: but, if any other skill vſurpe it, and checke their Miſtreſſe, there can follow nothing but confuſion and Atheiſme.

Much difference is to be made betwixt a reuolter and a man trained vp in error. A Iew Iew and an Arrian both deny Christs Deity, yet this opinion is not in both punisht with bodily death. Yea a reuolt to a lesse error, is more punishable than education in a capitall Heresie. Errors of iudgement, though lesse regarded than errors of practice, yet are more pernicious: but none so deadly as theirs, that once were in the truth. If truth be not sued to, it is dangerous; but if forsaken, desperate.

It is an ill argument of a good action not well done, when we are glad that it is done. To be affected with the comfort of the conscience of well performing it, is good: but meerely to reioyce that the act is ouer, is carnall. He neuer can begin cheerefully, that is glad he hath ended.

53

He that doth not secret seruice to God with some delight, doth but counterfeit in publique. The truth of any act or passion is then best tried, when it is without witnesse. Openly, many sinister respects may draw from vs a forme of religious duties: secretly, nothing but the power of a good conscience. It is to be feared, God hath more true and deuout seruice in Closets, than in Churches.

54

Words and diseases grow vpon vs with yeeres. In age, we talke much, because wee haue seene much, and soone after shall cease talking for euer: Wee are most diseased, because nature is weakest; and death which is neere, must haue harbingers: such is the old age of the World. No maruell, if this last time be full of writing, and weake discourse, full of sects and heresies, which are the sicknesses of this great and decaied body.

55

The best ground vntilled, soonest runs out into ranke weeds. Such are Gods Children; Ouer-growne with securitie ere they are aware, vnlesse they bee well exercised both with Gods plow of affliction, and their owne industry in meditation. A man of knowledge that is either negligent or vncorrected, cannot but grow wilde and godlesse.

56

With vs, vilest things are most common; But with God the best things are most frequently giuen. Grace, which is the noblest of all Gods fauours, is vnpartially bestowed vpon all willing receiuers; whereas Nobilitie of bloud and height of place, blessings of an inferiour nature, are reserued for few. Herein the Christian followes his Father; his praiers which are his richest portion, he communicates to all; his substance according to his abilitie, to few.

57

God therefore giues, because he hath giuen; making his former fauours, arguments for more; Man therefore shuts his hand, because hee hath opened it. There is no such way to procure more from God, as to vrge him with what hee hath done. All Gods blessings are profitable and excellent; not so much in themselues, as that they are inducements to greater.

58

Gods immediate actions are best, at first. The frame of this creation how exquisite was it vnder his hand! afterward, blemished by our sinne: mans indeuours are weake in their beginnings, and perfecter by degrees. No science, no deuice hath euer beene perfect in his cradle; or at once hath seene his birth and maturitie: of the same nature are those actions which God worketh mediatly by vs according to our measure of receit.

The

The cauſe of both is, on the one ſide the infiniteneſſe of his wiſdome and power, which cannot be corrected by any ſecond aſſaies: On the other, our weakneſſe, helping it ſelfe by former grounds and trials. Hee is an happy man that detracts nothing from Gods works, and addes moſt to his owne.

59

The old ſaying is more common than true; that thoſe which are in hell, know no other heauen: for this makes the damned perfectly miſerable, that out of their owne torment, they ſee the felicitie of the Saints; together with their impoſſibility of attaining it. Sight, without hope of fruition, is a torment alone: Thoſe that here might ſee God and will not, or doe ſee him obſcurely and loue him not, ſhall once ſee him with anguiſh of ſoule and not enioy him.

60

Sometimes euill ſpeeches come from good men, in their vnaduiſedneſſe: and ſometimes euen the good ſpeeches of men may proceed from an ill ſpirit. No confeſſion could be better than Satan gaue of Chriſt: It is not enough to conſider what is ſpoken, or by whom; but whence, and for what. The ſpirit is oftentimes tried by the ſpeech: but other-times the ſpeech muſt be examined by the ſpirit; and the ſpirit, by the rule of an higher word.

61

Greatneſſe puts high thoughts, and bigge words into a man; whereas the deiected minde takes, careleſly, what offers it ſelfe. Euery worldling is baſe-minded; and therefore his thoughts creepe ſtill low vpon the earth. The Chriſtian both is and knowes himſelfe truly great; and thereupon mindeth and ſpeaketh of ſpirituall, immortall, glorious, heauenly things. So much as the ſoule ſtoopeth vnto earthly thoughts, ſo much is it vnregenerate.

62

Long acquaintance, as it maketh thoſe things which are euill, to ſeeme leſſe euill; ſo it makes good things, which at firſt were vnpleaſant, delightfull. There is no euill of paine, nor no morall good action, which is not harſh at the firſt. Continuance of euill, which might ſeeme to weary vs, is the remedy and abatement of wearineſſe: and the practice of good, as it profiteth, ſo it pleaſeth. He that is a ſtranger to good and euill, finds both of them troubleſome. God therefore doth well for vs, while he exerciſeth vs with long afflictions: and we doe well to our ſelues, while we continually buſie our ſelues in good exerciſes.

63

Sometimes it is well taken by men, that we humble our ſelues lower than there is cauſe. Thy ſeruant IACOB, ſaith that good Patriarch, to his brother, to his inferiour. And no leſſe well doth God take theſe ſubmiſſe extenuations of our ſelues; I am a worme, and no man: Surely I am more fooliſh than a man, and haue not the vnderſtanding of a man in me. But I neuer finde that any man bragged to God, although in a matter of truth, and within the compaſſe of his deſert, and was accepted. A man may be too lowly in his dealing with men, euen vnto contempt: with God he cannot; but the lower he falleth, the higher is his exaltation.

The ſoule is fed as the body, ſtarued with hunger as the body, requires proportionable diet and neceſſary varietie, as the body. All ages and ſtatures of the ſoule beare not the ſame nouriſhment. There is milke for ſpirituall Infants, ſtrong meat for the growne Chriſtian. The ſpoone is fit for one, the knife for the other. The beſt Chriſtian is not ſo growne, that he need to ſcorne the ſpoone: but the weake Chriſtian may finde a ſtrong feed dangerous. How many haue beene caſt away with ſpirituall ſurfets; becauſe being but new-borne, they haue ſwallowed downe bigge morſels of the higheſt myſteries of godlineſſe, which they neuer could digeſt; but together with them haue caſt vp their proper nouriſhment? A man muſt firſt know the power of his ſtomacke, ere he know how with ſafetie and profit to frequent Gods Ordinary.

It is very hard for the beſt man in a ſudden extremity of death, to ſatisfie himſelfe in apprehending his ſtay, and repoſing his heart vpon it: for the ſoule is ſo oppreſſed with ſudden terrour, that it cannot well command it ſelfe, till it haue digeſted an euill. It were miſerable for the beſt Chriſtian, if all his former praiers and meditations did not ſerue to aide him in his laſt ſtraits, and meet together in the center of his extremitie; yeelding, though not ſenſible releefe, yet ſecret benefit to the ſoule: whereas the worldly man in this caſe, hauing not laid vp for this houre, hath no comfort from God, or from others, or from himſelfe.

66

All externall good or euill is meaſured by ſenſe: neither can we account that either good or ill, which doth neither actually auaile, nor hurt vs: ſpiritually this rule holds not. All our beſt good is inſenſible. For all our future (which is the greateſt) good, we hold onely in hope; and the preſent fauour of God we haue many times, and feele not. The ſtomacke findes the beſt digeſtion euen in ſleepe, when we leaſt perceiue it: and whiles wee are moſt awake, this power worketh in vs either to further ſtrength or diſeaſe, without our knowledge of what is done within: And on the other ſide, that man is moſt dangerouſly ſicke, in whom nature decaies without his feeling, without complaint. To know our ſelues happy, is good: but woe were to vs Chriſtians, if we could not be happy, and know it not.

67

There are none that euer did ſo much miſchiefe to the Church, as thoſe that haue beene excellent in wit and learning. Others may be ſpightfull enough, but want power to accompliſh their malice. An enemy that hath both ſtrength and craft, is worthy be feared. None can ſinne againſt the Holy Ghoſt, but thoſe which haue had former illumination. Tell not me what parts a man hath, but what grace: honeſt ſottiſhneſſe is better than profane eminence.

68

The entertainment of all ſpirituall euents muſt be with feare, or hope; but, of all earthly extremities, muſt be with contempt or deriſion. For what is terrible, is worthy of a Chriſtians contempt; what is pleaſant, to be turned ouer with a ſcorne. The meane requires a meane affection betwixt loue and hatred. We may not loue them, becauſe of their vanitie: we may not hate them, becauſe of their neceſſary vſe. It is an hard thing to be a wiſe Oaſt, and to fit our entertainment to all commers: which if it be not done, the ſoule is ſoone waſted, either for want of cuſtomers, or for the miſrule of ill gheſts.

69

God and man build in a contrary order. Man laies the foundation firſt, then addes the walls, the roofe laſt. God beganne the roofe firſt, ſpreading out this vault of heauen, ere hee laid the Baſe of the earth. Our thoughts muſt follow the order of his workmanſhip. Heauen muſt be minded firſt; earth afterward: and ſo much more, as it is ſeene more. Our meditation muſt herein follow our ſenſe: A few miles giue bounds to our view of earth; whereas we may neere ſee halfe the heauen at once. Hee that thinkes moſt both of that which is moſt ſeene, and of that which is not ſeene at all, is happieſt.

70

I haue euer noted it a true signe of a false heart, To be scrapulous and nice in small matters, negligent in the maine: whereas the good soule is still curious in substantiall points, and not careleſſe in things of an inferiour nature; accounting no duty so small as to be neglected, and no care great enough for principall duties: not so tything Mint and Cummin, that he should forget iustice and iudgement; nor yet so regarding iudgement and iustice, that he should contemne Mint and Cummin. He that thus misplaces his conscience, will be found either hypocriticall or superstitious.

71

It argues the world full of Atheists, that those offences which may impeach humane society, are entertained with an answerable hatred and rigour: those which doe immediately wrong the supreme Maiestie of God, are turned ouer with scarce so much as dislike. If we conuersed with God as we doe with men, his right would be at last as precious to vs as our owne. All that conuerse not with God, are without God: not onely those that are against God, but those that are without God, are Atheists. Wee may be too charitable: I feare not to say, that these our last times abound with honest Atheists.

72

The best thing corrupted, is worst: An ill man is the worst of all creatures, an ill Christian the worst of all men, an ill professor the worst of all Christians, an ill Minister the worst of all professors.

73

Naturally life is before death; and death is onely a priuation of life: Spiritually it is contrary. As Paul saith of the graine, so may we of man in the businesse of regeneration: He must die before he can liue: yet this death presuppoſes a life that was once, and should be. God chuses to haue the difficultest, first: we must be content with the paine of dying, ere we feele the comfort of life. As we die to nature, ere we liue in glory: so we must die to sinne, ere we can liue to grace.

74

Death did not first strike Adam the first sinfull man; nor Caine the first hypocrite; but Abel the innocent and righteous. The first soule that met with death, ouercame death: the first soule that parted from earth, went to heauen. Death argues not displeasure; because he whom God loued best, dies first; and the murtherer is punished with liuing.

75

The liues of most are miſ-spent, onely for want of a certaine end of their actions: wherein they doe as vnwise Archers, shoot away their arrowes they know not at what marke. They liue onely out of the present, not directing themselues and their proceedings to one vniuersall scope: whence they alter vpon all change of occasions, and neuer reach any perfection; neither can doe other but continue in vncertaintie, and end in discomfort. Others aime at one certaine marke, but a wrong one. Some (though fewer) leuell at the right end, but amisse. To liue without one maine and common end, is idlenesse and folly. To liue to a false end, is deceit and losse. True Christian wisdome both shewes the end, and findes the way. And as cunning Politikes haue many plots to compasse one and the same designe by a determined succession; so the wise Christian failing in the meanes, yet still fetcheth about to his steady end with a constant change of endeuours: such one onely liues to purpose, and at last repents not that hee hath liued.

76

The ſhipwracke of a good conſcience, is the caſting away of all other excellencies. It is no rare thing to note the ſoule of a wilfull ſinner ſtripped of all her graces, and by degrees expoſed to ſhame: ſo thoſe, whom we haue knowne admired, haue faine to be leuell with their fellowes; and from thence beneath them, to a mediocritie; and afterwards to ſottiſhneſſe and contempt, below the vulgar. Since they haue caſt away the beſt, it is iuſt with God to take away the worſt; and to caſt off them in leſſer regards, which haue reiected him in greater.

77

It hath euer beene counted more noble and ſucceſſefull to ſet vpon an open enemy in his owne home, than to expect till he ſet vpon vs, whiles he make onely a defenſiue war. This rule ſerues vs for our laſt enemy Death: whence that old demand of Epicure is eaſily anſwered, Whether it be better Death ſhould come to vs, or that we ſhould meet him in the way: meet him in our minds, ere he ſeize vpon our bodies. Our cowardlineſſe, our vnpreparation is his aduantage: whereas true boldneſſe in confronting him, diſmaies and weakens his forces. Happy is that ſoule, that can ſend out the ſcouts of his thoughts before-hand, to diſcouer the power of death a farre off; and then can reſolutely encounter him at vnawares vpon aduantage: ſuch one liues with ſecuritie, dies with comfort.

78

Many a man ſends others to heauen, and yet goes to hell himſelfe: and not few hauing drawne others to hell, yet themſelues returne by a late repentance, to life. In a good action, it is not good to ſearch too deepely into the intention of the agent, but in ſilence to make our beſt benefit of the worke: In an euill, it is not ſafe to regard the qualitie of the perſon, or his ſucceſſe, but to conſider the action abſtracted from all circumſtances, in his owne kinde. So we ſhall neither neglect good deeds, becauſe they ſpeed not well in ſome hands, nor affect a proſperous euill.

79

God doth ſome ſingular actions, wherein we cannot imitate him; ſome, wherein we may not; moſt, wherein he may and would faine be followed. He fetcheth good out of euill; ſo may we turne our owne and others ſinnes to priuate or publike good: wee may not doe euill for a good vſe; but we muſt vſe our euill once done, to good. I hope I ſhall not offend, to ſay, that the good vſe which is made of ſinnes, is as gainefull to God, as that which ariſes from good actions. Happy is that man, that can vſe either his good well, or his euill.

80

There is no difference betwixt anger and madneſſe, but continuance: for, raging anger is a ſhort madneſſe. What elſe argues the ſhaking of the hands and lips, paleneſſe, or redneſſe, or ſwelling of the face, glaring of the eies, ſtammering of the tongue, ſtamping with the feet, vnſteady motions of the whole body, raſh actions which we remember not to haue done, diſtracted and wilde ſpeeches? And madneſſe againe is nothing but a continued rage, yea ſome madneſſe rageth not: ſuch a milde madneſſe is more tolerable, than frequent and furious anger.

81

Thoſe that would keepe ſtate, muſt keepe aloofe off; eſpecially if their qualities bee not anſwerable in height to their place. For many great perſons are like a well-wrought picture vpon a courſe cloth; which a farre off ſhewes faire, but neere hand the roundneſſe of the threed marres the good workmanſhip. Concealement of gifts, after ſome one commended act, is the beſt way to admiration, and ſecret honour: but hee that would profit, muſt vent himſelfe oft, and liberally, and ſhew what he is, without all

priuate

priuate regard. As therefore, many times, honor followes modeſty vnlookt for; ſo, contrarily, a man may ſhew no leſſe pride in ſilence and obſcuritie, than others, which ſpeake and write for glory. And that other pride is ſo much the worſe, as it is more vnprofitable: for whereas thoſe which put forth their gifts, benefit others whiles they ſeeke themſelues; theſe are ſo wholly deuoted to themſelues, that their ſecrecy doth no good to others.

82

Such a mans delights and cares are in health, ſuch are both his thoughts and ſpeeches commonly on his death-bed: The proud man talkes of his faire ſutes, the glutton of his diſhes, the wanton of his beaſtlineſſe, the religious man of heauenly things. The tongue will hardly leaue that to which the heart is inured. If wee would haue good motions to viſit vs while we are ſicke, wee muſt ſend for them familiarly in our health.

83

He is a rare man, that hath not ſome kinde of madneſſe raigning in him: One a dull madneſſe of melancholy, another a conceited madneſſe of pride; another a ſuperſtitious madneſſe of falſe deuotion; a fourth of ambition, or couetouſneſſe; a fift, the furious madneſſe of anger; a ſixt, the laughing madneſſe of extreme mirth; a ſeuenth, a drunken madneſſe; an eight, of outragious luſt; a ninth, the learned madneſſe of curioſitie; a tenth, the worſt madneſſe of profaneneſſe and Atheiſme. It is as hard to reckon vp all kindes of madneſſes, as of diſpoſitions. Some are more noted and puniſhed than others; ſo that, the mad man in one kinde as much condemnes another, as the ſober man condemnes him. Onely that man is both good, and wiſe, and happy, that is free from all kindes of phrenſie.

84

There be ſome honeſt errors, where-with I neuer found that God was offended. That an husband ſhould thinke his owne Wife comely, although ill-fauoured in the eies of others: That a man ſhould thinke more meanely of his owne good parts, than of weaker in others: To giue charitable (though miſtaken) conſtructions of doubtfull actions and perſons (which are the effects of naturall affection, humilitie, loue) were neuer cenſured by God: Herein alone we erre, if we erre not.

85

No maruell if the worldling eſcape earthly afflictions. God corrects him not, becauſe he loues him not. He is baſe borne and begot. God will not doe him the fauour to whip him. The world afflicts him not, becauſe it loues him: for each one is indulgent to his owne. God vſes not the rod where he meanes to vſe the ſword. The Pillorie or ſcourge is for thoſe malefactors which ſhall eſcape execution.

86

Weake ſtomacks which cannot digeſt large meales, feed oft and little: For our ſoules, that which wee want in meaſure, we muſt ſupply in frequence. We can neuer fully enough comprehend in our thoughts the ioyes of heauen, the meritorious ſufferings of Chriſt, the terrors of the ſecond death: therefore we muſt meditate of them often.

87

The ſame thoughts doe commonly meet vs in the ſame places; as if we had left them there till our returne. For that the minde doth ſecretly frame to it ſelfe memoratiue heads, whereby it recals eaſily the ſame conceits. It is beſt to imploy our minde there, where it is moſt fixed. Our deuotion is ſo dull, it cannot haue too many aduantages.

88

I finde but one example in all Scripture, of any bodily cure which our Sauiour wrought by degrees: onely the blinde man, whoſe weake faith craued helpe by others, not by himſelfe, ſaw men firſt like trees, then in their true ſhape. All other miraculous cures of Chriſt were done at once, and perfect at firſt. Contrarily, I finde but one example of a ſoule fully healed (that is) ſanctified and glorified, both in a day; all other by degrees and leiſure. The ſteps of grace are ſoft and ſhort. Thoſe externall miracles he wrought immediatly by himſelfe; and therefore no marueil if they were abſolute like their Author. The miraculous worke of our Regeneration he works together with vs: He giueth it efficacy; we giue it imperfection.

SOME FEVV OF DAVIDS PSALMES METAPHRASED, for a taſte of the reſt.

By Ios. Hall.

LONDON,
Printed for THOMAS PAVIER, MILES FLESHER,
and John Haviland. 1624.

TO MY LOVING AND LEARNED COVSIN, Mr. SAMVEL BVRTON, Archdeacon of Gloceſter.

INdeed, my Poetrie was long ſithence out of date, and yeelded her place to grauer ſtudies: but whoſe veine would it not reuiue, to looke into thoſe heauenly Songs? I were not worthy to be a Diuine, if it ſhould repent mee to be a Poet with Dauid, after I ſhall haue aged in the Pulpit. This work is holy and ſtrict, & abides not any youthfull or heathenish libertie; but requires hands free from profaneneſſe, looſeneſſe, affection. It is a ſeruice to God & the Church by ſomuch more carefully to be regarded, as it is more common. For who is there that will not challenge a part in this labour? and that ſhall not finde himſelfe much more affected with holy meaſure rightly compoſed? Wherefore I haue oft wondred, how it could be offenſiue to our aduerſaries, that theſe diuine Ditties which the Spirit of God wrote in verſe, ſhould be ſung in verſe; and that an Hebrew Poeme ſhould be made Engliſh. For if this kinde of compoſition had beene vnfit, God would neuer haue made choice of numbers, wherein to expreſſe himſelfe. Yea, who knowes not that ſome other Scriptures, which the Spirit hath indited in proſe, haue yet beene happily and with good allowance put into ſtrict numbers? If hiſtories tell vs of a wanton Poet of old, which loſt his eies while hee went about to turne Moſes into verſe; yet euery ſtudent knowes with what good ſucceſſe and commendation Nonnus hath turned Iohns Goſpell into Greeke Heroicks. And Apollinarius, that learned Syrian matched with Baſil and Gregorie (who liued in his time) in the termes of this equalitie, that Baſils ſpeech was ἐμβριθέστερος, but Apollinaries ἀδρότερος, wrote, as Suidas reports, all the Hebrew Scripture in Heroicks, as Sozomen (ſomewhat more reſtrainedly) all the Archaiology of the Iewes, till Sauls gouernment, in 24. parts; or as Socrates yet more particularly, all Moſes in Heroicks, and all the other Hiſtories in diuers metres: but how-euer his other labours lie hid, his Metaphraſe of the Pſalmes is ſtill in our hands, with the applauſe of all the learned: beſides the labours of their owne owne Flaminius and Arias Montanus (to seeke for no more) which haue worthily bestowed themselues in this subiect. Neither doe I see how it can bee offensiue to our friends, that wee should desire our English Metaphrase bettered. I say nothing to the disgrace of that we haue: I know how glad our aduersaries are of all such aduantages; which they are ready enough to finde out without me, euer reprochfully vpbraiding vs with these defects. But since our whole Translation is now vniuersally reuised; what inconuenience or shew of innouation can it beare, that the verse should accompanie the prose? especially since it is well knowne how rude and homely our English Poesie was in those times, compared with the present; wherein, if euer, it seeth her full perfection. I haue beene sollicited by some reuerend friends to vndertake this taske; as that which seemed well to accord with the former exercises of my youth, and my present profession. The difficulties I found many, the worke long and great; yet not more painefull than beneficiall to Gods Church. Whereto as I dare not professe any sufficiencie; so I will not denie my readinesse, and vtmost endeuour, if I shall bee employed by Authoritie: wherefore, in this part, I doe humbly submit my selfe to the graue censures of them, whose wisdome menageth these common affaires of the Church: and am ready either to stand still or proceed, as I shall see their Cloud or Fire goe before or behinde me. Onely (howsoeuer) I shall, for my true affection to the Church, wish it done by better workemen. Wherein as you approue, so further my bold, but not vnprofitable motion, and commend it vnto greater cares: as I doe you to the Greatest.

Non-such. July 3.

Your louing kinsman,

IOS. HALL.

Some few of DAVIDS Pſalmes Metaphraſed.

PSALME 1.

In the tune of the 148. Pſalme.

Giue laud vnto the Lord.

WHo hath not walkt aſtray,
In wicked mens aduice,
Nor ſtood in ſinners way;
Nor in their companies
That ſcorners are,
As their fit mate,
In ſcoffing chaire,
Hath euer ſate.

2 But in thy lawes diuine,
O Lord ſets his delight,
And in thoſe lawes of thine
Studies all day and night;
Oh, how that man
Thrice bleſſed is!
And ſure ſhall gaine
Eternall bliſſe.

3 He ſhall be like the tree
Set by the water-ſprings,
Which when his ſeaſons be Moſt pleaſant fruit forth brings:
Whoſe boughs ſo greene
Shall neuer fade,
But couered beene
With comely ſhade.

So, to this happy wight,
All his deſignes ſhall thriue:
4 Whereas the man vnright,
As chaffe which winds doe driue,
With euery blaſt
Is toſt on hie,
Nor can at laſt
In ſafetie lie.

5 Wherefore in that ſad doome,
They dare not riſe from duſt:
Nor ſhall no ſinner come
To glory of the iuſt.
For, God will grace
The iuſt mans way;
While ſinners race
Runs to decay.

PSALME 2.

In the tune of the 125. Pſalme.

Thoſe that doe put their confidence.

WHy doe the Gentiles tumults make,
And nations all conſpire in vaine,
2 And earthly Princes counſell take
Againſt their God; againſt the Raigne
Of his deare Chriſt? let vs, they ſaine,
3 Breake all their bonds: and from vs ſhake
Their thraldome, yoke and ſeruile chaine.
4 Whiles thus (alas) they fondly ſpake,

Hee that aloft rides on the skies,
Laughes all their lewd deuice to ſcorne,
5 And when his wrathfull rage ſhall riſe,
With plagues ſhall make them all forlorne,
And in his furie thus replies;
6 But I, my King with ſacred horne
Anointing, ſhall in princely guiſe
His head with royall Crowne adorne.

Vpon my Sions holy mount
His Empires glorious ſeat ſhall be.
And I thus rais'd ſhall farre recount
The tenour of his true degree.
7 My Sonne thou art, ſaid God, I thee
Begat this day by due account:
Thy Scepter, doe but aske of me,
All earthly kingdomes ſhall ſurmount.

8 All

8 All nations to thy rightfull sway,
I will subiect from furthest end
9 Of all the world, and thou shalt bray
Those stubborne foes that will not bend,
With iron Mace (like Po'ters clay)
10 In pieces small: yee Kings, attend;
And yee, whom others wont obey,
Learne wisdome, and at last amend.

11 See, yee serue God, with greater dread
Than others you: and in your feare
Reioice the while; and (lowly spread) 12 Doe homage to his Sonne so deare:
Lest he be wroth, and doe you dead
13 Amids your way. If kindled
His wrath shall be; O blessed those,
That doe on him their trust repose.

PSALME 3.

As the 113. Psalme,

Ye children which, &c.

AH Lord! how many be my foes!
How many are against me rose,
2 That to my grieued soule haue sed,
Tush, God shall him no succour yeeld;
3 Whiles thou, Lord, art my praise, my shield,
And dost aduance my carefull head!

4 Loud with my voice to God I cry'd:
His Grace vnto my sute reply'd,
From out his holy hill.
5 I laid me downe, slept, rose againe.
For thou, O Lord, dost me sustaine,
And sau'st my soule from feared ill.

6 Not if ten thousand armed foes
My naked side should round enclose,
Would I be thereof ought a-dred.
Vp, Lord, and shield me from disgrace:
7 For thou hast broke my foe-mens face,
And all the wickeds teeth hast shed.

8 From thee, O God, is safe defence;
Doe thou thy free beneficence
Vpon thy people largely spread.

PSALME 4.

As the ten Commandements,

Attend my people.

THou witnesse of my truth sincere,
My God, vnto my poore request
Vouchsafe to lend thy gracious eare:
Thou hast my soule from thrall releast.

2 Fauour me still, and daigne to heare
Mine humble sute. O wretched wights,
3 How long will yee mine honour deare
Turne into shame through your despights?

Still will ye loue what thing is vaine,
4 And seeke false hopes? know then at last,
That God hath chose, and will maintaine
His fauorite, whom yee disgrac't.

God will regard my instant mone.
5 Oh! tremble then, and cease offending;
And on your silent bed alone,
Talke with your hearts, your waies amending.

6 Offer the truest sacrifice
Of broken hearts; on God besetting
7 Your onely trust. The most deuise
The waies of worldly treasure getting:

But thou, O Lord, lift vp to me
The light of that sweet looke of thine;
8 So shall my soule more gladsome be,
Than theirs with all their corne and wine.

9 So I in peace shall lay me downe,
And on my bed take quiet sleepe;
Whiles thou, O Lord, shalt me alone
From dangers all securely keepe.

PSALME 5.

In the tune of 124. Psalme,

Now Israel may say, &c.

BOw downe thine eare,
Lord, to these words of mine,

And well regard the ſecret plaints I make.
2 My King, my God,
to thee I doe betake
My ſad eſtate:
oh doe thine eare incline
To theſe loud cries that to thee powred bin.

3 At early morne
thou ſhalt my voice attend:
For, at day breake,
I will my ſelfe addreſſe
Thee to implore, and wait for due redreſſe.
4 Thou doſt not, Lord, delight in wickedneſſe;
Nor to bad men
wilt thy protection lend.

5 The boaſters proud cannot before thee ſtay:
Thou hat'ſt all thoſe that are to ſinne deuoted:
6 The lying lips,
and who with bloud are ſpotted,
Thou doeſt abhorre,
and wilt for euer ſlay:
7 But I vnto
thine houſe ſhall take the way,

And through thy grace abundant ſhall adore,
With humble feare within thy holy place.
8 Oh! lead me, Lord,
within thy righteous trace:
Euen for their ſakes that malice me ſo ſore, Make ſmooth thy paths my dimmer eies before.

9 Within their mouth
no truth is euer found:
Pure miſchiefe is their heart: a gaping toome 10 Is their wide throat;
and yet their tongues ſtill ſound, 11 With ſmoothing words.
O Lord, giue them their doome,
And let them fall in thoſe their plots profound.
In their exceſſe of miſchiefe them deſtroy 12 That Rebels are;
ſo thoſe that to thee flie,
Shall all reioyce
and ſing eternally:
13 And whom thou doſt
protect, and who loue thee,
And thy deare name,
in thee ſhall euer ioy;
Since thou with bliſſe
the righteous doſt reward,
And with thy grace
as with a ſhield him guard.

PSALME 6.

As the 50. Pſalme,

The mighty God, &c.

LEt me not, Lord,
be in thy wrath reproued:
Oh! ſcourge me not when thy fierce wrath is moued.
2 Pity me, Lord,
that doe with languor pine:
Heale me whoſe bones with paine diſſolued bin;
3 Whoſe weary ſoule
is vexed aboue meaſure.
Oh Lord, how long ſhall I bide thy diſpleaſure!
4 Turne thee, O Lord,
reſcue my ſoule diſtreſt;
5 And ſaue me of thy grace.
'Mongſt thoſe that reſt
In ſilent death, can none remember thee:
And in the graue
how ſhould'ſt thou praiſed be?
6 Weary with ſighes,
All night I caus'd my bed
To ſwim: with teares
my couch I watered.
7 Deepe ſorrow hath conſum'd my dimmed eyne, Sunke in with griefe at theſe lewd foes of mine:
8 But now hence, hence,
vaine plotters of mine ill:
The Lord hath heard
my lamentations ſhrill;

9 God heard my suit and still attends the same:
10 Blush now, my foes, and flie with sudden shame.

PSALME 7.

As the 112. Psalme.

The man is bleſt that God, &c.

ON thee, O Lord my God, relies
My onely truſt: from bloudy ſpight
Of all my raging enemies
Oh! let thy mercy me acquite:
2 Leſt they like greedy Lyons rend
My ſoule, while none ſhall it defend.

3 O Lord, if I this thing haue wrought,
If in my hands be found ſuch ill:
4 If I with miſchiefe euer ſought
To pay good turnes; or did not ſtill
Doe good vnto my cauſeleſſe foe,
That thirſted for my ouerthrow;

5 Then let my foe in eager chace,
Ore take my ſoule, and proudly tread
My life below; and with diſgrace
In duſt lay downe mine honour dead.
6 Riſe vp in rage, O Lord, eſt-ſoone
Aduance thine arme againſt my foone:

And wake for me, till thou fulfill
7 My promis'd right; ſo ſhall glad throngs
Of people flocke vnto thine hill.
For their ſakes then reuenge my wrongs,
8 And raiſe thy ſelfe. Thy iudgements be Ore all the world: Lord, iudge thou me.

As truth and honeſt innocence
Thou find'ſt in me, Lord, iudge thou me.
9 Settle the iuſt with ſure defence:
Let me the wicked's malice ſee
10 Brought to an end. For thy iuſt eye
Doth heart and inward reynes deſcry.

11 My ſafety ſtands in God; who ſhields
The ſound in heart: whoſe doome each day
12 To iuſt men and contemners yeelds
13 Their due. Except he change his way,
His ſword is whet, to bloud intended,
His murdering Bow is ready bended.

14 Weapons of death he hath addreſt
And arrowes keene to pierce my foe,
15 Who late bred miſchiefe in his breſt;
But when he doth on trauell goe,
16 Brings forth a lie: deepe pits doth delue,
And fals into his pits himſelue.

17 Backe to his owne head ſhall rebound
His plotted miſchiefe; and his wrongs
18 His crowne ſhall craze: But I ſhall ſound
Iehouah's praiſe with thankfull ſongs,
And will his glorious name expreſſe,
And tell of all his righteouſneſſe.

PSALME 8.

As the 113. Psalme,

Yee children which, &c.

HOw noble is thy mighty Name,
O Lord, o're all the worlds wide frame,
Whoſe glory is aduanc't on high
Aboue the rowling heauens racke!
2 How for the graceleſſe ſcorners ſake,
To ſtill th'auenging enemy,
Haſt thou by tender infants tongue,
The praiſe of thy great Name made ſtrong,
While they hang ſucking on the breſt!
3 But when I ſee the heauens bright,
The moone and glittering ſtarres of night,
By thine almighty hand addreſt,
4 Oh! what is man, poore ſilly man,
That thou ſo mind'ſt him, and doſt daine
To looke at his vnworthy ſeed!
5 Thou haſt him ſet not much beneath
Thine Angels bright; and with a wreath
Of glory haſt adorn'd his head.
6 Thou haſt him made high ſoueraigne
7 Of all thy works, and ſtretcht his raigne
Vnto the heards, and beaſts vntame,
8 To Fowles, and to the ſcaly traine,
That glideth through the watry Maine.
9 How noble each-where is thy Name!

PSALME 9.

To the tune of that knowne song, beginning,

Preserue vs, Lord.

THee, and thy wondrous deeds, O God,
With all my soule I sound abroad:
2 My ioy, my triumph is in thee.
Of thy dread name my song shall be,

3 O highest God: since put to flight,
And fal'ne and vanisht at thy sight
4 Are all my foes; for thou hast past
Iust sentence on my cause at last:

And sitting on thy throne aboue,
A rightfull Iudge thy selfe doest proue:
5 The troupes profane thy checks haue stroid,
And made their name for euer void.

6 Wheres now, my foes, your threatned wrack?
So well you did our Cities sacke,
And bring to dust; while that ye say,
Their name shall die as well as they.

7 Loe, in eternall state God sits:
And his high Throne to iustice fits:
8 Whose righteous hand the world shall weeld,
And to all folke iust doome shall yeeld.

9 The poore from high finde his releefe;
The poore in needfull times of griefe:
10 Who knowes the Lord, to thee shall cleaue,
That neuer doest thy clients leaue.

11 Oh! sing the God that doth abide,
On Sion mount; and blaz on wide
12 His worthy deeds. For he pursues
The guiltlesse blond with vengeance due:

He mindes their cause, nor can passe o're
Sad clamors of the wronged poore.
13 Oh! mercy Lord: thou that dost saue
My soule from gates of death and graue:

Oh! see the wrong my foes haue done:
14 That I thy praise, to all that gone
Through daughter Sions beauteous gate,
With thankfull songs may loud relate;

And may reioyce in thy safe aide.
Behold, the Gentiles whiles they made
A deadly pit my soule to drowne,
Into their pit are sunken downe;

In that close snare they hid for mee.
Loe, their owne feet intangled be.
16 By this iust doome the Lord is knowne,
That th'ill are punisht with their owne.

17 Downe shall the wicked backward fall
To deepest hell, and nations all 18 That God forget; nor shall the poore
Forgotten be for euermore.

The constant hope of soules oppresst
19 Shall not aye die. Rise from thy rest,
Oh Lord, let not men base and rude
Preuaile: iudge thou the multitude

20 Of lawlesse Pagans: strike pale feare
Into those brests that stubborne were:
And let the Gentiles feele and finde,
They beene but men of mortall kinde.

PSALME 10.

As the 51. Psalme,

O God, Consider.

WHy stand'st thou, Lord, aloofe so long,
And hidst thee in due times of need,
2 Whiles lewd men proudly offer wrong
Vnto the poore? In their owne deed,
And their deuice let them be caught.
3 For loe, the wicked braues and boasts
In his vile and outragious thought,
And blesseth him that rauines most.

4 On God he dares insult: his pride
Scornes to enquire of powers aboue.
But his stout thoughts haue still deni'd
5 There is a God; His waies yet proue
Aye prosperous: thy iudgements hye
Doe farre surmount his dimmer sight.
6 Therefore doth he all foes defie:
His heart saith, I shall stand in spight,

Nor euer moue; nor danger 'bide.
7 His mouth is fill'd with curses foule,
And with close fraud: His tongue doth hide

8 Mischiefe and ill: he seekes the soule
Of harmlesse men in secret waite,
And in the corners of the street
Doth shead their bloud; with scorne and hate,
His eies vpon the poore are set.

9 As some fell Lyon in his den,
He closely lurkes the poore to spoile:
He spoyles the poore and helplesse men,
When once he Snares them in his toyle.
10 He croucheth low in cunning wile,
And bowes his brest; whereon whole throngs
Of poore, whom his faire showes beguile,
Fall to be subiect to his wrongs.

11 God hath forgot (in soule, he saies)
He hides his face to neuer see.
12 Lord God, arise,; thine hand vp-raise:
Let not thy poore forgotten be.
13 Shall these insulting wretches scorne
Their God; and say, thou wilt not care?

14 Thou see'st (for all thou hast forborne)
Thou see'st what all their mischiefes are;

That to thine hand of vengeance iust
Thou maist them take: the poore distressed Rely on thee with constant trust,
The helpe of Orphans and oppressed.
15 Oh! breake the wickeds arme of might,
And search out all their cursed traines,
And let them vanish out of sight.
16 The Lord as King for euer raignes.

From forth his coasts, the heathen sect
17 Are rooted quite: thou Lord attendst
To poore meas sutes; thou deo'st direct
Their hearts: to them toine eare thou bendst;
18 That thou maist rescue from despight,
The wofull fatherlesse, and poore:
That so, the vaine and earthen wight
On vs may tyrannize no more.

A PREMONITION, OF THE TITLE AND VSE of Characters.

READER,

THe Diuines of the old Heathens were their Morall Philosophers: These receiued the Acts of an inbred law, in the Sinai of Nature, and deliuered them with many expositions to the multitude: These were the Ouerseers of manners, Correctors of vices, Directors of liues, Doctors of vertue, which yet taught their people the body of their naturall Diuinitie, not after one manner: while some spent themselues in deepe discourses of humane felicitie, and the way to it in common; others thought it best to apply the generall precepts of goodnesse or decency, to particular conditions and persons. A third sort in a meane course betwixt the two other, and compounded of them both, bestowed their time in drawing out the true lineaments of euerie vertue and vice, so liuely, that who saw the medals, might know the face: which Art they significantly tearmed Charactery. Their papers were so many tables, their writings so many speaking pictures, or liuing images, whereby the ruder multitude might euen by their sense learne to know vertue, and discerne what to detest. I am deceiued if any course could be more likely to preuaile; for herein the grosse conceit is led on with pleasure, and informed while it feeles nothing but delight: And if pictures haue beene accounted the bookes of Idiots, behold here the benefit of an image without without the offence. It is no shame for vs to learne wit of Heathens; neither is it materiall, in whose Schoole we take out a good lesson: yea, it is more shame not to follow their good, than not to lead them better. As one therefore that in worthy examples hold imitation better than inuention, I haue trod in their paths, but with an higher and wider steppe; and out of their Tablets haue drawne these larger portraitures of both sorts. More might be said, I deny not, of euery Vertue, of euery Vice: I desired not to say all, but enough. If thou doe but reade or like these, I haue spent good houres ill; but if thou shalt hence abiure those Vices, which before thou thoughtest not ill-fauoured, or fall in loue with any of these goodly faces of Vertue; or shalt hence finde where thou hast any little touch of these euils, to cleare thy selfe, or where any defect in these graces to supply it, neither of vs shall need to repent of our labour.

THE FIRST BOOKE.

CHARACTERISMES OF VERTVES.

THE PROOEME.

VErtue is not loued enough, because she is not seene; and Vice loseth much detestation, because her vglinesse is secret. Certainly, my Lords, there are so many beauties, and so many graces in the face of Goodnesse, that no eye can possibly see it without affection, without rauishment: and the visage of Euill is so monstrous through loathsome deformities, that if her louers were not ignorant, they would be mad with disdaine, and astonishment. What need we more than to discouer these two to the world? This worke shall saue the labour of exhorting, and dissuasion. I haue here done it as I could, following that ancient Master of Morality, who thought this the fittest taske for the ninety and ninth yeere of his age, and the profitablest monument that he could leaue for a fare-well to his Grecians. Loe here then Vertue and Vice stript naked to the open view, and despoiled, one of her rags, the other of her ornaments, and nothing left them but bare presence to pleade for affection: see now whether shall finde more suters. And if still the vaine mindes of lewd men shall dote vpon their old mistresse, it will appeare to be, not because she is not foule, but for that they are blinde, and bewitched. And first behold the goodly features of Wisdome, an amiable vertue, and worthy to leade this Stage: which as she extends her selfe to all the following Graces, so amongst the rest is for her largenesse most conspicuous.

Theophrastus.

CHARACTER OF THE WISE MAN.

THere is nothing that hee desires not to know, but most and first himselfe; and not so much his owne strength, as his weaknesses; neither is his knowledge reduced to discourse, but practice. Hee is a skilfull Logician, not by nature so much as vse; his working minde doth nothing all his time but make syllogismes, and draw out conclusions; euery thing that hee sees and heares, serues for one of the premisses: with these hee cares first to informe himselfe, then to direct others. Both his eies are neuer at once from home, but one keepes house while the other roues abroad for intelligence. In materiall and weightie points he abides not his minde suspended in vncertainties; but hates doubting, where hee may, where he should be resolute: and first he makes sure worke for his soule; accounting it no safetie to bee vnsetled in the fore-knowledge of his finall estate. The best is first regarded; and vaine is that regard which endeth not in securitie. Euery care hath his iust order; neither is there any one either neglected or misplaced. Hee is seldome ouerseene with credulitie; for knowing the falsenesse of the world, hee hath learn'd to trust himselfe alwaies; others so farre, as hee may not bee dammaged by their disappointment. He seekes his quietnesse in secrecie, and is wont both to hide himselfe in retirednesse, and his tongue in himselfe. He loues to be ghessed at, not knowne; and to see the world vnseene; and when he is forced into the light, shewes by his actions that his obscuritie was neither from affectation nor weaknesse. His purposes are neither so variable as may argue inconstancie; nor obstinately vnchangeable, but framed according to his after-wits, or the strength of new occasions. He is both an apt scholler and an excellent master; for both euery thing he sees informes him, and his minde enriched with plentifull obseruation, can giue the best precepts. His free discourse runs backe to the ages past, and recouers euents out of memorie, and then preuenteth Time in flying forward to future things; and comparing one with the other, can giue a verdict well-neere propheticall: wherein his coniectures are better than anothers iudgements. His passions are so many good seruants, which stand in a diligent attendance ready to be commanded by reason, by Religion; and if at any time forgetting their duty, they be miscarried to rebell, he can first conceale their mutinie; then suppresse it. In all his iust and worthy designes, hee is neuer at a losse, but hath so projected all his courses, that a second begins where the first failed; and fetcheth strength from that which succeeded not. There be wrongs which he will not see; neither doth he alwaies looke that way which he meaneth; nor take notice of his secret smarts, when they come from great ones. In good turnes, he loues not to owe more than he must; in euill, to owe and not pay. Iust censures he deserues not, for he liues without the compasse of an aduersarie; vniust he contemneth, and had rather suffer false infamie to die alone, than lay hands vpon it in an open violence. He confineth himselfe in the circle of his owne affaires, and lists not to thrust his finger into a needlesse fire. Hee stands like a center vnmoued, while the circumference of his estate is drawne aboue, beneath, about him. Finally, his wit hath cost him much; and he can both keepe, and value, and imploy it. He is his owne Lawyer; the treasurie of knowledge, the oracle of counsell; blinde in no mans cause, best-sighted in his owne.

Of an Honest man.

HE lookes not to what hee might doe, but what hee should. Iustice is his first guide, the second law of his actions, is expedience. Hee had rather complaine than offend, and hates sinne more for the indignitie of it, than the danger: his simple vprightnesse workes in him that confidence, which oft times wrongs him, and giues aduantage to the subtill, when he rather pitties their faithlesnesse, than repents of his credulitie: hee hath but one heart, and that lies open to sight; and were it not for discretion, hee neuer thinkes ought whereof he would auoid a witnesse: his word is his parchment, and his yea, his oath, which hee will not violate for feare, or for losse. The mis-haps of following euents, may cause him to blame his prouidence, can neuer cause him to eat his promise: neither saith he, This I saw not; but, This I said. When hee is made his friends Executor, he defrayes debts, payes legacies, and scorneth to gaine by Orphans, or to ransacke graues; and therefore will be true to a dead friend, because he sees him not. All his dealings are square, and aboue the boord: he bewraies the fault of what he sells, and restores the ouerseene gaine of a false reckoning. He esteemes a bribe venomous, though it come guilded ouer with the colour of gratuitie. His cheekes are neuer stained with the blushes of recantation; neither doth his tongue falter, to make good a lie with the secret gloses of double or reserued senses; and when his name is traduced, his innocencie beares him out with courage: then, loe, hee goes on the plaine way of truth, and will either triumph in his integritie, or suffer with it. His conscience ouer-rules his prouidence; so as in all things good or ill, he respects the nature of the actions, not the sequell. If he see what he must doe, let God see what shall follow. He neuer loadeth himselfe with burdens aboue his strength, beyond his will; and once bound, what he can he will doe; neither doth he will but what he can doe. His eare is the Sanctuarie of his absent friends name, of his present friends secret: neither of them can mis-carry in his trust. Hee remembers the wrongs of his youth, and repaies them with that vsurie which he himselfe would not take. Hee would rather want, than borrow, and begge, than not to pay: his faire conditions are without dissembling; and he loues actions aboue words. Finally, he hates falshood worse than death: he is a faithfull client of truth; no mans enemie; and it is a question, Whether more another mans friend or his owne; and if there were no heauen, yet he would be vertuous.

Of the Faithfull man.

HIs eies haue no other obiects, but absent and inuisible; which they see so cleerly, as that to them, sense is blinde: that which is present, they see not: if I may not rather say, that what is past or future, is present to them. Herein he exceeds all others, that to him nothing is impossible, nothing difficult, whether to beare, or vndertake. He walkes euery day with his Maker, and talkes with him familiarly, and liues euer in heauen, and sees all earthly things beneath him: when he goes in, to conuerse with God, he weares not his owne clothes, but takes them still out of the rich Wardrobe of his Redeemer, and then dare boldly prease in and challenge a blessing. The celestiall spirits doe not scorne his company, yea, his seruice. He deales in these worldly affaires as a stranger, and hath his heart euer at home: without a written warrant he dare dare doe nothing, and with it any thing. His warre is perpetuall, without truce, without intermission; and his victorie certaine: he meets with the infernall powers, and tramples them vnder feet. The shield that he euer beares before him, can neither be misſed, nor pierced; if his hand be wounded, yet his heart is safe: he is often tripped, seldome foyled; and if sometimes foyled, neuer vanquished. He hath white hands, and a cleane soule, fit to lodge God in, all the roomes whereof are set apart for his Holinesse: Iniquitie hath oft called at the doore, and craued entertainment, but with a repulse; or if sinne of force will be his tenant, his Lord hee cannot. His faults are few, and those hee hath, God will not see. Hee is allied so high, that hee dare call God Father, his Sauiour Brother, heauen his patrimonie, and thinkes it no presumption to trust to the attendance of Angels. His vnderstanding is inlightened with the beames of diuine truth; God hath acquainted him with his will; and what he knowes, hee dare confesse: there is not more loue in his heart, than libertie in his tongue. If torments stand betwixt him and Christ, if death, he contemnes them; and if his owne parents lie in his way to God, his holy carelesnesse makes them his foot-steps. His experiments haue drawne forth rules of confidence, which he dares oppose against all the feares of distrust: wherein he thinks it safe to charge God with what he hath done; with what he hath promised. Examples are his proofes, and instances his demonstrations. What hath God giuen, which he cannot giue? What haue others suffered, which he may not bee enabled to endure? Is hee threatened banishment? There he sees the deare Euangelist in Pathmos. Cutting in peeces? he sees Esay vnder the saw. Drowning? he sees Ionas diuing into the liuing gulfe. Burning? he sees the three Children in the hot walke of the Furnace. Deuouring? he sees Daniel in the sealed denne amids his terrible companions. Stoning? hee sees the first Martyr vnder his heape of many graue-stones. Heading? loe there the Baptists necke bleeding in Herodias platter. He emulates their paine, their strength, their glory. He wearies not himselfe with cares; for he knowes hee liues not of his owne cost: not idlely, omitting meanes, but not vsing them with diffidence. In the midst of ill rumors and amazements, his countenance changeth not; for he knowes both whom hee hath trusted, and whither death can leade him. He is not so sure he shall die, as that he shall be restored; and out-faceth his death with his resurrection. Finally, he is rich in workes, busie in obedience, cheerefull and vnmoued in expectation, better with euils, in common opinion miserable, but in true iudgement more than a man.

Of the Humble-man.

HE is a friendly enemie to himselfe: for though hee bee not out of his owne fauour, no man sets so low a value of his worth as himselfe; not out of ignorance, or carelesnesse, but of a voluntarie and meeke dejectednesse. Hee admires euery thing in another, whiles the same or better in himselfe hee thinkes not vnworthily contemned: his eies are full of his owne wants, and others perfections. Hee loues rather to giue than take honour, not in a fashion of complementall courtesie, but in simplicitie of his iudgement; neither doth hee fret at those, on whom hee forceth precedencie, as one that hoped their modestie would haue refused; but holds his minde vnfainedly below his place, and is ready to goe lower (if need bee) without discontent. When he hath but his due, he magnifieth courtesie, and disclaimes his deserts. He can be more ashamed of honour, than grieued with contempt; because hee thinkes that causelesse, this deserued. His face, his cariage, his habit, sauour of lowlinesse without affectation, and, yet he is much vnder that he seemeth. His words are few and soft, neuer either peremptorie or censorious, because hee thinkes both each man more wise, and none more faultie than himselfe: and when he approcheth to the Throne of God, he is so taken vp with the diuine greatnesse, that in his owne eies he is either vile or nothing.

Places

Places of publike charge are faine to sue to him, and hale him out of his chosen obscuritie; which he holds off, not cunningly to cause importunitie, but sincerely in the conscience of his defects. He frequenteth not the stages of common resorts, and then alone thinkes himselfe in his naturall element, when hee is shrowded within his owne walls. He is euer iealous ouer himselfe, and still suspecteth that which others applaud. There is no better obiect of beneficence; for what he receiues, he ascribes meerely to the bountie of the giuer; nothing to merit. He emulates no man in any thing but goodnesse, and that with more desire, than hope to ouertake. No man is so contented with his little, and so patient vnder miseries, because he knowes the greatest euils are below his sinnes, and the least fauours aboue his deseruings. He walkes euer in awe, and dare not but subiect euery word and action to an high and iust censure. Hee is a lowly valley sweetly planted, and well watered; the proud mans earth, whereon he trampleth; but secretly full of wealthy Mines, more worth than he that walkes ouer them; a rich stone set in lead; and lastly, a true Temple of God built with a low roofe.

Of a Valiant man.

HE vndertakes without rashnesse, and performes without feare: hee seekes not for dangers; but when they finde him, hee beares them ouer with courage, with successe. He hath oft-times lookt Death in the face, and passed by it with a smile, and when he sees he must yeeld, doth at once welcome and contemne it. Hee fore-casts the worst of all euents, and encounters them before they come in a secret and mentall warre; and if the suddennesse of an vnexpected euill haue surprized his thoughts, and infected his cheekes with paleneſse; he hath no sooner digested it in his conceit, than he gathers vp himselfe, and insults ouer mischiefe. Hee is the master of himselfe, and subdues his passions to reason; and by this inward victorie workes his owne peace. He is afraid of nothing but the displeasure of the Highest, and runnes away from nothing but sinne: he lookes not on his hands, but his cause; not how strong he is, but how innocent: and where goodnesse is his warrant, he may be ouer-mastered, he cannot be foiled. The sword is to him the last of all trials, which he drawes forth still as Defendant, not as Challenger, with a willing kinde of vnwillingnesse: no man can better manage it, with more safetie, with more fauour: hee had rather haue his bloud seene than his backe; and disdaines life vpon base conditions. No man is more milde to a relenting or vanquisht aduersarie, or more hates to set his foot on a carcase. He had rather smother an iniurie, than reuenge himselfe of the impotent: and I know not whether more detests cowardlinesse or crueltie. He talkes little, and brags lesse; and loues rather the silent language of the hand; to be seene than heard. He lies euer close within himselfe, armed with wise resolution, and will not be discouered but by death or danger. He is neither prodigall of bloud to mis-spend it idlely, nor niggardly to grudge it, when either God calls for it, or his Countrey; neither is hee more liberall of his owne life, than of others. His power is limited by his will, and he holds it the noblest reuenge, that he might hurt and doth not. He commands without tyrannie and imperiousnesse, obeyes without seruilitie, and changes not his minde with his estate. The height of his spirits ouer-lookes all casualties, and his boldnesse proceeds neither from ignorance nor senselesnesse: but first he values euils, and then despises them: he is so ballaced with wisdome, that he floats steddily in the midst of all tempests. Deliberate in his purposes, firme in resolution, bold in enterprising, vnwearied in atchieuing, and howsoeuer, happy in successe: and if euer he be ouercome, his heart yeelds last.

Of a Patient man.

THe patient man is made of a metall, not ſo hard as flexible: his ſhoulders are large, fit for a load of iniuries; which he beares not out of baſeneſſe and cowardlineſſe, becauſe he dare not reuenge, but out of Chriſtian fortitude, becauſe he may not: he hath ſo conquered himſelfe, that wrongs cannot conquer him; and herein alone findes, that victory conſiſts in yeelding. He is aboue nature, while he ſeemes below himſelfe. The vildeſt creature knowes how to turne againe; but to command himſelfe not to reſiſt being vrged, is more than heroicall. His conſtructions are euer full of charity and fauour; either this wrong was not done, or not with intent of wrong; or if that, vpon miſ-information; or if none of theſe, raſhneſſe (though a fault) ſhall ſerue for an excuſe. Himſelfe craues the offenders pardon, before his confeſſion; and a ſlight anſwer contents, where the offended deſires to forgiue. He is Gods beſt witneſſe, & when he ſtands before the barre for truth, his tongue is calmely free, his forehead firme, and hee with erect and ſetled countenance heares his iuſt ſentence, and reioyces in it. The Iaylors that attend him, are to him his Pages of honour; his dungeon, the lower part of the vault of heauen; his racke or wheele, the ſtaires of his aſcent to glory; he challengeth his executioners, and encounters the fierceſt paines with ſtrength of reſolution, and while he ſuffers, the beholders pity him, the tormentors complaine of wearineſſe, and both of them wonder. No anguiſh can maſter him, whether by violence or by lingring. He accounts expectation no puniſhment, & can abide to haue his hopes adiourned till a new day. Good lawes ſerue for his protection, not for his reuenge; and his owne power, to auoid indignities, not to returne them. His hopes are ſo ſtrong, that they can inſult ouer the greateſt diſcouragements; and his apprehenſions ſo deepe, that when he hath once faſtned, he ſooner leaueth his life than his hold. Neither time nor peruerſneſſe can make him caſt off his charitable endeuours, and deſpaire of preuailing; but in ſpight of all croſſes, and all denials, he redoubleth his beneficiall offers of loue. He trieth the ſea after many ſhip-wracks, & beats ſtill at that doore which he neuer ſaw opened. Contrariety of euents doth but exerciſe, not diſmay him; and when croſſes afflict him, he ſees a diuine hand inuiſibly ſtriking with theſe ſenſible ſcourges: againſt which hee dares not rebell, nor murmure. Hence all things befall him alike; and he goes with the ſame minde to the ſhambles, and to the fold. His recreations are calme and gentle; and not more full of relaxation than void of fury. This man onely can turne neceſſity into vertue, and put euill to good vſe. He is the ſureſt friend, the lateſt and eaſieſt enemy, the greateſt conqueror, and ſo much more happy than others, by how much he could abide to be more miſerable.

Of the true Friend.

HIs affections are both vnited and diuided; vnited to him hee loueth; diuided betwixt another and himſelfe; and his owne heart is ſo parted, that whiles he hath ſome, his friend hath all. His choice is led by vertue, or by the beſt of vertues, Religion; not by gaine, not by pleaſure; yet not without reſpect of equal condition, of diſpoſition not vnlike; which once made, admits of no change, except hee whom he loueth, be changed quite from himſelfe; nor that ſuddenly, but after long expectation. Extremity doth but faſten him, whiles he, like a well-wrought vault, lies the ſtronger, by how much more weight he beares. When neceſſity calls him to it, he can be a ſeruant to his equall, with the ſame will wherwith he can command his inferior; and though he riſe rise to honor, forgets not his familiarity, nor suffers inequality of estate to work strangenesse of countenance; on the other side, he lifts vp his friend to aduancement, with a willing hand, without enuy, without dissimulation. When his mate is dead, he accounts himselfe but halfe aliue; then his loue not dissolued by death, derines it selfe to those orphans which neuer knew the price of their father; they become the heires of his affection, and the burthen of his cares. He embraces a free community of all things, saue those which either honesty reserues proper, or nature; and hates to enioy that which would doe his friend more good: his charity serues to cloke noted infirmities, not by vntruth, not by flattery, but by discreet secrecy; neither is he more fauourable in concealement, than round in his priuate reprehensions; and when anothers simple fidelity shewes it selfe in his reproofe, hee loues his monitor so much the more, by how much more hee smarteth. His bosome is his friends closet, where hee may safely lay vp his complaints, his doubts, his cares; and looke how he leaues, so he findes them; saue for some additiall of seasonable counsell for redresse. If some vnhappy suggestion shall either distaine his affection, or breake it, it soone knits againe, and growes the stronger by that streine. He is so sensible of anothers iniuries, that when his friend is stricken, he cries out, and equally smarteth vntouched, as one affected not with sympathy, but with a reall feeling of paine: and in what mischiefe may be preuented, he interposeth his aid, and offers to redeeme his friend with himselfe; no houre can be vnseasonable, no businesse difficult, no paine grieuous in condition of his ease: and what either he doth or suffereth, he neither cares nor desires to haue knowne; lest he should seeme to looke for thanks. If hee can therefore steale the performance of a good office vnseene, the conscience of his faithfulnesse herein is so much sweeter as it is more secret. In fauours done, his memory is fraile, in benefits receiued, eternall: he scorneth either to regard recompence, or not to offer it. He is the comfort of miseries, the guide of difficulties, the ioy of life, the treasure of earth; and no other than a good Angell cloathed in flesh.

Of the Truly-Noble.

HE stands not vpon what he borrowed of his Ancestors, but thinkes hee must worke out his owne honour: and if hee cannot reach the vertue of them that gaue him outward glory by inheritance, hee is more abashed of his impotencie, than transported with a great name. Greatnesse doth not make him scornfull and imperious, but rather like the fixed starres; the higher he is, the lesse he desires to seeme. Neither cares he so much for pompe and frothy ostentation, as for the solid truth of Nobleneſſe. Courtesie and sweet affability can be no more seuered from him, than life from his soule; not out of a base and seruile popularity, and desire of ambitious insinuation; but of a natiue gentleneſſe of disposition, and true value of himselfe. His hand is open & bounteous, yet not so, as that he should rather respect his glory, than his estate; wherein his wisdome can distinguish betwixt parasites and friends, betwixt changing of fauours and expending them. He scorneth to make his height a priuilege of loosenesse, but accounts his titles vaine, if he be inferiour to others in goodnesse: and this as he should be more strict, the more eminent he is; because he is more obserued, and now his offences are become exemplar. There is no vertue that he holds vnfit for ornament, for vse; nor any vice which he condemnes not as sordid, and a fit companion of basenes; and whereof he doth not more hate the blemish, than affect the pleasure. He so studies, as one that knowes, ignorance can neither purchase honor, nor wield it; and that knowledge must both guide and grace him. His exercises are from his childhood ingenious, manly, decent, and such as tend still to wit, valor, actiuity: and if (as seldome) he descend to disports of chance, his games shall neuer make him either pale with feare, or hot with desire of gaine. Hee doth not so vse his followers, as if he thought they were made for nothing

nothing but his ſeruitude; whoſe felicity were only to be commanded and pleaſe: wearing them to the backe, and then either finding or framing excuſes to diſcard them empty; but vpon all opportunities lets them feele the ſweetneſſe of their owne ſeruiceableneſſe and his bounty. Silence in officious ſeruice is the beſt Oratory to plead for his reſpect: all diligence is but lent to him, none loſt. His wealth ſtands in receiuing, his honour in giuing: he cares not either how many hold of his goodneſſe, or to how few he is beholden: and if he haue caſt away fauours, he hates either to vpbraid them to his enemie, or to challenge reſtitution. None can bee more pitifull to the diſtreſſed, or more prone to ſuccour; and then moſt, where is leaſt meanes to ſollicite, leaſt poſſibility of requitall. He is equally addreſſed to warre and peace; and knows not more how to command others, than how to be his Countries ſeruant in both. He is more carefull to giue true honour to his Maker, than to receiue ciuill honour from men. Hee knowes that this ſeruice is free and noble, and euer loaded with ſincere glory; and how vaine it is to hunt after applauſe from the world, till he be ſure of him that moldeth all hearts, and powreth contempt on Princes; and ſhortly, ſo demeans himſelfe, as one that accounts the body of Nobility to conſiſt in Blood, the ſoule in the eminence of Vertue.

Of the good Magiſtrate.

HE is the faithfull Deputy of his Maker, whoſe obedience is the rule whereby he ruleth: his breſt is the Ocean whereinto all the cares of priuate men empty themſelues; which as he receiues without complaint and ouerflowing, ſo hee ſends them forth againe by a wiſe conueyance in the ſtreames of iuſtice: his dores, his eares are euer open to ſuters; and not who comes firſt ſpeeds well, but whoſe cauſe is beſt. His nights, his meales are ſhort and interrupted; all which he beares well, becauſe he knowes himſelfe made for a publike ſeruant of Peace and Iuſtice. Hee ſits quietly at the ſterne, and commands one to the top-ſaile, another to the maine, a third to the plummet, a fourth to the anchor, as hee ſees the need of their courſe and weather requires; and doth no leſſe by his tongue, than all the Marriners with their hands. On the Bench he is another from himſelfe at home; now all priuate reſpects of bloud, alliance, amity are forgotten; and if his owne Sonne come vnder tryall, hee knowes him not: Pity which in all others is wont to be the beſt praiſe of humanity, and the fruit of Chriſtian loue, is by him throwne ouer the barre for corruption: as for Fauour, the falſe Aduocate of the gracious, he allowes him not to appeare in the Court; there only cauſes are heard ſpeake, not perſons: Eloquence is then only not diſcouraged, when ſhe ſerues for a Client of truth: meere narrations are allowed in this Oratory, not Proems, not excurſions, not Gloſſes: Truth muſt ſtrip her ſelfe, and come in naked to his barre, without falſe bodies, or colors without diſguiſes: A bride in his Cloſet, or a letter on the Bench, or the whiſpering and winks of a great neighbour, are anſwered with an angry and couragious repulſe. Diſpleaſure, Reuenge, Recompence ſtand on both ſides the Bench, but he ſcornes to turne his eye towards them; looking onely right forward at Equity, which ſtands full before him. His ſentence is euer deliberate and guided with ripe wiſdome, yet his hand is ſlower than his tongue; but when he is vrged by occaſion either to doome or execution, he ſhewes how much he hateth mercifull iniuſtice: neither can his reſolution or act be reuerſed with partiall importunitie. His forehead is rugged and ſeuere, able to diſcountenance villany, yet his words are more awfull than his brow, and his hand than his words. I know not whether he be more feared or loued, both affections are ſo ſweetly contempered in all hearts. The good feare him louingly, the middle ſort loue him fearefully, and only the wicked man feares him ſlauiſhly without loue. He hates to pay priuate wrongs with the aduantage of his Office; and if euer

euer he be partiall, it is to his enemy. He is not more sage in his gowne, than valorous in armes, and increaseth in the rigour of discipline, as the times in danger. His sword hath neither rusted for want of vse, nor fursetteth of bloud, but after many threats is vnsheathed, as the dreadfull instrument of diuine reuenge. He is the Guard of good lawes, the Refuge of innocency, the Comet of the guilty, the Pay-master of good deserts, the Champion of iustice, the Patron of peace, the Tutor of the Church, the Father of his Countrey, and as it were another God vpon earth.

Of the Penitent.

HE hath a wounded heart and a sad face; yet not so much for feare, as for vnkindnesse: The wrong of his sinne troubles him more than the danger: None but he is the better for his sorrow; neither is any passion more hurtfull to others, than this is gainfull to him; The more he seekes to hide his griefe, the lesse it will bee hid; Euery man may reade it not onely in his eyes, but in his bones. Whiles hee is in charity with all others, he is so falne out with himselfe, that none but God can reconcile him: He hath sued himselfe in all Courts, accuseth, arraigneth, sentenceth, punisheth himselfe vnpartially, and sooner may finde mercy at any hand, than at his owne. He onely hath pulled off the faire vizor of sinne; so as that appeares not but masked vnto others, is seene of him barefac'd; and bewraies that fearefull vglinesse, which none can conceiue but he that hath viewed it. Hee hath lookt into the depth of the bottomlesse pit, and hath seene his owne offence tormented in others, and the same brands shaken at him. He hath seene the change of faces in that euill one, as a tempter, as a tormenter; and hath heard the noise of a conscience, and is so frighted with all these, that he can neuer haue rest, till he haue runne out of himselfe, to God; in whose face at first, hee findes rigour, but afterwards, sweetnesse in his bosome: He bleeds first from the hand that heales him. The Law of God hath made worke for mercy; which he hath no sooner apprehended, than he forgets his wounds, and looks carelesly vpon all these terrors of guiltinesse. When he casts his eye backe vpon himselfe, he wonders where he was, and how he came there; and grants, that if there were not some witchcraft in sinne, he could not haue beene so sottishly graceless. And now, in the issue, Satan findes (not without indignation and repentance) that hee hath done him a good turne in tempting him: For he had neuer beene so good, if he had not sinned; he had neuer fought with such courage, if he had not seene his bloud, and beene ashamed of his foile. Now hee is seene, and felt in the front of the spirituall battell; and can teach others how to fight, and incourage them in fighting. His heart was neuer more taken vp with the pleasure of sinne, than now with care of auoiding it: The very sight of that cup, wherein such a fulsome potion was brought him, turnes his stomacke: the first offers of sinne make him tremble more now, than he did before at the iudgements of his sinne; neither dares he so much as looke towards Sodom: All the powers and craft of hell cannot fetch him in for a customer to euill; his infirmity may yeeld once; his resolution neuer. There is none of his senses or parts, which hee hath not within couenants for their good behauiour; which they cannot euer breake with impunity. The wrongs of his sinne he repaies to men with recompence, as hating it should be said, he owes any thing to his offence; to God (what in him lies) with sighs, teares, vowes, and endeuours of amendment. No heart is more waxen to the impressions of forgiuenesse; neither are his hands more open to receiue, than to giue pardon. All the iniuries which are offered to him, are swallowed vp in his wrongs to his Maker, and Redeemer; neither can hee call for the arrerages of his farthings, when he lookes vpon the millions forgiuen him; he feeles not what he suffers from men, when he thinks of what hee hath done, and should haue suffered. He is a thankfull Herauld of the mercies of his God; which if all the world heare not from his mouth, it is no fault of his: Neither did hee so burne with the cruell fires of concupiscence, as now with the holy flames of zeale to that glory which hee hath blemished: and his eies are full of moisture, as his heart of heat. The gates of heauen are not so knocked at by any suter, whether for frequence, or importunitie. You shall finde his cheekes furrowed, his knees hard, his lips sealed vp, saue when he must accuse himselfe, or glorifie God, his eies humbly dejected, and sometimes you shall take him breaking off a sigh in the midst; as one that would steale an humiliation vnknowne, and would be offended with any part that should not keepe his counsell. When he findes his soule oppressed with the heauy guilt of a sinne, he giues it vent thorow his mouth, into the eare of his spirituall Physician, from whom he receiues Cordials answerable to his complaint. Hee is a seuere exactor of discipline first vpon himselfe, on whom he imposes more than one Lent; then, vpon others: as one that vowed to bee reuenged on sinne whersoeuer he findes it, and though but one hath offended him, yet his detestation is vniuersall. He is his owne taske-master for deuotion; and if Christianity haue any worke more difficult, or perillous than other, that he enioynes himselfe, and resolues contentment euen in miscarriage. It is no maruell if the acquaintance of his wilder times know him not; for he is quite another from himselfe; and if his minde could haue had any intermission of dwelling within his breast, it could not haue knowne this was the lodging: Nothing but an out-side is the same it was, and that altred more with Regeneration than with age. None but he can relish the promises of the Gospell; which he findes so sweet, that he complaines not, his thirst after them is vnsatiable; and now that he hath found his Sauiour, he hugs him so fast, and holds him so deare, that he feeles not when his life is fetcht away from him, for his martyrdome. The latter part of his life is so led, as if he desired to vnliue his youth; and his last Testament is full of restitutions, and legacies of piety. In summe, he hath so liued and died, as that Satan hath no such match, sinne hath no such enemy, God hath no such seruant as he.

He is an Happy man.

THat hath learn'd to reade himselfe more than all bookes; and hath so taken out this lesson, that he can neuer forget it; That knowes the world, and cares not for it; That after many trauerses of thoughts, is growne to know what he may trust to, and stands now equally armed for all euents: That hath got the mastery at home, so as he can crosse his will without a mutiny, and so please it, that he makes it not a wanton: That in earthly things wishes no more than nature; in spirituall, is euer graciously ambitious: That for his condition, stands on his owne feet, not needing to leane vpon the great; and can so frame his thoughts to his estate, that when he hath least, he cannot want, because he is as free from desire, as superfluity: That hath seasonably broken the head-strong restinesse of prosperitie, and can now menage it at pleasure: Vpon whom, all smaller crosses light as haile-stones vpon a roofe; and for the greater calamities, he can take them as tributes of life, and tokens of loue; and if his ship be tossed, yet he is sure his Anchor is fast. If all the world were his, he could be no other than he is; no whit gladder of himselfe, no whit higher in his carriage, because he knowes, contentment lies not in the things hee hath, but in the minde that values them. The powers of his resolution can either multiply, or substract at pleasure. He can make his cottage a Mannor, or a Palace when hee lists; and his home-close, a large dominion; his staind-cloth, Arras; his earth, plate; and can see state in the attendance of one seruant; as one that hath learned, a mans greatnesse or basenesse is in himselfe; and in this, he may euen contest with the proud, that he thinks his owne the best. Or, if he must be outwardly great, he can but turne the other end of the glasse, and make his stately Man-nor a low and ſtrait Cottage; and in all his coſtly furniture hee can ſee not richneſſe, but vſe; he can ſee droſſe in the beſt mettall, and earth thorow the beſt clothes; and in all his troupe, he can ſee himſelfe his owne ſeruant. He liues quietly at home, out of the noiſe of the world, and loues to enioy himſelfe alwaies, and ſometimes his friend, and hath as full ſcope to his thoughts, as to his eies. Hee walkes euer euen, in the mid-way betwixt hopes and feares, reſolued to feare nothing but God, to hope for nothing but that which he muſt haue. Hee hath a wiſe and vertuous minde in a ſeruiceable body; which that better part affects as a preſent ſeruant, and a future companion; ſo cheriſhing his fleſh, as one that would ſcorne to be all fleſh. He hath no enemies, not for that all loue him, but becauſe he knowes to make a gaine of malice. He is not ſo ingaged to any earthly thing, that they two cannot part on euen tearmes; there is neither laughter in their meeting, nor in their ſhaking of hands, teares. He keepes euer the beſt company, the God of Spirits, and the Spirits of that God; whom he entertaines continually in an awfull familiaritie, not being hindred, either with too much light, or with none at all. His conſcience and his hand are friends, and (what Deuill ſoeuer tempt him) will not fall out. That diuine part goes euer vprightly and freely, not ſtooping vnder the burthen of a willing ſinne, not fettered with the gieues of vniuſt ſcruples. He would not, if he could, run away from himſelfe, or from God; not caring from whom he lies hid, ſo he may looke theſe two in the face. Cenſures and applauſes are paſſengers to him, not gheſts; his eare is their thorow-fare, not their harbour; he hath learned to fetch both his counſell, and his ſentence from his owne breaſt. He doth not lay weight vpon his owne ſhoulders, as one that loues to torment himſelfe with the horror of much imploiment; but as he makes worke his game, ſo doth he not liſt to make himſelfe worke. His ſtrife is euer to redeeme, and not to ſpend time. It is his trade to doe good; and to thinke of it, his recreation. He hath hands enow for himſelfe and others, which are euer ſtretched forth for beneficence, not for need. He walkes cheerefully in the way that God hath chalked, and neuer wiſhes it more wide, or more ſmooth. Thoſe very tentations whereby he is foiled, ſtrengthen him; hee comes forth crowned, and triumphing out of the ſpirituall Battels, and thoſe ſcarres that he hath, make him beautifull. His ſoule is euery day dilated to receiue that God, in whom he is; and hath attained to loue himſelfe for God, and God for his owne ſake. His eies ſtick ſo faſt in heauen, that no earthly obiect can remoue them; yea his whole ſelfe is there before his time, and ſees with Steuen, and heares with Paul, and enioyes with Lazarus, the glorie that he ſhall haue; and takes poſſeſſion before-hand of his roome amongſt the Saints: and theſe heauenly contentments haue ſo taken him vp, that now he lookes downe diſpleaſedly vpon the earth, as the region of his ſorrow and baniſhment; yet ioying more in hope, than troubled with the ſenſe of euils; he holds it no great matter to liue, and his greateſt buſineſſe to die: and is ſo well acquainted with his laſt gheſt, that he feares no vnkindneſſe from him: neither makes he any other of dying, than of walking home when he is abroad, or of going to bed when he is weary of the day. He is well prouided for both worlds, and is ſure of peace here, of glory hereafter; and therefore hath a light heart, and a cheerefull face. All his fellow-creatures reioyce to ſerue him; his betters, the Angels, loue to obſerue him; God himſelfe takes pleaſure to conuerſe with him, and hath Sainted him afore his death, and in his death crowned him.

THE SECOND BOOKE.

CHARACTERISMES OF VICES.

By Ios. Hall.

THE PROOEME.

I Haue ſhewed you many faire Vertues: I ſpeake not for them; if their ſight cannot command affection, let them loſe it. They ſhall pleaſe yet better, after you haue troubled your eies a little with the view of deformities; and by how much more they pleaſe, ſo much more odious, and like themſelues, ſhall theſe deformities appeare. This light, contraries giue to each other, in the midſt of their enmitie, that one makes the other ſeeme more good, or ill. Perhaps in ſome of theſe (which thing I doe at once feare, and hate) my ſtile ſhall ſeeme to ſome leſſe graue, more Satyricall: if you finde mee not without cauſe iealous, let it pleaſe you to impute it to the nature of thoſe Vices, which will not bee otherwiſe handled. The faſhions of ſome euils are beſides the odiouſneſſe, ridiculous; which to repeat, is to ſeeme bitterly merry. I abhorre to make ſport with wickedneſſe, and forbid any laughter here, but of diſdaine. Hypocriſie ſhall leade this ring; worthily, I thinke, becauſe both ſhe commeth neereſt to Vertue, and is the worſt of Vices.

CHARACTER OF THE HYPOCRITE.

AN Hypocrite is the worſt kinde of Plaier, by ſo much as he acts the better part; which hath alwaies two faces, oft times two hearts: That can compoſe his forehead to ſadneſſe and grauitie, while he bids his heart bee wanton and careleſſe within, and (in the meane time) laughs within himſelfe, to thinke how ſmoothly he hath coozened the beholder. In whoſe ſilent face are written the characters of Religion, which his tongue and geſtures pronounce, but his hands recant. That hath a cleane face and garment, with a foule ſoule: whoſe mouth belies his heart, and his fingers belie his mouth. Walking early vp into the Citie, he turnes into the great Church, and ſalutes one of the pillars on one knee, worſhipping that God which at home he cares not for; while his eie is fixed on ſome window, on ſome paſſenger, and his heart knowes not whither his lips goe. Hee riſes, and looking about with admiration, complaines on our frozen charitie, commends the ancient. At Church he will euer ſit where he may be ſeene beſt, and in the middeſt of the Sermon puls out his Tables in haſte, as if he feared to leeſe that note; when he writes either his forgotten errand, or nothing: then he turnes his Bible with a noyſe, to ſeeke an omitted quotation; and folds the leafe, as if he had found it; and askes aloud the name of the Preacher, and repeats it, whom hee publikely ſalutes, thankes, praiſes, inuites, entertaines with tedious good counſell, with good diſcourſe, if it had come from an honeſter mouth. He can command teares when he ſpeakes of his youth; indeed becauſe it is paſt, not becauſe it was ſinfull: himſelfe is now better, but the times are worſe. All other ſinnes he reckons vp with deteſtation, while he loues and hides his darling in his boſome. All his ſpeech returnes to himſelfe, and euery occurrent drawes in a ſtorie to his owne praiſe. When he ſhould giue, he lookes about him, and ſaies, Who ſees me? No almes, no praiers fall from him without a witneſſe; belike leſt God ſhould denie that he hath receiued them: and when he hath done (leſt the world ſhould not know it) his owne mouth is his Trumpet to proclaime it. With the ſuperfluitie of his vitaile he builds an Hoſpitall, and harbours them whom his extortion hath ſpoiled; ſo while he makes many beggers, he keepes ſome. He turneth all Gnats into Camels, and cares not to vndoe the world for a circumſtance. Fleſh on a Friday is more abomination to him than his neighbours bed: He abhorres more not to vncouer at the name of Ieſus, than to ſweare by the name of God. When a Rimer reads his Poeme to him, he begs a Copie, and perſwades the Preſſe; there is nothing that hee diſlikes in preſence, that in abſence hee cenſures not. Hee comes to the ſicke bed of his ſtepmother, and weepes, when hee ſecretly feares her recouerie. Hee greets his friend in the ſtreet with ſo cleere a countenance, ſo faſt a cloſure, that the other thinkes hee reads his heart in his face; and ſhakes hands with an indefinite inuitation of When will you come? and when when his backe is turned, ioyes that he is ſo well rid of a gueſt: yet if that gueſt viſit him vnfeared, he counterfets a ſmiling welcome, and excuſes his cheare, when cloſely he frownes on his wife for too much. Hee ſhewes well, and faies well; and himſelfe is the worſt thing he hath. In briefe, he is the ſtrangers Saint, the neighbours diſeaſe, the blot of goodneſſe; a rotten ſticke in a darke night, a Poppie in a corne field, an ill tempered candle with a great ſnuffe, that in going out ſmells ill; and an Angell abroad, a Deuill at home; and worſe when an Angell, than when a Deuill.

Of the Buſie-body.

HIs eſtate is too narrow for his minde, and therefore hee is faine to make himſelfe roome in others affaires: yet euer in pretence of loue. No newes can ſtir but by his doore; neither can hee know that, which hee muſt not tell. What euery man ventures in Guiana voyage, and what they gained, hee knowes to a haire. Whether Holland will haue peace, he knowes, and on what conditions, and with what ſucceſſe, is familiar to him ere it be concluded. No Poſt can paſſe him without a queſtion, and rather than he will leeſe the newes, hee rides backe with him to appoſe him of tidings; and then to the next man he meets, he ſupplies the wants of his haſtie intelligence, and makes vp a perfect tale; wherewith he ſo haunteth the patient auditor, that after many excuſes, he is faine to endure rather the cenſure of his manners in running away, than the tedioufneſſe of an impertinent diſcourſe. His ſpeech is oft broken off with a ſucceſſion of long parentheſis, which he euer vowes to fill vp ere the concluſion, and perhaps would effect it, if the others eare were as vnwearіable as his tongue. If he ſee but two men talke and reade a letter in the ſtreet, he runnes to them, and askes if he may not be partner of that ſecret relation; and if they denie it, hee offers to tell, ſince he may not heare, wonders: and then falls vpon the report of the Scottiſh Mine, or of the great Fiſh taken vp at Linne, or of the freezing of the Thames; and after many thankes and diſmiſſions, is hardly intreated ſilence. He vndertakes as much as he performes little: this man will thruſt himſelfe forward to bee the guide of the way hee knowes not; and calls at his neighbours window, and askes why his ſeruants are not at worke. The Market hath no commoditie which hee prizeth not, and which the next table ſhall not heare recited. His tongue, like the taile of Samſons Foxes, carries firebrands, and is enough to ſet the whole field of the world on a flame. Himſelfe begins table-talke of his neighbour at anothers boord; to whom he beares the firſt newes, and adiures him to conceale the reporter: whoſe cholericke anſwer he returnes to his firſt Oaſt, inlarged with a ſecond edition; ſo, as it vſes to be done in the fight of vnwilling Maſtiues, hee claps each on the ſide apart, and prouokes them to an eager conflict. There can no Act paſſe without his Comment, which is euer farre-fetcht, raſh, ſuſpicious, delatorie. His eares are long, and his eies quicke, but moſt of all to imperfections; which as he eaſily ſees, ſo hee increaſes with intermedling. He harbours another mans ſeruant, and amids his entertainment askes what fare is vſuall at home, what houres are kept, what talke paſſeth their meales, what his maſters diſpoſition is, what his gouernment, what his gueſts? and when hee hath by curious inquiries extracted all the iuice and ſpirit of hoped intelligence, turnes him off whence he came, and workes on a new. He hates conſtancie as an earthen dulneſſe, vnfit for men of ſpirit: and loues to change his worke and his place; neither yet can he be ſo ſoone wearie of any place, as euery place is wearie of him; for as he ſets himſelfe on worke, ſo others pay him with hatred, and looke how many maſters he hath, ſo many enemies: neither is it poſſible that any ſhould not hate him, but who know him not. So then hee labours without thanks, talkes without credit, liues without loue, dies without teares, without pittie; ſaue that ſome ſay it was pittie he died no ſooner.

Of

Of the Superſtitious.

SVperſtition is godleſſe Religion, deuout impietie. The ſuperſtitious is fond in obſeruation, ſeruil: in feare, he worſhips God but as he liſts: he giues God what he askes not, more than he askes; and all but what he ſhould giue; and makes more ſinne than the Ten Commandements. This man dares not ſtirre forth till his breſt be croſſed, and his face ſprinkled: if but an Hare croſſe him the way, he returnes; or if his iourney began vnawares on the diſmall day; or if he ſtumble at the threſhold. If he ſee a Snake vnkilled, he feares a miſchiefe; if the ſalt fall towards him, hee lookes pale and red, and is not quiet till one of the waiters haue powred wine on his lappe; and when he neezeth, thinkes them not his friends that vncouer not. In the morning hee liſtens whether the Crow crieth euen or odde, and by that token preſages of the weather. If he heare but a Rauen croke from the next roofe, he makes his will; or if a Bittour flie ouer his head by night: but if his troubled fancie ſhall ſecond his thoughts with the dreame of a faire garden, or greene ruſhes, or the ſalutation of a dead friend, he takes leaue of the world, and ſaies he cannot liue. He will neuer ſet to ſea but on a Sunday; neither euer goes without an Erra Pater in his pocket. Saint Paules day and Saint Swithunes with the Twelue, are his Oracles; which hee dares beleeue againſt the Almanacke. When he lies ſicke on his death-bed, no ſinne troubles him ſo much, as that he did once eat fleſh on a Friday, no repentance can expiate that; the reſt need none. There is no dreame of his without an interpretation, without a prediction; and if the euent anſwer not his expoſition, hee expounds it according to the euent. Euery darke groue and pictured wall ſtrikes him with an awfull, but carnall deuotion. Old wiues and Starres are his counſellers; his night ſpell is his guard, and charmes his Phyſitian. He weares Paracelſian Characters for the tooth-ach, and a little hollowed wax is his Antidote for all euils. This man is ſtrangely credulous, and cals impoſſible things, miraculous: If he heare that ſome ſacred blocke ſpeakes, moues, weepes, ſmiles, his bare feet carry him thither with an offering: and if a danger miſſe him in the way, his Saint hath the thankes. Some way he will not goe, and ſome he dares not; either there are bugges, or he faineth them; euery lanterne is a ghoſt, and euery noiſe is of chaines. He knowes not why, but his cuſtome is to goe a little about, and to leaue the Croſſe ſtill on the right hand. One euent is enough to make a rule; out of theſe hee concludes faſhions proper to himſelfe, and nothing can turne him out of his owne courſe. If hee haue done his taske, hee is ſafe, it matters not with what affection. Finally, if God will let him be the caruer of his owne obedience, he could not haue a better ſubiect, as he is, he cannot haue a worſe.

Of the Profane.

THe Superſtitious hath too many gods: the Profane man hath none at all, vnleſſe perhaps himſelfe be his owne deitie, and the world his heauen. To matter of Religion, his heart is a piece of dead fleſh, without feeling of loue, of feare, of care, or of paine from the deafe ſtrokes of a reuenging conſcience. Cuſtome of ſinne hath wrought this ſenſleſneſſe, which now hath beene ſo long entertained, that it pleads preſcription, and knowes not to be altered. This is no ſudden euill: we are borne ſinfull, but haue made our ſelues profane; through many degrees wee climbe to this height of impietie. At firſt he ſinned, and cared not; now he ſinneth and knoweth not.

Appetite

Appetite is his Lord, and Reaſon his ſeruant, and Religion his drudge. Senſe is the rule of his beleefe; and if Pietie may be an aduantage, he can at once counterfeit and deride it. When ought ſucceedeth to him, he ſacrifices to his nets, and thankes either his fortune, or his wit; and will rather make a falſe God, than acknowledge the true: if contrary, he cries out of deſtinie, and blames him to whom he will not bee beholden. His conſcience would faine ſpeake with him, but he will not heare it; ſets the day, but hee diſappoints it; and when it cries loud for audience, hee drownes the noiſe with good fellowſhip. He neuer names God, but in his oathes; neuer thinkes of him, but in extremitie; and then he knowes not how to thinke of him, becauſe hee begins but then. He quarrels for the hard conditions of his pleaſure, for his future damnation; and from himſelfe laies all the fault vpon his Maker; and from his decree fetcheth excuſes of his wickedneſſe. The ineuitable neceſſitie of Gods counſell makes him deſperately careleſſe: ſo with good food he poyſons himſelfe. Goodneſſe is his Minſtrell; neither is any mirth ſo cordiall to him, as his ſport with Gods fooles. Euery vertue hath his ſlander, and his ieſt to laugh it out of faſhion: euery vice his colour. His vſualleſt theame is the boaſt of his young ſinnes, which he can ſtill ioy in, though he cannot commit; and (if it may be) his ſpeech makes him worſe than he is. He cannot thinke of death with patience, without terrour, which hee therefore feares worſe than hell, becauſe this hee is ſure of, the other he but doubts of. He comes to Church as to the Theater, ſauing that not ſo willingly; for company, for cuſtome, for recreation, perhaps for ſleepe, or to feed his eies or his eares: as for his ſoule, he cares no more than if he had none. He loues none but himſelfe, and that not enough to ſeeke his true good; neither cares hee on whom hee treads, that he may riſe. His life is full of licence, and his practice of outrage. Hee is hated of God, as much as he hateth goodneſſe, and differs little from a Deuill, but that he hath a body.

Of the Male-content.

HE is neither well full nor faſting; and though he abound with complaints, yet nothing diſlikes him but the preſent: for what hee condemned while it was, once paſt he magnifies, and ſtriues to recall it out of the iawes of Time. What he hath, he ſeeth not, his eies are ſo taken vp with what he wants; and what he ſees, hee cares not for, becauſe he cares ſo much for that which is not. When his friend carues him the beſt morſell, he murmures that it is an happy feaſt wherein each one may cut for himſelfe. When a preſent is ſent him, he askes, Is this all? and What, no better? and ſo accepts it, as if he would haue his friend know how much hee is bound to him for vouchſafing to receiue it. It is hard to entertaine him with a proportionable gift. If nothing, he cries out of vnthankfulneſſe; if little, that he is baſely regarded; if much, he exclaimes of flatterie, and expectation of a large requitall. Euery bleſſing hath ſomewhat to diſparage and diſtaſte it: Children bring cares, ſingle life is wilde and ſolitarie; eminencie is enuious, retiredneſſe obſcure; faſting painfull; ſatietie vnwieldie; Religion nicely ſeuere; libertie is lawleſſe; wealth burdenſome; mediocritie contemptible: Euery thing faulteth, either in too much, or too little. This man is euer head-ſtrong, and ſelfe willed, neither is hee alwaies tied to eſteeme or pronounce according to reaſon; ſome thing he muſt diſlike he knowes not wherefore, but hee likes them not: and other-where rather than not cenſure, he will accuſe a man of vertue. Euery thing hee medleth with, he either findeth imperfect, or maketh ſo: neither is there any thing that ſoundeth ſo harſh in his eare, as the commendation of another, whereto yet perhaps he faſhionably and coldly aſſenteth, but with ſuch an after-clauſe of exception, as doth more than marre his former allowance, and if he liſt not to giue a verball diſgrace, yet he ſhakes his head and ſmiles, as if his ſilence ſhould ſay, I could and will not. And when himſelfe himſelfe is praiſed without exceſſe, hee complaines that ſuch imperfect kindneſſe hath not done him right. If but an vnſeaſonable ſhowre croſſe his recreation, he is ready to fall out with heauen, and thinkes he is wronged, if God will not take his times when to raine, when to ſhine. He is a ſlaue to enuie, and loſeth fleſh with fretting, not ſo much at his owne infelicitie, as at others good; neither hath he leiſure to ioy in his owne bleſſings whileſt another proſpereth. Faine would hee ſee ſome mutinies, but dares not raiſe them; and ſuffers his lawleſſe tongue to walke thorow the dangerous paths of conceited alterations; but ſo, as in good manners hee had rather thruſt euery man before him when it comes to acting. Nothing but feare keepes him from conſpiracies, and no man is more cruell when he is not manicled with danger. Hee ſpeakes nothing but Satyrs and Libels, and lodgeth no gheſts in his heart but Rebels. The inconſtant and he agree well in their felicitie, which both place in change: but herein they differ; the inconſtant man affects that which will be, the male-content commonly that which was. Finally, he is a querulous curre, whom no horſe can paſſe by without barking at; yea, in the deepe ſilence of night the very moone-ſhine openeth his clamorous mouth: hee is the wheele of a well-couched fire-worke, that flies out on all ſides, not without ſcorching it ſelfe. Euery eare is long agoe wearie of him, and he is now almoſt wearie of himſelfe. Giue him but a little reſpit, and he will die alone; of no other death, than others welfare.

Of the Vnconſtant.

THe inconſtant man treads vpon a mouing earth, and keepes no paſe. His proceedings are euer heady and peremptorie; for he hath not the patience to conſult with reaſon, but determines meerely vpon fancie. No man is ſo hot in the purſuit of what he liketh; no man ſooner wearie. He is fierie in his paſſions, which yet are not more violent than momentanie: it is a wonder if his loue or hatred laſt ſo many daies as a wonder. His heart is the Inne of all good motions, wherein if they lodge for a night, it is well; by morning they are gone, and take no leaue: and if they come that way againe, they are entertained as gheſts, not as friends. At firſt like another Ecebolius he loued ſimple truth, thence diuerting his eies, hee fell in loue with idolatrie; thoſe heatheniſh ſhrines had neuer any more doting and beſotted client; and now of late he is leapt from Rome to Munſter, and is growne to giddie Anabaptiſme: what hee will be next, as yet he knoweth not; but ere he haue wintred his opinion, it will be manifeſt. Hee is good to make an enemie of, ill for a friend; becauſe as there is no truſt in his affection, ſo no rancor in his diſpleaſure. The multitude of his changed purpoſes brings with it forgetfulneſſe; and not of others more than of himſelfe. He ſaies, ſweares, renounces, becauſe what he promiſed, he meant not long enough to make an impreſſion. Herein alone he is good for a Common-wealth, that he ſets many on worke, with building, ruining, altering; and makes more buſineſſe than Time it ſelfe; neither is he a greater enemie to thrift, than to idleneſſe. Proprietie is to him enough cauſe of diſlike; each thing pleaſes him better that is not his owne. Euen in the beſt things, long continuance is a iuſt quarrell; Manna it ſelfe growes tedious with age, and Noueltie is the higheſt ſtile of commendation to the meaneſt offers: neither doth he in bookes and faſhions aske How good, but, How new. Varietie carries him away with delight, and no vniforme pleaſure can be without an irkſome fulneſſe. Hee is ſo transformable into all opinions, manners, qualities, that he ſeemes rather made immediatly of the firſt matter, than of well-tempered elements; and therefore is in poſſibilitie any thing or euery thing; nothing in preſent ſubſtance. Finally, hee is ſeruile in imitation, waxey to perſwaſions, wittie to wrong himſelfe, a gheſt in his owne houſe, an Ape of others, and in a word, any thing rather than himſelfe.

Of

Of the Flatterer.

FLatterie is nothing but falſe friendſhip, fawning hypocriſie, diſhoneſt ciuilitie, baſe merchandize of words, a plauſible diſcord of the heart and lips. The Flatterer is Ieare-eyed to ill, and cannot ſee vices; and his tongue walkes euer in one tracke of vniuſt praiſes, and can no more tell how to diſcommend, than to ſpeake true. His ſpeeches are full of wondring interiections; and all his titles are ſuperlatiue, and both of them ſeldome euer but in preſence. His baſe minde is well matched with a mercenarie tongue, which is a willing ſlaue to another mans eare; neither regardeth he how true, but how pleaſing. His Art is nothing but delightfull coozenage, whoſe rules are ſmoothing, and garded with periurie; whoſe ſcope is to make men fooles, in teaching them to ouer-value themſelues, and to tickle his friends to death. This man is a Porter of all good tales, and mends them in the carriage: One of Fames beſt friends, and his owne, that helps to furniſh her with thoſe rumours, that may aduantage himſelfe. Conſcience hath no greater aduerſarie; for when ſhe is about to play her iuſt part of accuſation, he ſtops her mouth with good termes, and wel-neere ſtrangleth her with ſhifts. Like that ſubtill fiſh, he turnes himſelfe into the colour of euery ſtone, for a bootie. In himſelfe he is nothing, but what pleaſeth his Great-one, whoſe vertues hee cannot more extoll, than imitate his imperfections, that he may thinke his worſt gracefull. Let him ſay it is hot, he wipes his forehead, and vnbraceth himſelfe; if cold, he ſhiuers, and calls for a warmer garment. When hee walkes with his friend, hee ſweares to him, that no man elſe is looked at, no man talked of; and that whomſoeuer he vouchſafes to looke on and nod to, is graced enough: That he knowes not his owne worth, leſt hee ſhould be too happy; and when hee tells what others ſay in his praiſe, hee interrups himſelfe modeſtly, and dares not ſpeake the reſt: ſo his concealement is more inſinuating than his ſpeech. He hangs vpon the lips which he admireth, as if they could let fall nothing but Oracles, and findes occaſion to cite ſome approued ſentence, vnder the name hee honoureth; and when ought is nobly ſpoken, both his hands are little enough to bleſſe him. Sometimes euen in abſence he extolleth his Patron, where he may preſume of ſafe conueyance to his eares; and in preſence ſo whiſpereth his commendation to a common friend, that it may not be vnheard where hee meant it. Hee hath ſalues for euery ſore, to hide them, not to heale them; complexion for euery face: ſinne hath not any more artificiall Broker, or more impudent Bawd. There is no vice, that hath not from him his colour, his allurement; and his beſt ſeruice is, either to further guiltineſſe, or ſmother it. If hee grant euill things inexpedient, or crimes errours, hee hath yeelded much; either thy eſtate giues priuilege of libertie, or thy youth; or if neither, What if it be ill? yet it is pleaſant. Honeſty to him is nice ſingularitie, repentance ſuperſtitious melancholy, grauitie dulneſſe, and all vertue, an innocent conceit of the baſe-minded. In ſhort, he is the Moth of liberall mens coats, the Eare-wig of the mightie, the bane of Courts, a friend and a ſlaue to the trencher, and good for nothing but to bee a factor for the Deuill.

Of the Slothfull.

HE is a religious man, and weares the time in his Cloiſter; and as the cloke of his doing nothing, pleads contemplation; yet is he no whit the leaner for his thoughts, no whit learneder. Hee takes no leſſe care how to ſpend time, than others others how to gaine by the expenſe; and when buſineſſe importunes him, is more troubled to fore-thinke what he muſt doe, than another to effect it. Summer is out of his fauour, for nothing but long daies that make no haſte to their euen. He loues ſtill to haue the Sunne witneſſe of his riſing; and lies long, more for lothneſſe to dreſſe him, than will to ſleepe: and after ſome ſtreaking and yawning, cals for dinner, vnwaſhed; which hauing digeſted with a ſleepe in his chaire, hee walkes forth to the bench in the Market-place, and lookes for Companions: whomſoeuer he meets, he ſtaies with idle queſtions, and lingring diſcourſe; how the daies are lengthned, how kindly the weather is, how falſe the clocke, how forward the Spring, and ends euer with What ſhall we doe? It pleaſes him no leſſe to hinder others, than not to worke himſelfe. When all the people are gone from Church, hee is left ſleeping in his ſeat alone. He enters bonds, and forfeits them by forgetting the day; and askes his neighbour when his owne field was fallowed, whether the next peece of ground belong not to himſelfe. His care is either none, or too late: when Winter is come, after ſome ſharpe viſitations, he lookes on his pile of wood, and askes how much was cropped the laſt Spring. Neceſſitie driues him to euery action, and what he cannot auoid, he will yet deferre. Euery change troubles him, although to the better; and his dulneſſe counterfeits a kinde of contentment. When he is warned on a Iury, he had rather pay the mulct, than appeare. All but that which Nature will not permit, he doth by a Deputy, and counts it troubleſome to doe nothing; but to doe any thing yet more. He is witty in nothing but framing excuſes to ſit ſtill, which if the occaſion yeeld not, he coineth with eaſe. There is no worke that is not either dangerous, or thankleſſe, and whereof he fore-ſees not the inconuenience and gainleſneſſe before hee enters; which if it be verified in euent, his next idleneſſe hath found a reaſon to patronize it. He had rather freeze than fetch wood, and chuſes rather to ſteale than worke; to begge than take paines to ſteale, and in many things to want than begge. He is ſo loth to leaue his neighbours fire, that hee is faine to walke home in the darke; and if he be not lookt to, weares out the night in the chimney corner; or if not that, lies downe in his clothes to ſaue two labours. Hee eates and praies himſelfe aſleepe; and dreames of no other torment but worke. This man is a ſtanding Poole, and cannot chuſe but gather corruption: he is deſcried amongſt a thouſand neighbours by a dry and naſtie hand, that ſtill ſauours of the ſheet; a beard vncut, vnkembed; an eie and eare yellow, with their excretions; a coat ſhaken on, ragged, vnbruſht; by linnen and face ſtriuing whether ſhall excell in vncleanneſſe. For body he hath a ſwolne legge, a duſky and ſwiniſh eie, a blowne cheeke, a drawling tongue, an heauy foot, and is nothing but a colder earth molded with ſtanding water. To conclude, is a man in nothing but in ſpeech and ſhape.

Of the Couetous.

HE is a ſeruant to himſelfe, yea to his ſeruant; and doth baſe homage to that which ſhould be the worſt drudge. A liueleſſe peece of earth is his maſter, yea his God, which he ſhrines in his coffer, and to which he ſacrifices his heart. Euery face of his coine is a new image, which he adores with the higheſt veneration; yet takes vpon him to be Protector of that he worſhippeth: which he feares to keepe, and abhorres to loſe: not daring to truſt either any other god, or his owne. Like a true Chymiſt he turnes euery thing into Siluer, both what hee ſhould eat, and what he ſhould weare; and that he keeps to looke on, not to vſe. When he returnes from his field, he askes, not without much rage, what became of the looſe cruſt in his cup-bord, and who hath rioted among his Leekes. He neuer eats good meale, but on his neighbours trencher; and there he makes amends to his complaining ſtomacke for his former and future faſts. He bids his neighbours to dinner, and when they haue done, ſends in a trencher for the shot. Once in a yeere perhaps, he giues himselfe leaue to feast, and for the time thinks no man more lauish; wherein he lists not to fetch his dishes from farre; nor will be beholden to the shambles, his owne prouision shall furnish his boord with an insensible cost, and when his guests are parted, talkes how much euery man deuoured, and how many cups were emptied, and feeds his family with the mouldy remnants a moneth after. If his seruant breake but an earthen dish for want of light, he abates it out of his quarters wages. Hee chips his bread, and sends it backe to exchange for halfe. He lets money, and sells Time for a price; and will not be importuned either to preuent or deferre his day; and in the meane time looks for secret gratuities, besides the maine interest which he sels and returnes into the stocke. He breeds of Money to the third generation; neither hath it sooner any being, than he sets it to beget more. In all things he affects secrecy and propriety: he grudgeth his neighbour the water of his Well: and next to stealing, hee hates borrowing. In his short and vnquiet sleepes he dreames of theeues, and runs to the doore, and names more men than he hath. The least sheafe he euer culls out for Tithe; and to rob God, holds it the best pastime, the cleerest gaine. This man cries out aboue others, of the prodigalitie of our times, and tells of the thrift of our fore-fathers: How that great Prince thought himselfe royally attired, when he bestowed thirteene shillings and foure pence on halfe a sute. How one wedding gowne serued our Grandmothers, till they exchanged it for a winding sheet; and praises plainnesse, not for lesse sin, but for lesse cost. For himselfe he is still knowne by his fore-fathers coat, which hee meanes with his blessing, to bequeath to the many descents of his heires. He neither would be poore, nor be accounted rich. No man complaines so much of want, to auoid a Subsidie; no man is so importunate in begging, so cruell in exaction; and when he most complaines of want, he feares that which he complaines to haue. No way is indirect to wealth; whether of fraud or violence. Gaine is his godlinesse; which if conscience goe about to preiudice, and grow troublesome by exclaiming against, he is condemned for a common Barretor. Like another Ahab, he is sicke of the next field, and thinkes he is ill seated, while hee dwels by neighbours. Shortly, his neighbours doe not much more hate him, than he himselfe. He cares not (for no great aduantage) to lose his friend, pine his body, damne his soule; and would dispatch himselfe when corne falls, but that he is loth to cast away money on a cord.

Of the Vaine-glorious.

ALl his humour rises vp into the froth of ostentation; which if it once settle, fals downe into a narrow roome. If the excesse be in the vnderstanding part, all his wit is in print, the Presse hath left his head emptie; yea, not onely what he had, but what he could borrow without leaue. If his glory be in his deuotion, he giues not an Almes but on record; and if he haue once done well, God heares of it often; for vpon euery vnkindnesse hee is ready to vpbraid him with merits. Ouer and aboue his owne discharge, he hath some satisfactions to spare for the common treasure. He can fulfill the Law with ease, and earne God with superfluitie. If he haue bestowed but a little summe in the glazing, pauing, parieting of Gods house, you shall finde it in the Church-window. Or if a more gallant humour possesse him, he weares all his land on his backe; and walking high, lookes ouer his left shoulder, to see if the point of his Rapier follow him with a Grace. He is proud of another mans horse; and well mounted, thinkes euery man wrongs him, that lookes not at him. A bare head in the street, doth him more good than a meales meat. Hee sweares bigge at an Ordinary, and talkes of the Court with a sharpe accent; neither vouchsafes to name any not honourable, nor those without some tearme of familiaritie; and likes well to see the hearer looke vpon him amazedly, as if he said, How happy is this man that is so great with Great-Ones!

Vnder

Vnder pretence of seeking for a scroll of newes, he drawes out an handfull of letters indorsed with his owne stile, to the height: and halfe reading euery title, passes ouer the latter part, with a murmur; not without signifying, what Lord sent this, what great Lady the other; and for what sutes; the last paper (as it happens) is his newes from his honorable friend in the French Court. In the midst of dinner, his Lacquay comes sweating in, with a sealed note from his Creditor, who now threatens a speedy arrest, and whispers the ill newes in his Masters eare, when he aloud names a Counceller of State, and professes to know the emploiment. The same messenger he calls with an imperious nod; and after expostulation, where hee hath left his fellowes, in his eare sends him for some new spur-leathers or stockings by this time footed; and when he is gone halfe the roome, recals him, and saith aloud, It is no matter, Let the greater bagge alone till I come; and yet againe calling him closer, whispers (so that all the table may heare) that if his crimson sute be ready against the day, the rest need no haste. He picks his teeth when his stomacke is empty, and calls for Phesants at a common Inne. You shall finde him prizing the richest Iewels, and fairest horses, when his purse yeelds not money enough for earnest. He thrusts himselfe into the preasse, before some great Ladies; and loues to be seene neere the head of a great traine. His talke is how many Mourners hee furnisht with gownes at his Fathers funerals, how many messes, how rich his Coat is, and how ancient, how great his alliance: what challenges he hath made and answered; what exploits he did at Cales or Newport; and when he hath commended others buildings, furnitures, sutes, compares them with his owne. When he hath vndertaken to be the Broker for some rich Diamond, he weares it; and pulling off his Gloue to stroke vp his haire, thinks no eye should haue any other obiect. Entertaining his friend, hee chides his Cooke for no better cheere, and names the dishes he meant, and wants. To conclude, he is euer on the Stage, and acts still a glorious part abroad, when no man caries a baser heart, no man is more sordid and careless at home. He is a Spanish Souldier on an Italian Theater; a Bladder full of wind, a skin full of words, a fooles wonder, and a wise mans foole.

Of the Presumptuous.

PResumption is nothing but hope out of his wits, an high house vpon weak pillars. The presumptuous man loues to attempt great things, onely because they are hard and rare: his actions are bold and venturous, and more full of hazard than vse. He hoiseth saile in a tempest, and saith, neuer any of his Ancestors were drowned: he goes into an infected house, and saies, the plague dares not seize on noble bloud: he runnes on high battlements, gallops downe steepe hills, rides ouer narrow bridges, walkes on weake Ice, and neuer thinks, What if I fall? but, What if I runne ouer and fall not? He is a confident Alchymist, and braggeth, that the wombe of his Furnace hath conceiued a burden that will doe all the world good: which yet he desires secretly borne, for feare of his owne bondage: in the meane time, his Glasse breakes; yet hee vpon better luting laies wagers of the successe, and promiseth wedges before-hand to his friend. He saith, I will sinne, and be sorry, and escape; either God will not see, or not be angry, or not punish it; or remit the measure. If I doe well, he is iust to reward; if ill, he is mercifull to forgiue. Thus his praises wrong God no lesse than his offence; and hurt himselfe no lesse than they wrong God. Any patterne is enough to encourage him: shew him the way where any foot hath trod, he dare follow, although he see no steps returning; what if a thousand haue attempted, and miscarried; if but one haue preuailed, it sufficeth. He suggests to himselfe false hopes of neuer too late; as if hee could command either Time or repentance: and dare defer the expectation of mercy, till betwixt the bridge and the water. Giue him but where to set his foot, and he will remoue the earth. He fore-knowes the mutations of States, the euents of warre, the temper of the seasons; either his old prophecy tels it him, or his starres. Yea, he is no stranger to the Records of Gods secret counsell, but he turnes them ouer, and copies them out at pleasure. I know not whether in all his enterprises he shew lesse feare, or wisdome: no man promises himselfe more, no man more beleeues himselfe. I will goe and sell, and returne and purchase, and spend and leaue my sonnes such estates; all which if it succeed, he thanks himselfe; if not, he blames not himselfe. His purposes are measured, not by his ability, but his will, and his actions by his purposes. Lastly, he is euer credulous in assent, rash in vndertaking, peremptory in resoluing, witlesse in proceeding, and in his ending miserable; which is neuer other, than either the laughter of the wise, or the pittie of fooles.

Of the Distrustfull.

THE distrustfull man hath his heart in his eies, or in his hand; nothing is sure to him but what he sees, what he handles. Hee is either very simple, or very false; and therefore beleeues not others, because hee knowes how little himselfe is worthy of beleefe. In spirituall things, either God must leaue a pawne with him, or seeke some other Creditor. All absent things and vnusuall, haue no other, but a conditionall entertainment: they are strange, if true. If he see two neighbours whisper in his presence, he bids them speake out, and charges them to say no more than they can iustifie. When he hath committed a message to his seruant, he sends a second after him, to listen how it is deliuered. He is his owne Secretarie, and of his owne counsell, for what he hath, for what he purposeth: and when he tels ouer his bags, looks thorow the key-hole, to see if he haue any hidden witnesse, and askes aloud, Who is there? when no man heares him. He borrowes money when he needs not, for feare lest others should borrow of him. He is euer timorous, and cowardly; and askes euery mans errand at the doore, ere he opens. After his first sleepe, he starts vp, and askes if the furthest gate were barred, and out of a fearefull sweat calls vp his seruant, and bolts the doore after him; and then studies whether it were better to lie still and beleeue, or rise and see. Neither is his heart fuller of feares, than his head full of strange proiects, and farre-fetcht constructions: What meanes the State, thinke you, in such an action, and whither tends this course? Learne of me (if you know not:) the waies of deepe policies are secret, and full of vnknowne windings; that is their act, this will be their issue: so casting beyond the Moone, he makes wise and iust proceedings suspected. In all his predictions, and imaginations, he euer lights vpon the worst; not what is most likely will fall out, but what is most ill. There is nothing that he takes not with the left hand: no text which his glosse corrupts not. Words, oathes, parchments, seales, are but broken Reeds; these shall neuer deceiue him; he loues no paiments but reall. If but one in an age haue miscarried by a rare casualtie, he misdoubts the same euent. If but a Tile falne from an high roofe, haue brained a passenger, or the breaking of a Coach-wheele haue indangered the burden, he sweares he will keepe home, or take him to his horse. He dares not come to Church, for feare of the crowd; not spare the Sabbaths labour, for feare of the want; nor come neere the Parliament house, because it should haue beene blowne vp. What might haue beene, affects him as much as what will be. Argue, vow, protest, sweare; he heares thee, and beleeues himselfe. He is a Scepticke, and dare hardly giue credit to his senses, which he hath often arraigned of false intelligence. Hee so liues, as if hee thought all the world were theeues, and were not sure whether himselfe were one. He is vncharitable in his censures, vnquiet in his feares; bad enough alwaies, but in his owne opinion much worse than he is.

die to quarrell with God, because the next field is fairer growne; and angerly calculates his cost, and time, and tillage. Whom he dares not openly backbite, nor wound with a direct censure, he strikes smoothly with an ouer-cold praise; and when he sees that he must either maliciously oppugne the iust praise of another, (which were vnsafe) or approue it by assent, he yeeldeth; but shewes withall that his meanes were such, both by nature and education, that he could not, without much neglect, be lesse commendable: so his happinesse shall be made the colour of detraction. When an wholsome law is propounded, he crosseth it, either by open, or close opposition; not for any incommoditie or inexpedience, but because it proceeded from any mouth besides his owne. And it must bee a cause rarely plausible, that will not admit some probable contradiction. When his equall should rise to honour, hee striues against it vnseene; and rather with much cost suborneth great aduersaries; and when hee sees his resistance vaine, he can giue an hollow gratulation in presence; but in secret, disparages that aduancement; either the man is vnfit for the place, or the place for the man: or if fit, yet lesse gainfull, or more common than opinion: whereto he addes, that himselfe might haue had the same dignitie vpon better tearmes, and refused it. He is wittie in deuising suggestions, to bring his Riuall out of loue, into suspition. If he be courteous, he is seditiously popular; if bountifull, he bindes ouer his clients to a faction; if successefull in warre, he is dangerous in peace; if wealthy, he laies vp for a day; if powerfull, nothing wants but opportunitie of rebellion. His submission is ambitious hypocrisie; his religion, politike insinuation; no action is safe from a iealous construction. When hee receiues a good report of him whom he emulates, he saith, Fame is partiall, and is wont to blanch mischiefes; and pleaseth himselfe with hope to finde it worse; and if Ill-will haue dispersed any more spightfull narration, he lies hold on that, against all witnesses, and brocheth that rumour for truest, because worst: and when he sees him perfectly miserable, he can at once pitie him, and reioyce. What himselfe cannot doe, others shall not: hee hath gained well, if he haue hindred the successe of what hee would haue done, and could not. Hee conceales his best skill, not so as it may not be knowne that he knowes it, but so as it may not be learned; because he would haue the world misse him. He attained to a soueraigne medicine, by the secret Legacy of a dying Empericke, whereof he will leaue no heire, lest the praise should be diuided. Finally, he is an enemy to Gods fauours, if they fall beside himselfe, the best nurse of ill Fame; a man of the worst diet; for he consumes himselfe; and delights in pining; a thorne-hedge couered with nettles; a peeuish Interpreter of good things, and no other than a leane and pale carkase quickned with a Fiend.

FINIS.

Of the Ambitious.

AMbition is a proud couetousnesse, a dry thirst of honour, the longing disease of reason, an aspiring, and gallant madnesse. The ambitious climbes vp high and perillous staires, and neuer cares how to come downe; the desire of rising hath swallowed vp his feare of a fall. Hauing once cleaued (like a Burre) to some great mans coat, he resolues not to be shaken off with any small indignities, and finding his hold thorowly fast, casts how to insinuate yet neerer; and therefore he is busie and frutle in his endeuours to please, and all his officious respects turne home to himselfe. He can be at once a slaue to command, an Intelligencer to informe, a Parasite to soothe and flatter, a Champion to defend, an Executioner to reuenge any thing for an aduantage of fauour. He hath projected a plot to rise, and woe be to the friend that stands in his way. He still haunteth the Court, and his vnquiet spirit haunteth him; which hauing fetcht him from the secure peace of his Country-rest, sets him new and impossible taskes; and after many disappointments, incourages him to try the same sea in spight of his shipwracks, and promises better successe. A small hope giues him heart against great difficulties, and drawes on new expense, new seruilitie; perswading him (like foolish boies) to shoot away a second shaft, that he may finde the first. He yeeldeth, and now secure of the issue, applauds himselfe in that honour, which he still affecteth, still misseth; and for the last of all trials, will rather bribe for a troublesome preferment, than returne void of a title. But now when he findes himselfe desperately crossed, and at once spoiled both of aduancement and hope, both of fruition and possibilitie, all his desire is turned into rage, his thirst is now onely of reuenge; his tongue sounds of nothing but detraction and slander: Now the place he sought for, is base, his riuall vnworthy, his aduersary iniurious, officers corrupt, Court infectious; and how well is he that may bee his owne man, his owne master; that may liue safely in a meane distance, at pleasure, free from starning, free from burning? But if his designes speed well, ere he be warme in that seat, his minde is possessed of an higher. What hee hath, is but a degree to what he would haue: now he scorneth what he formerly aspired to; his successe doth not giue him so much contentment, as prouocation; neither can he be at rest, so long as he hath one, either to ouer-looke, or to match, or to emulate him. When his Country-friend comes to visit him, he carries him vp to the awfull Presence, and now in his sight crowding neerer to the Chaire of State, desires to be lookt on, desires to be spoken to by the greatest, and studies how to offer an occasion, lest he should seeme vnknowne, vnregarded; and if any gesture of the least grace fall happily vpon him, he lookes backe vpon his friend, lest he should carelesly let it passe, without a note: and what hee wanteth in sense, hee supplies in History. His disposition is neuer but shamefully vnthankfull: for vnlesse he haue all, he hath nothing. It must be a large draught, whereof he will not say, that those few drops doe not slake, but inflame him: so still he thinkes himselfe the worse for small fauours. His wit so contriues the likely plots of his promotion, as if he would steale it away without Gods knowledge, besides his will: neither doth he euer looke vp, and consult in his fore-casts, with the supreme Moderator of all things; as one that thinkes honour is ruled by Fortune, and that heauen medleth not with the disposing of these earthly lots: and therefore it is iust with that wise GOD to defeat his fairest hopes, and to bring him to a losse in the hottest of his chace; and to cause honour to flie away so much the faster, by how much it is more eagerly pursued. Finally, he is an importunate suter, a corrupt client, a violent vndertaker, a smooth Factor, but vntrusty, a restlesse master of his owne; a Bladder puft vp with the wind of hope, and selfe-loue. He is in the common body, as a Mole in the earth, euer vnquietly casting; and in one word, is nothing but a confused heape of enuy, pride, couetousnesse.

Of the Vnthrift.

HE ranges beyond his pale, and liues without compaſſe. His expence is meaſured, not by abilitie, but will. His pleaſures are immoderate, and not honeſt. A wanton eye, a lickoriſh tongue, a gameſome hand haue impouerifht him. The vulgar ſort call him bountifull, and applaud him while he ſpends, and recompence him with wiſhes when he giues, with pitie when hee wants. Neither can it be denied that he raught true liberalitie, but ouer-went it. No man could haue liued more laudably, if when he was at the beſt, he had ſtaied there. While he is preſent, none of the wealthier gheſts may pay ought to the ſhot, without much vehemency, without danger of vnkindneſſe. Vſe hath made it vnpleaſant to him, not to ſpend. He is in all things more ambitious of the title of good fellowſhip, than of wiſdome. When he lookes into the wealthy cheſt of his Father, his conceit ſuggeſts that it cannot be emptied; and while he takes out ſome deale euery day, hee perceiues not any diminution; and when the heape is ſenſibly abated, yet ſtill flatters himſelfe with enough. One hand couzens the other, and the belly deceiues both: hee doth not ſo much beſtow benefits, as ſcatter them. True merit doth not carie them, but ſmoothneſſe of adulation. His ſenſes are too much his guides, and his purueyors; and appetite is his ſteward. He is an impotent ſeruant to his luſts; and knowes not to gouerne either his minde or his purſe. Improuidence is euer the companion of vnthriftineſſe: This man cannot looke beyond the preſent, and neither thinkes, nor cares what ſhall be; much leſſe ſuſpects what may be: and while he lauiſhes out his ſubſtance in ſuperfluities, thinkes he onely knowes what the world is worth, and that others ouerprize it. He feeles pouertie before he ſees it, neuer complaines till he be pinched with wants; neuer ſpares till the bottome, when it is too late either to ſpend or recouer. He is euery mans friend ſaue his owne, and then wrongs himſelfe moſt, when he courteth himſelfe with moſt kindneſſe. He vies Time with the ſlothfull, and it is an hard match, whether chaſes away good houres to worſe purpoſe; the one by doing nothing, or the other by idle paſtime. Hee hath ſo dilated himſelfe with the beames of proſperitie, that he lies open to all dangers, and cannot gather vp himſelfe, on iuſt warning, to auoid a miſchiefe. Hee were good for an Almner, ill for a Steward. Finally, he is the liuing tombe of his fore-fathers, of his poſteritie; and when he hath ſwallowed both, is more emptie than before he deuoured them.

Of the Enuious.

HE feeds on others euils, and hath no diſeaſe but his neighbours welfare: whatſoeuer God doe for him, he cannot be happy with company; and if he were put to chuſe, whether he would rather haue equals in a common felicitie, or ſuperiours in miſerie, he would demurre vpon the election. His eie caſts out too much, and neuer returnes home, but to make compariſons with anothers good. He is an ill prizer of forraine commoditie; worſe of his owne; for, that hee rates too high, this vnder value. You ſhall haue him euer inquiring into the eſtates of his equals and betters; wherein he is not more deſirous to heare all, than loth to heare any thing ouer-good: and if iuſt report relate ought better than he would, he redoubles the queſtion, as being hard to beleeue what he likes not; and hopes yet, if that be auerred againe to his griefe, that there is ſomewhat concealed in the relation, which if it were knowne, would argue the commended partie miſerable, and blemiſh him with ſecret ſhame. TO THE RIGHT HONOVRABLE, AND HOPEFVLL LORD, ROBERT, Earle of Essex, my singular good Lord, all increase of Grace and true HONOVR.

RIGHT HONOVRABLE,

WHilest I desired to congratulate your happy returne with some worthy present; I fell vpon this: which I dare not onely offer, but commend; the royallest Philosopher and wisest King, giuing you those precepts, which the Spirit of God gaue him. The matter is all his: nothing is mine, but the method, which I doe willingly submit to censure. In that, hee could not erre: in this, I cannot but haue erred, either in Art, or application, or sense, or disorder, or defect: yet not wilfully. I haue meant it well, and faithfully to the Church of God, and to your Honour, as one of her great hopes. If any man shall cauill, that I haue gone about to correct Salomons order, or to controule Ezekias seruants: I complaine both of his charity, and wisdome; and appeale to more lawfull iudgement. Let him as well say, that euery Concordance peruerts the Text. I haue onely endeuoured to be the common place-booke of that great King, and to referre his Diuine rules to their heads, for more ease of finding, for for better memory, for readier vse. See how that God, whose wisdome thought good to bereaue mankinde of Salomons profound Commentaries of Nature, hath reserued these his Diuine Morals, to out-liue the world; as knowing, that those would but feed mans curiositie, these would both direct his life, and iudge it. He hath not done this without expectation of our good, and glory to himselfe: which if we answer, the gaine is ours. I know how little need there is, either to intreat your Lordships acceptation, or to aduise your vse. It is enough to haue humbly presented them to your hands, and through them to the Church: the desire of whose good is my good; yea, my recompence and glory. The same God, whose hand hath led and returned you in safetie, from all forraine euils, guide your waies at home, and graciously increase you in the ground of all true honour, Goodnesse. My praiers shall euer follow you:

Who vow my selfe your Honours in all humble and true dutie,

SALOMONS ETHICKS,

Behauiour and Manners.

THE FIRST BOOKE.

FELICITY.

§ 1. Of Ethicks in common.
- The description.
- The chiefe end, which is Felicitie.

ETHICKS is a Doctrine of wisdome and knowledge to liue well, and of the madnesse and foolishnesse of vice : or instruction to doe wisely by iustice, and iudgement, and equity, and to doe good in our life. The end whereof is, to see and attaine that chiefe goodnesse of the children of men, which they enioy vnder the Sunne, the whole number of the daies of their life. Ec. 1. 17. Ec. 7. 27. Pr. 1. 3. Ec. 3. 12. Ec. 3. 2.

§ 2. Wherein Felicity is not.
- Not in pleasure,
- Not in wealth : for herein is
  1. No satisfaction.
  2. Increased expence.
  3. Restlesnesse.
  4. Want of fruition.
  5. Vncertaintie.
  6. Necessitie of leauing it.

WHich consists not in pleasure ; for I said in mine heart, Goe to now, I will proue thee with ioy, therefore take thou pleasure in pleasant things ; yea, I with-drew not my heart from any ioy : for my heart reioyced in all my labour : and who could eat, and who could haste to outward things more than I ? and behold, this also is vanitie. Ec. 2. 1. Ec. 2. 10. Ec. 2. 25. Ec. 2. 1.

Not in riches. 1. For he that loueth siluer, shall not be satisfied with siluer, and he that loueth riches, shall be without the fruit of them : this also is vanitie. Ec. 5. 9.

2. When riches increase, they are increased that eat them : and what good commeth to the owners thereof, but the beholding thereof with their eies ? yea much euill ; for whereas the sleepe of him that trauelleth is sweet, whether hee eat little or much ; contrarily, The satietie of the rich will not suffer him to sleepe ; so there is an euill sicknes, which I haue seene vnder the sunne, riches reserued to the owners thereof, for their euill, and after, not for their good : for there is another euill, which I haue seene vnder the Sunne, and it is frequent among men ; A man to whom God hath giuen riches, and Ec. 5. 10. treasures, and honour, and he wanteth nothing for his soule, of all it desireth; but God
Pr. 23. 24. Pr. 23. 5. Ec. 5. 14. giueth him no power thereof; and if hee haue that, yet how long? Riches remaine not alwaies, but taketh her to her wings as an Eagle, and flyeth to the heauens. And for their owner, As he came forth of his mothers belly, hee shall returne naked, to goe as he
Ec. 5. 15. came, and shall beare away nothing of his labour, which he caused to passe by his hand: And this is also an euill sickenesse, that in all points as he came, so shall he goe: and what profit hath he, that he hath trauelled for the wind?

- §. 3. Not in magnificence
  - of estate,
    - Royalty,
    - great attendance,
  - of works,
    - planting,
    - gathering Treasures,

Ec. 1. 12. Ec. 1. 16. Ec. 2. 9. Ec. 2. 4. Ec. 2. 5. Ec. 2. 6. Ec. 2. 7. Ec. 2. 8. Can. 3. 9. Can. 3. 10. Ec. 2. 11. Ec. 2. 12. Ec. 2. 11.

Not in honour and magnificence. I the Preacher haue beene King ouer Israel in Ierusalem, and I was great, and increased aboue all that were before me in Ierusalem, which also I shewed in effect; for I made me great works, I built mee houses, I planted me Vineyards, I made mee Gardens and Orchards, and planted in them Trees of all fruits; I made me Ponds of water, to water therewith the woods that grow with trees: I got men seruants, and maids, and had children borne in the house; also I had great possessions of beeues, and sheepe, aboue all that were before me in Ierusalem, I gathered to me also siluer and gold, and the chiefe treasures of Kings and Prouinces; I prouided Men-singers, and Women-singers, and the delights of the sonnes of men, musicall consorts of all kindes. Yea, I King Salomon made my selfe a Palace of the trees of Lebanon; I made the pillars thereof of siluer, and the pauement thereof of gold; the hangings thereof of purple, whose mids was paued with the loue of the daughters of Israel: Then I looked on all my workes that my hands had wrought, (as who is the man that will compare with the King in things which men now haue done?) and on the trauell that I laboured to doe; and behold, all is vanity, and vexation of spirit; and there is no profit vnder the Sunne.

- §. 4. Long life and issue reiected for
  - certaine end,
  - vnperfect satisfaction,
  - remembrance and continuance of darkenesse.

Ec. 6. 3. Ec. 6. 4. Ec. 6. 5. Ec. 6. 6. Ec. 11. 7. Ec. 11. 8.

Not in long life, and plenteous issue: for If a man beget an hundred children, and liue many yeeres, and the dayes of his yeeres be multiplied, and his soule bee not satisfied with good things, and hee be not buried, I say, that an vntimely fruit is better than he. For he commeth into vanity, and goeth into darkenesse, and his name shall be couered with darkenesse: Also, he hath not seene the Sunne, nor knowne it; therefore this hath more rest than the other: And if he had liued a thousand yeeres twise told, and had seene no good; shall not all goe to one place? and howsoeuer, the light surely is a pleasant thing, and it is good for the eies to see the Sunne; yet though a man liue many yeeres, and in them all he reioyce; if he shall remember the dayes of darkenesse, because they are many, all that commeth, is Vanity.

§. 5. Know-

- §. 5. Knowledge.
  - Though better than folly;
  - yet reiected vpon
    - experience,
    - indifferency of euents,
    - imperfection.

Not in learning, and humane knowledge. I haue giuen my heart to ſearch and finde out wiſdome, in all things that are done vnder the heauen, (this ſore trauell hath God giuen the ſonnes of men to humble them thereby) yea, I thought in mine heart and ſaid, Behold, I haue amplified and increaſed wiſdome, aboue all them that haue beene before mee, in the Court and Vniuerſity of Ieruſalem, and mine heart hath ſeene much wiſdome and knowledge: for (when I was at the wildeſt) my wiſdome remained with me: Then I ſaw indeed, that there is profit in wiſdome more than in folly, as the light is more excellent than darkneſſe: For the wiſe mans eyes are in his head, but the foole walketh in darkneſſe: but yet, I know that the ſame condition falleth to them all. Then I thought in mine heart, It befalleth to mee as it befalleth to the foole; why therefore doe I labour to be more wiſe? For what hath the Wiſe-man more than the foole? There ſhall be no remembrance of the wiſe, nor of the foole for euer: for that that now is, in the daies to come ſhall be forgotten, and how dieth the Wiſe-man? as doth the foole: Beſides the imperfection of the beſt knowledge; for the eye is not ſatisfied with ſeeing, nor the eare filled with hearing: I thought I would be wiſe, but it went far from me; it is farre off, what may it be? and it is a profound deepneſſe, who can finde it? yea, ſo farre is it from giuing contentment, that in the multitude of wiſdome is much griefe, and he that increaſeth knowledge, increaſeth ſorrow.

  - Bleſſing,
    - Fauour,
    - Ioy,
    - Preſeruation,
    - Proſperitie,

Wherein then doth it conſiſt? Let vs heare the end of all, Feare God, and keep his Commandements; for this is the whole of Man, the whole duty, the whole ſcope, the whole happineſſe; for Life is in the way of righteouſnes, and in that path there is no death; and attending thereon, all Bleſſings are vpon the head of the righteous. Wouldſt thou haue fauour? A good man getteth fauour of the Lord. Ioy? The righteous ſhall ſing and reioyce; and ſurely to a man that is good in his ſight, God giueth wiſdome and knowledge and ioy; ſo that the light of the righteous reioyceth, but the candle of the wicked ſhall bee put out. Preſeruation and deliuerance? Lo, the righteous is an euerlaſting foundation; for the way of the Lord is ſtrength to the vpright man, ſo as the righteous ſhall neuer be remoued; and if he be in trouble; Riches auaile not in the day of wrath, but righteouſneſſe deliuereth from death; ſo the righteous ſhall come out of aduerſitie, and eſcape out of trouble, and the wicked ſhall come in his ſtead; thus euery way Righteouſneſſe preſerueth the vpright in heart. Proſperity and wealth? The houſe of the righteous ſhall haue much treaſure, and his tabernacle ſhall flouriſh. Long life? The feare of the Lord increaſeth the daies; and not onely himſelfe, but his houſe ſhall ſtand. And though a ſinner doe euill an hundred times, and God prolong his daies, yet know I that it ſhall be well to them that feare the Lord, and doe reuerence before him. And laſtly, whatſoeuer good? God will grant the deſire of the righteous, and he that keepeth the Law, is bleſſed.

VErtue consists in the meane; vice in the extremes. Let thy waies be ordered aright; Turne not to the right hand, nor to the left, but remoue thy foot from euill; The rule whereof is Gods Law: for the commandement is a Lanterne, and instruction a light; and euery word of God is pure. My sonne hearken to my words, incline thine eare to my sayings; let them not depart from thine eyes, but keepe them in the midst of thine heart. For, they are life vnto those that finde them, and health vnto all their flesh. Keepe my Commandements, and thou shalt liue, and mine instruction as the apple of thine eye: Binde them vpon thy fingers, and write them vpon the Table of thine heart.

that findeth wisdome, and getteth vnderstanding: The merchandise thereof is better than siluer, and the gaine thereof is better than gold: It is more precious than pearles, and all the things that thou canst desire, are not to be compared to her. Length of daies is in her right hand; and in her left hand riches and glory: Her waies are waies of pleasure, and all her paths prosperity: She is a tree of life to them that lay hold on her, and blessed is he that receiueth her. The fruits of it are singular: for first, A wise heart doth not onely seeke, but get knowledge, without which the minde is not good: and the care of the wise, learning: And not get it only, but lay it vp, and not so onely, but workes by it: and yet more, is crowned with it. Besides knowledge, here is safety. When wisdome entreth into thy heart, and knowledge delighteth thy soule, then shall counsell preserue thee, and vnderstanding shall keepe thee: and deliuer thee from the euill way, and from the man that speaketh froward things, and from them that leaue the waies of righteousnesse, to walke in the waies of darknesse: and as from sinne, so from iudgement. The way of life is on high, the prudent to auoid from hell beneath. Thirdly, good direction. 1. For actions: Wisdome causeth to walke in the way of righteousnesse, and in the mids of the paths of iudgement. 2. For words, The heart of the wise guideth his mouth wisely, and addeth doctrine to his lips: So that the words of the mouth of a wise man haue grace: yea, he receiues grace from others. Either instruct or reproue the Prudent, and he will vnderstand knowledge. Not to speake of wealth: she causeth them that loue her, to inherit substance, and filleth their treasures: she giueth not onely honour: for the wisdome of a man doth make his face to shine, and the wise man shall inherit glory; but life: Vnderstanding is a well-spring of life, to him that hath it: and he that findeth mee (saith Wisdome) findeth life, and shall obtaine fauour of the Lord. Wherefore get wisdome: get vnderstanding: forget not, neither decline from the words of my mouth. Forsake her not, and she shall keepe thee: loue her, and she shall preserue thee. Wisdome is the beginning: get wisdome therefore, and aboue all possessions get vnderstanding: Exalt her, and she shall exalt thee: She shall bring thee vnto honour, if thou embrace her: shee shall giue a goodly ornament to thine head: yea, shee shall giue thee a crowne of glory.

PRouidence is that whereby the heart of the wise fore-knoweth the time, and iudgement; the time when it will be; the iudgement how it will be done: both which are appointed to euery purpose vnder Heauen: Not that man can foresee all future things: No, he knoweth not that, that shall be; For who can tell him when it shall bee? not so much as concerning himselfe. Neither doth man know his time, but as the fishes are taken with an euill net, and as the birds which are caught in the snare; so are the children of men snared in the euill time, when it falleth on them suddenly; yea, the steps of a man are ruled by the Lord; how should a man then vnderstand his owne way? But sometimes he may: The prudent man seeth the plague a farre off, and fleeth: and as for good things, With the Pismire he prouideth his meat in Summer; working still according to fore-knowledge; yet not too strictly and fearefully: for he that obserueth the wind, shall not sow; and he that regardeth the clouds, shall not reape.

Pr. 16. 20. Pr. 16. 23. Pr. 14. 15. Ec. 3. 1.

DIscretion is that whereby a man is wise in his businesses, and whereby the heart of the wise guideth his mouth wisely, and addeth doctrine to his lips; For actions: The Prudent will consider his steps, and make choice of his times: for To all things things there is an appointed time; and a time for euery purpose vnder heauen; a time to plant, and a time to plucke vp that which is planted; a time to slay, and a time to heale, &c. a time of warre, and a time of peace: from hence it is that the wise man is strong, and rich; for by knowledge shall the Chambers bee fild with precious things, which he knowes how to employ well. The crowne of the wise is their riches; from hence, that his good vnderstanding maketh him acceptable to others. For speeches The tongue of the wise vseth knowledge aright, and in the lips of him that hath vnderstanding, wisdome is found; and his words haue grace, both 1. for the seasonablenesse, A word spoken in his place is like apples of gold with pictures of siluer: and how good is a word in due season! 2. for the worth of them, The lips of knowledge are a precious iewell: lastly, for their vse: The lips of the wise shall preserue them, and their tongue is health, and with health, pleasure: Faire words are as an hony-combe, sweetnesse to the soule, and health to the bones.

Q. 5. The extremes,
- Ouer-wise,
- Foolish,
  - Who he is.
  - What kindes of Fooles; there bee — the meere foole, the rash foole, the wicked foole.
  - What successe.

HEre are two extremes: On the right hand; Make not thy selfe ouer-wise, wherefore shouldest thou be desolate? On the left: Neither be foolish; why shouldest thou perish not in thy time? The foole is that man that wandreth out of the way of wisdome, which hath none heart, that is, is destitute of vnderstanding, either to conceiue, or to doe as he ought: Of which sort is, 1. The meere foole; That foole, who when he goeth by the way, his heart faileth, whose folly is foolishnesse, in whose hand there is a price in vaine to get wisdome, which is too high for him to attaine: lastly, in whom are not the lips of knowledge. 2. The rash foole, that is hasty in his matters, that powreth out all his minde at once: which the wise man keepes in, till afterward; that hasteth with his feet, and therefore sinneth. There is more hope of the other foole than of him. 3. The wicked foole; That despiseth wisdome and instruction, that maketh a mocke of sinne; to whom it is abomination to depart from euill; to whom foolishnesse is ioy; yea, it is his pastime to doe wickedly, and his practice to spread abroad folly. And this man is obstinate in his courses; for though thou bray a foole in a morter among wheat, brayd with a pestell, yet will not his foolishnesse depart from him: and though it seeme to depart, yet as a dogge turneth againe to his vomit, so returnes hee to his foolishnesse. Spare thy labour therefore, speake not in the eares of a foole; for hee will despise the wisdome of thy words. To these saith wisdome, O ye foolish, how long will ye loue foolishnesse, and the scornfull take pleasure in scorning, and fooles hate knowledge? Turne you at my correction. Loe, I will poure out my minde vnto you, and make you vnderstand my words. Because I haue called, and ye refused; I haue stretched out my hand, & none would regard; but ye haue despised all my counsell, and would none of my correction; I will also laugh at your destruction, and mocke when your feare commeth, like sudden desolation; and your destruction shall come like a whirle-wind; when affliction and anguish shall come vpon you. Then shall they call vpon mee, but I will not answer: they shall seeke me early, but they shall not finde me; because they hated knowledge, and did not chuse the feare of the Lord; they would none of my counsell, but despised all my correction; therefore shall they eat of the fruit of their owne way, and be filled with their owne deuices: and what is that fruit but sorrow? Euen in laughing their heart is sorrowfull; and the end of that mirth is heauinesse: and like the noise of thornes vnder a pot, so (short and vaine) is the laughter of fooles: what but stripes? A rod shall be for the backe of him that is destitute of vnderstanding, yea, it is proper to him. To the Horse belongeth a whip, to the Asse a bridle, and a rod to the fooles backe: wherewith not

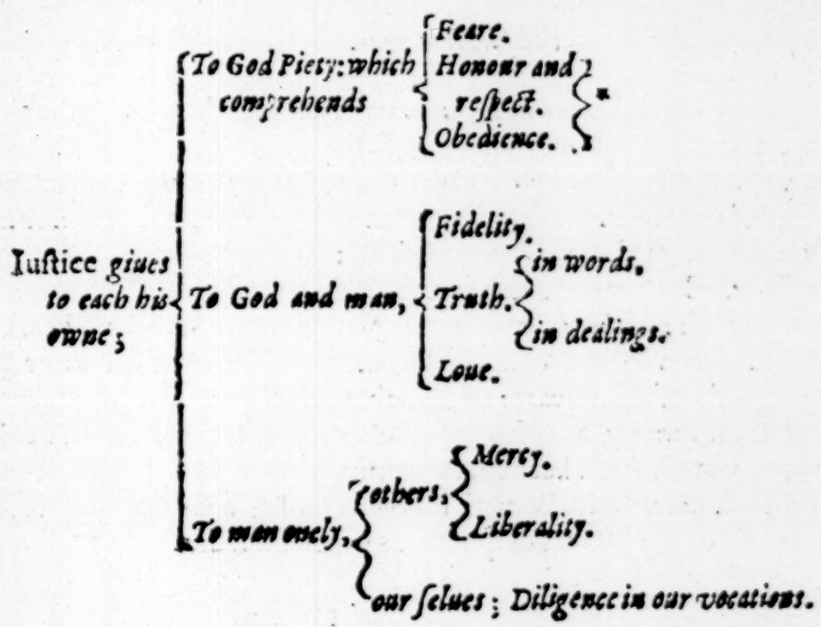
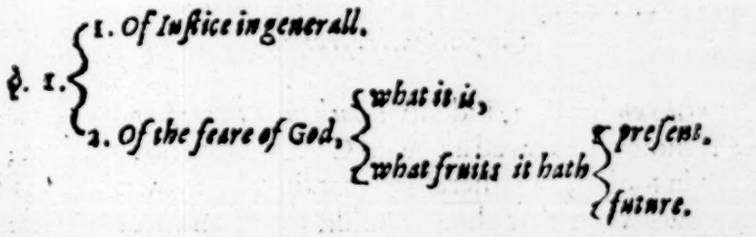
IVSTICE.





* Honour and Obedience are indeed mixed duties of Iustice both to God and man: but because as they belong to man, they are politike vertues and there handled; here we consider them onely as due to God.

NExt to Prudence, is Iustice. A man of vnderstanding walketh vprightly: The iust man, therefore, is he that walketh in his integrity; and whose path is to decline from euell; and briefly, hee that deales truly, in giuing each his owne. Pr. 15. 21. Pr. 20. 7. Pr. 16. 17. Pr. 12. 22.

Whether to God; vnto whom Iustice challengeth Piety: which comprehends, first, the feare of the Lord; and this feare of the Lord is to hate euill, as pride, arrogancie, and the euill way; and in all our waies to acknowledge God; that he may direct our waies; so that, he that walketh in his righteousnesse, feareth the Lord; but he that is lewd in his waies, despiseth him: which grace as it is the beginning of knowledge, and the Ec. 8. 13. the very inſtruction of wiſdome, ſo in ſome reſpect knowledge is the beginning of it; for If thou call'eſt after knowledge, and cryeſt for vnderſtanding; if thou ſeekeſt her as ſiluer, and ſearcheſt for her as treaſures; then ſhalt thou vnderſtand the feare of the Lord, and finde the knowledge of God; and this feare giues both contentment; Better is a little with the feare of the Lord, than great treaſure, and trouble therewith; and 2. future hope. Feare the Lord continually: for ſurely there is an end, & thy hope ſhall not be cut off. In which regard, This feare of the Lord is an aſſured ſtrength to depend vpon; becauſe his children ſhall haue hope, yea and preſent health and ioy. Feare the Lord, and depart from euill; ſo health ſhall be to thy nauell, and marrow to thy bones: and with health, life eternall. The feare of the Lord leadeth to life, yea is a well-ſpring thereof, and he that is filled therewith, ſhall continue, and ſhall not be viſited with euill; ſo that Bleſſed is the man that feareth alway: whereas on the contrary, He that hardneth his heart, and denies God, and ſaith, Who is the Lord? ſhall fall into euill.

HOnour and reſpect; both from the beſt things: Honor the Lord with thy riches, and the firſt fruits of all thy encreaſe; ſo ſhall thy barnes be filled with abundance, and thy preſſes ſhall burſt with new wine: and in our beſt times; Remember now thy Creator in the daies of thy youth; while the euill daies come not, nor the yeeres approach, wherein thou ſhalt ſay, I haue no pleaſure in them.

Thirdly, Obedience. Hee that obeyeth mee ſhall dwell ſafely (ſaith Wiſdome) and bee quiet from feare of euill: whether in attendance to the will of God; My ſonne, hearken to my words, incline thine eare vnto my ſayings; Let them not depart from thine eyes, but keepe them in the midſt of thine heart: for, He that regardeth inſtruction, is in the way of life; whereas he that turneth away his eare from it, his very prayer ſhall be abominable; or in executing of it: He that keepeth the commandement, is a childe of vnderſtanding; yea he is bleſſed, and thereby keepeth his owne ſoule; where they that forſake the Law, praiſe the wicked: and he that deſpiſeth his waies, ſhall die.

OR whether to God and man. 1. Fidelity: both, firſt in performing that wee haue vndertaken: If thou haue vowed a vow to God, deferre not to pay it; for hee delighteth not in fooles; pay therefore that thou haſt vowed; It is better that thou ſhouldſt not vow; than that thou ſhouldſt vow, and not pay it: Suffer not thy mouth to make thy fleſh to ſin; Neither ſay before the Angell, that this is ignorance: Wherefore ſhall God bee angry by thy voice, and deſtroy the worke of thine hands? For, It is deſtruction to a man, to deuoure that which is ſanctified, and after the vowes to enquire. Neither this to God onely, but to man; They that deale truly, are his delight; and the vpright ſhall inherit good things: yea, The faithfull man ſhall abound in bleſſings; whereas the perfidious man, as he wrongs others (for Confidence in an vnfaithfull man in time of trouble, is like a broken tooth, and a ſliding foot) ſo he gaineth not in the end, himſelfe; He that rewardeth euill for good, euill ſhall not depart from his houſe.

THis wicked man diggeth vp euill, and in his lips is like burning fire; Hee ſhutteth his eies to deuiſe wickedneſſe: hee moueth his lips, and bringeth euill to paſſe: and either hee inuenteth ill rumors; A righteous man hateth lying words: but the wicked cauſeth ſlander and ſhame; or elſe in true reports he will be fooliſhly medling, and goeth about diſcouering ſecrets; (where he that is of a faithfull heart, conceaeth matters) and by this meanes raiſeth diſcord. Without wood the fire is quenched: and without a tale-bearer, ſtrife ceaſeth; for the words of a tale-bearer are as flatterings, and goe downe into the bowels of the belly: therefore as on the one ſide, thou mayeſt not giue thine heart to all that men ſpeake of thee, leſt thou heare thy ſeruant curſing thee; ſo on the other, no countenance muſt be giuen to ſuch: for As the North-wind driues away raine; ſo doth an angry countenance the ſlandering tongue. We will swallow them vp aliue like a graue, euen whole; as those that goe downe into the pit. But, my sonne, walke not thou in the way with them: refraine thy foot from their path: for their feet runne to euill, and make haste to bloud-shed. Certainly as without cause the net is spred before the eies of all that hath wings, so they lay wait for bloud, and lie priuily for their liues; Thus the mercies of the wicked are cruell: But shall they preuaile in this? The causeless curse shall not come: The iust man may fall seuen times in a day, but he riseth vp againe, whiles the wicked shall fall into mischiefe; yea into the same they had deuised: He that diggeth a pit, shall fall therein; and he that rouleth a stone, it shall fall vpon him, and crush him to death: for Hee that doth violence against the bloud of a person, shall flee vnto the graue, and they shall not stay him.

TEMPERANCE and FORTITVDE.

Temperance is the moderation of our desires: whether

§. 1. Temperance in diet,

He temperate in diet, is hee that refraineth his appetite, that lookes not on the wine when it is red, that puts his knife to his throat, when hee sits with a Ruler; that when hee findes hony, eats but that which is sufficient for him, lest hee should bee ouer-full. It is true, that a man eateth and drinketh, and seeth the commoditie of all his labour; this is the gift of God: yea, this I haue seene good, that it is comely to eat and to drinke, and to take pleasure in all his labour wherein hee trauelleth vnder the Sunne, the whole number of the daies of his life which God giueth him, for this is his portion: God allowes vs to eat our bread with ioy, and drinke our wine with a cheerefull heart, and there is nothing better than this; yea, there is no profit but this: But not that a man should bee giuen to his appetite, that hee should seeke in his heart to draw his flesh to wine: or that whatsoeuer his eies desire, hee should not with-hold it from them: Such a man when hee is full, despiseth an hony-combe: whereas to the hungry, euery bitter thing is sweet: and in his excesse is outragious: One of the three things, yea foure, for which the earth is moued, and cannot sustaine it selfe, is a foole when hee is filled with meat. *Neither doth this prosper with himselfe. THe modest (for words) is a man of a precious spirit, that refraineth his lips, and spareth his words. The words of a modest man are like deepe waters, and the well-spring of wisdome like a flowing Riuer: but when hee doth speake, it is to purpose: for, The mouth of the iust shall be fruitfull in wisdome: and the lips of the righteous doe feed many, yea himselfe: A man shall be satiate with good things by the fruit of his mouth: and with the fruit of a mans mouth his belly shall be satisfied: but still he speaketh sparingly: A wise man concealeth knowledge, and a man of vnderstanding will keepe silence, which as it argues him wise, (for euen a foole, when hee holdeth his peace is counted wise; and he that stoppeth his lips, as prudent) so it giues him much safetie: Hee that keepeth his mouth, and his tongue, keepeth his soule from affliction; yea he keepeth his life: where contrarily, The mouth of the foole is in the multitude of words, it babbleth out foolishnesse; as it is fed with it: neither hath hee any delight in vnderstanding, but that which his heart discouereth; and while he bewraieth it, The heart of fooles publisheth his foolishnesse: And as he multiplieth words, so in many words there cannot want iniquitie: his mouth (still) babbleth euill things, for either hee speaketh froward things, or how to lie in wait for bloud, or in the mouth of the foolish is the rod of pride; and what is the issue of it? Hee that openeth his mouth, destruction shall be to him. And he that hath a naughtie tongue, shall fall into euill; for, both it shall be cut out, and the frowardnesse of it, is the breaking of the heart. Lastly, a fooles mouth is his owne destruction, and his lips are a snare for his soule.

For actions: The modest shall haue honour: And though we need not say, Of laughter, thou art madde, and of ioy, what is this thou doest? yet Anger is better than laughter: for by a sad looke the heart is made better. The heart of the wise therefore is in the house of mourning, but the heart of fooles is in the house of mirth. Reioice then, O young man, in thy youth, and let thine heart cheere thee in the daies of thy youth, and walke in the waies of thine heart, and in the sight of thine eies; but know, that for all these things God will bring thee to Iudgement.

Pr.29.23. Pr.30.2. NExt to the modest, is the humble in spirit: He saith, Surely, I am more foolish than a man, and haue not the vnderstanding of a man in me; for I haue not learned wisdome,

No :* With the lowly is wiſdome, and The care that harkneth to the corrections of life, ſhall lodge among the wiſe : Better it is therefore, to be of an humble minde with the lowly, than to diuide the ſpoiles with the proud : for before honour goeth humilitie ; and hee that confeſſeth and forſaketh his ſinnes, ſhall haue mercie, yea, the humble of ſpirit ſhall enioy glory : and the reward of humilitie, and the feare of God, is riches, and glory, and life. Fortitude is that, whereby The ſpirit of a man ſuſtaines his infirmities; which makes the righteous bold as a Lion: contrarily, the weake of ſtrength is hee that is faint in the day of aduerſitie; whoſe feare bringeth a ſnare vpon him; and that deſperate: A wounded ſpirit who can beare? which is often cauſed through guiltineſſe: The wicked fleeth, when none purſueth him. Confidence is, to truſt in the Lord with all thine heart, and not to leane to thine owne wiſdome; but in all thy waies to acknowledge him, and to commit thy workes to the Lord, and to haue hope in thy death: and though in other things, The hope that is deferred, is the fainting of the heart; yet in this, he that truſteth in the Lord, ſhall be fat; for, from hence, not onely his thoughts and waies are directed, but he receiueth ſafetie and protection: He is a ſhield to thoſe that truſt in him. The horſe is prepared for the day of battell, but ſaluation is of the Lord. Yea, The name of the Lord is a ſtrong tower: the righteous runneth to it, and is exalted. So that, He that truſteth in the Lord, he is bleſſed; whereas He that truſteth in his owne heart, is a foole: and it is a vaine thing to boaſt thy ſelfe of to morow; for thou knoweſt not what a day will bring forth.

And first,

HIS KING.

§. 1. Degrees — must be, and are — subordinate, highest, — and those from God. — not many, but one.

IN all well ordered gouernments there are degrees, And higher than the highest, and yet an higher than they: and these, of Gods appointment; not onely in the inferiour ranks, The rich and poore meet, and the Lord is the Maker of them all: but in the supreme, By me Kings raigne (saith Wisdome) and Princes decree Iustice: and not they onely, but the Nobles and all the Iudges of the earth; so it is a iust wonder, that the Grashoppers haue no King, yet they goe forth by bands. And as no King is a iudgement; so many: for Because of the transgression of the Land, there are many Princes; many, not onely in frequent succession, but in society of regiment.

A King must be high; as in place, so in blood: Blessed art thou, O Land, when thy King is the sonne of Nobles; not of any seruile condition; for nothing can be more vncomly, than for a seruant to haue rule ouer Princes: and it is a monster in State, to see seruants ride on horses, and Princes (of bloud) to walke as seruants on the ground; neither more monstrous than intollerable. There are three things for which the earth is moued, yea foure which it cannot sustaine: whereof one is, A seruant when he raigneth.

AND as his bloud is heroicall, so his disposition; not lasciuious, What, O my sonne of my desires, giue not thy strength to women, nor thy waies: But why, should he withhold hold from his eyes whatsoeuer they can desire, and withdraw his heart from any ioy? why may he not haue all the delights of the sonnes of men: as women taken captiue; as Queenes and Concubines, and Damosels without number? This is to destroy Kings; He shall finde more bitter than death the woman whose heart is as nets and snares. Not riotously excessiue; whether in wine: for It is not for Kings to drinke wine, nor for Princes strong drinke: What not at all? To him alone is it not said, Goe eat thy bread with ioy, and drinke thy wine with a cheerefull heart? who should eat or drinke, or haste to outward things more than he? Not immoderatly: so as he should drinke and forget the decree, and change the iudgement of all the children of affliction: Or in meat; for, Woe be to thee, O Land, when thy Princes eat in the morning: and if he be not the master of his appetite, his dainty meats will proue deceiueable. Not hollow, not double in speeches, in profession: The lip of excellency becomes not a foole; much lesse, lying talke a Prince. Not childish; Woe to thee, O Land, whose King is a childe: not so much in age, which hath sometimes proued successefull; but in condtion: Not imprudent, not oppressing; two vices conioyned; A Prince destitute of vnderstanding, is also a great oppressor; And to conclude, in all or any of these, not wilfully inflexible: A poore and wise childe is better than an old and foolish King, that will no more be admonished.

Contrarily he must be Temperate, Blessed art thou, O Land, when thy Princes eat in time, for strength, and not for drunkennesse: Iust and righteous, for false ballances (especially in the hand of gouernment) are an abomination to the Lord: but a perfect weight pleaseth him: A vertue beneficiall, both 1. to himselfe (for the Throne is established by Iustice) and 2. to the State. Iustice exalteth a Nation; than which nothing doth more binde and cheare the hearts of the people: for When the righteous are in authority, the people reioyce, but when the wicked beares rule, the people sigh: and with truth and iustice, must mercy be ioyned inseparably: for Mercy and truth preserue the King: and his Throne shall be established, also, by mercy. And all these must haue wisdome to menage them: By it, Princes rule, and are terrible to the ill-deserning. A wise King scatereth the wicked, and causeth the wheele to turne ouer them. To all these must bee added bounty: A Prince that hateth couetousnesse, shall prolong his daies; where contrarily, A man of gifts destroyeth his country: and yet further, a conquest of his owne passions; a princely victory: for He that is slow to anger, is better than the mighty man; and hee that ruleth his owne minde, better than he that winneth a City; because of all other, The Kings wrath is like the roaring of a Lion: and what is that but the messenger of death? and if it may be, a conquest of all others, through valour. There are three things, that order well their going, yea foure are comely in going: whereof the last and principall is, A King against whom no man dares rise vp. Lastly, secrecie in determinations: The Heauen in height, and earth in deepnesse, and the Kings heart can no man (no man should) search out: neither should it be in any hands but the Lords; who as he knowes it, so he turnes it whithersoeuer it pleaseth him.

- §. 5. His actions
  - common,
  - speciall to his place: To
    - iudge righteously

      2. according to the distresse of the party, vnpartially.

Pr. 16. 12. Pr. 16. 7.

His actions must suit his disposition, which must bee vniuersally holy: for, It is an abomination to Kings (of all other) to commit wickednesse. Which holinesse alone is the way to all peace: When the waies of a man please the Lord, he will make his enemies at peace with him: Peculiarly to his place; hee must first iudge his people: a King that sitteth in the Throne of iudgement, chaseth away all euill with his eies; and by this hee maintaines his country: and while he doth sit there, A diuine sentence must be in the lips of the King, and his mouth may not transgresse in iudgement. For, a King that iudgeth the poore in truth, his Throne shall be established for euer: Neither may his eare be partially open: which disposition shall be sure to be fed with reports; for, Of a Prince that harkneth to lies, all his seruants are wicked: nor his mouth shut, especially in cases of distresse: Open thy mouth for the dumbe in the cause of all the children of destruction: open thy mouth, iudge righteously, and iudge the afflicted and the poore: yet not with so much regard to the estate of persons, as the truth of the cause; for Surely it is not good to condemne the iust in what euer condition; nor that Princes should smite such for equity: wherein he shall wisely search into all difficulties. The glory of God is to passe by infirmities, but the Kings honour is to search out a thing; yet so, as he is not seldome mercifull in execution, Deliuering them that are drawne to death, and preseruing them that are drawne to be slaine. These obserued, it cannot be, that man should rule euer man to his hurt.

law be enacted, they violate it not, nor striue for innouation. Hee that breakes the hedge, a serpent shall bite him. He that remoueth stones, shall hurt himselfe thereby: and hee that cutteth wood, shall be in danger thereby. And if they haue offended, they haste not to goe forth of the Princes sight, nor stand in an euill thing: for he will doe what-euer pleaseth him; but rather if the spirit of him that ruleth, rise vp against them, by gentlenesse pacifie great sinnes.

Secondly, mutuall commerce, and interchange of commodities; without which, is no liuing: The abundance of the earth is ouer all: and the King consists by the field that is tilled. The husbandman therefore must till his land, that hee may bee satisfied with bread; for, much increase commeth by the strength of the Oxe: and moreouer, he must sell corne, that blessings may be vpon him; which if he withdraw, the people shall curse him; so that, the slothfull man, whose field is ouergrowne with thornes and nettles, is but an ill member: And againe, The Merchant must bring his wares from farre; and each so trade with other, that both may liue. They prepare bread for laughter, and wine comforts the liuing, but siluer answereth to all. For lesse publike society, is required due reseruation of propriety; not to remoue the ancient bounds which his fathers haue made; not to enter into the field of the fatherlesse; for he that redeemeth them, is mighty; not to increase his riches by vsury and interest, not to hasten ouer-much to be rich; for such one knoweth not that pouerty shall come vpon him; and that an heritage hastily gotten in the beginning, in the end thereof shall not bee blessed: and that in the meane time, The man that is greedy of gaine, troubleth his owne house. 2. Truth of friendship. A man that hath friends, ought to shew himselfe friendly: for a friend is neerer than a brother; Thy owne friend therefore, and thy fathers friend forget thou not: for whether he reproue thee, The wounds of a louer are faithfull: or whether he aduise, As ointment and perfume reioyce the heart, so doth the sweetnesse of a mans friend by hearty counsell: or whether he exhort; iron sharpens iron, so doth a man sharpen the face of his friend; and all this, not in the time of prosperitie only, as commonly, Riches gather many friends, and the poore is separated from his neighbour: but contrarily, A true friend loueth at all times, and a brother is borne for aduersity; in all estates therefore, as the face in the water water answers to face, so the heart of man to man; who yet may not be too much prised: Withdraw thy foot from thy neighbours house, lest he be weary of thee, and hate thee; neither enter into thy brothers house in the day of thy calamity: nor againe, too forward in proffering kindnesse to his owne losse; A man destitute of vnderstanding, toucheth the hand, and becommeth surety for his neighbour: If therefore thou art become surety for thy neighbour (much more if thou hast stricken hands with the stranger) thou art snared with the words of thine owne mouth, thou art euen taken with the words of thine owne mouth. Doe this now, my sonne, seeing thou art come into the hand of thy neighbour (not hauing taken a pledge for thy suretiship) goe and humble thy selfe, and sollicit thy friends: Giue no sleepe to thine eies, nor slumber to thine eielids. Deliuer thy selfe as a Doe from the hand of the Hunter, and as a bird from the hand of the Fowler, and take it for a sure rule, He that hateth suretiship, is sure.

SALOMONS OECONOMICKS, OR FAMILY.

Q. 1. The head of the Family: in whom is required { Wisdome, Stayednesse, Thrift.

THE man is the head, and guide of the family; In whom wisdome is good with an inheritance: for Through wisedome an house is builded and established: which directs him to doe all things in due order; first, to prepare his worke without, and then after, to build his house; and therewith, stayednesse. For, as a bird that wandreth from her nest, so is a man that wandreth from his owne place; and (which is the chiefe stay of his estate) thriftinesse; for Hee that troubleth his owne house (by excesse) shall inherit the wind: and the foole shall bee seruant to the wise in heart: for which purpose he shall finde, that The house of the righteous shall haue much treasure, while the reuenues of the wicked is but trouble: or if not much; yet Better is a little with the feare of the Lord, than great treasure, and trouble therewith: Howsoeuer, therefore, let him be content with his estate: Let the Lambes bee sufficient for his cloathing, and let the Goats be the price of his field. Let the milke of his Goats be sufficient for his food, for the food of his family, and the sustenance of his maides: and if he haue much reuenue, let him looke for much expence. For, When goods increase, they are increased that eat them: and what good commeth to the owners thereof, but the beholding thereof with their eyes?

Q. 2. Who must beare himselfe { Wisely, Chastly, Quietly, and cheerefully.

HE that findeth a wife, findeth a good thing, and receiueth fauour of the Lord: Who must therefore behaue himselfe, 1. wisely, as the guide of her youth: as the Head to which she is a Crowne. 2. Chastly, Drinke the water of thine owne Cisterne, and the riuers out of the middest of thine owne Well. The matrimoniall loue must be pure and cleere, not muddy and troubled; Let thy fountaines flow forth, and the riuers of waters in the streets; the sweet and comfortable fruits of blessed mariage, in plentifull issue: But let them be thine alone, and not the strangers with thee. This loue abides no partners: for this were to giue thine honour vnto others, and thy strength to the cruell; so should the stranger be filled with thy strength, and (as the substance will be with the affections) thy labours should bee in the house of a stranger; and thou shalt mourne (which is the best successe hereof) at thine end, when thou hast consumed (besides thy goods)

TO THE RIGHT HONOVRABLE, MY SINGVLAR GOOD LORD, and Patron, EDVVARD Lord DENNY, Baron of Waltham, All Grace and Happineſſe.

RIGHT HONOVRABLE,

When I would haue withdrawne my hand from diuine Salomon, the heauenly elegance of this his beſt Song drew mee vnto it, and would not ſuffer mee to take off mine eies, or pen. Who can reade it with vnderſtanding, and not be tranſported from the world, from himſelfe? and bee any otherwhere ſaue in Heauen, before his time? I had rather ſpend my time in admiration, than Apologie. Surely, here is nothing that ſauours not of extaſie, and ſpirituall rauiſhment; neither was there euer ſo high and paſſionate a ſpeculation deliuered by the Spirit of God, to mankinde: which by how much more diuine it is, by ſo much more difficult. It is well, if theſe myſteries can be found out by ſearching. Two things make the Scripture hard: Prophecies, Allegories; both are met in this: but the latter ſo ſenſibly to the weakeſt eies, that this whole Paſtorall-mariage-ſong (for ſuch it is) is no other than one Allegorie ſweetly continued: where the deepeſt things of God are ſpoken in Riddles, how can there be but obſcuritie and diuers conſtruction? All iudgements will not (I know) ſubſcribe to my ſenſes; yet I haue beene beene fearefull and spiritually nice, not often dissenting from all Interpreters; alwaies, from the vnlikeliest. It would bee too tedious to giue my account for euery line: let the learned scan and iudge. What-euer others censures be, your Honours was fauourable; and (as to all mine) full of loue and incouragement. That, therefore, which it pleased you to allow from my pen, vouchsafe to receiue from the Presse; more common, not lesse deuoted to you. What is there of mine that doth not ioy in your name, and boast it selfe in seruing you? To whose soule and people, I haue long agone addicted my selfe, and my labours, and shall euer continue

Your Lordships, in all humble and vnfained dutie,

SALOMONS SONG OF SONGS PARAPHRASED.

CHAP. I.

Dialogue. The Church, to CHRIST.

1. Let him kisse me with the kisses of his mouth; for thy loue is beter than wine.

OH that he would bestow vpon me the comfortable testimonies of his loue, and that he would vouchsafe me yet a neerer coniunction with himselfe; as in glorie hereafter, so for the meane time in his sensible graces! For thy loue, O my Sauiour, and these fruits of it, are more sweet vnto mee, than all earthly delicates can be to the bodily taste.

2. Because of the sauour of thy good ointments, thy name is as an ointment powred out: therefore the Virgins loue thee.

Yea, so wonderfully pleasant are the sauours of those graces that are in thee, wherewith I desire to be endued, that all whom thou hast blessed with the sense thereof, make as high and deare account of thy Gospell, whereby they are wrought, as of some precious ointment, or perfume: the delight whereof is such, that (hereupon) the pure and holy soules of the faithfull place their whole affection vpon thee.

3. Draw mee, we will runne after thee: the King hath brought mee into his chambers, wee will reioice, and bee glad in thee: we will remember thy loue, more than wine, the righteous doe loue thee.

Pull me therefore out from the bondage of my sinnes: deliuer mee from the world, and doe thou powerfully incline my will and affections toward thee: and in spight of all tentations, giue mee strength to cleaue vnto thee; and then both I, and all those faithfull children thou hast giuen mee, shall all at once with speed and earnestnesse walke to thee, and with thee: yea, when once my Royall and glorious Husband hath brought me both into these lower roomes of his spirituall treasures on earth, and into his heauenly chambers of glory, then will we reioice and be glad in none, but thee, which shalt be all in all to vs: then will wee celebrate and magnifie thy loue aboue all the pleasures we found vpon earth; for all of vs thy righteous ones, both Angels and Saints, are inflamed with the loue of thee.

4. I am blacke, O daughters of Ierusalem, but comely: If I be as the tents of Kedar, yet I am as the curtaines of Salomon.

Neuer vpbraid me (O yee forraine congregations) that I seeme in outward appearance discoloured by my infirmities, and duskish with tribulations: for whatsoeuer I seeme to you, I am yet inwardly well-fauoured in the eies of Him whom I seeke to please; and though I be to you blacke, like the tents of the Arabian shepheards; yet to him, and in him, I am glorious and beautifull, like the Curtaines of Salomon.

5. Regard

5. Regard yee me not, becauſe I am blacke: for the Sunne hath looked vpon mee; the ſonnes of my mother were angry againſt me: they made me keeper of the vines; but I kept not mine owne vine.

Looke not therefore diſdainfully vpon me, becauſe I am blackiſh, and darke of hiew: for this colour is not ſo much naturall to mee, as cauſed by that continuall heat of afflictions wherewith I haue beene vſually ſcorched: neither this, ſo much vpon my owne iuſt deſert, as vpon the rage and enuie of my falſe brethren, the world: who would needs force vpon me the obſeruation of their idolatrous religions, and ſuperſtitious impieties; through whoſe wicked importunitie, and my owne weakneſſe, I haue not ſo intirely kept the ſincere truth of God committed to me, as I ought.

6. Shew me, O thou whom my ſoule loueth, where thou feedeſt, where thou lieſt at noone: for why ſhould I be as ſhe that turneth aſide to the flocks of thy companions.

Now therefore that I am ſome little ſtarted aſide from thee, O thou whom my ſoule notwithſtanding dearely loueth, ſhew me, I beſeech thee, where, and in what wholſome and diuine paſtures thou (like a good ſhepherd) feedeſt and reſteſt thy flocks with comfortable refreſhings, in the extremitie of theſe hot perſecutions: for how can it ſtand with thy glorie, that I ſhould through thy neglect, thus ſuſpiciouſly wander vp and downe, amongſt the congregations of them that both command and practiſe the worſhip of falſe gods?

CHRIST, to the Church.

7. If thou know not, O thou the faireſt among women, get thee forth by the ſteps of the flocke, and feed thy Kids aboue the tents of the ſhepherds.

IF thou know not, O thou my Church, whom I both eſteeme and haue made moſt beautifull by my merits, and thy ſanctification, ſtay not amongſt theſe falſe worſhippers, but follow the holy ſteps of thoſe bleſſed Patriarkes, Prophets, Apoſtles, which haue beene my true and ancient flocke, who haue both knowne my voice, and followed mee; and feed thou my weake and tender ones with this their ſpirituall food of life, farre aboue the carnall reach of thoſe other falſe teachers.

8. I haue compared thee, O my loue, to the troupes of horſes in the Chariots of Pharaoh.

Such is mine eſtimation of thee, O my Loue, that ſo farre as the choiſeſt Egyptian horſes of Pharaoh, for comely ſhape, for honourable ſeruice, for ſtrength and ſpeed, exceed all other, ſo farre thou excelleſt all that may be compared with thee.

9. Thy cheekes are comely with rowes of ſtones, and thy necke with chaines.

Thoſe parts of thee, which both are the ſeats of beautie, and moſt conſpicuous to the eye, are glorioufly adorned with the graces of my ſanctification; which are for their worth as ſo many precious borders of the goodlieſt ſtones, or chaines of pearle.

10. We will make thee borders of gold, with ſtuds of ſiluer.

And though thou be already thus ſet forth; yet I and my Father haue purpoſed a further ornament vnto thee, in the more plentifull effuſion of our Spirit vpon thee: which ſhall bee to thy former deckings, in ſtead of pure gold curiouſly wrought with ſpecks of ſiluer.

NEither doeſt thou on my part loſe any of thy loue, O my deare Church: for behold, in mine eies, thus clothed as thou art with my righteouſneſſe, oh how faire and glorious thou art! how aboue all compariſon glorious and faire! Thine eies, which are thy ſeers, (Prophets, Apoſtles, Miniſters) and thoſe inward eies, whereby thou ſeeſt him that is inuiſible, are full of grace, chaſtitie, ſimplicitie.

And behold, the congregations of Saints, the places where we doe ſweetly conuerſe and walke together, are both firme and during (like Cedars amongſt the trees) not ſubiect, through thy protecting grace, to vtter corruption; and through thy fauourable acceptation and word (like to galleries of ſweet wood) full of pleaſure and contentment.

CHRIST.

1. I am the Roſe of the field, and the Lillie of the valleyes.

THou haſt not without iuſt cauſe magnified me, O my Church: for, as the faireſt and ſweeteſt of all flowers which the earth yeeldeth, the Roſe and Lillie of the valleyes, excell for beautie, for pleaſure, for vſe, the moſt baſe and odious weeds that grow; ſo doth my grace, to all them that haue felt the ſweetneſſe thereof, ſurpaſſe all worldly contentments.

2. Like a Lillie among the thornes, ſo is my loue among the daughters.

Neither is this my dignitie alone: but thou, O my Spouſe (that thou maieſt bee a fit match for me) art thus excellent aboue the world, that no Lillie can be more in goodly ſhew beyond the naked thorne, than thou in thy glorie thou receiueſt from mee, ouerlookeſt all the aſſemblies of aliens and vnregenerates.

5. Regard yee me not, because I am blacke: for the Sunne hath looked vpon mee; the sonnes of my mother were angry against me: they made me keeper of the vines; but I kept not mine owne vine.

Looke not therefore disdainfully vpon me, because I am blackish, and darke of hiew: for this colour is not so much naturall to mee, as caused by that continuall heat of afflictions wherewith I haue beene vsually scorched: neither this, so much vpon my owne iust desert, as vpon the rage and enuie of my false brethren, the world: who would needs force vpon me the obseruation of their idolatrous religions, and superstitious impieties; through whose wicked importunitie, and my owne weakneſſe, I haue not so intirely kept the sincere truth of God committed to me, as I ought.

6. Shew me, O thou whom my soule loueth, where thou feedest, where thou liest at noone: for why should I be as she that turneth aside to the flocks of thy companions.

Now therefore that I am some little started aside from thee, O thou whom my soule notwithstanding dearely loueth, shew me, I beseech thee, where, and in what wholsome and diuine pastures thou (like a good shepherd) feedest and restest thy flocks with comfortable refreshings, in the extremitie of these hot persecutions: for how can it stand with thy glorie, that I should through thy neglect, thus suspiciously wander vp and downe, amongst the congregations of them that both command and practise the worship of false gods?

Those parts of thee, which both are the seats of beautie, and most conspicuous to the eye, are gloriously adorned with the graces of my sanctification; which are for their worth as so many precious borders of the goodlieſt stones, or chaines of pearle.

10. We will make thee borders of gold, with studs of siluer.

And though thou be already thus set forth; yet I and my Father haue purposed a further ornament vnto thee, in the more plentifull effusion of our Spirit vpon thee: which shall bee to thy former deckings, in stead of pure gold curiously wrought with specks of siluer.

3. Like the Apple-tree among the trees of the forest, so is my welbeloued among the sonnes of men: vnder his shadow had I delight, and sate downe; and his fruit was sweet vnto my mouth.

AND (to returne thine owne praises) as some fruitfull and well-growne Apple-tree, in comparison of all the barren trees of the wilde forest, so art thou (O my beloued Sauiour) to me, in comparison of all men, and Angels; vnder thy comfortable shadow alone, haue I euer wont to finde safe shelter against all mine afflictions, all my tentations and infirmities, against all the curses of the Law, and dangers of iudgement, and to coole my selfe after all the scorching beames of thy Fathers displeasure, and (besides) to feed and satisfie my soule with the soueraigne fruit of thy holy Word, vnto eternall life.

4. He brought me into the wine-cellar, and loue was his banner ouer me.

He hath graciously led me by his Spirit, into the midst of the mysteries of godlinesse; and hath plentifully broached vnto mee the sweet wines of his Scriptures and Sacraments. And looke how souldiers are drawne by their colours from place to place, and cleaue fast to their ensigne: so his loue, which he spred forth in my heart, was my onely banner, whereby I was both drawne to him, directed by him, and fastned vpon him.

5. Stay me with flagons, and comfort me with apples: for I am sicke of loue.

And now, O yee faithfull Euangelists, Apostles, Teachers, apply vnto mee with all care and diligence, all the cordiall promises of the Gospell: these are the full Flagons of that spirituall wine, which onely can cheere vp my soule; these are the Apples of that tree of life, in the middest of the Garden, which can feed me to immortalitie. Oh come and apply these vnto my heart: for I am euen ouercome with a longing expectation and desire of my delayed glory.

6. His left hand be vnder my head: and let his right hand embrace me.

And whiles I am thus spiritually languishing in this agonie of desire, let my Sauiour imploy both his hands to releeue mine infirmitie: let him comfort my head and my heart, my iudgement and affections, (which both complaine of weakenesse) with the liuely heat of his gracious embracements: and so let vs sweetly rest together.

7. I charge you, O daughters of Ierusalem, by the Roes and by the Hindes of the field, that yee stirre not vp, nor waken my Loue, vntill he please.

In the meane time, I charge you (O all yee that professe any friendship or affinitie with mee) I charge you, by whatsoeuer is comely, deare and pleasant vnto you, as you will auoid my vttermost censures, take heed how you vex and disquiet my mercifull Sauiour, and grieue his Spirit, and wrong his name, with your vaine and lewd conuersation; and doe not dare, by the least prouocation of your sinne, to interrupt his peace.

8. It is the voice of my welbeloued: behold, he commeth leaping by the mountaines, and skipping by the hils.

Loe, I haue no sooner called, but hee heares and answers mee with his louing voice: neither doth he onely speake to me afarre, but he comes to me with much willingnesse and celeritie; so willingly, that no humane resistance can hinder him, neither the hillocks of my lesser infirmities, nor the mountaines of my grosser sinnes (once repented of) can stay his mercifull pase towards me.

9. My welbeloued is like a Roe, or a young Hart: loe, hee standeth behinde our wall, looking forth of the windowes, shewing himselfe thorow the grates.

So

So ſwiftly, that no Roe or Hinde can fully reſemble him in this his ſpeed and nimbleneſſe: and loe, euen now, before I can ſpeake it, is hee come neere vnto me, cloſe to the doore and wall of my heart. And though this wall of my fleſh hinder my full fruition of him, yet loe, I ſee him by the eie of faith, looking vpon me; I ſee him as in a glaſſe; I ſee him ſhining gloriouſly, thorow the grates and windowes of his Word and Sacraments, vpon my ſoule.

10. My Welbeloued ſpake, and ſaid vnto me, Ariſe, my Loue, my faire one, and come thy way.

And now, me thinks, I heare him ſpeake to mee in a gracious inuitation, and ſay, Ariſe, (O my Church) riſe vp, whether from thy ſecuritie, or feare: hide not thy head any longer, O my beautifull Spouſe, for danger of thine enemies, neither ſuffer thy ſelfe to be preſſed with the dulneſſe of thy nature, or the careleſſe ſleepe of thy ſinnes; but come forth into the comfortable light of my preſence, and ſhew thy ſelfe cheereſull in mee.

11. For behold, winter is paſt, the raine is changed and gone away.

For behold, all the cloudie winter of thy afflictions is paſſed, all the tempeſts of tentations are blowne ouer; the heauen is cleare, and now there is nothing that may not giue thee cauſe of delight.

12. The flowers appeare in the earth: the time of the ſinging of birds is come, and the voice of the Turtle is heard in our land.

Euery thing now reſembles the face of a ſpirituall Spring; all the ſweet flowers and bloſſomes of holy profeſſion put forth, and ſhew themſelues in their opportunities: now is the time of that heauenly melodie, which the cheereſull Saints and Angels make in mine eares, while they ſing ſongs of deliuerance, and praiſe mee with their Alleluiahs, and ſay, Glory to God on high, in earth peace, good will towards men.

13. The Fig-tree hath brought forth her young Figs, and the Vines with their ſmall Grapes haue caſt a ſauour: ariſe, my Loue, my faire one, and come away.

What ſpeake I of bloſſomes? behold, thoſe fruitfull Vines, and Fig-trees of my faithfull ones, whom my husbandrie hath carefully tended and dreſſed, yeeld forth both pleaſant (though tender) fruits of obedience, and the wholſome and comfortable ſauours of better deſires: wherefore now, O my deare Chriſt, ſhake off all that dull ſecuritie, wherewith thou haſt beene held, and come forth and enioy me.

14. My Doue, thou art in the holes of the rocke, in the ſecret places of the cliſts: ſhew mee thy ſight, let me heare thy voice: for thy voice is ſweet, and thy ſight comely.

O my beautifull, pure, and chaſte Spouſe, which like vnto ſome ſolitarie Doue, haſt long hid thine head in the ſecret and inacceſſible clifts of the rocks, out of the reach and knowledge of thy perſecutors; how-euer thou art concealed from others, ſhew thy ſelfe in thy workes and righteouſneſſe, vnto mee: and let mee bee euer plied with thy words of imploration, and thankſgiuing: for thy voice (though it be in mourning) and thy face (though it be ſad and blubbered (are exceedingly pleaſing vnto me.

15. Take vs the Foxes, the little Foxes which deſtroy the Vines: for our Vines haue ſmall grapes.

And in the meane time (O all yee that wiſh well to my name and Church) doe your vtmoſt endeuour to deliuer her from her ſecret enemies (not ſparing the leaſt) who either by hereticall doctrine, or prophane conuerſation, hinder the courſe of the Goſpell, and peruert the faith of many, eſpecially of thoſe that haue newly giuen vp their names to mee, and are but newly entred into the profeſſion of godlineſſe.

16. My Wel-beloued is mine, and I am his: he feedeth among the Lillies.

My beloued Sauiour is mine, through my faith; and I am his through his loue: and we both are one, by vertue of that blessed vnion on both parts; whereby wee mutually enioy each other with all sufficient contentment. And how worthily is my loue placed vpon him, who leadeth mee forth into pleasant pastures, and at whose right hand there is the fulnesse of ioy for euermore!

17. Vntill the day breake, and the shadowes flee away, returne, my Wel-beloued, and be like a Roe or a young Hart vpon the mountaines of Bether.

Come therefore (O my Sauiour) and vntill the day of thy glorious appearance shall shine forth to the world, wherein our spirituall mariage shall bee consummate, and vntill all these shadowes of ignorance, of infidelitie, of troubles of conscience, and of outward tribulations bee vtterly dispersed, and chased away, come and turne thee to mee againe, thou which to the carnall eies of the world seemest absent, come quickly, and delay not; but for the speed of thy returne, be like vnto some swift Roe, or Hinde, vpon those smooth hils of Gilead, which Iordan seuers from the other part of Iury.

CHAP. III.

1. In my bed by night I sought him whom my soule loued: I sought him, but I found him not.

MY securitie told mee that my Sauiour was neere vnto my soule, yea within it, and in it: but when by serious and silent meditation I searched my owne heart, I found that (for ought my owne sense could discerne) hee was farre off from mee.

2. I will rise therefore now, and goe about in the Citie by the streets, and by the open places, and will seeke him that my soule loueth: I sought him, but I found him not.

Then thought I with my selfe, Shall I lie still contented with this want? No, I will stirre vp my selfe; and the helpe I cannot finde in my selfe, I will seeke in others: Of all that haue beene experienced in all kinde of difficulties, of all deepe Philosophers, of the wisest and honestest worldlings, I will diligently enquire for my Sauiour: amongst them I sought him, yet could receiue no answer to my satisfaction.

3. The watchmen that went about the Citie, found mee: to whom I said, Haue you seene him whom my soule loueth?

Missing him there, I ran to those wise and carefull Teachers, whom God hath set as so many watch-men vpon the walls of his Ierusalem, who sooner found me than I could aske after them; to whom I said (as thinking no man could be ignorant of my Loue) Can you giue me no direction where I might finde him whom my soule loueth?

4. When I had past a little from them, then I found him whom my soule loueth: I tooke hold on him, and left him not, till I had brought him vnto my mothers house, into the chamber of her that conceiued mee.

Of whom when I had almost left hoping for comfort, that gracious Sauiour who would not suffer mee tempted aboue my measure, presented himselfe to my soule: Loe then, by a new act of faith, I laid fast hold vpon him, and will not let him any more part from my ioifull embracements, vntill both I haue brought him home fully into the seat of my conscience, and haue wonne him to a perpetuall cohabitation with mee, and a full accomplishment of my loue, in that Ierusalem which is aboue, which is the mother of vs all.

5. I charge yee, O daughters of Ieruſalem, by the Roes, and by the Hindes of the field, that ye ſtirre not vp nor waken my Loue vntill ſhe pleaſe.

NOw that my diſtreſſed Church hath beene all the night long of my ſeeming abſence, toiled in ſeeking mee, I charge you, (O all that profeſſe any friendſhip with me) I charge you by whatſoeuer is comely, deare, and pleaſant vnto you, that (as you will anſwer it) you trouble not her peace with any vniuſt or vnſeaſonable ſuggeſtions, with vncharitable contentions, with any Nouelties of doctrine, but ſuffer her to reſt ſweetly in that diuine truth, which ſhe hath receiued, and this true apprehenſion of me wherein ſhe reioiceth.

6. Who is ſhe that commeth vp out of the wilderneſſe, like pillars of ſmoake perfumed with Myrrh and Incenſe, and with all the chiefe of ſpices?

Oh who is this? how admirable? how louely? who but my Church, that aſcendeth thus gloriouſly out of the wilderneſſe of the world, wherein ſhee hath thus long wandered into the bleſſed manſions of my Fathers houſe, all perfumed with the graces of perfect ſanctification, mounting right vpward into her glory, like ſome ſtraight pillar of ſmoke, that ariſeth from the moſt rich and pleaſant compoſition of odours that can be deuiſed?

7. Behold his bed better than Salomons: threeſcore ſtrong men are round about it, of the valiant men of Iſrael.

I Am aſcended; and loe, how glorious is this place where I ſhall eternally enioy the preſence and loue of my Sauiour! how farre doth it exceed the earthly magnificence of Salomon? about his bed doe attend a Gard of threeſcore choiſeſt men of Iſrael.

8. They all handle the ſword, and are expert in warre: euery one hath his ſword vpon his thigh, for the feare by night.

All ſtout Warriers, able and expert to handle the ſword; which, for more readineſſe each of them weares hanging vpon his thigh, ſo as it may bee haſtily drawne vpon any ſudden danger: but about this heauenly pauillion of my Sauiour, attend millions of Angels, ſpirituall Souldiers, mightie in power, ready to bee commanded ſeruice by him.

9. King Salomon made himſelfe a bed of the trees of Lebanon.

The Bride-bed that Salomon made (ſo much admired of the world) was but of the Cedars of Lebanon.

10. He made the pillars thereof of ſiluer, and the ſted thereof of gold, the hangings thereof of purple, whoſe midſt was in-laid with the loue of the daughters of Ieruſalem.

The Pillars but of ſiluer, and the Bed-ſted of gold; the Teſter or Canopie, but of purple; the Couerlet wrought with the curious and painfull needle-worke of the maids of Ieruſalem: but this celeſtiall reſting place of my God is not made with hands, nor of any corruptible metall, but is full of incomprehenſible light, ſhining euermore with the glorious preſence of God.

11. Come forth, yee daughters of Sion, and behold the King Salomon with the crowne wherewith his mother crowned him in the day of his mariage, and in the day of the gladneſſe of his heart.

And as the outward ſtate, ſo the maieſtie of his perſon is aboue all compariſon. Come forth (O yee daughters of Sion) lay aside all priuate and earthly affections; looke vpon King Salomon as hee sits solemnly crowned in the day of his greatest royaltie and triumph, and compare his highest pompe, with the diuine magnificence of my Sauiour, in that day when his blessed mariage shall bee fully perfected aboue, to the eternall reioycing of himselfe, and his Church; and see whether there bee any portion betwixt them.

CHAP. IIII.

CHRIST.

1. Behold, thou art faire, my Loue, behold, thou art faire, thine eies are like the Doues within thy locks: thine haire is like a flocke of Goats which looke downe from the mountaines of Gilead.

OH how faire thou art and comely, my deare Spouse! how inwardly faire with the gifts of my Spirit! how faire outwardly in thy comely administration and gouernment! Thy spirituall eies of vnderstanding and iudgement, are full of puritie, chastitie, simplicitie; not wantonly cast forth, but modestly shining amidst thy locks: all thy gracious profession, and all thy appendances, and ornaments of expedient ceremonies, are so comely to behold, as it is to see a flocke of well-fed Goats grasing vpon the fruitfull hills of Gilead.

2. Thy teeth like a flocke of sheepe in good order, which goe vp from the washing: which euery one bring out twins, and none is barren among them.

Those that chew and prepare the heauenly food for thy soule, are both of gracious simplicitie, and of sweet accordance one with another; hauing all one heart and one tongue: and both themselues are sanctified and purged from their vncleannesse, and are fruitfull in their holy labours vnto others; so that their doctrine is neuer in vaine, but is still answered with plentifull increase of soules added to the Church.

3. Thy lips are like a threed of scarlet, and thy talke is comely: thy temples are within thy locks as a peece of a Pomegranate.

Thy speech (especially in the mouth of thy Teachers) is both gracious in it selfe, and such as administers grace to the hearers; full of zeale and feruent charitie, full of grauitie and discretion: and that part of thy countenance, which thou wilt haue seene (though dimly and sparingly) is full of holy modestie and bashfulnesse; so blushing, that it seemeth like the colour of a broken peece of Pomegranate.

4. Thy necke is as the tower of Dauid, built for defence: a thousand shields hang therein, and all the targets of the strong men.

Those, who by their holy authoritie sustaine thy gouernment (which are as some straight and strong necke to beare vp the head) are like vnto Dauids high Tower of defence, furnished with a rich armorie; which affords infinite waies of safe protection, and infinite monuments of victorie.

5. Thy two brests are as two young Kids that are twinnes, feeding among the Lillies.

Thy two Testaments (which are thy two full and faire brests, whereby thou nurses all thy faithfull children) are as two twins of Kids: twins, for their excellent and perfect agreement one with another, in all resemblances: of Kids, that are daintily fed among the sweet flowers, for the pleasant nourishment which they yeeld to all that sucke thereof.

6. Vntill the day breake, and the ſhadowes flie away, I will goe into the Mountaines of Myrrh, and to the Mountaines of Incenſe.

Vntill the day of my gracious appearance ſhall ſhine forth, and vntill all theſe ſhadowes of ignorance, infidelitie, afflictions, bee vtterly and ſuddenly diſperſed, O my Spouſe, I will retire my ſelfe (in regard of my bodily preſence) into my delightfull and glorious reſt of heauen.

7. Thou art all faire, my Loue, and there is no ſpot in thee.

Thou art exceeding beautifull, O my Church, in all the parts of thee: for all thy ſinnes are done away, and thine iniquitie is couered, and loe, I preſent thee to my Father without ſpot, or wrinkle, or any ſuch deformitie.

8. Come with me from Lebanon, my Spouſe, euen with me from Lebanon, and looke from the top of Amanah, from the top of Shenir and Hermon, from the dens of the Lions, and from the mountaines of the Leopards.

And now (O thou which I profeſſe to haue maried to my ſelfe in truth and righteouſneſſe) thou ſhalt be gathered to me from all parts of the world; not onely from the confines of Iudea, where I planted and found thee, but from the remoteſt and moſt ſauage places of the Nations; out of the companie of Infidels, of cruell and bloudy perſecutors, who like Lions and Leopards haue tyrannized ouer thee, and mercileſſly torne thee in peeces.

9. My ſiſter, my Spouſe, thou haſt wounded my heart with one of thine eies: and with a chaine of thy necke.

Thou haſt vtterly rauiſht me from my ſelfe (O my ſiſter and Spouſe; for ſo thou art, both ioined to me in that ſpirituall vnion, and coheire with me of the ſame inheritance and glory) thou haſt quite rauiſht my heart with thy loue: euen one caſt of one of thine eies of faith, and one of the ornaments of thy ſanctification wherewith thou art decked by my Spirit, haue thus ſtricken mee with loue: how much more, when I ſhall haue a full ſight of thee, and all thy graces, ſhall I be affected towards thee!

10. My ſiſter, my Spouſe, how faire is thy loue! how much better is thy loue than wine, and the ſauour of thine ointments than all ſpices?

O how excellent, how precious, how delectable are thoſe loues of thine, O my ſiſter, my Spouſe! how farre ſurpaſſing all earthly delicates! and the ſauour of thoſe diuine vertues, wherewith thou art endued, more pleaſing to my ſent, than all the perfumes in the world!

11. Thy lips, my Spouſe, drop as Hony combes: Hony and milke are vnder thy tongue, and the ſauour of thy garments is as the ſauour of Lebanon.

The gracious ſpeeches that proceed from thee, are as ſo many drops of the Hony-combe that fall from thy lips: and whether thou exhort, or confeſſe, or pray, or comfort, thy words are both ſweet and nouriſhing; and the ſauour of thy good works, and outward conuerſation, is to me as the ſmell of the wood of Lebanon to the ſenſe of man.

12. My ſiſter, my Spouſe, is as a Garden incloſed, as a Spring ſhut vp, and a Fountaine ſealed vp.

My ſiſter, my Spouſe, is as a Garden or Orchard full of all varietie of the heauenly Trees and flowers of grace; not lying carelesly open, either to the loue of ſtrangers, or to the rage of enemies, which like the wilde Bore out of the wood, might root vp and deſtroy her choice plants: but ſafely hedged and walled about, by my protection, and reſerued for my delight alone; ſhe is a Spring & Well of wholſome waters, from whom flow forth the pure ſtreames of my Word; but, both incloſed and ſealed vp: partly, that ſhee may the better (by this cloſeneſſe) preſerue her owne naturall taſte and vigour, from the corruptions of the world; and partly, that ſhee may not be defiled and mudded by the prophane feet of the wicked.

13. Thy plants are as an Orchard of Pomegranats with ſweet fruits: as Cypers, Spikenard, euen Spikenard and Saffron, Calamus and Cinamon, with all the trees of Incenſe, Myrrh and Aloes, with all the chiefe ſpices.

Thou art an Orchard, yea a Paradiſe, whoſe plants (which are thy faithfull children that grow vp in thee) are as Pomegranate Trees; the Apples whereof are eſteemed, for the largeneſſe, colour and taſte, aboue all other: or (if I would feed my other ſenſes) the plentifull fruits of thy holy obedience (which thou yeeldeſt vnto mee) are for their ſmell, as ſome compoſition of Cypreſſe, Spikenard, Saffron, ſweet Cane, Cinamon, Incenſe, Myrrh, Aloes, and what ſoeuer elſe may be deuiſed, vnto the moſt perfect ſent.

14. O fountaine of the gardens, O well of liuing waters, and the ſprings of Lebanon.

Thou art ſo a Spring in my Garden, that the ſtreames which are deriued from thee, water all the gardens of my particular congregations, all the world ouer: thou art that Fountaine, from whoſe pure head iſſue all thoſe liuing waters, which who ſo drinketh, ſhall neuer thirſt againe; euen ſuch cleare currents, as flow from the hill of Libanus, which like vnto another Iordan, water all the Iſrael of God.

The Church.

15. Ariſe, O North, and come, O South, and blow on my garden, that the ſpices thereof may flow out: let my Well-beloued come to his garden, and eat his pleaſant fruit.

IF I bee a garden, as thou ſaieſt (O my Sauiour) then ariſe, O all yee ſoueraigne winds of the Spirit of God, and breathe vpon this garden of my ſoule; that the ſweet odours of theſe my plants may both bee increaſed, and may alſo bee diſperſed afarre, and carried into the noſtrils of my Well-beloued: and ſo let him come into his owne garden (which his owne hand hath digged, planted, watred) and accept of the fruit of that ſeruice and praiſe, which hee ſhall inable mee to bring forth to his Name.

CHAP. V.

CHRIST.

1. I am come into my garden, my ſiſter, my Spouſe: I gathered my Myrrh with my ſpice; I ate my Hony with my Hony-combe, I dranke my wine with my milke: eat, O my friends: drinke, and make you merry, O Wel-beloued.

BEhold, according to thy deſire, I am come into my garden, O my ſiſter, my Spouſe; I haue receiued thoſe fruits of thine obedience which thou offeredſt vnto mee, with much ioy and pleaſure. I haue accepted not onely of thy good works, but thy endeuours and purpoſes of holineſſe, both which are as pleaſant to me, as the Hony and the Hony-combe. I haue allowed of the cheerefulneſſe of thy ſeruice, and the wholeſomeneſſe of thy doctrine. And yee, O my friends, whether bleſſed Angels, or faithfull men, partake with me in this ioy ariſing from the faithfulnes of my Church: cheere vp and fill your ſelues, O my beloued, with the ſame Spirituall dainties wherewith I am refreſhed.

The Church.

2. I ſleepe, but my heart waketh: it is the voyce of my Well-beloued that knocketh, ſaying, Open

Open vnto me, my ſiſter, my Loue, my Deue, my vndefiled: for mine head is full of dew, and my locks with the drops of the night.

WHen the world had caſt me into a ſecure ſleepe, or ſlumber rather (for my heart was not vtterly bereaued of a true faith in my Sauiour) euen in this darkneſſe of my minde, it pleaſed my gracious Redeemer not to neglect mee; he came to me, and knocked oft, and called importunately at the doore of my heart, by his word and chaſtiſements, and ſaid, Open the doore of thy ſoule, O my ſiſter, my deare, chaſte, comely, vnſpotted Church: let mee come in, and lodge and dwell with thee, in my graces; ſhut out the world, and receiue me with a more liuely act, and renouation of thy faith. For loe, I haue long waited patiently for this effect of thy loue, and haue endured all the iniuries both of the night, and weather of thy prouocations, that I might at laſt enioy thee.

3. I haue put off my coat: how ſhall I put it on? I haue waſhed my feet: how ſhall I defile them?

I anſwered him againe, pleading excuſes for my delay; Alas, Lord, I haue now, ſince I left my forward profeſſion of thee, auoided a great number of cares and ſorrowes: muſt I take them vp againe to follow thee? I haue liued cleane from the ſoile of theſe euills: and ſhall I now thruſt my ſelfe into danger of them?

4. My Well-beloued put his hand from the hole of the doore; and my bowels yearned toward him.

When my Sauiour heard this vnkinde anſwer of delay, he let his hand fall from the key-hole, which he had thus before without ſucceſſe laboured about; and withdrew himſelfe from ſolliciting me any more: whereupon my heart and bowels yearned within me for him, and for the remorſe of my ſo long foreſlowing his admittance vnto me.

5. I roſe vp to open to my well-beloued, and my hands did drop downe Myrrh, and my fingers pure Myrrh vpon the handles of the Barres.

And now I rouzed vp my drouſie heart (what I could) that I might in ſome cheerefull manner deſire to receiue ſo gracious a Sauiour: which when I but endeuoured, I found that he had left behinde him ſuch a plentifull bleſſing (as the monument of his late preſence) vpon the firſt motions of my heart, as that with the very touch of them I was both exceedingly refreſhed, and moued to further indignation at my ſelfe for delaying him.

6. I opened to my Well-beloued: but my Well-beloued was gone and paſt; mine heart was gone when he did ſpeake: I ſought him, but I could not finde him; I called him, but he anſwered me not.

I opened to my beloued Sauiour: but my Sauiour had now (in my feeling) withdrawne himſelfe, and hid his countenance from me, holding me ſhort of thoſe gracious offers and meanes which I had refuſed; and now I was almoſt paſt my ſelfe with deſpaire, to remember that ſweet inuitation of his, which I neglected: I ſought him therefore in my thoughts, in the outward vſe of his ordinances, and of my earneſt prayers; but he would not as yet be found of me, or let me finde that I was heard of him.

7. The watch-men that went about the City found me, they ſmote mee, and wounded me: the watch-men of the walls tooke away my vaile from me.

Thoſe which ſhould haue regarded mee, and by their vigilancy haue ſecured mee from danger, proued mine aduerſaries: in ſtead of comforting me, they fell vpon me, and wounded me with their falſe doctrines, drawing me on into further errors, ſpoiling me of that purity and ſincerity of profeſſion, wherewith, as with ſome rich and modeſt vaile, I was formerly adorned, and couered.

8. I

8. I charge you, O daughters of Ieruſalem, if you finde my Well-beloued, that you tell him I am ſicke of loue.

I aduiſe you ſolemnly, O all yee that wiſh well to me (for I care not who knowes the vehemencie of my paſſion) if you ſhall finde my Sauiours preſence in your aſſemblies before me, pray for the recouerie of his loue to mee; and bemoning my eſtate to him, tell him how I languiſh with the impatient deſire of his loue, and preſence, to bee reſtored vnto mee.

9. O the faireſt among women, what is thy Well-beloued, more than another Well-beloued? what is thy Well-beloued, more than another louer, that thou doſt ſo charge vs?

O thou which art the moſt happy, moſt gracious, and moſt glorious of all creatures, the choſen of the liuing God; what is thy Well-beloued whom thou ſeekeſt, aboue all other the ſonnes of men? what ſuch eminencie is there in him aboue all Saints and Angels: that thou art both ſo farre gone in affection to him? and doſt ſo vehemently adiure vs to ſpeake vnto him for thee?

10. My Well-beloued is white and ruddy, the Standard-bearer of ten thouſand.

My Well-beloued (if you know not) is of perfect beautie; in whoſe face is an exact mixture of the colours of the pureſt and healthfulleſt complexion of holineſſe: for hee hath not receiued the ſpirit by meaſure; and in him the Godhead dwels bodily; he is infinitely fairer than all the ſonnes of men; and for goodlineſſe of perſon may beare the Standard of comelineſſe and grace amongſt ten thouſand.

11. His head is as fine Gold, his locks curled, and blacke as a Rauen.

The Dietie which dwelleth in him, is moſt pure and glorious: and that fulneſſe of grace which is communicated to his humane nature, is wonderouſly beautifull, and ſo ſets it forth, as the blacke curled locks doe a freſh and well-fauoured countenance.

12. His eies are like Doues vpon the riuers of waters, which are waſht with Milke, and remaine in their fulneſſe.

His iudgement of all things, and his reſpect to his Church (which are as his eies) are full of loue, and full of pietie, ſhining like vnto Doues waſhed in water, yea, in Milke, ſo as there is no ſpot, or blemiſh to be found in them: and they are withall ſo fully placed, as is both moſt comely and moſt expedient for the perfect ſight of the eſtate, and neceſſities of his ſeruants.

13. His cheekes are as a bed of ſpices, and as ſweet Flowers, and his lips like Lillies dropping downe pure Myrrh.

The manifeſtation of himſelfe to vs in his Word, is ſweet to our ſpirituall feeling, as an heape of ſpice, or thoſe flowers that are vſed to make the beſt perfuming ointments, are to the other ſenſes: his heauenly inſtructions and promiſes of his Goſpell are vnſpeakably comfortable, and plenteous, in the grace that is wrought by them.

14. His hands as Rings of Gold ſet with the Chryſolite; his belly like white Iuory couered with Saphyres.

His actions, and his inſtruments (which are his hands) are ſet forth with much port and maieſtie, as ſome precious ſtone beautifies the Ring wherein it is ſet: the ſecret counſels of his breſt, and the myſteries of his will, are moſt pure and holy, and full of excellent glorie.

15. His legs are as pillars of Marble, ſet vpon ſockets of fine gold: his countenance, as Lebanon, excellent as the Cedars.

All his proceedings are firme and ſtable; and withall, as Pillars of Marble ſet in ſockets ſockets of tried gold; ſo as they are neither ſubiect to wauering, nor to any danger of infirmitie and corruption: the ſhew and cariage of his whole perſon, whereby hee makes himſelfe knowne to his choſen, is exceeding goodly and vpright, like to the ſtraight and loftie Cedars of Lebanon.

16. His mouth is as ſweet things, and he is wholly delectable: this is my Wel-beloued, and this is my Louer, O daughters of Ieruſalem.

His mouth, out of which proceedeth innumerable bleſſings and comfortable promiſes, is to my ſoule euen ſweetneſſe it ſelfe; yea (what ſpeake I of any one part?) as you haue heard in theſe particulars; hee is all ſweets: there is nothing but comfort in him; and there is no comfort but in him; and this (if he would know) is my Well-beloued; of ſo incomparable glory and worthineſſe, that ye may eaſily diſcerne him from all others.

Forraine Congregations.

17. O the faireſt among women, whither is thy Well-beloued gone? whither is thy Well-beloued turned aſide, that we might ſeeke him with thee?

SInce thy Well-beloued is ſo glorious, and amiable, (O thou which art for thy beautie worthy to bee the Spouſe of ſuch an husband) tell vs (for thou onely knoweſt it; and to ſeeke Chriſt without the Church, wee know is vaine) tell vs where this Sauiour of thine is to be ſought; that we (rauiſhed alſo with the report of his beautie) may ioine with thee in the ſame holy ſtudie of ſeeking after him.

Chap. VI.

1. My Well-beloued is gone downe into his Garden to the beds of ſpices, to feed in the Gardens, and to gather Lillies.

MY Well-beloued Sauiour (if you would know this alſo) is to be ſought and found in the particular aſſemblies of his people, which are his Garden of pleaſure, wherein are varieties of all the beds of renued ſoules; which both he hath planted, and dreſſed by his continuall care, and wherein he walketh for his delight; feeding and ſolacing himſelfe with thoſe fruits of righteouſneſſe and new obedience, which they are able to bring forth vnto him.

2. I am my Well-beloueds, and my Well-beloued is mine, who feedeth among the Lillies.

And now loe, whatſoeuer hath happened croſſe to mee, in my ſenſible fruition of him; in ſpight of all tentations, my beloued Sauiour is mine through faith; and I am his through his loue; and both of vs are by an inſeparable vnion knit together; whoſe coniunction and loue is moſt ſweet and happy: for all that are his, he feedeth continually with heauenly repaſt.

Christ.

3. Thou art beautifull, my Loue, as Tirzah, comely as Ieruſalem, terrible as an armie with Banners.

NOtwithſtanding this thy late blemiſh of neglecting mee, O my Church: yet ſtill in mine eies, through my grace, vpon this thy repentance, thou art beautifull, like vnto that neat and elegant Citie Tirzah, and that orderly building of Ieruſalem, Ieruſalem, the glory of the world: and with this thy louelineſſe, thou art awfull vnto thine aduerſaries, through the power of thy cenſures, and the maieſtie of him that dwelleth in thee.

4. Turne away thine eies from me, for they ouercome me: thine haire is like a flocke of Goats which looke downe from Gilead.

Yea, ſuch beautie is in thee, that I am ouercome with the vehemencie of my affection to thee: turne away thine eies a while from beholding me; for the ſtrength of that faith, whereby they are fixed vpon mee, rauiſheth mee from my ſelfe with ioy. I doe therefore againe renew thy former praiſe; that thy gracious profeſſion, and all thy appendances and ornaments of expedient ceremonies, are ſo comely to behold, as it is to ſee a flocke of well-fed Goats graſing vpon the fruitfull hills of Gilead.

5. Thy teeth are like a flocke of ſheepe which goe vp from the waſhing, which euery one bring out twins, and none is barren among them.

Thy Teachers, that chew and prepare the heauenly food for thy ſoule, are of ſweet accordance one with another, hauing all one heart, and one tongue; and both themſelues are ſanctified and purged from their vncleanneſſe, and are fruitfull in their holy labours vnto others: ſo that their doctrine is neuer in vaine, but is ſtill anſwered with plentifull increaſe of ſoules to the Church.

6. Thy Temples are within thy locks as a peece of a Pomegranate.

That part of thy countenance which thou wilt haue ſeene (though dimly and ſparingly) is full of holy modeſtie and baſhfulneſſe; ſo bluſhing, that it ſeemeth like the colour of a broken peece of Pomegranate.

7. There are threeſcore Queenes, and foureſcore Concubines, and of the Damſels, without number.

Let there be neuer ſo great a number of people and nations, of Churches, and aſſemblies, which challenge my Name and Loue, and perhaps by their outward proſperitie, may ſeeme to plead much intereſt in me, and much worth in themſelues.

8. But my Loue is alone, and my Vndefiled, ſhe is the onely daughter of her mother, and ſhee is deare to her that bare her: the Daughters haue ſeene her, and counted her bleſſed, euen the Queenes and the Concubines, and they haue praiſed her.

Yet thou onely art alone my true and chaſte Spouſe, pure and vndefiled in the truth of thy doctrine, and the imputation of my holineſſe: thou art ſhe, whom that Ieruſalem which is aboue, (the mother of vs all) acknowledgeth for her onely true, and deare daughter. And this is not my commendation alone: but all thoſe forraine aſſemblies, which might ſeeme to bee Riuals with thee of this praiſe, doe applaud and bleſſe thee in this thine eſtate, and ſay; Bleſſed is this people, whoſe God is the Lord.

9. Who is ſhee that looketh forth as the morning, faire as the Moone, pure as the Sunne, terrible as an armie with banners?

And admiring thy goodlineſſe, ſhall ſay; Who is this that lookes out ſo freſhly as the morning new riſen; which from theſe weake beginnings is growne to ſuch high perfection, that now ſhee is as bright, and glorious, as the Sunne in his full ſtrength, and the Moone in a cleare skie; and withall is ſo dreadfull through the maieſtie of her countenance, and power of her cenſures, as ſome terrible armie, with enſignes diſplayed, is to a weake aduerſarie?

10. I went downe to the dreſſed Orchard, to ſee the fruits of the valley, to ſee if the Vine budded, and if the Pomegranates flouriſhed.

Thou complainedſt of my abſence, (O my Church:) there was no cauſe; I meant not to forſake forſake thee; I did but onely walke downe into the well-dreſſed Orchard of thine aſſemblies, to recreate and ioy my ſelfe with the view of their forwardneſſe, to ſee the happy progreſſe of the humble in ſpirit, and the gracious beginnings of thoſe tender ſoules, which are newly conuerted vnto mee.

11. I knew nothing, my ſoule ſet me as the chariots of my noble people.

So earneſtly did I long to reuiſit thee, and to reſtore comfort vnto thee, that I haſted I knew not which way: and with inſenſible ſpeed I am come backe, as it were vpon the ſwifteſt chariots, or the wings of the wind.

12. Returne, returne, O Shulamite: returne, returne, that I may behold thee: what ſhall you ſee in the Shulamite, but as the companie of an armie?

Now therefore returne (O my Spouſe, the true daughter of Ieruſalem) returne to mee, returne to thy ſelfe, and to thy former feeling of my grace: returne, that both my ſelfe, and all the companie of Angels, may ſee and reioice in thee: and what ſhall yee ſee (O all yee hoaſts of heauen) what ſhall yee ſee in my Church? Euen ſuch an awfull grace and maieſtie, as is in a well-marſhalled army, ready to meet with the enemie.

Chap. VII.

1. How beautifull are thy goings with ſhooes, O Princes daughter? the compaſſe of thy hips like iewels: the worke of the hand of a cunning workeman.

How beautifull are thy feet, O daughter of the Higheſt; being ſhod with the preparation of the Goſpell of peace, and readily addreſſed to run the way of the commandements of thy God! thou art compaſſed about thy loines with the girdle of veritie; which is both precious for the matter of it, and cunningly framed by the skill of the ſpirit of truth.

2. Thy nauell is as a round cup, that wanteth not liquor: thy bellie is as an heape of wheat, compaſſed about with Lillies.

The nauell, whereby all thy ſpirituall conceptions receiue their nouriſhment, is full of all fruitfull ſupply, and neuer wants meanes of ſuſtenance, to feed them in thy wombe: which alſo is ſo plenteous in thy bleſſed increaſe, that it is as an heape of wheat, conſiſting of infinite pure graines, which conſort together with much ſweetneſſe and pleaſure.

3. Thy two breſts are as two young Kids that are twinnes.

Thy two Teſtaments (which are thy two full and comely breſts, by whoſe wholſome milke thou nouriſheſt all thy faithfull children, once borne into the light) are for their excellent and perfect agreement, and their amiable proportion, like two twinnes of Kids.

4. Thy necke is like a Tower of Iuorie: thine eies are like artificiall pooles in a frequented gate: thy noſe is as the Tower of Lebanon, that looketh toward Damaſcus.

Thoſe, who by their holy authoritie ſupport thy gouernment (which are as ſome ſtraight and ſtrong necke to beare vp thy head) are for their height and defence, like a Tower; for their order, pureneſſe and dignitie, like a Tower of Iuory: thy Teachers and Miniſters (which are thine eies) are like vnto ſome cleare and artificiall ponds of water, in a place of greateſt reſort: wherein all commers may ſee the faces of their conſciences; and whence they may plentifully draw the Waters of life. Thy noſe, by which all ſpirituall ſents are conuayed to thee, is perfectly compoſed, and featured like ſome curious

Turret

Turret of that goodly house in Lebanon; so as thy iudgement, and power of discerning the spirits, is admirable for the order and excellencie thereof.

5. Thine head vpon thee is as scarlet, and the lush of thine head like purple: the King is tied in thy beames.

The whole tyre of thine head (which are the ceremonies vsed by thee) are very gracefull, and of high estimation and price to all the beholders: and as for me, I am so enamoured of thee, that I am euen tied by my owne desire, to a perpetuall presence in thine holy assemblies.

6. How faire art thou, and how pleasant art thou, O my loue, in pleasures!

Oh how beautifull and louely art thou therefore (O my Church) in all thy parts and ornaments! how sweet and pleasant art thou (O my Loue) in whatsoeuer might giue me true contentment!

7. This thy stature is like a Palme-tree, and thy brests like clusters.

Thy whole frame is, for goodlinesse and straight growth, like vnto some tall Palme-tree; which the more it is depressed by the violence of persecutions, riseth the more; and the two brests of thy Testaments are like two full iuicie clusters, which yeeld comfortable and abundant refreshing.

8. I said, I will goe vp into the Palme-tree; I will take hold of her boughs: thy brests shall now be like the clusters of the Vines, and the sauour of thy nose like Apples.

Seeing then thou art my Palme-tree, I haue resolued in my selfe to adioine my selfe to thee; to enioy thee, to gather those sweet fruits of thy graces, which thou yeeldest; and by my presence also will cause thee to be more plentifull in all good workes, and doctrine; so as thou shalt afford abundance of heauenly liquor vnto all the thirstie soules of thy children; and an acceptable verdure of holinesse and obedience vnto me.

9. And the roofe of thy mouth like good wine, which goeth straight vp to my Wel-beloued, and causeth the lips of him that is asleepe, to speake.

And the deliuerie of my Word, by the mouthes of my Ministers, shall be as some excellent wine, which sparkleth right vpward: being well accepted of that God, in whose name it is taught, and looketh most pleasantly in the glasse, being no lesse highly esteemed of the receiuers: which is of such wonderfull power, that it is able to put words both of repentance, and praise, into the lips of him that lies asleepe in his sinnes.

The Church.

10. I am my Wel-beloueds, and his desire is toward me.

BEhold, such as I am, I am not my owne; much lesse am I any others: I am wholly my Sauiours: and now I see, and feele, whatsoeuer I had deserued, that hee is mine also in all intire affection; who hath both chosen mee, and giuen himselfe for mee.

11. Come, my Wel-beloued, let vs goe into the fields, let vs lodge in the villages.

Come therefore, O my deare Sauiour, let vs ioine together in our naturall care: let thy Spirit and my seruice be intent vpon thy Congregations here below on earth; and let vs stay in the place where our spirituall Husbandrie lieth.

12. Let vs goe vp early in the morning to the Vines, and see if the Vine flouriſh, whether it hath disclosed the first Grapes, or whether the Pomegranats blossome: there will I giue thee my loue.

Let

Let vs with all haſte and cheerfulneſſe viſit the fruitfull vines of our beleeuing children; and to our mutuall comfort, be witneſſes and partakers of all the ſignes and fruits of grace, of all thoſe good workes, and thankſgiuings, of thoſe holy endeuours and worthy practices, which they yeeld forth vnto vs: let vs iudge of their forwardneſſe, and commend it: whereupon it will eaſily appeare, that the conſummation of our happy mariage draweth neere, in which there ſhall be a perfect vnion betwixt vs.

13. The Mandrakes haue giuen a ſmell, and in our gates are all ſweet things new and old; my Well-beloued, I haue kept them for thee.

Behold: thy godly ſeruants, which not onely beare fruit themſelues, but are powerfull in the prouocation of others, preſent their beſt ſeruices vnto thee; and euen at our doores (not farre to ſeeke, not hard to procure) is offer made vnto thee, of all variety of fruit; whether from thy young Conuerts, or thy more ſetled Profeſſors: and all theſe I ſpend not lauiſhly; but in my louing care, duely reſerue them for thee, and for the ſolemne day of our full mariage.

Chap. VIII.

The Iewiſh Church.

1. Oh that thou wereſt as my brother that ſucked the breſt of my mother! I would finde thee without; I would kiſſe thee, then they ſhould not deſpiſe me.

OH that I might ſee thee (my Sauiour) clothed in fleſh! Oh that thou which art my euerlaſting Husband, mighteſt alſo be my Brother, in partaking the ſame humane nature with me; that ſo I finding thee below vpon earth, might familiarly entertaine thee, and conuerſe with thee, without reproach of the world; yea, might be exalted in thy glory!

2. I will lead thee, and bring thee into my mothers houſe; there thou ſhalt teach me: I will cauſe thee to drinke ſpiced wine, and new of the Pomegranats.

Then would I (though I be now pent vp in the limits of Iudæa) bring thee forth into the light and knowledge of the vniuerſall Church, whoſe daughter I am: and then and there, thou ſhouldſt teach me how perfectly to ſerue and worſhip thee, and I ſhall gladly entertaine thee with a royall feaſt of the beſt graces that are in my holieſt ſeruants; which I know thou wilt account better cheere, then all the ſpiced cups, and Pomegranate wines in the world.

3. His left hand ſhall be vnder my head, and his right hand ſhall embrace me.

Then ſhall I attaine to a nearer communion with him; and both his hands ſhall bee employed to ſuſtaine, and relieue me: yea, he ſhall comfort my head and my heart (my iudgement, and affections) with the liuely heat of his gracious embracements.

4. I charge you, O daughters of Ieruſalem, that you ſtirre not vp, nor waken my Loue, vntill he pleaſe.

I charge you (O all ye that profeſſe any friendſhip to me) I charge you deeply, as ye will auoid my vttermoſt cenſures; take heed how ye vex and diſquiet my mercifull Sauiour, and grieue his Spirit: and doe not dare, by the leaſt prouocation of him, to interrupt his peace.

Christ.

5. Who is this that commeth out of the Wilderneſſe, leaning vpon her Well-beloued? I raiſed fed thee vp vnder an Apple-tree: there thy mother conceiued thee: there she conceiued that bare thee.

WHo is this, that from the comfortlesse deserts of ignorance, of infidelity, of tribulations, ascendeth thus vp into the glorious light and liberty of my chosen? relying her selfe wholly vpon her Sauiour, and solacing her selfe in him? Is it not my Church? It is she, whom I haue loued, and acknowledged of old: for euen vnder the tree of offence, the forbidden fruit which thou tastedst to thy destruction, I raised thee vp againe from death; Euen there, thy first mother conceiued thee, while by faith she laid hold on that blessed promise of the Gospell, whereby she and her beleeuing seed were restored.

The Iewish Church.

6. Set me as a seale on thy heart, and as a signet on thine arme: for loue is strong as death, Iealousie is cruell as the Graue: the coales thereof are fiery coales, and a vehement flame.

ANd so haue thou mee still (O my Sauiour) in a perpetuall and deare remembrance: keepe me sure in thine heart, yea in thine armes, as that which thou holdest most precious: and let me neuer be remoued from thy loue; the least shew and danger whereof I cannot endure: for this my spirituall loue is exceeding powerfull, and can no more be resisted then death it selfe: and the iealous zeale which I haue for thee and thy glory, consumes me, euen like the Graue, and burnes me vp like vnto the coales of some most vehement and extreame fire.

7. Much water cannot quench loue, neither can the floods drowne it: if a man should giue all the substance of his house for loue, they would greatly contemne it.

Yea, more then any fire; for any flame yet may be quenched with water: but all the water of afflictions and terrors (yea, whole streames of persecutions) cannot quench this loue: and for all tempting offers of wealth, of pleasures and honour, how easily are they all contemned for the loue of my Sauiour!

8. We haue a little sister, and she hath no brests: what shall we doe for our sister when she shall be spoken for?

We haue a sister (as thou knowest, O Sauiour) ordained through thy mercy, to the same grace with mee: the vncalled Church of the Gentiles; small (as yet) of growth through the rarenesse of her Conuerts, and destitute of the help of any outward ministery, whereby shee might either beare, or nourish children vnto thee: when she growes vnto her maturity; and the mystery of calling her vniuersally to thee, shall be reuealed to the world, and her selfe; what course will it please thee to take with her?

CHRIST.

9. If she be a wall, we will build vpon her a siluer Palace: and if she bee a doore, we will keepe her in with boords of Cedar.

IF she shall continue firme and constant, in the expectation of her promises, and the profession of that truth which shall be reuealed; we will beautifie and strengthen her with further grace, and make her a pure and costly Palace, fit to entertaine my spirit: and if she will giue free passage and good entrance, to my word and grace, we will make her sure and safe from corruption, and reserue her to immortality.

The Iewish Church.

10. I am a wall, and my brests are towers: then was I in his eyes as one that findeth peace.

BEhold: that condition which thou requirest in the Church of the Gentiles, thou findest in me; I am thus firme and constant in my expectation, in my profession, and and that want thou findeſt in her of ability to nouriſh her Children, by the breſt of thy Word, is not in me; who haue abundance both of nouriſhment and defence vpon which my confeſſion and plea, I found grace and peace in the eyes of my Sauiour; and receiued from him aſſurance of his euerlaſting loue to me.

CHRIST.

11. Salomon had a Vine in Baalhamon: he gaue the Vineyard vnto keepers: euery one bringeth for the fruit thereof a thouſand peeces of ſiluer.

MY Church is my Vine, and I am the Owner and Husbandman: our thrift and profit thereof farre exceedeth the good husbandry of Salomon: he hath a rich Vineyard indeed in a moſt fruitfull ſoyle; but he lets it forth to the hands of others, as not being able to keepe and dreſſe it himſelfe: and therefore he is faine to be content with the greateſt part of the increaſe, not expecting the whole.

22. But my Vineyard which is mine, is before mee: to thee O Salomon appertaineth a thouſand peeces of ſiluer, and two hundred to them that keepe the fruit thereof.

But my Vine is euer before me, I am with it to the end of the world, I reſerue it in mine owne hands, and dreſſe it with mine owne labour: and therefore if thou (O Salomon) canſt receiue from thine, to the proportion of a thouſand, thy workmen and farmers will look for the fift part to come vnto their ſhare; whereas the gaine of my Vineyard ariſeth wholly, and onely vnto my ſelfe.

13. O thou that dwelleſt in the gardens, the companions hearken vnto thy voice, cauſe me to heare it.

Sith therefore ſuch is my care of thee, and ioy in thee (O my Church, which conſiſteſt of the particular aſſemblies of men profeſſing my Name) ſee thou be diligent in declaring my will, and giuing holy counſels to all thy fellow-members: ſpeake forth my praiſe in the great congregations (which all attend willingly vpon thee) and let me heare the voyce of thy conſtant and faithfull confeſſion of me before the world.

The Church.

14. Oh my Well-beloued, flee away, and be like vnto the Roe, or to the yong Hart vpon the Mountaine of ſpices.

I Will moſt gladly doe what thou commandeſt, O my Sauiour: but that I may performe it accordingly, be thou (which art, according to thy bodily preſence, in the higheſt heauens) euer preſent with me by thy Spirit, and haſten thy glorious comming, to my full Redemption.

TO THE HIGH AND MIGHTY PRINCE, HENRY, PRINCE OF GREAT BRITAINE, Sonne and Heire Apparant to our Soueraigne Lord, IAMES, King of GREAT BRITAINE, &c.

All glory in eyther world.

MOst Gratious Prince:

IT is not from any conceit of ſuch worth in my labours, that they durſt looke ſo high. A lower patronage would haue ſerued an higher work. It were well if ought of mine could be worthy of popular eyes; Or if I could wring ought from my ſelfe not vnworthy of a iudicious Reader. I know, your Highneſſe wants neyther preſents, nor counſells: preſents from ſtrangers, counſells from your Teachers; neyther of them matchable by my weakneſſe: onely duty herein excuſeth me from preſumption. For, I thought it iniuſtice to deuote the fruit of my labours to any other hand beſide my Maſters: which alſo I knew to be as gracious, as mine is faithfull. Yet (ſince euen good affections cannot warrant too much vileneſſe in gifts to Princes) leſt, while my modeſty diſparages my worke, I ſhould hazard the acceptation; here ſhall your Grace finde variety, not without profit. I hate a Diuine that would but pleaſe; and, withall, thinke it impoſſible for a man to profit, that pleaſeth not. And if, while my my style fixeth it selfe vpon others, any spirituall profit shall reflect vpon your Highnesse, how happy am I! who shall euer thinke, I haue liued to purpose, if (by the best of my studies) I shall haue done any good office to your soule. Further, (which these times account not the least praise) your Grace shal herein perceiue a new fashion of discourse, by Epistles; new to our language, vsuall to others: and (as Nouelty is neuer without plea of vse) more free, more familiar. Thus, wee doe but talke with our friends by our pen, and expresse our selues no whit lesse easily; somewhat more digestedly.

Whatsoeuer it is, as it cannot bee good enough to deserue that countenance; so, the countenance of such Patronage shall make it worthy of respect from others. The God of Princes protect your person, perfect your graces, and giue you as much fauour in Heauen, as you haue honour on earth.

Your Graces
humbly-deuoted seruant,

Epist. I. Expostulating for his departure, and perswading his returne.

How vnhappily is my style changed! Alas, that to a friend, to a brother, I must write as to an Apostate, to an aduersary! Doth this seeme harsh? You haue turned it, by being turned your selfe. Once the same walls held vs in one louing Society; the same Dioceſſe, in one honourable function: Now, not one Land, and (which I lament) not one Church. You are gone, we stand and wonder. For a sheepe, to stray through simplicity, is both ordinary and lamentable: but, for a Shepheard, is more rare, more scandalous. I dare not presume ouer-much, vpon an appeale to a blinded conscience. Those that are newly come from a bright candle into a darke roome, are so much more blinde, as their light was greater; and the purest yuory turneth with fire into the deepest blacke. Tell vs yet by your old ingenuity, and by those sparkes of good which yet (I hope) lie couered vnder your cold ashes, tell vs, what diuided you? Your motiues shall once be scanned before an higher barre. Shame not to haue the weake eyes of the world see that, which once your vndeceiueable Iudge shall see and censure. What saw you, what heard you anew, that might offer violence to a resolued minde, and make it either to alter, or suspend? If your reasons be inuincible, informe vs, that we may follow you: but if (as they are) slight and feeble, returne you to vs: returne, and thinke it no shame to haue erred, iust shame to continue erring. What such goodly beauty saw you in that painted, but ill-fauoured Strumpet, that should thus bewitch you, so to forget your selfe, and contemne the chaste loue of the Spouse of your Sauiour? I saw her at the same time in her gayest dresse: Let my soule neuer prosper, if I could see any thing worthy to command affection. I saw, and scorned: you saw, and adored. Would God your adoration were as farre from superstition, as my scorne from impietie. That God iudge betwixt vs, whether herein erred: yea, let men iudge, that are not drunke with those Babyloniſh dregs! How long might an indifferent eye looke vpon the comicall and mimicke actions in those your mysteries that should be sacred, (your magical exorcisines, your clericall shauings, your vncleanly vnctions, your crossings, creepings, censings, sprinklings, your coozning miracles, garish processions, burning of noone-day, christning of bels, marting of pardons, tossing of beads, your superstitious hallowing of candles, waxe, ashes, palmes, chrisme, garments, roses, swords, water, salt, the Pontificall solemnities of your great Master, and whatsoeuer your new mother hath, besides, plausible) before he should see ought, in all these, worthy of any other entertainment, then contempt! Who can but disdaine, that these things should procure any wise proselyte? Cannot your owne memory recount those truly religious spirits, which hauing sought Rome as resolued Papists, haue left the world as holy Martyrs; dying for the detestation of that which they came to adore? Whence this? They heard and magnified that, which they now saw and abhorred. Their fire of zeale brought them to the flames of Martyrdome. Their innocent hopes promised them Religion: they found nothing but a pretence; promised deuotion, and behold, idolatry: they saw, hated, suffered, and now raigne; whiles you wilfully and vnbidden, will lose your soule, where others meant to lose, and haue found it. Your zeale dies, where theirs began to liue: you like to liue, where where they would but dye. They ſhall comfort vs, for you: they ſhall once ſtand vp againſt you: While they would rather die in the heat of that fire, then liue in the darkneſſe of their errors; you rather die in the Egyptian darkneſſe of errors then liue in the pleaſant light of Truth: yea, I feare, rather in another fire, then this Light.

Alas! what ſhall we looke for of you? Too late repentance, or obſtinate error? Both miſerable. A Spira, or a Staphylus? Your friends, your ſelfe, ſhall wiſh you rather vnborne, then either.

O thou, which art the great Shepheard, great in power, great in mercy, which leauеſt the ninety and nine to reduce one, fetch home (if thy will bee) this thy forlorne charge: fetch him home, driue him home to thy Fold, though by ſhame, though by death. Let him once recouer thy Church, thou him, it is enough. Our common Mother I know not whether more pities your loſſe, or diſdaines thus to be robb'd of a ſon: not for the need of you; but her owne piety, her owne loue. For, how many troops of better informed ſoules hath ſhe euery day returning into her lap; now breathing from their late Antichriſtianiſme, and embracing her knees vpon their owne? She laments you, not for that ſhee feares ſhee ſhall miſſe you, but for that ſhee knowes you ſhall want her. See you her teares, and doe but pitty your ſelfe as much as ſhe you. And from your Mother, to deſcend to your Nurſe: Is this the fruit of ſuch education? Was not your youth ſpent in a ſociety of ſuch comely order, ſtrict gouernment, wiſe lawes, religious care (it was ours; yet let me praiſe it, to your ſhame) as may iuſtly challenge (after all bragges) either RHEMES or DOVVAY, or if your Ieſuits haue any other denne more cleanly, and more worthy of oſtentation? And could you come out, freſh and vnſeaſoned, from the middeſt of thoſe ſalt waues? Could all thoſe heauenly ſhowres fall beſide you; while you, like a Gedeons fleece, want moiſture? Shall none of thoſe diuine principles, which your youth ſeem'd to drinke in, check you in your new errors? Alas! how vnlike are you to your ſelfe, to your name? Iacob wreſtled with an Angell, and preuailed: you grapple but with a Ieſuit, and yeeld. Iacob ſupplanted his brother: and Eſau hath ſupplanted you. Iacob changed his name for a better by a valiant reſiſtance: you, by your cowardly yeelding, haue loſt your owne. Iacob ſtroue with God, for a bleſſing: I feare to ſay it, you againſt him, for a curſe; for, no common meaſure of hatred, or ordinary oppoſition, can ſerue a reuolter. Either you muſt be deſperately violent, or ſuſpected. The mighty One of Iſrael (for hee can doe it) raiſe you ſalne, returne you wandred, and giue you grace at laſt to ſhame the Deuill, to forſake your ſtepmother, to acknowledge your true Parent, to ſatisfie the world, to ſaue your owne ſoule. If otherwiſe, I will ſay of you, as Ieremy of his Iſraelites (if not rather with more indignation) My ſoule ſhall weepe in ſecret for your reuolt, and mine eyes ſhall drop downe teares, becauſe one of the Lords flocke is caried away captiue.

Emanuel Colledge in Cambridge.

To my Lord and Patrone, the Lord DENNY Baron of Waltham.

EPIST. II. Of the contempt of the World.

MY Lord: my tongue, my pen, & my heart, are all your ſeruants: when you cannot heare me through diſtãce, you muſt ſee me in my Letters. You are now in the Senate of the Kingdome, or in the concourſe of the city, or perhaps (though more rarely) in the royall face of the Court. All of them, places fit for your place. From all theſe, let me call off your minde to her home aboue; and, in the midſt of buſineſſe, ſhew you reſt:

reſt: If I may not rather commend, then admoniſh, and before-hand confeſſe my counſell ſuperfluous, becauſe your holy forwardneſſe hath preuented it. You can afford theſe, but halfe of your ſelfe: The better part is better beſtowed: Your ſoule is ſtill retired, and reſerued. You haue learned to vouchſafe theſe worldly things, vſe, without affection; and know to diſtinguiſh wiſely, betwixt a Stoicall dulneſſe, and a Chriſtian contempt: and haue long made the world, not your God, but your ſlaue. And in truth (that I may looſe my ſelfe into a bold and free diſcourſe) what other reſpect is it worthy of? I would adore it on my face, if I could ſee any Maieſty that might command veneration. Perhaps it loues me not ſo much, as to ſhew me his beſt. I haue ſought it enough: and haue ſeene what others haue doated on, and wondred at their madneſſe. So may I looke to ſee better things aboue, as I neuer could ſee ought here, but vanitie and vileneſſe.

What is fame, but ſmoake? and mettall, but droſſe? and pleaſure, but a pill in ſuger? Let ſome Gallants condemne this, as the voice of a Melancholike Scholler: I ſpeake that which they ſhall feele, and ſhall confeſſe. Though I neuer was ſo, I haue ſeen ſome as happy as the world could make them: and yet I neuer ſaw any more diſcontented. Their life hath bin neither longer, nor ſweeter, nor their heart lighter, nor their meales heartier, nor their nights quieter, nor their cares fewer, nor their complaints. Yea, we haue knowne ſome, that haue loſt their mirth when they haue found wealth; and at once haue ceaſed to be merry and poore. All theſe earthly delights, if they were ſound, yet how ſhort they are! and if they could bee long, yet how vnſound! If they were ſound, they are but as a good day betweene two agues, or a ſunne-ſhine betwixt two tempeſts. And if they were long, their honie is exceeded by their gall. This ground beares none but maples, hollow and fruitleſſe; or, like the banks of the dead Sea, a faire apple, which vnder a red ſide containes nothing but duſt. Euery flower in this garden either pricks, or ſmels ill. If it be ſweet, it hath thornes: and if it haue no thornes, it annoyes vs with an ill ſent. Goe then, ye wiſe idolatrous Paraſites, and erect ſhrines, and offer ſacrifices to your God, the World, and ſeek to pleaſe him with your baſe and ſeruile deuotions: it ſhall be long enough ere ſuch religion ſhall make you happy. You ſhall at laſt forſake thoſe altars, emptie and ſorrowfull. How eaſie is it for vs Chriſtians, thus to inſult ouer the worldling, that thinkes himſelfe worthy of enuie? How eaſie to turne off the world with a ſcornfull repulſe; and when it makes vs the Deuils profer, All theſe will I giue thee, to returne Peters anſwer, Thy ſiluer and thy gold periſh with thee? How eaſie to account none ſo miſerable, as thoſe that are rich with iniurie, and grow great by being conſcious of ſecret euils? Wealth and honor, when it comes vpon the beſt tearmes, is but vaine; but, when vpon ill conditions, burdenſome. When they are at the beſt, they are ſcarce friends: but, when at the worſt, tormentors. Alas, how ill agrees a gay coat, and a feſtred heart? What auailes an high title, with an hell in the ſoule? I admire the faith of Moſes: but, preſuppoſing his faith, I wonder not at his choice. He preferred the afflictions of Iſrael, to the pleaſures of Ægypt; and choſe rather to eate the Lamb, with ſowre hearbs, than all their fleſh-pots: for, how much better is it to be miſerable than guilty? and what compariſon is there betwixt ſorrow and ſinne? If it were poſſible let me rather be in hell without ſinne, than on earth wickedly glorious. But how much are we bound to God, that allowes vs earthly fauours, without this oppoſition! That God hath made you at once honourable and iuſt, and your life pleaſant and holy, and hath giuen you an high eſtate with a good heart; are fauours, that looke for thanks. Theſe muſt be acknowledged, not reſted in: They are yet higher thoughts that muſt perfect your contentment.

What God hath giuen you, is nothing to that he meanes to giue: He hath bin liberall; but he will be munificent. This is not ſo much as the taſte of a full cup. Faſten your eyes vpon your future glory, and ſee how meanly you ſhall eſteeme theſe earthly graces. Here, you command but a little pittance of mould (great indeed, to vs; little, to the whole:) there, whole heauen ſhall be yours. Here you command, but as a ſubiect: there you ſhall reigne as a King. Here, you are obſerued; but ſometimes with your iust Vistaste: there, you shall raigne with peace, and ioy. Here, you are noble among men; there, glorious amongst Angels. Here, you want not honour; but you want not crosses: there is nothing but felicity. Here, you haue some short ioyes: there, is nothing but eternity. You are a stranger, here; there, at home. Here, Satan tempts you, and men vexe you: there, Saints and Angels shall applaud you; and God shall fill you with himselfe. In a word, you are onely blessed here, for that you shall be.

These are thoughts worthy of greatnesse: which if we suffer eyther imployments or pleasures to thrust out of our doores, we doe wilfully make our selues comfortlesse. Let these still season your mirth, and sweeten your sorrowes, and euer interpose themselues betwixt you and the world. These onely can make your life happy, and your death welcome.

To my Lord HAY, H. and P.

EP. III. Of true Honour.

MY Lord, it is safe to complaine of Nature where Grace is; and to magnifie Grace, where it is at once had, and affected. It is a fault of Nature, and not the least, that as she hath dimme eyes, so they are miss-placed. She lookes still, eyther forward or downeward; forward to the obiect she desires, or downeward to the meanes: neuer turnes her eyes eyther backward, to see what shee was; or vpward, to the cause of her good: whence, it is iust with God to with-hold what he would giue, or to curse that which hee bestowes; and to befot carnall minds with outward things, in their value, in their desire, in their vse: whereas true wisedome hath cleare eyes, and right set; and therefore sees an inuisible hand in all sensible euents, effecting all things, directing all things to their due end; sees on whom to depend, whom to thanke. Earth is too low, and too base, to giue bounds vnto a spirituall sight. No man then can truely know what belongs to wealth, or honour, but the gracious; eyther how to compasse them, or how to prize them, or how to vse them. I care not how many thousand wayes there are to seeming-honour, besides this of vertue: they all (if more) still lead to shame: or what plots are deuised to improue it; if they were as deepe as hell, yet their end is losse. As there is no counsell against God, so there is no honour without him. Hee inclines the hearts of Princes to fauour; the hearts of inferiours to applause. Without him, the hand cannot moue, to successe; nor the tongue, to praise: And what is honour without these? In vaine doth the world frowne vpon the man, whom hee meanes to honour; or smile, where hee would disgrace. Let mee then tell your Lordship, who are fauourites in the Court of heauen; euen whiles they wander on earth: yea, let the great King himselfe tell you, Those that honour mee, I will honour. That men haue the grace to giue honour to God, is an high fauour: but because men giue honour to God (as their dutie) that therefore God should giue honour to men, is to giue, because hee hath giuen. It is a fauour of God, that man is honoured of man like himselfe: but that God alloweth of our endeuours as honour to himselfe, is a greater fauour than that wherewith hee requites it.

This is the goodnesse of our God; The man that serues him, honours him: and whosoeuer honours him with his seruice is crowned with honour. I challenge all times, places, persons: Who euer honoured God, and was neglected? Who hath wilfully dishonoured him, and prospered? Turne ouer all Records, and see how successe euer blessed the iust, after many dangers, after many stormes of resistance, and left their conclusion glorious; glorious; how all godlesse plots, in their looſe, haue at once deceiued, ſhamed, puniſhed their Author. I goe no farther: Your owne breſt knowes, that your happy experience can herein iuſtifie God. The world hath noted you, for a follower of vertue; and hath ſeene how faſt Honour followed you: Whiles you ſought fauour with the God of heauen, he hath giuen you fauour with his Deputy on earth.

Gods former actions are patternes of his future: He teacheth you what he will doe, by what hee hath done. Vnleſſe your hand be weary of offering ſeruice, he cannot eyther pull in his hand from rewarding, or hold it out empty. Honour him ſtill, and God pawnes his honour, on not failing you. You cannot diſtruct him, whom your proofe hath found faithfull. And, whiles you ſettle your heart in this right courſe of true glory, laugh, in ſecret ſcorne, at the idle endeuours of thoſe men, whoſe policies would out-reach God, and ſeize vpon honour without his leaue. (God laughes at them in heaven, it is a ſafe and holy laughter that followes his.) And pity the prepoſterous courſes of them, which make religion but a foot-ſtoole to the ſeat of aduancement; which care for all things but heauen; which make the world their ſtanding marke, and doe not ſo much as roue at God. Many had ſped well, if they had begun well, and proceeded orderly.

A falſe method is the bane of many hopefull endeuours. God bids vs ſeeke firſt his Kingdome; and earthly things ſhall find vs vnſought. Fooliſh nature firſt ſeekes the world: and if ſhe light on God by the way, it is more then ſhe expects, deſires, cares for; and therefore failes of both, becauſe ſhee ſeekes neither aright. Many had beene great, if they had cared to be good; which now are croſſed in what they would, becauſe they willed not what they ought. If Salomon had made wealth his firſt ſuit, I doubt he had beene both poore and fooliſh: now, hee asked wiſedome, and gained greatneſſe: Becauſe he choſe well, he receiued what he asked not. O the bounty and fidelitie of our God! becauſe we would haue the beſt, he giues vs all: Earth ſhall wait vpon vs, becauſe we attend vpon heauen.

Goe on, my Lord, goe on happily, to loue religion, to practiſe it: let God alone with the reſt. Bee you a patterne of vertue; hee ſhall make you a Precedent of glory. Neuer man loſt ought by giuing it to God: that liberall hand returnes our gifts, with aduantage. Let men, let God ſee that you honour him; and they ſhall heare him proclaime before you, Thus ſhall it be done to the man whom the King will honour.

To M. Newton, Tutor to the Prince.

EPIST. IV. Of Gratulation, for the hopes of our Prince; with an aduiſing apprecation.

SIR, God hath called you to a great and happy charge: You haue the cuſtody of our common Treaſure: Neither is there any ſeruice comparable to this of yours; whether we regard God, or the world. Our labours oft-times beſtowed vpon many, ſcarce profit one: yours, beſtowed vpon one, redounds to the profit of many millions. This is a ſummary way of obliging all the world to you. I encourage you not in your care: you haue more comfort in the ſucceſſe of it, then all worlds can giue you. The very ſubiect of your pains would giue an hart to him that hath none. I rather congratulate with you our common happineſſe, & the hopes of poſterity, in that royall and bleſſed iſſue. You haue beſt cauſe to be the witnes of the rare forwardnes of our gracious Maſter:

and I haue ſeene enough, to make me thinke I can neuer bee enough thankfull to God for him. That Princes are fruitfull, is a great bleſſing: but, that their children are fruitfull in grace, and not more eminent in place than vertue, is the greateſt fauour God can doe to a State. The goodneſſe of a priuate man is his owne; of a Prince, the whole worlds. Their words are Maximes, their actions examples, their examples rules. When I compare them with their royall Father, (as I do oft and chearfully) I cannot ſay whether he be more happy in himſelfe, or in them. I ſee both in him, and them; I ſee and wonder, that God diſtributes to naturall Princes gifts proportionable to their greatneſſe. The wiſe Moderator of the world knowes what vſe is of their parts: hee knowes that the head muſt haue all the ſenſes that pertaine to the whole body: and how neceſſary it is, that inferiours ſhould admire them no leſſe for the excellency of their graces, then for the ſway of their authority. Whereupon it is, that hee giues heroicall qualities to Princes; and as he hath beſtowed vpon them his owne name, ſo alſo hee giues them ſpeciall ſtamps of his owne glorious Image. Amongſt all other vertues, what a comfort is it to ſee thoſe yeares, and thoſe ſpirits ſtoope ſo willingly to deuotion? Religion is growne too ſeuere a Miſtreſſe for young and high courages to attend. Very rare is that Nobility of blood, that doth not challenge liberty; and that liberty, that ends not in looſeneſſe. Loe, this example teacheth our Gallants, how well euen Maieſtie can ſtand with homage; Maieſty to men, with homage to God.

Farre be it from me, to doe that which my next clauſe ſhall condemne: but I think it ſafe to ſay, that ſeldome euer thoſe yeares haue promiſed, ſeldome haue performed ſo much. Onely God keepe two miſchiefes euer from within the ſmoake of his Court; Flattery and Treachery: The iniquity of times may make vs feare theſe; not his inclination.

For, whether as Engliſh, or as men, it hath beene euer familiar to vs, to fawne vpon Princes: Though, what doe I beſtow two names vpon one vice, but attired in two ſundry ſuits of euill? For, Flatterie is no other than gilded treaſon; nothing elſe but poyſon in gold: This euill is more tame; not leſſe dangerous. It had beene better for many great ones not to haue been, than to haue beene in their conceits more than men. This, Flatterie hath done; and what can it not? That other, Treacherie, ſpils the blood; this, the vertues of Princes. That takes them from others: this bereaues them of themſelues. That, in ſpight of the actors, doth but change their Crowne: this ſteales it from them for euer. Who can but wonder, that reads of ſome not vnwiſe Princes, ſo bewitched with the inchantments of their Paraſites, that they haue thought thẽſelues Gods immortal, and haue ſuffered themſelues ſo ſtyled, ſo adored? Neither Temples nor Statues, nor Sacrifices haue ſeemed too much glory to the greatneſſe of their ſelfe-loue. Now none of al their actions could be either euill, or vnbeſeeming; nothing could proceed from them worthy of cenſure, vnworthy of admiration: Their very ſpots haue beene beauty, their humors iuſtice, their errors witty, their Paradoxes diuine, their exceſſes heroicall. O the damnable ſcruility of falſe mindes! which perſwade others of that which themſelues laugh to ſee beleeued. O the dangerous credulity of ſelfe-loue! which entertaines all aduantages if neuer ſo euill, neuer ſo impoſſible. How happy a ſeruice ſhall you do to this whole world of ours, if you ſhall ſtill ſettle in that princely minde a true apprehenſion of himſelfe; and ſhall teach him to take his owne height aright; and euen from his childhood to hate a Paraſite, as the worſt Traytor: To break thoſe falſe glaſſes, that would preſent him a face, not his owne: To applaud plain truth, and bend his browes vpon exceſſiue prayſes. Thus affected, hee may bid Vice doe her worſt. Thus ſhall he ſtriue with Vertue, whether ſhall more honour each other. Thus ſincere and ſolid glory ſhall euerywhere follow, and crowne him. Thus, when hee hath but his due, he ſhall haue ſo much, that he ſhall ſcorne to borrow the falſe colours of adulation. Goe on happily in this worthy and noble employment. The worke cannot but ſucceed, that is furthered with ſo many prayers.

Ep. V. A report of some Obseruations in my Trauell.

SIR, besides my hopes, not my desires, I trauelled of late; for knowledge partly, and partly for health. There was nothing that made not my iourney pleasant, saue the labour of the way: which yet was so sweetly deceiued, by the society of Sir Edmund Bacon, (a Gentleman truly honourable, beyond all titles) that I found small cause to complaine. The Sea brookt not me, nor I it; an vnquiet element, made only for wonder & vse, not for pleasure. Alighted once from that woodden conueyance, and vneuen way, I bethought my selfe how fondly our life is committed to an vnsteady and reeling peece of wood, fickle winds, restlesse waters; while wee may set foot on stedfast and constant earth. Loe, then euery thing taught me, euery thing delighted me; so ready are we to be affected with those forrain pleasures, which at home we should ouer-look. I saw much, as one might in such a span of earth, in so few moneths. The time fauoured me: for, now newly had the key of peace opened those parts which warre had before closed; closed (I say) to all English, saue either fugitiues or captiues. All ciuill occurrences (as what faire Cities, what strange fashions, entertainments, dangers, delights we found) are fit for other eares, and winter euenings. What I noted, as a Diuine within the sphere of my profession, my paper shall not spare in some part to report; and that to your selfe, which haue passed a longer way, with more happy fruit of obseruation. Euen little streames empty themselues into great Riuers, and they againe into the Sea. Neither do I desire to tell you what you know not: it shall be sufficient that I relate ought which others shall thinke memorable.

Along our way, how many Churches saw we demolished! Nothing left, but rude heaps, to tell the passenger, there hath beene both deuotion and hostility. O the miserable foot-steps of warre, besides bloodshed, ruine, and desolation! Furie hath done that there, which Couetousnesse would doe with vs; would doe, but shall not: The truth within, shall saue the wals without. And, to speake truly (what-euer the vulgar exclaime) Idolatrie pull'd downe those wals; not rage. If there had beene no Hollander to raze them, they should haue falne alone, rather than hide so much impietie vnder their guilty roofe. These are spectacles, not so much of cruelty, as iustice; Cruelty of man, Iustice of God. But (which I wondred at) Churches fall, and Iesuits Colledges rise, euery where. There is no city, where those are not either rearing or built. Whence commeth this? Is it, for that deuotion is not so necessary as policy? Those men (as we say of the Fox) fare best, when they are most cursed. None so much spighted of their owne; none so hated of all; none so opposed by ours: and yet these ill weeds grow. Whosoeuer liues long, shall see them feared of their owne, which now hate them; shall see these seuen leane kine deuoure al the fat beasts that feed on the medowes of Tyber. I prophecie, as Pharaoh dreamed: The euent shall iustifie my confidence.

At Bruxelles I say some English-women professe themselues Vestals; with a thousand rites, I know not whether more ridiculous, or magicall. Poore soules! they could not be fooles enough at home. It would haue made you to pitty, laugh, disdain (I know not which more) to see by what cunning sleights and faire pretences that weake sexe was fetcht into a wilfull bondage; and (if those two can agree) willingly constrained to serue a master whom they must and cannot obey: whom they neither may forsake for their vow, nor can please for their frailty. What followes hence? Late sorrow, secret mischiefe, misery irremediable. Their forwardnesse, for will-worship, shall condemne our coldnesse for truth.

I talked there (in more boldneſſe perhaps then wiſedome) with Coſterus a famous Ieſuit; an old man, more teaſty then ſubtle, and more able to wrangle then ſatisfie. Our diſcourſe was long and roaring, and on his part full both of words and vehemency. He ſpake as at home; I as a ſtranger: yet ſo, as he ſaw me modeſtly peremptory. The particulars would ſwell my Letter too much: It is enough, that the Truth loſt leſſe then I gained. At Gaunt (a city that commands reuerence for age, and wonder for the greatneſſe) we fell vpon a Cappucine nouice, which wept bitterly, becauſe he was not allowed to be miſerable. His head had now felt the razor, his backe the rod: all that Laconicall diſcipline pleaſed him well; which another, being condemned to, would iuſtly account a torment. What hindred then? Piety to his mother, would not permit this which hee thought piety to God: He could not be a willing begger, vnleſſe his mother muſt beg vnwillingly. He was the onely heyre of his father, the onely ſtay of his mother: the comfort of her widowhood depended on this her orphane; who now naked muſt enter into the world of the Cappucines, as he came firſt into this; leauing his goods to the diuiſion of the fraternity: the leaſt part whereof ſhould haue beene hers, whoſe hee wiſhed all: Hence thoſe teares, that repulſe. I pitied his ill beſtowed zeale; and rather wiſhed, then durſt teach him more wiſedome. Theſe men for deuout, the Ieſuits for learned and pragmaticall, haue ingroſſed all opinion from other Orders. O hypocriſie! No Cappucine may take or touch ſiluer: for theſe are (you know) the quinteſſence of Franciſcan ſpirits. This mettall is as very an Anathema to theſe, as the wedge of gold to Achan; at the offer whereof he ſtarts backe, as Moſes from the ſerpent: yet he carries a boy with him, that takes and carries it; and neuer complaines of either mettall or meaſure. I ſaw and laughed at it; and by this open tricke of hypocriſie, ſuſpected more, more cloſe. How could I chuſe? while commonly the leaſt appeares of that which is; eſpecially of that which is loathſome in appearance, much more in nature. At Namurs, on a pleaſant and ſteepe hill-top, we found one that was tearmed a maried Hermite; approuing his wiſedome aboue his fellowes, that could make choice of ſo chearfull and ſociable a ſolitarineſſe. Whence, after a delightfull paſſage vp the ſweet Riuer Moſa, we viſited the populous and rich Clergy of Leodium. That great Citie might well be dichotomized into Cloyſters and Hoſpitals. If I might aduenture, I could here play the Criticke, after all the ruines of my neglected Philologie. Old monuments, and after them our Lipſius, call this people Eburones: I doubt whether it ſhould not rather be written Ebriones; yet without ſearch of any other Records, ſaue my owne eyes: while yet I would thoſe ſtreets were more moiſt with wine, then with blood; wherein no day, no night is not diſmall to ſome. No law, no Magiſtrate, layes hold on the knowne murderer, if himſelfe liſt: for three dayes after his fact, the gates are open, and iuſtice ſhut: priuate violence may purſue him, publike iuſtice cannot: whence, ſome of more hot temper carue themſelues of reuenge; others take vp with a ſmall pecuniary ſatisfaction. O ENGLAND, thought I, happy for iuſtice, happy for ſecurity! There you ſhall find in euery corner a Maumet; at euery doore a Begger; in euery diſh a Prieſt. From thence we paſſed to the Spa, a village famous for her medicinall and minerall waters, compounded of Iron and Copperice; the vertue whereof yet the ſimple inhabitant aſcribes to their beneficiall Saint, whoſe heauy foot hath made an ill-ſhaped impreſſion in a ſtone of his * Sauenir: A water more wholeſome than pleaſant, and yet more famous than wholeſome. The wyld deſerts (on which it borders) are haunted with three kinds of ill cattell; Free-booters, Wolues, Witches: although theſe two laſt are oft-times one. For that ſauage Ardenna is reputed to yeeld many of thoſe monſters, whom the Greekes call λυκανθρωπους; they, Leugarous; we (if you will) Witch-wolues; Witches that haue put on the ſhape of thoſe cruell beaſts. We ſaw a boy there, whoſe halfe-face was deuoured by one of them neere the village: yet ſo, as that the eare was rather cut then bitten off. Not many dayes before our comming, at Limburgh was executed one of thoſe miſcreants, who confeſſed on the wheele to haue deuoured two and forty children in that forme. It would aske a large volume, to ſcan this probleme of Lycanthropie. The reaſons, wherewith their relation furniſht me on both parts, would make an epiſtle tedious. This in ſhort I reſolued; a ſubſtantiall change, is aboue the reach of all infernall powers, proper to the ſame hand that created the ſubſtance of both: Herein the Deuill playes the double Sophiſter; yea, the Sorcerer with Sorcerers. He both deludes the witches conceit, and the beholders eies.

One thing I may not omit, without ſinfull ouer-ſight; A ſhort, but memorable Storie, which the Grephier of that towne (though of different religion) reported to more eares then ours. When the laſt Inquiſition tyrannized in thoſe parts, and helpt to ſpend the Faggots of Ardenna; one of the reſt, a confident Confeſſour, being ledde farre to his ſtake, ſung Pſalmes along the way, in a heauenly courage and victorious triumph: the cruell Officer enuying his laſt mirth, and grieuing to ſee him merrier then his tormentors, commanded him ſilence: He ſings ſtill, as deſirous to improue his laſt breath to the beſt. The view of his approaching glory, bred his ioy; his ioy breakes forth into a chearfull confeſſion: The enraged Sheriffe cauſes his tongue, drawne forth to the length, to be cut off neere the roots. Bloody wretch! It had beene good muſicke to haue heard his ſhreekes: but, to heare his muſick was torment. The poore Martyr dies in ſilence, reſts in peace. Not many moneths after, our butcherly Officer hath a ſonne borne with his tongue hanging downe vpon his chinne, like a Deere after long chaſe; which neuer could be gathered vp within the bounds of his lips. O the diuine hand, full of iuſtice, full of reuenge! Goe now, Lipſius, and write the new miracles of thy Goddeſſe; and confirme ſuperſtition by ſtrange euents. Iudge you that haue ſeene, if euer the Chappel of Halle or Zichem haue yeelded ought more notable. We meet euery-where Pilgrims to thoſe his Ladyes: two Ladies ſhall I call them, or one Lady in two ſhrines? If two, why doe they worſhip but one? If but one, why doth ſhee that cure at Zichem, which at Halle ſhe could not? O what pitie it is, that ſo high a wit ſhould in the laſt act be ſubiect to dotage! All the maſculine brood of that braine we cheriſhed, and (if need were) admired: but theſe his ſilly Virgins, the feeble iſſue of diſtempered age, who can abide? one of his darlings, at Louan, told me from his owne mouth, that the elder of theſe two daughters was by him in ten dayes got, conceiued, borne, chriſtned. I beleeued, and wondred not. Theſe acts of ſuperſtition haue an inuiſible father, and mid-wife: beſides that it is not for an Elephant to goe three yeares with a Mouſe. It was told me in the ſhop of his Moretus, not without ſome indignation, that our King, when he had well viewed the booke, and read ſome paſſages, threw it to the ground, with this cenſure; Damnation to him that made it, and to him that beleeues it. Whether a true ſtory, or one of their Legends, I enquire not: I am ſure, that ſentence did not ſo much diſcontent them, as it ioyed me. Let me tell you yet, ere I take off my pen, two wonders more, which I ſaw in that wonder of Cities, Antwerp; one, a ſolemne Maſſe in a ſhambles, and that on Gods day; while the houſe was full of meat, of butchers, of buyers; ſome kneeling, others bargaining, moſt talking, all buſie. It was ſtrange to ſee one houſe ſacred to God, and the belly; and how thoſe two ſeruices agreed: The Prieſt did eat fleſh, the butchers ſold fleſh, in one roofe, at one inſtant. The butcher killed, and ſold it by peeces; the Prieſt did ſacrifice, and orally deuoure it whole: whether was the more butcher? The like we might haue ſeene at Malines. The other, an Engliſh man, ſo madly deuout, that he had wilfully mur'd vp himſelfe as an Anachoret; the worſt of al priſoners. There ſate he pent vp, for his further merit, halfe hunger-ſtarued for the charity of the Citizens. It was worth ſeeing, how manly hee could bite-in his ſecret want, and diſſemble his ouer-late repentance. I cannot commend his mortification, if he wiſh to be in heauen, yea in purgatory, to bee deliuered from thence: I durſt not pitty him; becauſe his durance was willing, and (as he hoped) meritorious: but, ſuch incouragement as he had from me, ſuch thanke ſhall he haue from God; who in ſtead of an Euge, which he lookes for, ſhall angerly challenge him, with Who required this? I leaue him now, in his owne fetters; you, to your worthy and honourable employments.

Pardon me this length. Loquacitie is the naturall fault of Trauellers: while I profit any, I may well be forgiuen.

Epist. VI. Concerning the Miracles of our time.

INdeed the world abounds with miracles. Theſe, while they fill the mouthes of many, ſway the faith of ſome, and make all men wonder. Our nature is greedy of news; which it will rather faine then want. Certainly, ere long, miracles will be no wonders, for their frequence. I had thought, our age had had too many gray hayres, and with time experience, and with experience craft, to haue deſcried a Iuggler: but now I ſee by the ſimplicity, it declines to its ſecond childhood. The two Lipſian Ladies, the charmes of Bluntſtones boy, and Garnets ſtraw, what a noiſe haue they made! I onely wonder how Faux and Catesby eſcaped the honour of Saints, and priuiledge of miracles. Herein you aske my ſentence; more ſeaſonably then you hoped. For I meant to haue wrote a iuſt volume of this ſubiect, and furniſht my ſelfe accordingly in that Region of wonders; but that I feared to ſurcharge the nice ſtomacke of our time, with too much. Neither would my length haue ought auailed you; whoſe thoughts are ſo taken vp with ſo high & ſeruiceable cares, that they can giue no leiſure to an ouer-long diſcourſe. May it pleaſe you therefore to receiue in ſhort, what I haue deliberately reſolued in my ſelfe, and thinke I can make good to others.

I haue noted foure ranks of commonly-named miracles: from which, if you make a iuſt ſubduction, how few of our wonders ſhall remaine either to beleeſe or admiration? The firſt meerely reported, not ſeene to be done; the next ſeeming to bee done, but counterfaited; the third, truly done, but not true miracles; the laſt, truly miraculous, but by Satan. The firſt of theſe are bred of lies, and nouriſhed by credulity: The mouth of Fame is full of ſuch blaſts. For theſe, if I liſted a while to rake in the Legends and booke of Conformities, an ingenuous Papiſt could not but bluſh, an indifferent Reader could not but lay his hand on his ſpleene, and wonder as much that any man could bee ſo impudent to broach ſuch reports, or any ſo ſimple to beleeue them; as the credulous multitude wonders that any ſhould be ſo powerfull to effect them. But I ſeeke neither their ſhame, nor others laughter. I dare ſay, not the Talmud, not the Alcoran, hath more impoſſible tales, more ridiculous lies. Yea, to this houre, Canus himſelfe (a famous Papiſt) dares referre many of thoſe ancient miracles reported and (by all likelihood) beleeued of Bede and Gregory. The next are bred of fraud, nouriſhed by ſuperſtition. Who knowes not, how the famous K[illegible] other eyes, and hands, by thoſe ſecret gimmers, which now euery P[illegible] How Saint Wilfreds needle opened to the penitent, and cloſed it to the guilty? How our Lady ſheds the teares of a bleeding Vine? and doth many other ſuch fraudfull feats, as Bel did of old eat vp his banquet, or as Piceas the Eremite faſted forty dayes. But theſe two euery honeſt Papiſt will confeſſe, with voluntary ſhame and griefe; and grant that it may grow a diſputable queſtion whether Mountebanks or Prieſts are the greater cozeners. Viues, beyond his wont, vehemently, termes them execrable and S[illegible]call impoſtors. The third are true works of God vnder a falſe title: God giues them their being, men their name: vniuſt, becauſe aboue their nature; wherein the Philoſopher and the ſuperſtitiouſly-ignorant, are contrarily extreame: while the one ſeekes out naturall cauſes of Gods immediate and metaphyſicall workes; the other aſcribes ordinary effects to ſupernaturall cauſes. If the violence of a diſeaſe ceaſe, after a vow made to our Lady; if a ſouldier, armed with this vow ſcape gun-ſhot; a captiue priſon; a woman trauelling, death; the vulgar (and I would they alone) cry out, A miracle. One Load-ſtone hath more more wonder in it, than a thousand such euents. Euery thing drawes a base minde to admiration. Francesco del Campo (one of the Arch-Dukes Quiryes) told vs not without importunate deuotion, that in that fatall field of Newport, his vow to their Virgin helpt him to swim ouer a large water, when the oares of his arms had neuer before tried any waues. A dogge hath done more, without acknowledgement of any Saint. Feare giues sudden instincts of skill, euen without precept. Their owne Costerus durst say, that the cure of a disease is no miracle: His reason, because it may be done by the power of Nature, albe in a longer time. * Yeeld this, and what haue Lipsius his two Ladies done? wherefore serues all this clamor, from the two hils? I assented not; neither will be herein thus much their enemy: For, as well the manner of doing, as the matter, makes a miracle. If Peters handkerchiefe, or shadow, heale a disease, it is miraculous, though it might haue beene done by a potion. Many of their recoueries (doubtlesse) haue bin wrought through the strength of Nature in the Patiēt; not of vertue in the Saint. How many sick men haue mended, with their physicke in their pocket? Though many other also (I doubt not) of those cures haue fallen into the fourth head; which indeed is more knotty, and require a deeper discourse. Wherein, if I shall euince these two things, I shall (I hope) satisfie my Reader, and cleare the Truth: One, that miracles are wrought by Satan, the other, that those which the Romish Church boasteth, are of this nature, of this author. I contend not of words: wee take miracles in Augustines large sense; wherein is little difference betwixt a thing maruellous and miraculous; such as the Spirit of God in either instrument cals δυναμεις and גבורות. Perhaps it would bee more proper to say, that God workes these miracles by Satan: for, as in the naturall and voluntary motions of wicked men; so in the supernaturall acts of euill spirits (as they are acts) there is more then a meere permission. Satan, by his tempest, bereaues Iob of his children; yet Iob, looking higher, saith, The Lord hath taken. No sophistry can elude this proofe of Moses; that a Prophet or dreamer may giue a true signe or wonder, and yet say, Let vs go after strange Gods: nor that of our Sauior, who foretels of false christs, false Prophets that shall giue σημεῖα μεγαλα καὶ τερατα; signes and wonders, and those great. There are some too great, I grant, for the hand of all infernall powers: by which, our Sauiour inuincibly proues the truth of his deity: These neuer graced falshood, neither admit any precedent from our times. As to the rest so frequent and common; for me, I could not beleeue the Church of Rome were Antichristian, if it had not boasted of these wonders. All the knot lies then in the application of this to Rome, and our imaginary Lady: How shall it appeare, that their miracles are of this kind? Ludouicus Viues giues six notes to distinguish Gods miracles from Satans: Lipsius three: Both of them too many, as might easily be discouered by discussing of particulars. It is not so much the greatnesse of the work, not the beleefe of witnesses, nor the quality nor manner of the action, nor truth of essence, that can descry the immediate hand which worketh in our miracles. That alone is the true and golden rule, which Iustin Martyr (if at least that booke be his) prescribes in his Questions and Answers; How shall it bee knowne that our miracles are beter than the Heathens, although the euent countenance both alike? Resp. Ex fide & cultu veri Dei: Miracles must be iudged by the doctrine which they confirme; not the doctrine by the miracles. The Dreamer, or Prophet, must bee esteemed, not by the euent of his wonder, but by the substance & scope of his teaching. The Romanists argue preposterously, while they would proue the truth of their Church by miracles; whereas they shold proue their miracles by the truth. To say nothing of the fashion of their cures, that one is prescribed to come to our Lady rather on a Friday, as Henry Loyez; another, to wash nine dayes in the water of MONTAGV, as Leonard Stocqueau; another to eat a peece of the Oake where the image stood, as * Magdaleine the widow of Bruxelles. All which, if they sauor not strong of magicall receits, let the indifferent iudge. Surely, either there is no sorcery, or this is it. All shall be plaine, if the doctrine confirmed by their miracles be once discussed: for, if that be diuine truth, we doe vniustly impugne these workes as diabolicall; if falshood, they doe blasphemously proclaime them for diuine. These works tend all chiefly to this double doctrine; that the blessed blessed Virgin is to be inuoked, for her mediation; That God and Saints are to be adored in and by images; Positions that would require a volume, and such as are liberally disputed by others: whereof one is against Scripture; the other (which in these cases values no lesse) besides it. One deifies the Virgin; the other a stocke or stone. It matters not what subtle distinctions their learned Doctors make betwixt mediatiō of Redemption, and Intercession, Δουλία and Λατρεία, the Saint and the Image: We know, their common people, whose deuotion enriches those shrines (by confession of their owne Writers) climbe the hill of Zichem with this conceit, that Mary is their Sauioresse; that the stocke is their Goddesse: which vnlesse it be true, how doe their wonders teach them lies! and therefore how from God? But, to take the first at best (for the second is so grosse, that were not the second Commandement by Papists purposely razed out of their Primiers, children and carters would condemne it) it cannot bee denyed, that all the substance of prayer is in the heart; the vocall sound is but a complement, and as an outward case wherein our thoughts are sheathed. That power cannot know the praier which knowes not the heart: either then the Virgin is God, for that shee knowes the heart; or to know the heart is not proper to God: or to know the heart, and so our prayers, is falsely ascribed to the Virgin: and therfore these wonders, which teach men thus to honor her, are Doctors of lies; so, not of God. There cannot be any discourse wherein it is more easie to bee tedious. To end; If prayers were but in words, and Saints did meddle with all particularities of earthly things, yet blessed Mary should bee a God, if shee could at once attend all her suters. One sollicits her at Halle, another at Scherpenheuuel, another at Luca, at our Walsingham another; one in Europe, another in Asia; or perhaps another is one of her new Clients in America. Ten thousand deuout Suppliants are at once prostrate before her seueral shrines. If she cannot heare all, why pray they? If she can, what can God doe more? Certainly (as the matter is vsed) there cannot be greater wrong offered to those heauenly spirits, then by our importunate superstitions to be thrust into Gods Throne; and to haue forced vpon them the honors of their Maker. There is no contradiction in heauen: a Saint cannot allow that an Angell forbids. See thou doe it not, was the voyce of an Angell: if all the miraculous blockes in the world shall speake contrary, wee know whom to beleeue. The old rule was, * Μαῖαν μηδεὶς προσκυνείτω: Either that rule is deuillish, or this practice. And if this practice bee ill, God deliuer mee from the immediate author of these miracles. Change but one Idoll for another, and what differ the wonders of Apollos Temples, from those of these Chappels? We reuerence (as we ought) the memory of that holy and happy Virgin: We hate those that dishonour her; we hate those that deifie her. Curſed be all honour that is stolne from God.

This short satisfaction I giue, in a long question; such as I dare rest in; and resolue that all popish miracles are either falsely reported, or falsly done, or falsely miraculous, or falsely ascribed to heauen.

Since your departure from vs, Reynolds is departed from the world. Alas, how many worthy Lights haue our eyes seene shining and extinguisht? How many losses haue we liued to see the Church

Church ſuſtaine, and lament; of her children, of her pillers; our owne, and forraine; I ſpeake not of thoſe, which (being excellent) would needs be obſcure: whom nothing but their owne ſecrecy depriued of the honour of our teares. There are, beſides, too many whom the world noted and admired; euen ſince the time that our common mother acknowledged vs for her ſonnes. Our Fulke led the way; that profound, ready, and reſolute Doctor, the hammer of hereticks, the champion of Truth: whom your younger times haue heard oft diſputing acutely and powerfully. Next him, followed that honour of our Schooles, and Angell of our Church, learned Whitakers; than whom our age ſaw nothing more memorable: what clearneſſe of iudgement, what ſweetneſſe of ſtyle, what grauity of perſon, what grace of cariage was in that man? Who euer ſaw him without reuerence? or heard him without wonder? Soone after, left the world that famous and illuminate Doctor, Francis Iunius, the glory of Leiden, the other hope of the Church, the Oracle of Textuall and Schoole-Diuinity, rich in languages, ſubtle in diſtinguiſhing, and in argument invincible: and his companion in labours, Lu. Trelcatius, would needs be his companion in ioyes; who had doubled our ſorrow and loſſe, but that he recompenced it with a ſonne like himſelfe. Soone after, fell old reuerend Beza; a long fixed ſtarre in this firmament of the Church: who, after many excellent monuments of learning and fidelity, liued to proue vpon his aduerſaries, that hee was not dead at their day. Neyther may I, without iniury, omit that worthy payre of our late Diuines, Grenham and Perkins: whereof the one excelled in experimentall diuinitie, & knew well how to ſtay a weake conſcience, how to raiſe a fallen, how to ſtrike a remorſleſſe: The other, in a diſtinct iudgement, and a rare dexterity in clearing the obſcure ſubtleties of the Schoole, and eaſie explication of the moſt perplex diſcourſes. Doctor Reynolds is the laſt; not in worth, but in the time of his loſſe. Hee alone was a well furniſht library, full of all faculties, of all ſtudies, of all learning: the memory, the reading of that man were neer to a miracle. Theſe are gone, amongſt many more, whom the Church mournes for in ſecret: would God her loſſe could be as eaſily ſupplied, as lamented. Her ſorrow is for thoſe that are paſt; her remainder of ioy in thoſe that remaine; her hope in the next age. I pray God the cauſes of her hope, and ioy, may be equivalent to thoſe of her griefe.

What ſhould this worke in vs, but an imitation, yea (that word is not too bigge for you) an emulation of their worthineſſe? It is no pride, for a man to wiſh himſelfe ſpiritually better then he dare hope to reach: nay, I am deceiued, if it be not true humility. For what doth this argue him, but low in his conceit, high in his deſires only? Or if ſo; happy is the ambition of grace, and power of ſincere ſeruiceablenеſſe to God. Let vs wiſh and affect this, while the world layes plots for greatneſſe: Let me not proſper, if I beſtow enuy on them. He is great, that is good: and no man, me-thinkes, is happy on earth, to him that hath grace for ſubſtance, and learning for ornament. If you know it not, the Church (our mother) lookes for much at your hands: ſhe knowes how rich our common father hath left you: ſhe notes your graces, your opportunities, your imployments: ſhe thinks you are gone ſo farre, like a good Merchant, for no ſmall gaine; and lookes you ſhall come home well laded. And for vent of your preſent commodities (tho our chiefe hope of ſucceſſe be cut off with that vnhoped peace) yet what can hinder your priuate trafficke for God? I hope (and who doth not?) that this blow will leaue in your noble Venetians a perpetuall ſcarre; and that their late irreſolution ſhall make them euer capable of all better counſell; and haue his worke (like ſome great Eclipſe many yeares after. How happy were it for Venice, if as ſhe is euery yeare maried to the Sea, ſo ſhe were once throughly eſpouſed to Chriſt! In the meane time, let me perſwade you to gratifie vs at home with the publication of that your exquiſit Polemicall diſcourſe; whereto our conference with M. Alablaſter gaue ſo happy an occaſion: You ſhall hereby cleare many truths, and ſatisfie all Readers: yea, I doubt not, but an aduerſary (not too peruerſe) ſhall acknowledge the Truths victory and yours. It was wholſome counſell of a Father, that in the time of an hereſie euery man ſhould write. Perhaps, you complain of the inundations of Francford: How many haue been diſcouraged raged from benefiting the world, be this conceit of multitude! Indeed we all write, and while we write, cry out of number. How well might many be spared, euen of those that complaine of too many? whose importunate babling cloyes the world, without vse.

To my Lord, the Earle of Essex.

Ep. VIII. Aduice for his Trauels.

MY Lord, both my dutie and promise make my Letters your debt; and, if neither of these, my thirst of your good. You shall neuer but need good counsell; most in trauell: Then are both our dangers greater, and our hopes.

I need not to tell you the eyes of the world are much vpon you, for your owne sake, for your fathers: onely let your eyes be vpon it againe, to obserue it, to satisfie it, and in some cases to contemn it. As your graces, so your weaknesses, will be the sooner spied, by how much you are more noted. The higher any building is, the more it requires exquisit proportion: which in some low and rude piles, is needlesse. If your vertues shall be eminent like your fathers, you cannot so hide your selfe, but the world will see you, and force vpon you applause & admiration, in spight of modesty: but if you shall come short in these, your fathers perfection shall be your blemish. Thinke, now, that more eyes are vpon you, then at home: of forrainers, of your owne; theirs to obserue, ours to expect. For, now we account you in the Schoole of wisedome: whence if you returne not better, you shall worse; with the losse of your time, of our hopes. For, I know not how naturall it is to vs, to looke for alteration in trauell; and, with the change of aire and land, to presuppose a change in the person. Now you are (through both your yeeres and trauell) in the forge of your hopes. We all looke (not without desire and apprecation) in what shape you will come forth. Thinke it not enough, that you see, or can say you haue seene strange things of nature, or euent: it is a vaine and dead trauell, that rests in the eye, or the tongue. All is but lost, vnlesse your busie mind shall, from the body that it sees, draw forth some quintessence of obseruation, wherewith to informe, & inrich it selfe. There is nothing can quite the cost and labour of trauell, but the gaine of wisedome. How many haue we seene and pitied, which haue brought nothing from forrain countries, but mishapen clothes, or exoticall gestures, or new games, or affected lispings, or the diseases of the place, or (which is worst) the vices? These men haue at once wandred from their countrie, and from themselues: and some of them (too easie to instance) haue left God behind them; or perhaps, instead of him, haue after a loose and filthy life, brought home some idle Puppet in a box, whereon to spend their deuotion. Let their wracke warne you: and let their follies be entertained by you, with more detestation then pittie. I know your Honour too well to feare you: your young yeares haue beene so graciously preuented with soueraigne antidotes of truth and holy instruction, that this infection despaires of preuailing. Your very blood giues you argument of safety: yet good counsell is not vnseasonable, euen where danger is not suspected. For Gods sake, my Lord, whatsoeuer you gaine, lose nothing of the truth; remit nothing of your loue and pietie to God; of your fauour and zeale to religion. As sure as there is a God, you were trained vp in the true knowledge of him. If either Angell, or Deuill, or Iesuit should suggest the contrary, send him away with defiance. There you see and heare euery day, the true mother and the fained, striuing and pleading for the liuing child. The true Prince of peace hath past sentence from heauen, on our side. Doe not you stoope so much as to a doubt, or motion of irresolution.

Aban-

Abandon those from your table and salt, whom your owne and others experience shall descry dangerous: Those Serpents are full of insinuations: But, of all, those of your owne country; which are so much the more pernicious, by how much they haue more colour of priuiledge of intireneſſe. Religion is the greateſt care: aduices for carriage, and improuement of trauell, challenge the next place. I need not counsell you to keepe your state with affability; and so to menage your selfe, as that your courteſie may be more visible then your greatneſſe. Nature hath taught you this; and hath secretly propagated it from your father: who by his sweetneſſe of disposition, wonne as many hearts, as by his valour and munificence. I rather tell you, that a good nature hath betrayed many; who looking for that in others, which they found in themselues, haue at last complained of their owne credulity, and others deceit. Trust not strangers too much, with your counsell, with your person: and in your greateſt familiarities, haue an eye to their common disposition, and infirmities. Those natures wherewith you conuerse, are subiect to displeasure, and violent in pursuit of small indignities. Yesterday heard I named, from no vnfaithfull report, a French Courtier, that in single combat hath sent 18 soules from the field to their place: yet he euer as the patient in the quarrell; and for this mentioned with more than excuse: I censure not how iustly. This is others care: Onely hence I argue the rifeneſſe of vnkindneſſe taken, and pursued. You shall see, that the soyle is not so diuers, as the inclination of persons; who in all Climates, though they differ in particulars, yet still agree too well in common faults. The Italian deepe, close, and crafty; the French rash; the German dull. One not forward to offer wrongs; but apprehensiue of a small wrong offered: another, prone eyther to take, or giue them; but not vneasie to remit: another, long in conceiuing, long in retaining. What doe I exemplifie? There are long Catalogues of peculiar vices, that haunt speciall places; which, if they were not notoriously infamous, my charity would serue me to particularize. It were pity there should be fewer vertues, locall and proper. There are good vses to be made of others enormities; if no more, by them to correct our owne: who loaths vice in another is in good forwardneſſe to leaue it in himselfe. The view of the publike calamities, and disorders of other Churches, shall best teach you thankfulneſſe for the better state of ours: But better vse of their vertues; by how much it is more excellent to know what we should doe, than what should not. You must now looke vpon all things, not with the eye of a stranger only, but of a Philosopher, but of a Christian; which accounts all losse, that is not reduced to practice. It is a great praise, that you are wiser by the contemplation of forraigne things; but much greater, that you are better.

That you haue seene Cities, and Courts, and Alpes, and Riuers, can neuer yeeld you so sound comfort, as that you haue lookt seriously into your selfe. In vaine doe we affect all forraign knowledge, if we be not throughly acquainted at home. Thinke much, and say little, especially in occasions of dispraise: wherein, both a little is enough, and oft times any thing is too much. You cannot inquire too much: that which in vs inferiors would be censured for dangerous curiosity, in your Greatnes shall be construed as a commendable desire of knowledge. Aske still after men of greateſt parts and reputation: and where you finde Fame no lyer, note and respect them. Make choyce of those for conuersation, which either in present, or in hope are eminent: and when you meet with excellencies in any faculty, leaue not without some gaine of knowledge. What are others graces to you, if you onely admire them; not imitate, not appropriate them? Lo, your equals in time grow vp happily in the Colledge (so I may terme it) of our yong and hopefull Court, which you haue left; and aboue all, that gracious President of worthineſſe and perfection: whom while in all other things you serue, you may without reproofe emulate for learning, vertue, piety. My selfe am witneſſe of their progreſſe; which I doe ioyfully gratulate to the succeeding age. Beware, lest their diligence shall out-strip you, and vpbraid you with that ancient check of going far and faring worse. I am bold and busie in counselling: you abound with better monitors; and the best you cary about, I hope, in your owne bosome. Though these ſhould be needleſſe, yet they argue my humble affection, and diſcharge my duty. My prayers are better than my counſels; both of them hearty and vnfained for your good. God guide and returne you ſafe, from a iourney not more happy and proſperous than I wiſh it.

To Sir ROBERT DRVRY, and his LADY.

EPIST. IX. Concerning my Remouall from them.

WIth how vnwilling a heart I leaue you, hee knowes that ſearches the heart: Neyther durſt I goe, but that I ſenſibly ſee his hand pulling mee from you. Indeed, deſire of competency betrayed me, at firſt; and drew mine eyes to look aſide: but, when I bent them vpon the place, and ſaw the number and the need of the people, together with their hunger and applauſe, meeting with the circumſtances of Gods ſtrange conueyance of this offer to me; I ſaw, that was but as the Fowlers feather, to make me ſtoope: and, contemning that reſpect of my ſelfe, I ſincerely acknowledged higher motiues of my yeelding; and reſolued I might not reſiſt. You are deare to me, as a charge to a Paſtor; If my paines to you haue not proued it, ſuſpect mee: Yet I leaue you. God calls me to a greater worke: I muſt follow him. It were more eaſe to me, to liue ſecretly hidden in that quiet obſcurity, as Saul amongſt the ſtuffe, then to be drawne out to the eye of the world, to act ſo high a part before a thouſand witneſſes. In this point, if I ſeeme to neglect you, blame me not; I muſt neglect and forget my ſelfe. I can but labour, whereſoeuer I am. God knowes how willingly I doe that, whether there or here. I ſhall digge, and delue, and plant, in what ground ſoeuer my Maſter ſets me. If hee take me to a larger field, complaine you not of loſſe, while the Church may gaine. But, you are mine owne Charge; No wiſe father neglects his owne, in compaſſion of the greater need of others: yet conſider, that euen carefull Parents, when the Prince commands, leaue their families, and goe to warfare. What if God hath called me to heauen; would you haue grudged my departure? Imagine I am there, where I ſhall bee; although the caſe be not to you altogether ſo hopeleſſe: for, now I may heare of you, viſit you, renue my holy counſels, and be mutually comforted from you; there, none of theſe. He, that will once tranſpoſe me from earth to heauen, hath now choſen to tranſpoſe me from one peece of earth to another: what is here worthy of your ſorrow, worthy of complaint? That ſhould be for my owne good: this ſhall be for the good of many. If your experience haue taught you, that my labors doe promiſe profit; obtaine of your ſelfe to deny your ſelfe ſo much, as to reioyce that the loſſe of a few ſhould be the aduantage of many ſoules. Tho, why doe I ſpeake of loſſe? I ſpeake that as your feare, not my owne: and your affection cauſeth that feare, rather then the occaſion.

The God of the Harueſt ſhall ſend you a Labourer, more able, as carefull: That is my prayer, and hope, and ſhall be my ioy. I dare not leaue but in this expectation, this aſſurance. What-euer become of me, it ſhall be my greateſt comfort to heare you commend your change; and to ſee your happy progreſſe in thoſe waies I haue both ſhewed you, and beaten. So ſhall we meet in the end, and neuer part.

Ep. X. Against the feare of Death.

You complaine, that you feare death: He is no man that doth not. Besides the paine, Nature shrinks at the thought of parting. If you would learn the remedy, know the cause; for that she is ignorant and faithlesse. Shee would not be cowardly, if she were not foolish. Our feare is from doubt, and our doubt is from vnbeleefe: and whence is our vnbeleefe, but chiefly frō ignorance? She knowes not what good is elsewhere: she beleeues not her part in it. Get once true knowledge & true faith, your feare shal vanish alone. Assurance of heauenly things, makes vs willing to part with earthly. He cannot contemn this life, that knowes not the other. If you would despise earth therfore, think of heauen. If you would haue death easie, thinke of that glorious life that followes it. Certainly, if we can endure paine, for health; much more should we abide a few pangs for glory. Thinke how fondly we feare a vanquisht enemy. Loe, Christ hath triumpht ouer Death: he bleedeth and gaspeth vnder vs: and yet we tremble. It is enough to vs, that Christ dyed: neyther would he haue dyed, but that we might dye with safety and pleasure.

Thinke that death is necessarily annexed to nature: We are for a time, on condition that we shall not be; wee receiue life, but vpon the termes of re-deliuery. Necessity makes some things easie; as it vsually makes easie things difficult. It is a fond iniustice to imbrace the couenant, and shrinke at the condition.

Thinke, there is but one common rode to all flesh: There are no by-paths of any fairer or nearer way; no, not for Princes. Euen company abateth miseries: and the commonnesse of an euill makes it lesse fearefull. What worlds of men are gone before vs; yea, how many thousands out of one field? How many Crownes and Scepters lye piled vp at the gates of Death, which their owners haue left there, as spoiles to the conqueror? Haue we been at so many graues, & so oft seene our selues dye in our friends; and doe we shrinke when our course commeth? Imagine you alone were exempted from the common law of mankind, or were condemned to Methusalahs age; assure your selfe, death is not now so fearefull, as your life would then be wearisome.

Thinke not so much what Death is, as from whom he comes, and for what. We receiue euen homely messengers from great persons; not without respect to their masters: And what matters it who he be, so he bring vs good newes? What newes can be better than this, That God sends for you, to take possession of a Kingdome? Let them feare Death, which know him but as a pursuiuant sent from hell; whom their conscience accuseth of a life wilfully filthy; and bindes-ouer secretly to condemnation: We know whither we are going, and whom we haue beleeued: Let vs passe on cheerfully, through these blacke gates vnto our glory.

Lastly, know that our improuidence onely addes terror vnto death. Thinke of death, and you shall not feare it. Doe you not see, that euen Beares and Tygres seem not terrible to those that liue with them? How haue we seene their keepers sport with them, when the beholders durst scarce trust their chaine? Be acquainted with Death: though he looke grimme vpon you at first, you shall finde him (yea, you shall make him) a good companion. Familiarity cannot stand with feare. These are receits enow. Too much store doth rather ouer-whelme than satisfie. Take but these, and I dare promise you security.

EP. I. The eſtate of a true, but weake Chriſtian.

IF you aske how I fare: Sometimes, no man better; and, if the fault were not mine owne, Alwayes. Not that I can command health, and bid the world smile when I liſt. How poſſible is it for a man to be happy without theſe; yea, in ſpight of them? Theſe things can neyther augment, nor impaire thoſe comforts that come from aboue. What vſe, what ſight is there of the ſtarres, when the Sunne ſhines? Then onely can I finde my ſelfe happy, when (ouer-looking theſe earthly things) I can fetch my ioy from heauen. I tell him that knowes it, the contentments that earth can afford her beſt Fauourites, are weake, imperfect, changeable, momentany; and ſuch, as euer end in complaint. Wee ſorrow that wee had them; and, while wee haue them, we dare not truſt them: Thoſe from aboue are full, and conſtant. What an heauen doe I feele in my ſelfe, when (after many trauerſes of meditation) I find in my hart, a feeling poſſeſſion of my God! When I can walke, and conuerſe with the God of heauen, not without an openneſſe of heart, and familiarity: When my ſoule hath caught faſt and ſenſible hold of my Sauiour; and either pulls him downe to it ſelfe, or rather lifts vp it ſelfe to him; and can and dare ſecretly auouch, I know whom I haue beleeued: When I can looke vpon all this inferior creation, with the eies of a ſtranger, & am tranſported to my home in my thoughts; ſolacing my ſelfe in the view & meditation of my future glory, and that preſent of the Saints: When I ſee wherefore I was made, and my conſcience tells me I haue done that for which I came; done it, not ſo as I can boaſt, but ſo as it is accepted; while my weakneſſes are pardoned, and my acts meaſured by my deſires, and my deſires by their ſincerity: Laſtly, when I can finde my ſelfe (vpon holy reſolution) made ſtrong and ſquare, fit to entertaine all euents; the good with moderate regard, the euill with courage and patience, both with thankes; ſtrongly ſetled to good purpoſes, conſtant and cheerfull in deuotion; and, in a word, ready for God, yea full of God. Sometimes I can be thus, and pity the poore and miſerable proſperity of the godleſſe; and laugh at their moneths of vanity, and ſorrow at my owne: But then againe (for why ſhould I ſhame to confeſſe it?) the world thruſts it ſelfe betwixt me and heauen; and, by his darke and indigeſted parts, eclipſeth that light which ſhined to my ſoule. Now, a ſenſleſſe dulneſſe ouertakes me, and beſots me; my luſt to deuotion is little, my ioy none at all: Gods face is hid, and I am troubled. Then I begin to compare my ſelfe with others, and thinke, Are all men thus blockiſh and earthen? or, am I alone worſe worse than the rest, and singular in my wretchednesse? Now I cary my carcasse vp and downe carelesly, and (as dead bodies are rubbed, without heat) I doe in vaine force vp. on my selfe delights, which others laugh at: I endeuor my wonted worke, but without an heart; there is nothing is not tedious to me, no not my selfe.

Thus I am, till I single my selfe out alone, to him that alone can reviue me: I reason with my selfe, and confer with him; I chide my selfe, and intreat him: and, after some spirituall speeches interchanged, I renue my familiarity with him; and he the tokens of his loue to me. Lo, then I liue againe, and applaud my selfe in this happinesse, and wish it might euer continue, and thinke basely of the world in comparison of it. Thus I hold on, rising and falling; neither know, whether I should more praise God for thus much fruition of him, or blame my selfe for my inconstancy in good; more reioyce, that somtimes I am well, or grieue that I am not so alwayes. I striue, and wish, rather then hope, for better. This is our warfare; we may not looke to triumph alwayes; we must smart somtimes, and complaine; and then againe reioyce that we can complaine; and grieue that we can reioyce no more, and that we can grieue no more. Our hope is, if we be patient, we shall once be constant.

To Sir Edmvnd Bacon.

Epist. II. Of the benefit of retirednesse and secrecie.

SVspect (if you can) that, because now many cold windes blow betwixt vs, my affection can be cooler to you. True loue is like a strong streame, which the further it is from the head, runnes with more violence. The thoughts of those pleasures I was wont to finde in your presence, were neuer so delightfull, as now when I am barred from renuing them. I wish me with you; yea (if I could or might wish to change) I should wish me your selfe. To liue hidden, was neuer but safe, and pleasant; but now, so much better, as the world is worse. It is a happinesse, not to be a witnes of the mischiefe of the times; which it is hard to see, and be guiltlesse. Your philosophicall Cell is a safe shelter from tumults, from vices, from discontentments. Besides that liuely, honest, and manly pleasure, which arises from the gaine of knowledge in the deepe mysteries of Nature; how easie is it in that place to liue free from the common cares, from the infection of common euils! Whether the Spaniard gaine or saue by his peace, and how hee keepes it; and whether it were safer for the States to lay downe armes, and be at once still and free; Whether the Emperors truce with the Turke were honorable and seasonable; and whether Venice haue wonne or lost by her late iarres; are thoughts that dare not looke in at those doores. Who is enuyed, and who pitied at Court; Who buyes hopes and kindnesse dearest; who layes secret mynes to blow vp another, that himselfe may succeed, can neuer trouble you: These cares dare not enter into that Sanctuary of peace. Thence you can see how all that liue publike are tossed in these waues, and pity them. For, great places haue seldome safe and easie entrances: and (which is worst) great charges can hardly be plausibly wielded, without some indirect policies. Alas! their priuiledges cannot counteruaile their toyle. Weary dayes, and restlesse nights, short lifes and long cares, weake bodies and vnquiet mindes, attend lightly on greatnesse. Eyther Clients breake their sleepe in the morning, or the intention of their minde driues it off from the first watch. Eyther suits or complaints thrust themselues into their recreations; and packets of Letters interrupt their meales. It is euer Terme with them, without Vacation. Their businesses admit no night, no holiday: Loe, your priuacy frees you from all this, and what euer other glorious misery. There you may sleepe, sleep, and eat, & honestly disport, & enioy your selfe, and command both your praises and others. And, whiles you are happy, you liue out of the reach of enuy; vnlesse my self send that guest thither: which I should iustly condemne as the fault of my loue. No man offers to vndermine you, none to disgrace you: you could not want these inconueniences abroad. Yea, let a man liue in the open world, but as a looker on, he shall bee sure not to want abundance of vexations. An ill mind holds it an easie torment, to liue in continuall sight of euill; if not rather a pleasure: but, to the well-disposed, it is next to Hell. Certainly, to liue among Toads and Serpents, is a Paradise to this. One iests pleasantly with his Maker: another makes himselfe sport with Scripture. One fills his mouth with oathes of sound: another scoffes at the religious. One speakes villanie; another laughes at it; a third defends it. One makes himselfe a Swine, another a Deuil: Who (that is not all earth) can endure this? who cannot wish himselfe rather a desolate Hermite, or a close prisoner? Euery euill we see, doth either vex, or infect vs. Your retirednesse auoids this; yet so, as it equally escapes all the euils of solitarinesse. You are full of friends; whose society, intermixed with your closeness, makes you to want little of publike. The Desert is too wilde, the Citie too populous: the Country is onely fit for rest. I know, there want not some obscure corners, so haunted with dulnesse, that as they yeeld no outward vnquietnesse, so no inward contentment. Yours is none of those; but such as striues rather with the pleasure of it, to requite the solitarinesse. The Court is for honour, the City for gaine, the Countrey for quietnesse; a blessing that need not (in the iudgement of the wisest) yeeld to the other two. Yea, how many haue wee knowne, that hauing nothing but a coat of thatch to hide them from heauen, yet haue pitied the carefull pompe of the mighty? how much more may those which haue full hands and quiet hearts, pitty them both? I do not so much praise you in this, as wonder at you. I know many vpon whom the conscience of their wants forces a necessary obscurity; who if they can steale a vertue out of necessity, it is well: but, I no where know so excellent parts shrouded in such willing secrecy. The world knowes you, and wants you; and yet you are voluntarily hid. Loue your selfe still; and make much of this shadow, vntill our common mother call you forth to her necessary seruice, and charge you to neglect your selfe, to pleasure her. Which once done, you know where to find peace. Whether others applaud you, I am sure, you shall your selfe: and I shall still magnifie you, and (what I can) imitate you.

To Mr. Iohn Whiting.

Ep. III. An Apologeticall discourse of the mariage of Ecclesiasticall persons.

I Know not whether this quarrell be worthy of an answer, or rather of a silent scorne; or if an answer, whether merry or serious. I doe not willingly suffer my pen to wade into questions: yet this argument seemes shallow enough for an Epistle. If I free not this truth, let me bee punished with a diuorce. Some idle table-talke cals vs to plead for our wiues. Perhaps some Gallants grudge vs one, who can bee content to allow themselues more. If they thought wiues curses, they would afford them vs. Our mariage is censured (I speake boldly) of none but them which neuer knew to liue chastly in mariage; who neuer knew that* Canonists true distinction of Virginity. What care we for their censure, where God approues? But some perhaps maintaine it out of iudgement: Bid them make much of that which Paul tels them, is a doctrine of deuils. Were it not for this opinion, the Church of Rome would want one euident brand of her Antichristianisme. Let their shauelings speake for themselues; vpon whom their vnlawfull vnlawfull Vow hath forced a wilfull and impossible necessity. I leaue them to scan the old rule of In turpi voto muta decretum; if they had not rather, Cautè si non caste. Euen moderate Papists will grant vs free, because not bound by Vow; no, not so farre as those old Germans, pro posse & nosse. Or what care we, if they grant it not? while we hold vs firme to that sure rule of Basil the great; * He that forbids what God inioynes, or inioynes what God forbids, let him be accursed. I passe not what I heare men, or Angels say, while I heare God say, Let him be the husband of one wife. That one word shall confirme me against the barking of all impure mouthes. He that made mariage, sayes, it is honourable: what care we for the dishonour of those that corrupt it? yea, that which nature noteth with shame, God mentions with honour, [a] τιμιος ὁ γαμος; [b] Gregory with the title of opus castum; Paphnutius, of σωφροσυνη, chastity. But if God should be Iudge of this controuersie, it were soone at an end; who in the time euen of that legall strictnesse, allowed wedlocke to the Ministers of his Sanctuary. Let Cardinall Panormitan be heard speake. [c] Continency (saith he) in Clergymen, is neither of the substance of their order, nor appointed by any law of God. And Gratian, out of Augustine, yet more. [d] Their mariage (saith he) is neither forbidden by Legall, nor Euangelicall, nor Apostolike authority.

God neuer imposed this law of Continence: who then? [e] The Church. As if a good spouse would gaine-say what her husband willeth. But how well? Heare, O ye Papists, the iudgement of your owne Cardinall; and confesse your mouthes stopped. [f] But I beleeue (saith he) it were for the good and safety of many soules, & would bee an wholesome law, that those which would, might marry; for that, as experience teacheth vs, a contrary effect followes vpon that law of Continency; since at this day they liue not spiritually, neither are cleane, but are defiled with vnlawfull copulation, to their great sinne: whereas with their owne wife it might be chastity. Is this a Cardinall, thinke you, or a Huguenot? But if this red hat be not worthy of respect; let a Pope himselfe speake out of Peters chaire. Pius the second, as learned as hath sit in that roome this thousand yeares; [g] Mariage (saith he) vpon great reason was taken from the Clergy; but vpon greater reason is to bee restored. What need we other Iudge? How iust this law is, you see; see now how ancient: For some doctrines haue nothing to plead for them, but Time. Age hath beene an old refuge for Falsehood. Tertullians rule is true; That which is first, is truest. What the ancient Iewish Prelates did, Moses is cleare. What did the Apostles? Doth not [h] Paul tell vs, that both the rest of the Apostles, and the brethren of the Lord, and Cephas, had wiues, and (which is more) caried them still along in their trauels? For that childish euasion of [i] ἀδελφὴ γυναῖκα who can abide, but to laugh at? Doth not [k] Clemens of Alexandria (a Father not of more antiquity, than credit, tell vs, that Peter, Philip, and Paul himselfe, were maried? And this last (though vnlikest) how is it confirmed by Ignatius, in his Epistle to the Philadelphians? Yea, their own Cardinall, learned Cajetane, doth both auouch and euince it. This was their practice: what was their Constitution? Looke in these Canons which the Romish Church fathers vpon the Apostles, and Franciscus Turrian their Iesuit sweats to defend it in a whole Volume: There you find, Canon. 5. enacted, that [m] no Bishop, Presbyter, Deacon, shall forsake his wife (προφάσει εὐλαβείας) in pretense of Religion, vpon paine of deposition. It would moue laughter, to see how the Iesuits gnaw vpon this bone, and sucke-in nothing but the blood of their owne iawes; [n] while the sixt generall Councell auerres and proclaimes this sense truly Apostolicall, in spight of all contradiction.

without scruple of any contrary iniunction. Many of those Ancients admired Virginitie, but imposed it not. Amongst the rest, [o] Origen (though himselfe a wilfull Eunuch) is faine to perswade the sonnes of Clergy men, not to be proud of their parentage. After this, when the Fathers of the Nicene Councell went about to enact a law of Continency, Socrates the Historian expresses it thus: [p] It seemeth good (saith he) to the Bishops to bring in a new law into the Church. It was then new, and they but would haue brought it in; therefore before, it was not: where we know how Paphnutius, himselfe a Virgin, famous for holinesse, famous for miracles, rising (ἐβόησε) cryed aloud, that they ought not to lay this (βαρυζυγον) heauy yoke, vpon men of the Church. His argumentes wan assent. He spake and preuailed. So this liberty was still continued and affirmed. If this be not plaine enough, [q] holy Athanasius, a witnesse past exception, shall serue for a thousand histories till his Age.

[r] Many Bishops (saith he) haue not maried; and contrarily Monkes haue been fathers of children: as contrarily, you see Bishops the Fathers of children, and Monkes that haue not sought posterity. Would you yet haue instances of the former, and the next Age? Here you haue [s] Numidicus the Martyr, a maried Presbyter; [t] Cheremon of Nilus, a maried Bishop; [u] Demetrianus Bishop of Antioch, whose son Domnus succeeded Paulus Samosatenus; Philoromus and Phileas BB. of the Thmuites; Gabinius brother of Eutichianus BB. of Rome; the father of Nazianzene, Basil, and the other [x] Gregory, Hilarius, and that good Spiridion Bishop of Cyprus, of whom Sozomen giues so direct testimony. To omit others, what should I speak of many Bishops of Rome, whose sonnes not spurious, as now-adaies, but (as Pope Vrban himselfe witnesses) [z] lawfully begot in wedlock, followed their fathers in the Pontificial chaire. [a] The reason wherof, that Pope himself ingenuously rendreth; for that mariage was euerywhere lawfull to the Clergy before the prohibition (which must needs be late) & in the Easterne Church to this day is allowed. What need we more testimonies, or more examples? What euer [b] Heliodorus, B. of Trica (a man fitter for a wantō loue-story than a Church-cōtrouersie) brought into the Church of Thessalia, Socrates thus flatly writes of those Bishops of his time: [c] For many of them in the place and function of Bishops, beget children of their lawfull wiues. This was practised: See what was decreed in that sixt general [d] Councel of Constantinople, to this purpose, to the confusion of all replyers. If any Protestant Church in Christendome can make a more peremptory, more full and absolute, more cautelous decree, for the mariage of Ecclesiasticall persons, let me be condemned as faithlesse: A place, I grant, miserably handled by our Aduersaries; and because they cannot blemish it enough, indignely torne out of the Councels. What dare not impudency doe? * Against all euidences of Greeke Copies, against their own Gratian, against pleas of antiquity. This is the readiest way; Whom they cannot answer, to burne; what they cannot shift off, to blot out; and to cut the knot which they cannot vntie. The Romanists of the next age were somewhat more equall: who, seeing themselues pressed with so flat a Decree, confirmed by authority of Emperours, as would abide no denyall, began to distinguish vpon the point; limiting this liberty onely to the Easterne Church, and granting that all the Clergy of the East might marry, not theirs. So Pope Steuen the second freely confesses:

Itaque si quis dignus inveniatur, &c. is minimè prohibendus est ad hunc gradum ascendere, ideo quod cum legitima uxore cohabiter. Nec tempore ordinationis suæ ab eo postuletur, seu cogatur ut abstinere velit aut debeat legitimo congressu cum propriâ uxore. * Citat à Nilo Thessalonicensi.

[c] The tradition (saith he) of the Easterne Churches is otherwise than that of the Romane Church. For, their Priests, Deacons, or Subdeacons are maried; but in this Church or the Westerne, no one of the Clergy, from the Subdeacon to the Bishop, hath leaue to marry.

Liberally; but not enough: and if he yeeld this, why not more? Shall that be lawfull in the East, which in the West is not? Doe the Gospels, or lawes of equity alter according to the foure corners of the world? Doth God make difference betwixt Greece and England? If it be lawfull, why not euery where? If vnlawfull, why is it done any where? So then you see, we differ not from the Church in this; but from the Romish Church: But this sacred Councel doth not only vniuersally approue this practice (with paine of deposition to the gaine-sayers) but atouches it for a Decree Apostolical. Iudge now whether this one authority be not enough to weigh down an hundred petty conuenticles, and many legions (if there had beene many) of priuate contradictions. Thus, for seuen hundred yeares, you find nothing but open freedome: All the scuffling arose in the eight Age; wherein yet this violent imposition found many and learned Aduersaries, and durst not be obtruded at once. Loe, euen then, Gregory the third, writing to the Bishops of Bauaria, giues this disiunct charge; [f] Let none keepe an harlot or a concubine: but either let him liue chastely, or marry a wife, whom it shall not be lawfull for him to forsake: According to that rule of Clerks, cited from [g] Isidore, and renewed in the [h] Councell of Mentz, to the perpetuall shame of our iugling aduersaries. Nothing can argue guiltinesse so much, as vniust expurgations. [i] Isidore saith, Let them containe, or let them marry but one: They cite him, Let them containe; and leaue out the rest: somewhat worse than the Deuill cited Scripture. But, I might haue spared all this labour of writing, could I perswade whosoeuer either doubts, or denies this, to reade ouer that one Epistle which [k] Huldericus BB. of Ausburge wrote learnedly, and vehemently, to Pope Nicholas the first, in this subiect: which if it doe not answer all cauils, and satisfie all Readers, and conuince all (not wilfull) aduersaries, let me be cast, in so iust a cause. There you shall see, how iust, how expedient, how ancient this liberty is; together with the feeble and iniurious grounds of forced Continency: Reade it, and see whether you can desire a bettter Aduocate. After him (so strongly did he plead, and so happily) for two hundred yeares more, this freedome still blessed those parts; yet, not without extreame opposition. Histories are witnesses of the busie, and not vnlearned combats of those times, in this argument. But now, when the body of Antichristianisme began to be compleat, and to stand vp in his absolute shape, after a thousand yeares from Christ; this liberty, which before wauered vnder Nicolas 1, now by the hands of Leo 9, Nicolas 2, and that brand of hell, Gregory 7, was vtterly ruined, wiues debarred, single life vrged: [l] A good turne for whoremasters (saith Auentine) who now for one wife might fix hundred Bed-fellowes.

But, how approued of the better sort appeares (besides that the Churches did ring of him each where for Antichrist) in that at the [m] Councell of Wormes the French and German Bishops deposed this Gregory, in this name (amongst other quarrels) for [n] separating man and wife. Violence did this; not reason: neither was Gods will here questioned, but the Popes wilfulnesse. What broyles hereon ensued, let [o] Auentine witnesse.

The bickerings of our English Clergy, with their Dunstanes, about this time, are memorable in our own Histories, which teach vs how late, how repiningly, how vniustly, they stooped vnder this yoake. I had rather send my Reader to Bale and Fox, then abridge their Monuments, to enlarge mine owne.

I haue (I hope) fetcht this truth farre enough; and deduced it low enough through many Ages, to the midst of the rage of Antichristian tyranny. There left our liberty; there began their bondage. Our liberty is happily renewed with the Gospel: what God, EPIST. IV. Of the sorrow not to be repented of.

IT is seldome seene, that a silent griefe speeds wel: for either a man must haue strong hands of resolution to strangle it in his bosome; or else it driues him to some secret mischiefe: whereas sorrow reuealed, is halfe remedied, and euer abates in the vttering. Your griefe was wisely disclosed; and shall be as strangely answered. I am glad of your sorrow; and should weepe for you, if you did not thus mourne. Your sorrow is, that you cannot enough grieue for your sinnes. Let me tell you, that the Angels themselues sing at this lamentation; neither doth the earth afford any so sweet musicke in the eares of God. This heauinesse is the way to ioy. Worldly sorrow is worthy of pity, because it leadeth to death: but this deserues nothing but enuy and gratulation. If those teares were common, hell would not so enlarge it selfe. Neuer sinne, repented of, was punished: and neuer any thus mourned, and repented not. Loe, you haue done that, which you grieue you haue not done. That good God, whose act is his will, accounts of our will as our deed. If he required sorrow proportionable to the hainousnesse of our sins, there were no end of mourning. Now, his mercy regards not so much the measure, as the truth of it; and accounts vs to haue that which wee complaine to want. I neuer knew any truly penitēt, which in the depth of his remorse, was afraid of sorrowing too much; nor any vnrepentant, which wisht to sorrow more. Yea, let me tell you, that this sorrow is better, and more, then that deepe heauinesse for sinne, which you desire. Many haue been vexed with an extreame remorse for some sinne, from the gripes of a galled conscience, which yet neuer came where true repentance grew; in whom the conscience playes at once the accuser, witnesse, Iudge, tormentor: but an earnest griefe, for the want of griefe, was neuer found in any but a gracious heart. You are happy, and complaine. Tell me, I beseech you; This sorrow which you mourne to want, is it a grace of the spirit of God, or not? If not, why doe you sorrow to want it? If it be, oh how happy is it to grieue for want of grace! The God of all truth and blessednesse hath said, Blessed are those that hunger and thirst after righteousnesse; and, with the same breath, Blessed are they that mourne: for, they shall be comforted. You say, you mourne; Christ saith, you are blessed: you say, you mourne; Christ saith, you shall be comforted. Either now distrust your Sauiour, or else confesse your happinesse, & with patience expect his promised consolation. What doe you feare? You see others stand like strong Oakes, vnshaken, vnremoued: you are but a reed, a feeble plant, tossed and bowed with euery wind, and with much agitation bruised; Loe, you are in tender and fauourable hands, that neuer brake any, whom their sinnes bruised; neuer bruised any, whom temptations haue bowed. You are but flax; and your best is not a flame, but an obscure smoake of grace: Loe, here his spirit is as a soft wind, not as cold water; he will kindle, will neuer quench you. The sorrow you want, is his gift: Take heed lest while you vex your selfe with dislike of the measure, you grudge at the giuer. Beggers may not chuse. This portion he hath vouchsafed to giue you; if you haue any, it is more then he was bound to beſtow: yet you ſay, What, no more? as if you tooke it vnkindly, that hee is no more liberall. Euen theſe holy diſcontentments are dangerous. Deſire more (ſo much as you can) but repine not, when you doe not attaine. Deſire, but ſo as you be free from impatience, free from vnthankfulneſſe. Thoſe that haue tryed, can ſay how difficult it is to complaine, with due reſeruation of thankes. Neither know I whether is worſe, To long for good things impatiently, or not at all to deſire them. The fault of your ſorrow is rather in your conceit, then in it ſelfe. And, if indeed you mourne not enough, ſtay but Gods leiſure, and your eyes ſhall runne ouer with teares. How many doe you ſee ſport with their ſinnes, yea brag of them? How many that ſhould die for want of paſtime, if they might not ſin freely, and more freely talke of it? What a Saint are you to theſe, that can droop vnder the memory of the frailty of youth, and neuer thinke you haue ſpent enow teares! Yet ſo I encourage you in what you haue, as one that perſwades you not to deſiſt from ſuing for more. It is good to be couetous of grace, and to haue our deſires herein enlarged with our receits. Weepe ſtill, and ſtill deſire to weepe: but let your teares be as the raine in a ſunne-ſhine; comfortable and hopefull: and let not your longing fauour of murmur, or diſtruſt. Theſe teares are reſerued; this hunger ſhall be ſatisfied; this ſorrow ſhall bee comforted: There is nothing betwixt God and you, but time. Preſcribe not to his wiſedome: haſten not his mercy. His grace is enough for you: his glory ſhall be more then enough.

TO M. HVGH CHOLMLEY.

EP. V. Concerning the Metaphraſe of the Pſalmes.

FEare not my immoderate ſtudies. I haue a body that controls me enough in theſe courſes; my friends need not. There is nothing whereof I could ſooner ſurfet, if I durſt neglect my body to ſatisfie my mind: But whiles I affect knowledge, my weakneſſe checkes me, and ſayes, Better a little learning then no health. I yeeld, and patiently abide my ſelfe debarred of my choſen felicity. The little I can get, I am no niggard of; neither am I more deſirous to gather, then willing to impart. The full handed are commonly moſt ſparing. We veſſels, that haue any empty roome, anſwer the leaſt knock with a hollow noyſe: you, that are full, ſound not. If we pardon your cloſeneſſe, you may well bear with our profuſiō. If there be any wrong, it is to our ſelues, that we vnder what wee ſhould lay vp. It is a pardonable fault, to do leſſe good to our ſelues, that we may doe more to others. Amongſt other endeauours, I haue boldly vndertaken the holy Meetres of Dauid; how happily, iudge you by what you ſee. There is none of all my labours ſo open to all cenſures; none whereof I would ſo willingly heare the verdict of the wiſe and iudicious. Perhaps, ſome thinke the verſe harſh; whoſe nice care regards roundneſſe more then ſenſe. I embrace ſmoothneſſe, but affect it not. This is the leaſt good quality of a verſe; that intends any thing but muſicall delight. Others may blame the difficulty of the tunes: whoſe humour cannot be pleaſed without a greater offence. For, to ſay truth, I neuer could ſee good verſe written in the wonted meaſures. I euer thought them moſt eaſie, and leaſt Poeticall. This fault (if any) will light vpon the negligence of our people; which endure not to take paines for any fit variety. The French and Dutch haue giuen vs worthy examples of diligence, and exquiſitneſſe in this kind. Neither our eares nor voyces are leſſe tunable. Here is nothing wanting but will to learne. What is this, but to eate the corne out of the eare, becauſe we will not abide the labour to grinde, and knead it? If the queſtion bee, whether our verſe must descend to them; or they ascend to it; wise moderation I thinke would determine it most equall, that each part should remit somewhat, and both meet in the midst. Thus I haue endeauored to doe, with sincere intent of their good, rather then my own applause. For it had beene easie to haue reached to an higher straine: but I durst not; whether for the graue Maiesty of the subiect, or benefit of the simplest reader. You shal still note, that I haue laboured to keepe Dauids entire sense, with numbers neither lofty nor slubbered: which mean is so much more difficult to find, as the businesse is more sacred, and the liberty lesse. Many great wits haue vndertaken this task; which yet haue either not effected it, or haue smothered it in their priuate deskes, and denied it the common light. Amongst the rest, were those two rare spirits of the Sidnyes; to whom, Poesie was as naturall as it is affected of others: and our worthy friend, M. Sylvester, hath shewed me, how happily he hath sometimes turned from his Bartas, to the sweet singer of Israel. It could not be, that in such abundant plenty of Poesie, this work should haue past vnattempted: would God I might liue to see it perfected; either by my own hand, or a better. In the meane time, let me expect your impartiall sentence, both concerning the forme, and sense. Lay aside your loue, for a while; which too oft blindes iudgement. And as it vses to be done in most equall proceedings of iustice, shut me out of doores while my verse is discussed: yea, let me receiue not your censure onely, but others by you: this once (as you loue mee) play both the Informer and the Iudge. Whether you allow it, you shall encourage me; or correct, you shall amend me. Either your starres, or your spits, (that I may vse Origens notes) shall bee welcome to my margent. It shall be happy for vs, if God shall make our poore labours any way seruiceable to his Name and Church.

Ep. VI. A Preface to his Relation of the Russian affaires.

TRauell perfecteth wisedome; and obseruation giues perfection to trauell: without which, a man may please his eyes, not feed his braine; and after much earth measured, shall returne with a weary body, and an empty minde. Home is more safe, more pleasant, but lesse fruitfull of experience: But, to a mind not working and discursiue, all heauens, all earths are alike. And, as the end of trauell is obseruation; so, the end of obseruation is the enforming of others: for, what is our knowledge if smothered in our selues, so as it is not knowne to more? Such secret delight can content none but an enuious nature. You haue breathed many and cold ayres, gone farre, seene much, heard more, obserued all. These two yeares you haue spent in imitation of Nabuchadnezzars seuen; conuersing with such creatures as Paul fought with at Ephesus. Alas! what a face, yea what a backe of a Church haue you seene? what manners? what people? Amongst whom, ignorant superstition striues with close Atheisme, treachery with cruelty, one Deuill with another; while Truth and Vertue doe not so much as giue any chalenge of resistance. Returning once to our England after this experience, I imagine you doubted whether you were on earth, or in heauen. Now then (if you will heare me, whom you were wont) as you haue obserued what you haue seene, and written what you haue obserued; so, publish what you haue written: It shall bee a gratefull labour, to vs, to posterity. I am deceiued, if the ficklenesse of the Russian state, haue not yeelded more memorable matter of history then any other in our age, or perhaps many centuries of our predecessors. How shall I think, but that God sent you thither before these broiles, to be the witnesse, the register of so famous mutations? He loues to haue those iust euils which hee doth in one part of the world, knowne to the whole, and those euils which men doe in the night of their secrecy, brought forth into the Theater of the World; that the euill of mens sinne being compared with the euill of his punishment, may iustifie his proceedings, and condemne theirs. Your worke shall thus honor him besides your second seruice, in the benefit of the Church. For, whiles you discourse of the open tyranny of that Ruffian Nero, Iohn Basilius; the more secret, no lesse bloody plots of Boris; the ill successe of a stolne Crowne, tho set vpon the head of an harmelesse Sonne; the bold attempts and miserable end of a false, yet aspiring chalenge; the perfidiousnesse of a seruile people, vnworthy of better gouernors; the miscariage of wicked gouernors, vnworthy of better subiects; the vniust vsurpations of men, with (tho late) reuenges of God, cruelty rewarded with blood, wrong claimes with ouerthrow, treachery with bondage; the Reader, with some secret horror, shall draw in delight, and with delight instruction: Neither know I any Relation whence hee shall take out a more easie lesson of iustice, of loyalty, of thankfulnesse.

But aboue all, let the world see and commiserate the hard estate of that worthy and noble Secretary, Buchinski. Poore gentleman! his distresse recals euer to my thoughts Æsops Storke, taken amongst the Cranes: He now nourishes his haire, vnder the displeasure of a forraine Prince; At once in durance and banishment. He serued an ill master; but, with an honest heart, with cleane hands. The masters iniustice doth no more infect a good seruant, then the truth of the seruant can iustifie his ill master. A bad worke-man may vse a good instrument: and oft-times a cleane napkin wipeth a foule mouth. It ioyes me yet to thinke, that his piety, as it euer held friendship in heauen, so now it wins him friends in this our other world: Lo, euen from our Iland vnexpected deliuerance takes a long flight, and blesseth him beyond hope; yea rather, from heauen, by vs. That God, whom he serues, will bee known to those rude and scarce humane Christians, for a protector of innocence, a fauourer of truth, a rewarder of piety. The mercy of our gracious King, the compassion of an honourable Councellor, the loue of a true friend, and (which wrought all, and set all on worke) the grace of our good God, shall now loose those bonds, and giue a glad welcome to his liberty, and a willing farewell to his distresse. He shall (I hope) liue to acknowledge this; in the meane time, I doe for him. Those Russian affaires are not more worthy of your records, then your loue to this friend is worthy of mine. For neither could this large sea drowne or quench it, nor time and absence (which are wont to breed a lingring consumption of friendship) abate the heat of that affection which his kindnesse bred, religion nourished. Both rarenesse, and worth shall commend this true-loue; which (to say true) hath been now long out of fashion. Neuer times yeelded more loue; but, not more subtle. For, euery man loues himselfe in another, loues the estate in the person: Hope of aduantage is the loadstone that drawes the iron hearts of men; not vertue, not desert. No age afforded more Parasites, fewer friends: The most are friendly in sight, seruiceable in expectation, hollow in loue, trustlesse in experience. Yet now, Buchinski, see and confesse thou hast found one friend, which hath made thee many: on whom while thou bestowedst much fauour, thou hast lost none. I cannot but thinke how welcome, Liberty (which tho late, yet now at last hath lookt backe vpon him) shall bee to the Cell of his affliction; when, smiling vpon him, she shall lead him by the hand, and (like another Angell) open the iron gates of his miserable captiuity, and (from those hard Prestanes and sauage Christians) cary him by the hayre of the head, into this paradise of God. In the meane time, I haue written to him as I could, in a knowne language, with an vnknowne hand; that my poore Letters of gratulation might serue as humble attendants to greater.

For your worke, I wish it but such glad entertainment, as the profit, yea the delight of it deserues; and feare nothing, but that this long delay of publication will make it scarce newes. We are all growne Athenians, and account a strange report like to a fish and a guest. Those eyes and hands staid it, which might doe it best. I cannot blame you, you, if you thinke it more honored by the ſtay of his gracious peruſall, then it could be by the earthly acceptation of the world. Euen the caſt garments of Princes are precious. Others haue in part preuented you; whoſe labours, to yours, are but as an Eccho to a long period: by whom, we heare the laſt ſound of theſe ſtirres, ignorant of the beginning. They giue vs but a taſte in their hand: you lead vs to the open fountaine. Let the Reader giue you but as much thanke, as you giue him ſatisfaction; you ſhall deſire no more.

Finally, God giue vs as much good vſe, as knowledge of his iudgements; the world, helpe of your labourss; your ſelfe, incouragement; Buchinski, liberty.

To Staniſlaus Buchinski, late Secretary to Demetrius Emp. of Ruſsia.

EPIST. VII. Of the comfort of Impriſonment.

THe knowledge, that the eye giues of the face alone, is ſhallow, vncertaine, imperfect. For what is it, to ſee the vtmoſt skin, or fauour of the viſage; changeable with diſeaſe, changeable with paſſion? The eare (me thinkes) doth both moſt clearly diſcloſe the minds of others, and knit them faſter to ours: which, as it is the ſenſe of diſcipline, ſo of friendſhip, commanding it euen to the abſent, and in the preſent cheriſhing it. This thing we haue lately proued in your ſelfe, moſt noble Staniſlaus: neerer examples we might haue had; better we could not. How many, how excellent things haue we heard of you, from our common friend, though moſt yours, which haue eaſily wonne our beleefe, our affections! How oft, how honorable mention hath he made of your name! How frequently, how feruently haue we wiſht you, both ſafety and liberty! And now, loe where ſhe comes, as the Greeks ſay, ἀπομαχαιρας and viſits her forlorne Client. Although I would not doubt to ſay, that this outward durance of the body, hath ſeemed more harſh to the beholders, then to your ſelfe, a wiſe man (which is more) a Chriſtian; whoſe free ſoule, in the greateſt ſtraits of the outward man, flies ouer Seas and Lands whither it liſteth; neither can, by any diſtance of place, nor ſwelling of waues, nor height of mountaines, nor violence of enemies, nor ſtrong bars, nor walls, nor guards, be reſtrained from what place it ſelfe hath choſen. Loe, that enioyes God, enioyes it ſelfe and his friends; and ſo feeds it ſelfe with the pleaſure of enioying them, that it eaſily either forgets or contemnes all other things. It is no Paradoxe, to ſay that, A wiſe Chriſtian cannot be impriſoned, cannot be baniſhed: He is euer at home, euer free. For, both his liberty is within him, and his home is vniuerſall. And what is it, I beſeech you (for you haue tried) that makes a priſon? Is it ſtraitneſſe of walls? Then you haue as many fellowes, as there are men. For, how is the ſoule of euery man pent within theſe clay wals of the body, more cloſe, more obſcure! whence ſhee may looke oft, through the grates of her buſie thoughts; but, is neuer releaſed in ſubſtance, till that God, who gaue vs our Mittimus into this Gaole, giue vs our Deliuery, with Returne yee ſonnes of Adam: Thus either all men are priſoners, or you are none. Is it reſtraint? How many (eſpecially of that other ſex in thoſe your Eaſterne parts) chamber vp themſelues, for ſtate; ſo as they neither ſee the Sunne, nor others them? How many ſuperſtitious men, for deuotion; how many obſcure Aglai, for eaſe and careleſneſſe, keepe themſelues in their owne cotrage, in their owne village; and neuer walke forth ſo much as to the neighbour townes? And what is your Ruſsia to all her inhabitants, but a large priſon, a wide Galley? yea, what other is the world to vs? How can hee complaine of straitnesse, or restraint, that roues ouer all the world, and beyond it? Tyranny may part the soule from the body; cannot confine it to the body. That which others doe for ease, deuotion, state, you doe for necessity: why not as willingly, since you must doe it? Do but imagine the other cause: and your case is the same with theirs which both haue chosen, and delight to keepe close; yet hating the name of prisoners, while they embrace the condition. But, why doe I perswade you, not to mislike that, which I pray you may forsake? I had rather you should bee no prisoner at all, then to bee a cheerfull prisoner vpon necessity. If the doores be open, my perswasion shall not hold you in. Rather our prayers shall open those doores, and fetch you forth into this common liberty of men; which also hath not a little (though an inferior) contentment. For, how pleasant is it to these senses, by which we men are wont to be led, to see and bee seene, to speake to our friends, and heare them speake to vs; to touch and kisse the deare hands of our Parents, and with them at last to haue our eyes closed? Either this shall befall you; or what hopes, what paines (I adde no more) hath this your carefull friend lost? and we, what wishes, what consultations? It shall be; I dare hope, yea beleeue it: Onely thou our good God giue such end, as thou hast done entrance into this businesse; and so dispose of these likely endeauors, that whom we loue and honor absent, we may at last in presence see and embrace.

To my father in law, M. G. VVenyffe.

Ep. VIII. Exciting to Christian cheerefulnesse.

YOu complaine of dulnesse; a common disease, and incident to the best mindes, and such as can most contemne vanities. For, the true Worldling hunts after nothing but mirth; neither cares how lawlesse his sport be, so it be pleasant: hee faines to himselfe false delights, when he wants: and if he can passe the time, and chase away Melancholie, he thinkes his day spent happily. And thus it must needs be; while the world is his god, his deuotion can bee but his pleasure: whereas the mortified soule, hath learned to scorne these friuolous and sinfull ioyes; and affects either solid delights, or none; and had rather be dull for want of mirth, then transported with wanton pleasures. When the world, like an important Minstrell, thrusts it selfe into his chamber, and offers him musicke, vnsought; if he vouchsafe it the hearing, it is the highest fauour he dare, or can yeeld: He rewards it not, he commends it not: Yea, hee secretly lothes those harsh and iarring notes, and reiects them. For, he finds a better consort within, betwixt God and himselfe, when he hath a little tuned his heart with meditation. To speake fully, the World is like an ill foole in a Play: the Christian is a iudicious spectator, which thinkes those iests too grosse to be laught at; and therefore entertaines that with scorne, which others with applause. Yet in truth, we sinne, if wee reioyce not: there is not more error in false mirth, then in vniust heauinesse. If worldlings offend, that they laugh, when they should mourne; we shall offend no lesse, if we droop in cause of cheerefulnesse. Shall we enuy, or scorne, to see one ioy in red and white drosse, another in a vaine title; one in a dainty dish, another in a iest; one in a book, another in a friend; one in a Kite, another in a Dogge; whiles wee enioy the God of Heauen, and are sorrowfull? What dull metall is this we are made of? We haue the fountaine of ioy, and yet complaine of heauinesse. Is there any ioy, without God?

Certainly,

Certainly, if ioy be good, and all goodneſſe bee from him; whence ſhould ioy ariſe, but from him? And if hee be the author of ioy; how are we Chriſtians, and reioyce not? What? do we freeze in the fire, and ſtarue at a feaſt? Haue we a good conſcience, and yet pine and hang down the head? When God hath made vs happy, doe we make our ſelues miſerable? When I aske my heart Dauids queſtion, I know not whether I bee more angry or aſhamed at the anſwer; Why art thou ſad my ſoule? My body, my purſe, my fame, my friends; or perhaps none of theſe: onely I am ſad, becauſe I am. And what if all theſe? what if more? when I come to my better wits, Haue I a father, an aduocate, a comforter, a manſion in heauen? If both earth and hell conſpired to afflict me, my ſorrow cannot counteruaile the cauſes of my ioy. Now I can challenge all aduerſaries; and either defie all miſeries, or bid all croſſes, yea death it ſelfe, welcome. Yet God doth not abridge vs of theſe earthly ſolaces, which dare weigh with our diſcontentments, and ſometimes depreſſe the balance. His greater light doth not extinguiſh the leſſe. If God had not thought them bleſſings, hee had not beſtowed them: and how are they bleſſings, if they delight vs not? Bookes, friends, wine, oyle, health, reputation, competencie, may giue occaſions, but not bounds, to our reioycings. We may not make them Gods riualls, but his ſpokes-men. In themſelues they are nothing; but in God worth our ioy. Theſe may be vſed; yet ſo as they may bee abſent without diſtraction. Let theſe goe; ſo God alone be preſent with vs, it is enough: He were not God, if he were not All-ſufficient. We haue him, I ſpeake boldly; Wee haue him in feeling, in faith, in pledges, and earneſt; yea, in poſſeſſion. Why doe we not enioy him? why doe we not ſhake-off that ſenſeleſſe drowſineſſe, which makes our liues vnpleaſant; and leaue-ouer all heauineſſe to thoſe that want God; to thoſe that either know him not, or know him diſpleaſed?

To M. W. R. Dedic. to M. Thomas Burlz.

Ep. IX. Conſolations of immoderate griefe for the death of friends.

WHile the ſtreame of ſorrow runs full, I know how vaine it is to oppoſe counſell. Paſſions muſt haue leaſure to digeſt. Wiſdome doth not more moderate them, then time. At firſt, it was beſt to mourne with you, and to mitigate your ſorrow, by bearing part; wherein, would God my burden could be your eaſe. Euery thing elſe is leſſe, when it is diuided; And then is beſt, after teares, to giue counſell: yet, in theſe thoughts I am not a little ſtraited. Before you haue digeſted griefe, aduice comes too early; too late, when you haue digeſted it. Before, it was vnſeaſonable; after, would be ſuperfluous. Before, it could not benefit you: after, it may hurt you, by rubbing-vp a skinned ſore a-freſh. It is as hard to chooſe the ſeaſon for counſell, as to giue it: and that ſeaſon is, after the firſt digeſtion of ſorrow; before the laſt. If my Letters then meet with the beſt opportunitie, they ſhall pleaſe me, and profit you: If not, yet I deſerue pardon, that I wiſhed ſo. You had but two Iewels, which you held precious; a Wife, and a Sonne: One was your ſelfe diuided; the other, your ſelfe multiplyed: You haue loſt both, and well-neere at once. The loſſe of one cauſed the other, and both of them your iuſt griefe. Such loſſes, when they come ſingle, afflict vs; but, when double, aſtoniſh vs; and tho they giue aduantage of reſpite, would almoſt ouerwhelme the beſt patient. Lo, now is the tryall of your manhood, yea, of your Chriſtianitie: You are now in the liſts, ſet vpon by two of Gods fierce afflictions; ſhow now what patience you haue, what fortitude. Wherefore haue you gathered, and laid vp all this time, time, but for this brunt? Now bring forth all your holy ſtore to light, and to vſe; and approue to vs in this difficultie, that you haue all this vvhile beene a Chriſtian in earneſt. I know, theſe euents haue not ſurpriſed you on a ſudden: you haue ſuſpected they might come; you haue put-caſes if they ſhould come. Things that are hazardous, may be doubted: but certaine things are, and muſt be expected. Prouidence abates griefe, and diſcountenances a croſſe. Or, if your affection were ſo ſtrong, that you durſt not fore-thinke your loſſe; take it equally but as it falls. A wiſe man and a Chriſtian knowes death ſo fatall to Nature, ſo ordinarie in euent, ſo gainefull in the iſſue, that I vvonder he can for this either feare or grieue. Doth God onely lend vs one another, and doe we grudge when he calls for his owne? So I haue ſeene ill debters, that borrow vvith prayers, keepe vvith thankes, repay vvith enmitie. We miſtake our tenure: vve take that for gift, vvhich God intends for loane; Wee are tenants at will, and thinke our ſelues owners. Your vvife and child are dead: Well, they haue done that for vvhich they came.

If they could not haue dyed, it had been worthy of vvonder; not at all, that they are dead. If this condition vvere proper onely to our families, and friends, or yet to our climate alone; how vnhappie ſhould we ſeeme to our neighbours, to our ſelues! Now it is common, let vs mourne that vve are men. Lo, all Princes and Monarchs daunce vvith vs in the ſame ring: yea, what ſpeake I of earth? The God of Nature, the Sauiour of men, hath trod the ſame ſteps of death? And doe we thinke much to follow him? How many ſeruants haue vvee knowne, that haue thruſt themſelues betwixt their Maſter and death; vvhich haue dyed, that their Maſter might not dye: and ſhall vve repine to die vvith ours? How truely may vve ſay of this our Dauid, Thou art worth ten thouſand of vs; yea, vvorth a world of Angels: yet he died, and dyed for vs. Who would liue, that knowes his Sauiour died? who can be a Chriſtian, and vvould not be like him? Who can be like him, that vvould not die after him? Thinke of this, and iudge whether all the vvorld can hire vs not to die. I neede not aske you, vvhether you loued thoſe whom you haue loſt: Could you loue them, and not wiſh they might be happy? Could they be happy, and not dye? In truth, nature knowes vvhat ſhee vvould haue; Wee can neither abide our friends miſerable in their ſtay, nor happie in their departure: We loue our ſelues ſo vvell, that wee cannot be content they ſhould gaine by our loſſe. The excuſe of our ſorrow is, that you mourne for your ſelfe. True: but compare theſe two, and ſee whether your loſſe or their gaine be greater. For, if their aduantage exceed your loſſe; take heed, leſt while you bewray your loue in mourning for them, it appeare that you loue but your ſelfe in them. They are gone to their preferment, and you lament: your loue is iniurious. If they were vaniſhed to nothing, I could not blame you, tho you tooke vp Rachels lamentation: But now, you know they are in ſurer hands then your owne: you know, that hee hath taken them, which hath vndertaken to keepe them, to bring them againe: You know it is but a ſleepe, which is miſcalled Death; and that they ſhall, they muſt awake, as ſure as they lie downe; and wake more freſh, more glorious, then when you ſhut their eyes. What doe we with Chriſtianitie, if we beleeue not this? and if we doe beleeue it, why doe we mourne as the hopeleſſe? But the matter, perhaps, is not ſo heauy as the circumſtance: Your croſſes came ſudden, and thicke; You could not breathe from your firſt loſſe, ere you felt a worſe. As if hee knew not this, that ſent both: As if he did it not on purpoſe. His proceedings ſeeme harſh; are moſt wiſe, moſt iuſt. It is our fault, that they ſeeme otherwiſe then they are. Doe we thinke, wee could carue better for our ſelues? O the mad inſolence of Nature, that dares controll, where ſhee ſhould wonder! Preſumptuous clay! that will be checking the Potter. Is his wiſdome, himſelfe? Is he, in himſelfe, infinite? is his Decree out of his wiſdome; and doe we murmur? Doe wee, fooliſh wormes, turne againe when he treads vpon vs? What? doe you repine at that which was good for you, yea beſt? That is beſt for vs which God ſeeth beſt: and that he ſeeth beſt, which he doth. This is Gods doing. Kiſſe his rod in ſilence, and giue glory to the hand that rules it. His will is the rule of his actions; and his goodneſſe, of his will. Things are good to vs, becauſe he wils them: He wils them, becauſe they are good to himſelfe. It is your glory that he intends, in your ſo great affliction. It is no praiſe to wade ouer a ſhallow Ford, but to cut the ſwelling waues of the Deepe, commends both our ſtrength and skill. It is no victory, to conquer an eaſie and weake croſſe. Theſe maine euils haue crownes anſwerable to their difficultie: Wreſtle once and goe away with a bleſſing. Bee patient in this loſſe, and you ſhall once triumph in your gaine. Let God haue them with cheerefulneſſe, and you ſhall enioy God with them in glory.

To Mr F. A. Merchant.

Ep. X. Againſt ſorrow for worldly loſſes.

IT is fitter for me to begin with chiding, then with aduice: what meanes this weake diſtruſt? Goe on, & I ſhall doubt whether I write to a Chriſtian. You haue loſt your heart, together with your wealth; How can I but feare, leſt this Mammon was your God? Hence was Gods iealouſie in remouing it; and hence your immoderate teares for loſing it. If thus; God had not loued you, if hee had not made you poore. To ſome, it is an aduantage to leeſe: you could not haue been at once thus rich, and good. Now, heauen is open to you, which was ſhut before; and could neuer haue giuen you entrance, with that load of iniquitie. If you be wiſe in menaging your affliction, you haue changed the world for God, a little droſſe for heauen. Let me euer loſe thus, and ſmart when I complaine.

But you might haue at once retained both. The ſtomach, that is purged, muſt be content to part with ſome good nouriſhment, that it may deliuer it ſelfe of more euill humors. God ſaw (that knowes it) you could not hold him ſo ſtrongly, while one of your hands was ſo faſtned vpon the world. You ſee, many make themſelues wilfully poore: why cannot you be content God ſhould impouerish you? If God had willed their pouertie, he would haue commanded it: If he had not willed yours, he would not haue effected it. It is a ſhame for a Chriſtian, to ſee an Heathen Philoſopher laugh at his owne ſhipwracke; while himſelfe howles out, as if all his felicity were imbarked with his ſubſtance. How ſhould wee ſcorne, to thinke that an Heathen man ſhould laugh either at our ignorance, or impotence? ignorance, if wee thought too highly of earthly things; impotence, if we ouer-loued them. The feare of ſome euils is worſe then the ſenſe. To ſpeake ingenuouſly; I could neuer ſee, wherein pouertie deſerued ſo hard a conceit. It takes away the delicacie of fare, ſoftneſſe of lodging, gayneſſe of attire, and perhaps brings with it contempt: this is the worſt, and all. View it now on the better ſide: Lo, their quiet ſecurity, ſound ſleepes, ſharpe appetite, free merriment; no feares, no cares, no ſuſpition, no diſtempers of exceſſe, no diſcontentment. If I were Iudge, my tongue ſhould be vniuſt, if pouertie went away weeping. I cannot ſee, how the euils it brings, can compare with thoſe which it remoues; how the diſcommodities ſhould match the bleſſings of a meane eſtate. What are thoſe you haue loſt, but falſe friends, miſerable comforters? Elſe they had not left you. Oh ſlight & fickle ſtay, that windes could bereaue you of! If your care could goe with them, here were no damage: and, if it goe not with them, it is your fault. Grieue more for your fault, then for your loſſe. If your negligence, your riotous miſ-ſpence had empaired your eſtate, then Satan had impouerisht you; now would I haue added to your griefe, for your ſinne, not for your affliction: But now, ſince windes and waters haue done it as the officers of their Maker; why ſhould you not ſay with mee, as I with Iob, The

Lord

Lord hath taken? Vſe your loſſe well, and you ſhall find that God hath croſſed you with a bleſſing. And if it were worſe then the world eſteemes it, yet thinke not what you feele, but what you deſerue: You are a ſtranger to your ſelfe, if you confeſſe not, that God fauours you in this whip. If he had ſtripped you of better things, and ſcourged you with worſe, you ſhould ſtill haue acknowledged a mercifull iuſtice: If you now repine at an eaſie correction, you are worthy of ſeuerity. Beware the next, if you grudge and ſwell at this. It is next to nothing which you ſuffer: what can bee further from vs, then theſe goods of outward eſtate? You need not abate either health, or mirth, for their ſakes. If you doe now draw the affliction neerer then he which ſent it, and make a forraine euill domeſticall; if while God viſits your eſtate, you fetch it home to your body, to your minde; thanke your ſelfe that you will needs be miſerable: But if you loue not to fare ill; take croſſes as they are ſent, and goe lightly away with an eaſie burden.

THE THIRD DECAD.

To Mr Smith, and Mr Rob. Ring-leaders of the late Separation at Amsterdam.

Ep. I. Setting forth their iniury done to the Church, the iniuſtice of their cauſe, and fearfulneſſe of their offence: Cenſuring and aduiſing them.

WEe heare of your ſeparation, and mourne; yet not ſo much for you, as for your vvrong: you could not doe a greater iniury to your mother, then to fly from her. Say ſhee were poore, ragged, weake; ſay ſhe were deformed; yet ſhee is not infectious: Or if ſhee vvere, yet ſhe is yours. This were cauſe enough for you, to lament her, to pray for her, to labour for her redreſſe, not to auoid her: This vnnaturalneſſe is ſhamefull; and more hainous in you, who are reported not parties in this euill, but authors. Your flight is not ſo much, as your miſ-guidance. Plead not: this fault is paſt excuſe. If wee all ſhould follow you, this vvere the vvay, of a Church (as you plead) imperfect, to make no Church; and of a remedie, to make a diſeaſe. Still the fruit of our charitie to you, is, beſides our griefe, pitie. Your zeale of truth hath miſ-led you, and you others: A zeale, if honeſt, yet blind-folded, and led by ſelfe-will. Oh that you loued Peace, but halfe ſo well as Truth: then, this breach had neuer beene: and you that are yet brethren, had beene ſtill companions. Goe out of Babylon, you ſay; The voice not of Schiſme, but of holineſſe. Know you vvhere you are? Looke about you, I beſeech you, looke behinde you; and ſee if wee haue not left it vpon our backs. Shee her ſelfe feeles, and ſees that ſhee is abandoned: and complaines to all the world, that we haue not onely forſaken, but ſpoiled her; and yet you ſay, Come out of Babylon. And except you will bee willingly blinde, you may ſee the heapes of her Altars, the aſhes of her Idols, the ruines of her monuments, the condemnation of her errours, the reuenge of her abominations. And are wee yet in Babylon? Is Babylon yet amongſt vs? Where are the maine buildings of that accurſed Citie; thoſe high and proud Towers of their vniuerſall Hierarchie, infallible iudgement, diſpenſation vvith the Lawes of God, and ſinnes of men; diſpoſition of Kingdomes, depoſition of Princes, parting ſtakes vvith God in our conuerſion, through freedom of vvil; in our ſaluation, through the merit of our vvorks? Where are thoſe rotten heapes (rotten, not through age, but corruption) of tranſubſtantiating of bread, adoring of Images, multitude of Sacraments, power of Indulgences, neceſſitie of Confeſſions, profit of Pilgrimages, conſtrained and approued Ignorance, vnknowne deuotions? Where are those deepe vaults (if not mynes) of Penances and Purgatories, and whatsoeuer hath beene deuised by those Popelings, whether profitable or glorious, against the Lord, and his Christ? Are they not all raced, and buried in the dust? Hath not the Maiestie of her Gods, like as was done to Mithra, and Serapis, beene long agone offered to the publique laughter of the vulgar? What is this but to goe, yea to runne (if not to fly) out of Babylon? But (as euery man is an hearty Patron of his owne actions, and it is a desperate cause that hath no plea) you alledge our consorting in Ceremonies, and say still we tarry in the suburbs. Grant that these were as ill, as an enemy can make them, or can pretend them: You are deceiued, if you thinke the walles of Babylon stand vpon Ceremonies. Substantiall errors are both her foundation, and frame. These rituall obseruations are not so much as Tile and Reede, rather like to some Vane vpon the roofe; for ornament, more then vse: Not parts of the building, but not necessarie appendances. If you take them otherwise, you wrong the Church; if thus, and yet depart, you wrong it and your selfe: As if you would haue perswaded righteous Lot not to stay in Zoar, because it was so neere Sodome. I feare, if you had seene the money-changers in the Temple, how euer you would haue prayed, or taught there: Christ did it, not forsaking the place, but scourging the offenders: And this is the valour of Christian teachers: To oppose abuses, not to runne away from them: Where shall you not thus finde Babylon? Would you haue runne from Geneua, because of her wafers? Or from Corinth, for her disordered loue-feasts? Either runne out of the world, or your flight is in vaine. If experience of change teach you not, that you shall finde your Babylon euery where, returne not. Compare the place you haue left, with that you haue chosen; let not feare of seeming to repent ouer-soone, make you partiall. Loe, there a common harbour of all opinions, of all heresies; if not a mixture. Here you drew in the free and cleare aire of the Gospel, without that odious composition of Iudaisme, Arrianisme, Anabaptisme: There you liue in the stench of these and more. You are vnworthy of pitie, if you will approue your misery. Say if you can, that the Church of England (if shee were not yours) is not an heauen to Amsterdam. How is it then, that our gnats are harder to swallow, then their camels? and that whiles all Christendome magnifies our happinesse, and applauds it; your handfull alone, so detests our enormities, that you despise our graces? See whether in this you make not God a loser. The thanke of all his fauours is lost, because you want more: and in the meane time, who gaines by this sequestration, but Rome and Hell? How doe they insult in this aduantage, that our mothers owne children condemne her for vncleane, that we are daily weakened by our diuisions, that the rude multitude hath so palpable a motiue to distrust vs? Sure, you intended it not: but, if you had been their hired Agent, you could not haue done our enemies greater seruice. The God of heauen open your eyes, that you may see the vniustice of that [redacted] which hath transported you; and turne your heart to an endeuour of all Christian satisfaction: Otherwise, your soules shall finde too late, that it had beene a thousand times better to swallow a Ceremonie, then to rend a Church: yea, that euen whoredomes and murders shall abide an easier answer then separation. I haue done, if onely I haue aduised you of that fearfull threatning of the Wise-man: The eye that mocketh his father, and despiseth the gouernment of his mother, the Rauens of the valley shall picke it out, and the yong Eagles eate it.

To Sir Andrew Asteley.

Ep. II. A discourse of our due preparation for death, and the meanes to sweeten it to vs.

Since I saw you, I saw my father die: How boldly and merrily did hee passe therow the gates of death, as if they had had no terrour, but much pleasure! Oh that I could as easily imitate, as not forget him! We know, wee must tread the same way; how happy, if with the same mind? Our life, as it giues way to death, so must make way for it: It will be, though we will not: it will not bee happy, without our will, without our preparation. It is the best and longest lesson, to learne how to die; and of surest vse: which alone if we take not out, it were better not to haue liued. Oh vaine studies of men, how to walke thorough Rome streets all day in the shade, how to square cirles, how to salue vp the celestiall motions, how to correct mis-written copies, to fetch vp old words from forgetfulnesse, and a thousand other like points of idle skill; whiles the maine care of life and death is neglected! There is an Art of this, infallible, eternall both in truth, and vse: for though the meanes bee diuers, yet the last act is still the same, and the disposition of the soule need not be other: it is all one whether a feuer bring it, or a sword; wherein yet, after long profession of other sciences, I am still (why should I shame to confesse?) a learner; and shall be (I hope) whilest I am: yet it shall not repent vs, as diligent schollers repeat their parts vnto each other, to be more perfect; so mutually to recall some of our rules of well-dying: The first whereof is a conscionable life: The next, a right apprehension of life, and death: I tread in the beaten path: doe you follow me. To liue holily, is the way to die safely, happily. If death be terrible, yet innocence is bold, and will neither feare it selfe, nor let vs feare; where contrariwise wickednesse is cowardly, and cannot abide either any glimpse of light, or shew of danger. Hope doth not more draw our eyes forward, then conscience turnes them backward, and forces vs to looke behinde vs; affrighting vs euen with our past euils. Besides the paine of death, euery sinne is a new Fury to torment the soule, and to make it loth to part. How can it chuse, when it sees on the one side, what euill it hath done; on the other, vvhat euill it must suffer? It vvas a cleare heart (what else could doe it?) that gaue so bold a forehead to that holy Bishop, who durst on his death-bed professe, I haue so liued, as I neither feare to die, nor shame to liue. What care we when be found, if well-doing? What care we how suddenly, vvhen our preparation is perpetuall? What care we how violently, vvhen so many inward friends (such are our good actions) giue vs secret comfort? There is no good Steward, but is glad of his Audit; his straight accounts desire nothing more then a discharge: onely the doubtfull and vntrustie feares of his reckoning. Neither onely doth the vvant of integritie make vs timorous, but of wisedome, in that our ignorance cannot equally value, either the life which vve leaue, or the death vve expect. Wee haue long conuersed vvith this life, and yet are vnacquainted: how should wee then know that death we neuer saw? or that life vvhich followes that death?

These cottages haue been ruinous, and wee haue not thought of their fall: our vvay hath beene deepe, and we haue not looked for our rest. Shew mee euer any man that knew vvhat life vvas, and vvas loth to leaue it. I vvill shew you a prisoner that would dwell in his Goale, a slaue that likes to be chained to his Galley. What is there here, but darknesse of ignorance, discomfort of euents, impotency of bodie, vexation of conscience, distemper of passions, complaint of estate, feares and sense of euill, hopes and doubts of good, ambitious rackings, couetous toyles, enuious vnderminings, irkesome disappointments, weary facieties, restlesse desires, and many worlds of discontentments in this one? What wonder is it that we would liue? We laugh at their choice that are in loue with the deformed; and what a face is this we dote vpon? See if sinnes, and cares, and crosses haue not (like a filthy Morphew) ouer-spread it, and made it loathsome to all iudicious eyes. I maruell then, that any wise men could be other but Stoicks, and could haue any conceit of life, but contemptuous; not more for the misery of it, while it lasteth, then for the not lasting: we may loue it, wee cannot hold it. What a shadow of a smoake, what a dreame of a shadow is this, wee affect? Wise Salomon sayes, there is a time to be borne, and a time to dye: you doe not heare him say, a time to liue. What is more flitting then time? Yet life is not long enough to be worthy of the title of time. Death borders vpon our birth, and our cradle stands in our graue. We lament the losse of our parents: how soone shall our sonnes bewaile ours? Loe, I that write this, and you that reade it; how long are we here? It were well, if the world were as our tent, yea as our Inne; if not to lodge, yet to bait in: but now it is onely our thorow-fare, one generation passeth, another commeth; none stayeth. If this earth were a Paradise, and this which we call our life were sweet as the ioyes aboue, yet how should this fickleness of it coole our delight? Grant it absolute; who can esteeme a vanishing pleasure? How much more now, when the drammes of our honey are lost in pounds of gall, when our contentments are as farre from sincerity as continuance? Yet the true apprehension of life (though ioyned with contempt) is not enough to settle vs, if either we be ignorant of death, or ill perswaded: for if life haue not worth enough to allure vs, yet death hath horror enough to affright vs. Hee that would die cheerefully, must know death his friend: what is hee but the faithfull officer of our Maker, who euer smiles or frownes with his Master; neither can either shew or nourish enmitie, where God fauours: when he comes fiercely, and puls a man by the throat, and summons him to Hell, who can but tremble? The messenger is terrible; but the message worse: hence haue risen the miserable despaires, and furious rauing of the ill conscience, that findes no peace within, lesse without. But when he comes sweetly, not as an executioner, but as a guide to glory, and profers his seruice, and shewes our happinesse, and opens the doore to our heauen; how worthy is he of entertainment? how worthy of gratulation? But his salutation is painfull, if courteous, what then? The Physician heales vs, not without paine; and yet wee reward him. It is vnthankfulnesse to complaine, vvhere the answer of profit is excessiue. Death paineth: how long? how much? with what proportion to the sequell of ioy? O death, if thy pangs be grieuous, yet thy rest is sweet. The constant expectation that hath possessed that rest, hath already swallowed those pangs, and makes the Christian at once wholly dead to his paine, wholly aliue to his glory. The soule hath not leysure to care for her suffering, that beholds her crowne; which if shee were conioyned to fetch thorow the flames of hell, her faith would not sticke at the condition.

Thus in briefe, he that liues Christianly, shall dye boldly; he that findes his life short and miserable, shall dye willingly; hee that knowes death, and fore-sees glory, shall die cheerefully and desirously.

EP. III. A diſcourſe of the tryall and choice of the true Religion.

Sir: This Diſcourſe inioyned by you, I ſend to your cenſure, to your diſpoſing; but to the vſe of others. Vpon your charge I haue written it for the wauering. If it ſeeme worthy, communicate it; elſe it is but a daſh of your pen. I feare onely the breuitie: a Volume were too little for this Subiect. It is not more yours, then the Author. Farewell.

WE doe not more affect varietie in all other things, then wee abhorre it in Religion. Euen thoſe which haue held the greateſt falſhoods, hold that there is but one truth. I neuer read of more then one Hereticke, that held all Hereſies true; neither did his opinion ſeeme more incredible, then the relation of it. God can neither be multiplyed, nor Chriſt diuided: if his coat might bee parted, his bodie was intire. For that then all ſides chalenge Truth, and but one can poſſeſſe it; let vs ſee who haue found it, who enioy it.

There are not many Religions that ſtriue for it, tho many opinions. Euery Hereſie, albe fundamentall, makes not a Religion. We ſay not, The Religion of Arrians, Neſtorians, Sabellians, Macedonians, but the ſect or hereſie. No opinion challenges this name in our vſuall ſpeech, (for I diſcuſſe not the proprietie) but that which, ariſing from many differences, hath ſetled it ſelfe in the world, vpon her owne principles, not without an vniuerſall diuiſion. Such may ſoone be counted: Tho it is true, there are by ſo much too many, as there are more then one. Fiue religions then there are by this rule, vpon earth; which ſtand in competition for truth, Iewiſh, Turkiſh, Greekiſh, Papiſh, Reformed; whereof each pleads for it ſelfe, with diſgrace of the other. The plaine Reader doubts, how he may ſit Iudge, in ſo high a plea: God hath put this perſon vpon him; while he chargeth him to try the ſpirits; to retaine the good, reiect the euill: If ſtill he plead with Moſes, inſufficiencie; let him but attend, God ſhall decide the caſe in his ſilence, without difficultie. The Iew hath little to ſay for himſelfe, but impudent denials of our Chriſt, of their Prophecies: whoſe very refuſall of him, more ſtrongly proues him the true Meſsias; neither could he be iuſtified to be that Sauiour, if they reiected him not; ſince the Prophets fore-ſaw and fore-told, not their repelling of him onely, but their reuiling. If there were no more arguments, God hath ſo mightily confuted them from heauen, by the voice of his iudgement, that al the vvorld hiſſeth at their conuiction. Loe, their very ſinne is capitally written in their deſolation, and contempt. One of their owne late Doctors ſeriouſly expoſtulates in a relenting Letter to another of his fellow Rabbins, what might be the cauſe of ſo long and deſperate a ruine of their Iſrael; and comparing their former captiuities with their former ſinnes, argues (and yet feares to conclude) that this continuing puniſhment, muſt needs be ſent for ſome ſinne ſo much greater then Idolatry, Oppreſſion, Sabbath-breaking; by how much this plague is more grieuous then all the other: Which, his feare tels him (and he may beleeue it) can be no other, but the murder, and refuſall of their true Meſſias. Let now all the Doctors of thoſe obſtinate Synagogues, anſwer this doubt of their owne obiecting: But how, paſt all contradiction, is the ancient witneſſe of all the holy Prophets, anſwered and confirmed by their euents? whoſe foreſayings verified verified in all particular issues, are more then demonstratiue. No Art can describe a thing past, with more exactnesse, then they did this Christ to come. What circumstance is there, that hath not his prediction? Haue they not fore-written who should be his mother, A Virgin: Of what Tribe, of Iuda: Of what house, of Dauid; What place, Bethleem: what time, when the scepter should be taken from Iuda: Or after sixtie nine weekes: What name, Iesus, Immanuel: What habitation, Nazareth: What harbinger, Iohn, the second Elias: What his businesse; to preach, saue, deliuer: What entertainment, reiection: What death, the Crosse: What manner, piercing the body, not breaking the bones: What company, amidst two wicked ones: Where, at Ierusalem: Whereabouts, without the Gates: With what words, of imploration: What draught, of Vineger and Gall: who was his Traitor, and with what successe? If all the Synagogues of the Circumcision, all the gates of Hell, can obscure these euidences, let me be a proselyte. My labour herein is so much lesse, as there is lesse danger of Iudaisme. Our Church is well rid of that accursed Nation, whom yet Rome harbors, and, in a fashion, graces; whiles in stead of spitting at, or that their Neapolitan correction whereof Gratian speaks, the Pope solemnly receiues at their hands, that Bible, which they at once approue, and ouerthrow. But would God there were no more Iewes then appeare. Euen in this sense also hee is a Iew, that is one within: plainely, whose heart doth not sincerely confesse his Redeemer. Tho a Christian Iew, is no other then an Atheist; and therfore must be scourged else-where. The Iew thus answered: The Turke stands out for his Mahomet, that cozening Arabian, whose Religion (if it deserue that name) stands vpon nothing but rude ignorance, and palpable Imposture. Yet loe here a subtill Diuell, in a grosse religion: For when he saw that he could not by single twists of Heresie pull downe the well-built walls of the Church; hee windes them all vp in one Cable, to see if his cord of so many folds might happily preuaile: raising vp wicked Mahomet, to deny with Sabellius the distinction of persons, with Arrius Christs diuinity, with Macedonius the Deity of the Holy Ghost, with Sergius two wils in Christ, with Marcion Christs suffering: And these policies seconded with violence, how haue they wasted Christendome? O damnable mixture, miserably successefull! which yet could not haue beene, but that it meets with sottish Clients, and sooths vp nature, and debars both all knowledge, and contraction. What is their Alcoran but a fardle of foolish impossibilities? Whosoeuer shall heare me relate the stories of Angell Adriels death, Seraphuels trumpet, Gabriels bridge, Horroth and Marroths hanging, the Moones descending into Mahomets sleeue, the Litter, wherin he saw God caried by eight Angels, their ridiculous and swinish Paradise, and thousands of the same bran; would say, that Mahomet hoped to meet either with beasts, or mad-men. Besides these barbarous fictions, behold their lawes, full of licence, full of impietie: in which, reuenge is incouraged, multitude of wiues allowed, theft tolerated; and the frame of their opinions such, as well bewrayes their whole religion to be but the mungrell issue of an Arrian, Iew, Nestorian, and Arabian: A monster of many seeds, and all accursed; In both which regards, Nature her selfe, in whose breast God hath written his royall Law (tho in part, by her defaced) hath light enough to condemne a Turke, as the worst Pagan. Let no man looke for further disproofe. These follies, a wise Christian will scorne to confute, and scarce vouchsafe to laugh at.

The Greekish Church (so the Russes tearme themselues) put in the next claime, but with no better successe; whose infinite Clergy affords not a man that can giue either reason or account of their owne doctrine. These are the basest dregs of all Christians, so we fauourably terme them; tho they, perhaps in more simplicitie then wilfulnesse, would admit none of all the other Christian world to their font, but those, who in a solemne renunciation spit at, and abiure their former God, Religion, Baptisme: yet peraduenture wee might more iustly terme them Nicolaitans, for that obscure Saint (if a Saint, if honest) by an vnequall diuision, findes more homage from them then his master. These are as ignorant as Turkes, as idolatrous as Heathens, as obstinate as Iewes, and more superstitious then Papists. To speake ingenuously from that I haue heard and read;

read; if the worſt of the Romiſh religion, and the beſt of the Moſcouitiſh bee compared, the choice will be hard whether ſhould be leſſe ill. I labour the leſſe in all theſe, whoſe remoteneſſe and abſurditie ſecure vs from infection, and whoſe onely name is their confutation. I deſcend to that maine riuall of Truth, which creepes into her boſome, and is not leſſe neere then ſubtle, the religion (if not rather the faction) of Papiſme, whoſe plea is importunate, and ſo much more dangerous, as it caries fairer probability. Since then of all religions the Chriſtian obtaineth, let vs ſee of thoſe that are called Chriſtian, which ſhould command aſſent and profeſſion. Euery religion beares in her lineaments the image of her parent: the true Religion therefore is ſpirituall, and lookes like God in her puritie: all falſe religions are carnall, and carie the face of Nature, their mother, and of him whoſe illuſion begot them, Satan. In ſumme, Nature neuer conceiued any which did not fauour her, nor the ſpirit any which did not oppugne her. Let this then be the Lydian ſtone of this tryall; we need no more. Whether Religion ſoeuer doth more plauſibly content Nature, is falſe; whether giues more ſincere glory to God, is his Truth. Lay aſide preiudice: Whither I beſeech you tendeth all Popery, but to make Nature either vainly proud, or careleſſely wanton? What can more aduance her pride, then to tell her, that ſhe hath in her own hands freedome enough of will (with a little preuention) to prepare her ſelfe to her iuſtification; that ſhe hath (whereof to reioyce) ſome-what, which ſhee hath not receiued; that if God pleaſe but to vnfetter her, ſhe can walke alone? She is inſolent enough of her ſelfe; this flatterie is enough to make her mad of conceit. After this; That if God will but beare halfe the charges by his cooperation, ſhe may vndertake to merit her owne glory, and braue God in the proofe of his moſt accurate iudgement; to fulfill the whole royall law; and that from the ſuperfluitie of her owne ſatisfactions, ſhee may bee abundantly beneficiall to her neighbours; that naturally without faith a man may doe ſome good workes; that we may repoſe confidence in our merits. Neither is our good onely by this flatterie extolled, but our ill alſo diminiſhed; our euils are our ſinnes; ſome of them (they ſay) are in their nature veniall, and not worthy of death; more, that our originall ſinne is but the want of our firſt iuſtice; no guilt of our firſt fathers offence; no inherent ill diſpoſition; and that by Baptiſmall water is taken away what euer hath the nature of ſinne; that a meere man (let mee not wrong Saint Peters ſucceſſor, in ſo tearming him) hath power to remit both puniſhment and ſinne, paſt and future; that many haue ſuffered more then their ſinnes haue required; that the ſufferings of the Saints added to Chriſts paſſions, make vp the treaſure of the Church, that ſpirituall Exchequer; whereof their Biſhop muſt keepe the key, and make his friends. In all theſe the gaine of Nature (who ſees not?) is Gods loſſe: all her brauery is ſtolne from aboue: beſides thoſe other direct derogations from him; that his Scriptures are not ſufficient; that their originall fountaines are corrupted, and the ſtreames runne clearer; that there is a multitude (if a finite number) of Mediators. Turne your eyes now to vs, and ſee contrarily how we abaſe Nature, how wee knead her in the duſt; ſpoiling her of her proud rags, loading her with reproaches; and giuing glory to him, that ſayes, he will not giue it to another; whiles we teach, that we neither haue good, nor can doe good of our ſelues; that we are not ſicke or fettered, but dead in our ſinne; that we cannot moue to good, more then we are moued; that our beſt actions are faulty; our ſatisfactions debts; our deſerts damnation; that all our merit is his mercy that ſaues vs; that euery of our ſinnes is deadly; euery of our natures originally depraued, and corrupted; that no water can entirely waſh away the filthineſſe of our concupiſcence; that none but the blood of him that was God, can cleanſe vs; that all our poſſible ſufferings are below our offences; that Gods written Word is all-ſufficient to informe vs, to make vs both wiſe and perfect; that Chriſts mediation is more then ſufficient to ſaue vs, his ſufferings to redeeme vs, his obedience to inrich vs. You haue ſeene how Papiſtry makes Nature proud; now ſee how it makes her lawleſſe and wanton: while it teacheth (yet this one, not ſo vniuerſally) that Chriſt dyed effectually for all; that in true contrition an expreſſe purpoſe of new life is not neceſſarie;

rie; that wicked men are true members of the C ; that a lewd mis-creant or infidell in the businesse of the Altar partakes of th body and blood of Christ, yea (which a shame to tell) a brute creature; that men may saue the labour of searching, for that it is both easie and safe (with that Catholike Collier) to beleeue with the Church, at a venture: more then so, that deuotion is the seed of ignorance; that there is infallabilitie annexed to a particular place and person; that the bare act of the Sacraments confers grace without faith; that the meere signe of the Crosse made by a Iew or Infidell, is of force to driue away Diuels; that the sacrifice of the Masse in the very worke wrought, auailes to obtaine pardon of our sinnes, not in our life onely, but when we lye frying in purgatory; that we need not pray in faith to be heard, or in vnderstanding; that almes giuen, merit heauen, dispose to iustification, satisfie God for sinne; that abstinence from some meats and drinkes is meritorious; that Indulgences may be granted to dispense vvith all the penance of sinnes afterward to bee committed; that these by a liuing man may be applyed to the dead; that one man may deliuer anothers soule out of his purging torments: and therefore, that hee who vvants not either money or friends; need not feare the smart of his sinnes. O religion, sweet to the wealthy, to the needy desperate! who will now care henceforth how sound his deuotions be, how lewd his life, how hainous his sinnes, that knowes these refuges? On the contrary, we curbe Nature, we restraine, we discourage, we threaten her, teaching her not to rest in implicit faiths, or generall intensions, or external actions of piety, or presumptuous dispensations of men: but to striue vnto sincere faith, without which we haue no part in Christ, in his Church, no benefit by Sacraments, prayers, fastings, beneficences: to set the heart on worke in all our deuotions, without which the hand and tongue are but hypocrites: to set the hands on worke in good actions, without which the presuming heart is but an hypocrite: to expect no pardon for sinne before we commit it, and from Christ alone when wee haue committed it, and to repent before we expect it: to hope for no chaffering, no ransome of our soules from below, no contrary change of estate after dissolution: that life is the time of mercy, death of retribution. Now let me appeale to your soule, and to the iudgement of all the vvorld, whether of these two religions is framed to the humour of Nature: yea let mee but know vvhat action Popery requires of any of her followers, which a meere Naturalist hath not done, cannot doe? See how I haue chosen to beat them with that rod wherewith they thinke we haue so often smarted: for what cauill hath beene more ordinary against vs, then this of ease and liberty, yea licence giuen and taken by our religion? together with the vpbraidings of their owne strict and rigorous austerenesse? Where are our penall workes, our fastings, scourges, haire-cloth, weary pilgrimages, blushing confessions, solemne vowes of willing beggery and perpetuall continencie? To doe them right, we yeeld; in all the hard workes of will-worship they goe beyond vs; but (lest they should insult in the victory) not so much as the Priests of Baal went beyond them. I see their whips: shew me their kniues. Where did euer zealous Romanist lance and carue his flesh in deuotion? The Baalites did it, and yet neuer the wiser, neuer the holier. Either therefore this zeale, in workes of their owne deuising, makes them not better then we, or it makes the Baalites better then they: let them take their choise. Alas, these difficulties are but a colour to auoid greater: No, no, to worke our stubborne wils to subiection, to draw this vntoward flesh to a sincere cheerefulnesse in Gods seruice: to reach vnto a sound beliefe in the Lord Iesus, to pray with a true heart, without distraction, without distrust, without mis-conceit: to keepe the heart in continuall awe of God: These are the hard tasks of a Christian, worthy of our sweat, worthy of our reioycing: all which that Babylonish religion shifteth off with a careless fashionablenesse, as if it had not to doe with the soule. Giue vs obedience: let them take sacrifice. Doe you yet looke for more euidence? looke into particulars, and satisfie your selfe in Gods decision, as Optatus aduised of old. Since the goods of our father are in question, whither should we goe but to his Will and Testament? My soule beare the danger of this bold assertion. If we erre, wee erre with Christ and his Apostles.

Ep. IV. A diſcourſe of the hardneſſe of Chriſtianity, and the abundant recompence of the pleaſures and commodities of that profeſſion.

HOw hard a thing it is (deare Vncle) to be a Chriſtian! perhaps others are leſſe dull, and more quiet; more waxen to the impreſſions of grace, and leſſe troubleſome to themſelues; I accuſe none, but whom I dare, my ſelfe. Euen eaſie buſineſſes are hard to the weake: let others boaſt, I muſt complaine. To keepe our ſtation is hard; harder to moue forward. One while I ſcarce reſtraine my vnruly deſires, from euill; ofter, can find no luſt to good. My heart will either be vaine, or ſullen: when I am wrought with much ſweat to deteſt ſinne, and diſtaſte the world, yet who ſhall raiſe vp this droſſe to a ſpirituall ioy? Sometimes I purpoſe vvell; and if thoſe thoughts (not mine) begin to lift me from my earth; loe, he that rules in the aire, ſtoopes vpon me with powerfull tentations, or the vvorld puls me downe with a ſweet violence; ſo as I know not vvhether I be forced, or perſwaded to yeeld; I finde much weakeneſſe in my ſelfe, but more treachery. How vvilling am I to be deceiued! How loth to bee altered! Good duties ſeeme harſh, and can hardly eſcape the repulſe, or delay of excuſes; and not without much ſtrife grow to any reliſh of pleaſure; and vvhen they are at beſt, cannot auoid the mixture of many infirmities: which doe at once diſquiet, and diſcourage the mind, not ſuffering it to reſt in vvhat it vvould haue done, and could not. And if after many ſighes and teares, I haue attained to doe well, and reſolue better; yet this good eſtate is farre from conſtant, and eaſily inclining to change. And whiles I ſtriue, in ſpight of my naturall fickleneſſe, to hold my owne vvith ſome progreſſe, and gaine; vvhat difficultie doe I finde, vvhat oppoſition? O God, what aduerſaries haſt thou prouided for vs vveake men! what incounters! Malicious and ſubtill ſpirits, an alluring vvorld, a ſerpentine and ſtubborne nature: Force and fraud doe their vvorſt to vs; ſometimes becauſe they are ſpirituall enemies, I ſee them not, and complaine to feele them too late: Other-whiles my ſpirituall eyes ſee them with amazement, and I (like a cowardly Iſraelite) am ready to flee, and plead their meaſure, for my feare: Who is able to ſtand before the ſonnes of Anak? Some other times I ſtand ſtill, and (as I can) weakely reſiſt; but am foiled with indignation, and ſhame. Then againe I riſe vp, not without baſhfulneſſe and ſcorne: and vvith more hearty reſiſtance preuaile, and triumph, when ere long, ſurprized with a ſudden and vnwarned aſſault, I am caried away captiue, whither I vvould not: and mourning for my diſcomfiture, ſtudy for a feeble reuenge: My quarrell is good, but my ſtrength maintaines it not; It is now long ere I can recouer this ouerthrow, and finde my ſelfe whole of theſe wounds. Beſides ſuggeſtions, croſſes fall heauy, and worke no ſmall diſtemper in a minde faint and vnſetled, vvhoſe law is ſuch, that the more I grow, the more I beare; and not ſeldome, when God giues me reſpite, I afflict my ſelfe: either my feare faineth euils, or my vnruly paſſions raiſe tumults vvithin me, vvhich breed much trouble, whether in ſatisfying or ſuppreſſing: not to ſpeake, that ſinne is attended, beſides vnquietneſſe, vvith terror.

Now you ſay; Alas! Chriſtianitie is hard: I grant it; but gainfull and happy. I contemne the difficultie, when I reſpect the aduantage. The greateſt labours that haue anſwerable requitals, are leſſe then the leaſt that haue no regard. Beleeue me, when when I looke to the reward, I would not haue the worke easier. It is a good Master whom we serue, who not onely payes, but giues; not after the proportion of our earnings, but of his owne mercy. If euery paine that wee suffer were a death, and euery crosse an hell, we haue amends enough. It were iniurious to complaine of the measure, when we acknowledge the recompence. Away with these weake dislikes: tho I should buy it dearer, I would be a Christian. Any thing may make me out of loue with my selfe, nothing with my profession: I were vnworthy of this fauour if I could repent to haue endured: herein alone I am safe, herein I am blessed. I may be all other things, and yet with that dying Emperor complaine, with my last breath, That I am no whit the better: let me be a Christian, I am priuiledged from miseries; hell cannot touch me, death cannot hurt me. No euill can arrest me while I am vnder the protection of him, which ouer-rules all good and euill: yea so soone as it touches mee, it turnes good; and being sent and suborned by my spirituall aduersaries to betray mee, now in an happy change it fights for me, and is driuen rather to rebell, then wrong mee. It is a bold and strange word: No price could buy of me the gaine of my sinnes: That, which while I repented, I would haue expiated with blood; now after my repentance I forgoe not for a world; the fruit of hauing sinned (if not rather, of hauing repented.) Besides my freedome, how large is my possession? All good things are mine, to challenge, to enioy. I cannot looke beyond my owne, nor besides it; and the things that I cannot see, I dare claime no lesse. The heauen that rowles so gloriously about my head is mine, by this right: yea, those celestiall spirits, the better part of that high creation, watch me in my bed, guard me in my wayes, shelter me in my dangers, comfort me in my troubles, and are ready to receiue that soule which they haue kept.

What speake I of creatures? The God of spirits is mine: and by a sweet and secret vnion I am become an heire of his glory, yea (as it were) a limme of himselfe. O blessednesse! worthy of difficulty, worthy of paine. What thou wilt, Lord, so I may be thine, what thou wilt. When I haue done all, when I haue suffered all, thou exceedest more then I want. Follow me then, deare Vncle: or (if you will) leade me rather (as you haue done) in these steps; and from the rough way, looke to the end: Ouer-looke these trifling grieuances, and fasten your eyes vpon the happy recompence; and see if you cannot scorne to complaine. Pitie those that take not your paines; and persist with courage till you feele the weight of your Crowne.

Ep. V. Expostulating the cause of his vnsetlednesse in Religion, which is pleaded to be our dissensions: shewing the insufficiencie of that Motiue, and comparing the state of our Church herein, with the Romish.

I Would I knew where to finde you: then I could tell how to take a direct ayme; whereas now I must roue, and coniecture. To day you are in the tents of the Romanists; to morrow in ours; the next day betweene both, against both. Our aduersaries thinke you ours, we theirs, your conscience findes you with both, and neither. I flatter you not: this of yours is the worst of all tempers: heat and cold haue their vses; luke-warmnesse is good for nothing, but to trouble the stomacke. Those that are spiritually hot, finde acceptation; those that are starke cold, haue a lesser reckoning; the meane betweene both, is so much worse, as it comes neerer to good, and attaines it not.

How

How long wilt you halt in this indifferency? Resolue one way, and know at last what you doe hold; what you should. Cast off either your wings or your teeth; and loathing this Bat-like nature, be either a bird or a beast. To dye wauering and vncertaine, your selfe will grant fearfull. If you must settle, when begin you? If you must beginne, why not now? It is dangerous deferring that, whose want is deadly, and whose opportunity is doubtfull. God cryeth with Iehu, Who is on my side, who? Looke at last out of your window to him, and in a resolute courage cast downe this Iezabel that hath bewitched you. Is there any impediment, which delay will abate? Is there any which a iust answer cannot remoue? If you had rather wauer, who can settle you? But if you loue not inconstancy, tell vs why you stagger. Bee plaine, or else you will neuer bee firme: What hinders you? Is it our diuisions: I see you shake your head at this, and by your silent gesture bewray this the cause of your distaste: Would God I could either deny this with truth, or amend it with teares: But I grant it, with no lesse sorrow, then you with offence. This earth hath nothing more lamentable, then the ciuill jarres of one faith. What then? Must you defie your mother, because you see your brethren fighting? Their dissension is her griefe: Must she lose some sonnes, because some others quarrell? Doe not so wrong your selfe in afflicting her. Will you loue Christ the lesse, because his coat is diuided? Yea, let mee bodly say; The hemme is torne a little, the garment is whole; or rather it is fretted a little, not torne; or rather the fringe, not the hem. Behold, here is one Christ, one Creed, one Baptisme, one Heauen, one way to it; in summe, one religion, one foundation, and (take away the tumultuous spirits of some rigorous Lutherans) one heart: our differences are those of Paul and Barnabas; not those of Peter and Magus: if they be some, it is well they are no more; if many, that they are not capitall. Shew me that Church, that hath not complained of distraction; yea that family, yea that fraternity, yea that man that alwayes agrees with himselfe. See if the Spouse of Christ, in that heauenly mariage song, doe not call him, a young Hart in the mountaines of diuision. Tell me then, whither wil you go for truth, if you will allow no truth, but where there is no diuision? To Rome perhaps, famous for vnitie, famous for peace. See now how happily you haue chosen, how well you haue sped: Loe, there Cardinall Bellarmine himselfe, a witnesse aboue exception, vnder his owne hand acknowledgeth to the world, and reckons vp 237 contrarieties of doctrine among the Romish Diuines. VVhat need we more euidence? O the perfect accordance of Peters See! worthy to be recorded for a badge of truth. Let now all our aduersaries scrape together so many contradictions of opinions amongst vs, as they confesse amongst themselues, and be you theirs. No, they are not more peaceable, but more subtle; they haue not lesse dissension, but more smothered. They fight closely within doores, without noyse; all our frayes are in the field: would God wee had as much of their cunning, as they want of our peace; and no more of their policy, then they want of our truth. Our strife is in ceremonies, theirs substance; ours in one or two points, theirs in all. Take it boldly from him that dares auouch it, there is not one point in all Diuinity (except those wherein we accord with them) wherein they all speak the same. If our Church displease you for differences, theirs much more; vnlesse you will be either wilfully incredulous, or wilfully partiall: vnlesse you dislike a mischiefe the lesse for the secrecy. VVhat will you doe then? VVill you be a Church alone? Alas, how full are you of contradictions to your selfe! how full of contrary purposes! how oft doe you chide with your selfe! how oft doe you fight with your selfe! I appeale to that bosome which is priuy to those secret combats: beleeue me not, if euer you find perfect vnity any where but aboue: either goe thither, and seeke it amongst those that triumph, or be content with what estate you finde in this warfaring number. Truth is in differences, as gold in drosse, wheat in chaffe; will you cast away the best mettall, the best graine, because it is mingled with this offall? VVill you rather bee poore and hungry, then bestow labour on the fanne, or the furnace? Is there nothing worth your respect, but peace? I haue heard that the interlacing of discords graces the best musick; and I know not whether the very euill spirits agree not with themselues. If the body be ſound, what though the coat be torne? or if the garment be whole, what if the lace be vnript? Take you peace: let me haue truth; I cannot haue both. To conclude: Embrace thoſe truths that we all hold; and it greatly matters not what you hold in thoſe wherein we differ: and if you loue your ſafety, ſeeke rather grounds whereon to reſt, then excuſes for your vnreſt. If euer you looke to gaine by the truth, you muſt boe chuſe it, and cleaue to it: Meere reſolution is not enough; except you will rather loſe your ſelfe then it.

To Sir Edmvnd Lvcy.

Epist. VI. Diſcourſing of the different degrees of heauenly glory; and of our mutuall knowledge of each other aboue.

AS thoſe which neuer were at home, now after much heare-ſay trauelling toward it, aske in the way, What manner of houſe it is, what ſeat, what frame, what ſoile; ſo doe we in the paſſage to our glory: we are all pilgrimes thither; yet ſo; as that ſome haue lookt into it afarre through the open windowes of the Scripture. Goe to then: whiles others are enquiring about worldly dignities, and earthly pleaſures, let vs two ſweetly conſult of the eſtate of our future happineſſe; yet without preſumption, without curioſitie. Amongſt this infinite choice of thoughts, it hath pleaſed you to limit our diſcourſe to two heads. You aske firſt, if the ioyes of the glorified Saints ſhall differ in degrees. I feare not to affirme it. There is one life of all, one felicity; but diuers meaſures. Our heauen beginnes here, and here varies in degrees. One Chriſtian enioyes God aboue another, according as his grace, as his faith is more: and heauen is ſtill like it ſelfe, not other aboue from that beneath. As our grace begins our glory, ſo it proportions it: Bleſſednеſſe ſtands in the perfect operation of the beſt faculties, about the perfectеſt obiect; that is, in the viſion, in the fruition of God. All his Saints ſee him, but ſome more clearly; as the ſame Sunne is ſeene of all eyes, not with equall ſtrength. Such as the eye of our faith was to ſee him that is inuiſible, ſuch is the eye of our preſent apprehenſion to ſee as we are ſeene. Who ſees not, that our rewards are according to our workes? not for them, as on merit (woe be to that ſoule which hath but what it earneth) but after them, as their rule of proportion: and theſe, how ſenſibly vnequall! One giues but a cup of cold water to a diſciple, another giues his blood for the maſter. Different workes haue different wages, not of deſert, but of mercy. Fiue talents well imployed, carry away more recompence then two; yet both approued, both rewarded with their Maſters ioy. Who can ſticke at this, that knowes thoſe heauenly ſpirits (to whom we ſhall be like) are marſhalled by their Maker into ſeuerall rankes? He that was rapt into their element, and ſaw their bleſſed orders, as from his owne knowledge, hath ſtiled them, Thrones, Principalities, Powers, Dominions. If in one part of this Celeſtiall Family, the great Houſholder hath thus ordered it, why not in the other? yea euen in this he hath inſtanced; You ſhall ſit on twelue Thrones, and iudge the twelue Tribes of Iſrael. If he meane not ſome preheminence to his Apoſtles, how doth he anſwer, how doth he ſatisfie them? Yet more: Lazarus is in Abrahams boſome; therefore Abraham is more honoured then Lazarus. I ſhall need no moe proofes, if from heauen you ſhall looke down into the great Gulfe, and there ſee diuerſity of torments according to the value of ſinnes. Equality of offences, you acknowledge an idle Paradoxe of the Stoicks: to hold vnequall ſinnes equally puniſhed, were more abſurd, and more iniurious to

Gods

Gods iuſtice: There is but one fire, which yet otherwiſe burnes the ſtraw, otherwiſe wood and iron. He that made and commands this dungeon, theſe tortures, tells vs that the wilfully diſobedient ſhall ſmart with moe ſtripes; the ignorant with fewer. Yet ſo conceiue of theſe heauenly degrees, that the leaſt is glorious. So do theſe veſſels differ, that all are full: there is no want in any, no enuy. Let vs ſtriue for a place, not ſtriue for the order: how can we wiſh to be more then happy?

Your other queſtion is of our mutuall knowledge aboue; the hope whereof (you thinke) would giue much contentment to the neceſſity of our parture: for both wee are loth not to know thoſe whom we loue, and wee are glad to thinke wee ſhall know them happy: whereof (if it may comfort you) I am no leſſe confident. If I may not goe ſo far, as with the beſt of the Fathers, to ſay we ſhall know one anothers thoughts, I dare ſay, our perſons we ſhall; our knowledge, our memory, are not there loſt, but perfected: yea, I feare not to ſay we ſhall know both our miſeries paſt, and the preſent ſufferings of the damned. It makes our happineſſe not a little the ſweeter, to know that we were miſerable, to know that others are and muſt bee miſerable: wee ſhall know them; not feele them. Take heed, that you clearly diſtinguiſh betwixt ſpeculation and experience. We are then farre out of the reach of euils. We may ſee them to comfort vs, not to affect vs. Who doubts that theſe eyes ſhall ſee, and know the glorious manhood of our bleſſed Sauiour, aduanced aboue all the powers of heauen? And if one body, why not more? And if our elder brother, why no more of our ſpirituall fraternity? Yea if the twelue thrones of thoſe Iudges of Iſrael ſhall be conſpicuous; how ſhall wee not acknowledge them? And if theſe, who ſhall reſtraine vs from more? You will eaſily grant, that our loue can neuer faile: Faith and hope giue place to ſight, to preſent fruition; for theſe are of things not ſeene: but loue is perpetuall, not of God only, but his Saints: For nothing ceaſes, but our earthly parts, nothing but what ſauors of corruption. Chriſtian loue is a grace, and may well chalenge a place in heauen: and what loue is there, of what we know not? More plainly; If the three Diſciples in Tabor knew Moſes and Elias, how much more ſhall we know them in Gods Sion? Laſtly, (for it is a letter, not a volume, that I intended in this not neceſſary, but likely diſcourſe) that famous parable can tell you, that thoſe which are in hell, may know ſingular and ſeuerall perſons, though diſtant in place. The rich Glutton knowes Lazarus and Abraham. I heare what you ſay; It is but a parable: neither will I preſſe you with the contrary authority of Ambroſe, Tertullian, Gregory, Hierome, or any Father; nor with that vniuerſall rule of Chryſoſtome, that thoſe onely are parables, where examples are expreſſed, and names concealed: I yeeld it; yet all holy parables haue their truths, at leaſt their probabilities. Deny this, and you diſable their vſe, wrong their Author. Our Sauiour neuer ſaid ought was done, that cannot be: and ſhall then the damned retaine ought, which the glorified loſe? No man euer held that the ſoule was aduantaged by torment. Comfort you therefore in this; you ſhall know and be knowne. But farre be from hence all carnall and earthly thoughts; as if your affections ſhould be (as below) doubled to your wife or child. Nature hath no place in glory: here is no reſpect of blood, none of mariage. This groſſer aquaintance and pleaſure is for the Paradiſe of Turkes, not the Heauen of Chriſtians. Here is, as no mariage, (ſaue betwixt the Lambe and his Spouſe the Church) ſo no matrimoniall affections. You ſhall reioyce in your glorified child; not as your child, but as glorified. In briefe, let vs ſo enquire of our company, that aboue all things we ſtriue to be there our ſelues, where we are ſure, if we haue not what we imagined, we ſhall haue more then we could imagine.

To Mr T. L.

EP. VII. Concerning the matter of diuorce in case of apparant adultery, aduising the innocent party of the fitteſt courſe in that behalfe.

ALL intermedling is attended with danger; and euer ſo much more, as the band of the parties contending, is nearer and ſtraiter: how can it then want perill, to iudge betwixt thoſe which are, or ſhould bee one fleſh? yet great neceſsities require hazard. My profeſsion would iuſtly checke me, if I preferred not your conſcience to my owne loue. I pity and lament, that your owne boſome is falſe to you; that your ſelfe with ſhame, and with ſin, are pulled from your ſelfe, & giuen to whom you would not: An iniury that cannot be parallelled vpon earth; and ſuch as may without our wonder, diſtract you: ſleight croſſes are digeſted with ſtudy, and reſolution; greater, with time; the greateſt, not without ſtudy, time, counſell. There is no extreame euill, whoſe euaſions are not perplexed. I ſee here miſchiefe on either hand: I ſee you beſet, not with griefes onely, but dangers. No man euer more truly held a wolfe by the eare; which he can neither ſtay, nor let goe with ſafety. Gods ancient law would haue made a quicke diſpatch, and haue determined the caſe, by the death of the offender, and the liberty of the innocent; and not it alone. How many Heathen Law-giuers haue ſubſcribed to Moſes? Arabians, Grecians, Romans, yea very Gothes, the dregs of Barbariſme, haue thought this wrong not expiable, but by blood. With vs, the eaſineſſe of reuenge, as it yeelds frequence of offences, ſo multitude of doubts: Whether the wronged husband ſhould conceale, or complaine: complaining, whether he ſhould retaine or diſmiſſe: diſmiſſing, whether he may marry, or muſt continue ſingle: not continuing ſingle, whether he may receiue his own, or chuſe another: but your inquiries ſhall be my bounds. The fact (you ſay) is too euident. Let me aske you; To your ſelfe, or to the world. This point alone muſt vary our proceedings. Publike notice requires publike diſcharge. Priuate wrongs are in our owne power: publike, in the hands of authority. The thoughts of our owne breſts, while they ſmother themſelues within vs, are at our command, whether for ſuppreſſing, or expreſſing; but if they once haue vented themſelues by words, vnto others eares, now (as common ſtrayes) they muſt ſtand to the hazard of cenſure: ſuch are our actions. Neither the ſword, nor the keyes meddle within doores, & what but they vvithout? If fame haue laid hold on the wrong, proſecute it, cleere your name, cleere your houſe, yea Gods. Elſe you ſhall be reputed a Pandar to your owne bed: and the ſecond ſhame ſhall ſurpaſſe the firſt, ſo much as your owne fault can more blemiſh you, then anothers. If there were no more; he is cruelly mercifull, that neglects his owne fame. But what if the ſinne were ſhrouded in ſecrecy? The loathſomneſſe of vice conſiſts not in common knowledge. It is no leſſe hainous, if leſſe talked of. Report giues but ſhame: God and the good ſoule deteſt cloſe euils. Yet then I ask not of the offence, but of the offender; not of her crime, but her repentance. She hath ſinned againſt heauen, and you. But hath ſhe waſhed your polluted bed with her teares? Hath her true ſorrow beene no leſſe apparant then her ſinne? Hath ſhe peeced her old vow with new proteſtations of fidelity? Do you find her at once humbled and changed? Why ſhould that eare be deafe to her prayers, that was open to her accuſation? why is there not yet place for mercy? Why doe we Chriſtians liue as vnder Martiall law, wherein we ſinne but once? Plead not authority: Ciuilians haue beene too rigorous: the mercifull ſentence of Diuinity, ſhal ſweetly temper humane ſeuereneſs. How many haue we known the better for their ſinne? That Magdalene (her predeceſſor in filthineſſe) had neuer loued ſo much, if ſhe had not ſo much ſinned. How oft hath Gods Spouſe deſerued a diuorce? which yet ſtill her confeſſions, her teares haue reuerſed. How oft hath that ſcroll beene written, and ſigned; and yet againe cancelled, and torne, vpon ſubmiſſion? His actions, not his words onely, are our precepts: Why is man cruell, where God relents? The wrong is ours onely, for his ſake; without whoſe law, were no ſinne. If the Creditor pleaſe to remit the debt, doe ſtanders-by complaine? But if ſhe be at once filthy, and obſtinate, flie from her bed, as contagious. Now your beneuolence is adultery; you impart your body to her, ſhe her ſinne to you: A dangerous exchange; An honeſt body for an harlots ſinne: Herein you are in cauſe that ſhe hath more then one adulterer. I applaud the rigour of thoſe ancient Canons, which haue ſtill roughly cenſured euen this cloake of vice: As there is neceſſity of charity in the former, ſo of iuſtice in this. If you can ſo loue your wife, that you deteſt not her ſin, you are a better husband then a Chriſtian, a better bawd then an husband. I dare ſay no more vpon ſo generall a relation; good Phyſitians in dangerous diſeaſes dare not preſcribe on bare ſight of vrine, or vncertaine report, but will feele the pulſe, and ſee the ſymptomes, ere they reſolue on the receit. You ſee how no niggard I am of my counſels: would God I could as eaſily aſſwage your griefe, as ſatisfie your doubts.

the

To M. Robert Hay.

Epist. VIII. A Diſcourſe of the continuall exerciſe of a Chriſtian, how he may keepe his heart from hardneſſe, and his wayes from error.

TO keepe the heart in vre with God, is the higheſt taske of a Chriſtian. Good motions are not frequent: but the conſtancy of good diſpoſition is rare and hard. This worke muſt be continuall, or elſe ſpeedeth not: like as the body from a ſetled and habituall diſtemper muſt be recouered by long diets; and ſo much the rather, for that we cannot intermit here without relapſes. If this field be not tilled euery day, it will runne out into thiſtles. The euening is fitteſt for this worke: when retyred into our ſelues, we muſt cheerefully, and conſtantly, both looke vp to God, and into our hearts; as we haue to doe with both: to God in thankſgiuing firſt, then in requeſt. It ſhall be therefore expedient for the ſoule, duly to recount to it ſelfe all the ſpecialties of Gods fauours: a confuſed thankes fauours of careleſneſſe, and neither doth affect vs, nor win acceptance aboue. Bethinke your ſelfe then of all theſe externall, inferiour, earthly graces: that your being, breathing, life, motion, reaſon, is from him; that hee hath giuen you a more noble nature, then the reſt of the creatures, excellent faculties of the mind, perfection of ſenſes, ſoundneſſe of body, competency of eſtate, ſeemlineſſe of condition, fitneſſe of calling, preſeruation from dangers, reſcue out of miſeries, kindneſſe of friends, carefulneſſe of education, honeſty of reputation, liberty of recreations, quietneſſe of life, opportunity of well-doing, protection of Angels. Then riſe higher to his ſpirituall fauours, tho here on earth, and ſtriue to raiſe your affections with your thoughts: Bleſſe God that you were borne in the light of the Goſpell, for your profeſſion of the truth, for the honor of your vocation, for your incorporating into the Church, for the priuiledge of the Sacraments, the free vſe of the Scriptures, the communion of Saints, the benefit of their prayers, the ayde of their counſels, the pleaſure of their conuerſation; for the beginnings of regeneration, any foot-ſteps of faith, hope, loue, zeale, patience, peace, ioy, conſcionableneſſe, for any deſire of more. Then let your ſoule mount higheſt of all, into her heauen, and acknowledge thoſe celeſtiall graces of her election to glory, redemption from ſhame and death, of the interceſſion of her Sauiour, of the preparation of her place; and there let her ſtay a while vpon the meditation of her future ioyes. This done, the way is made for your requeſt; Sue now to your God; as for grace to anſwer theſe mercies, ſo to ſee wherein you haue not anſwered them: From him therefore caſt your eyes downe vpon your ſelfe: and as ſome carefull Iuſticer doth a ſuſpected fellon, ſo doe you ſtrictly examine your heart, of what you haue done that day; of what you ſhould haue done; enquire whether your thoughts haue beene ſequeſtred to God, ſtrangers from the world, fixed on heauen; whether iuſt, charitable, lowly, pure, Chriſtian; whether your ſenſes haue beene holily guided, neither to let in temptations, nor to let out ſinnes; whether your ſpeeches haue not beene offenſiue, vaine, raſh, indiſcreet, vnſauoury, vnedifying; whether your actions haue beene warrantable, expedient, comely, profitable. Thence, ſee if you haue beene negligent in watching your heart, expence of your time, exerciſes of deuotion, performance of good workes, reſiſtance of temptations, good vſe of good examples: and compare your preſent eſtate with the former: looke iealouſly, whether your ſoule hath gained or loſt; loſt ought of the heat of her loue, tenderneſſe of conſcience, feare to offend, ſtrength of vertue; gained, more increaſe of grace, more aſſurance of glory. And when you find (alas! who can but find?) either holineſſe decayed, or euill done, or good omitted, caſt downe your eyes, ſtrike your breſt, humble your ſoule, and ſigh to him whom you haue offended; ſue for pardon as for life, heartily, yearningly: inioyne your ſelfe carefull amendment, redouble your holy reſolutions, ſtrike hands with God in a new couenant: my ſoule for your ſafety. Much of this good counſell I confeſſe to haue learned from the Table of an vnknown Author, at Antwerp. It contented me: and therefore I haue thus made it (by many alterations) my owne for forme, and yours for the vſe: Our practice ſhall both commend it, and make vs happy.

To Mr. I. F. one of the company of the Turkiſh Merchants.

EP. IX. Diſcourſing of the lawfulneſſe of converſation and trade with Infidels and Hereticks, and ſhewing how farre and wherein it is allowable.

IN matter of ſinne I dare not diſcommend much feare. Looſeneſſe is both a more ordinary fault, and more dangerous, then exceſſe of care: yet herein the minde may be vniuſtly tortured, and ſuffer without gaine. It is good to know our bounds, and keep them; that ſo we may neither be careleſly offenſiue, nor needleſly afflicted. How farre we may trauell to, and converſe with Infidels, with Hereticks, is a long demand, and cannot be anſwered at once. I ſee extreams on both hands, and a path of truth betwixt both, of no ſmall latitude. Firſt, I commend not this courſe to you; it is well, if I allow it. The earth is large, and truth hath ample Dominions; and thoſe not incommodious, not vnpleaſant. To neglect the maine bleſſings with competency of the inferiour; for abundance of the inferiour, without the maine, were a choice vnwiſe and vnequall. While we are free, who would take ought but the beſt? Whither goe you? Haue we not as temperate a Sunne, as faire an Heauen, as fertile an Earth, as rich a Sea, as ſweet Companions? What ſtand I on equality? a firmer peace, a freer Goſpell, an happier gouernment then the world can ſhew you? yet you muſt goe: I giue you allowance; but limited, and full of cautions: like an inquiſitiue Officer, you muſt let me aske, who, how, when, whither, why, how long, and accordingly determine. To communicate with them in their falſe ſeruices, who will not ſpit at, as impious? We ſpeake of converſing with men, not with idolatries: ciuilly, not in Religion: not in workes of darkneſſe, neſſe, but buſineſſe of commerce and common indifferencies. Fie on thoſe Riunmonites, that plead an vpright ſoule in a proſtrate body: Hypocrites, that pretend a Nathanael in the skin of a Nicodemus. God hates their ſecret halting, and will reuenge it. Let goe their vices, and ſpeake of their perſons: Thoſe may bee conuerſed with; not with familiarity, not with intireneſſe; as men qualified, not as friends. Traffique is here allowed, not amity; not friendſhip, but peace. Paul will allow you to feaſt at their table, not to frequent it: yet not this to all. Chriſtianity hath all ſtatures in it, all ſtrengths: children, and men, weaklings, Gyants. For a feeble vngrounded Chriſtian, this verie company is dangerous: ſafe for the ſtrong and inſtructed. Turne a child looſe into an Apothecaries ſhop, or an Idiot, that gally-pot which lookes faireſt, ſhall haue his firſt hand, tho full of poyſonous drugs: where the iudicious would chooſe the wholeſomeſt, led not by ſenſe, but skill. Setledneſſe in the truth will cauſe vs to hate and ſcorne ridiculous impiety: and that hate will ſettle vs the more; where the vnſtayed may grow to leſſe diſlike, and indanger his owne infection. He had need bee a reſolute Caleb that ſhould goe to ſee the land of Canaan; yet not ſuch a one, vpon euery occaſion: meere pleaſure or curioſity I dare not allow in this aduenture. The command of authority, or neceſſity of traffique, I cannot reiect: Or if after ſufficient preuention, deſire to informe our ſelues thorowly in a forraine Religion, or ſtate (eſpecially for publike vſe) cary vs abroad, I cenſure not. In all matter of danger, a calling is a good warrant; and it cannot want perill to goe vnſent: Neither is there ſmall weight in the quality of the place, and continuance of the time. It is one caſe where the profeſſion of our religion is free, another where reſtrained; perhaps not without conſtraint to idolatry: where wee haue meanes for our ſoules, and allowed Miniſtery, the cauſe muſt needs differ from a place of neceſſary blindneſs, of peeuiſh ſuperſtition. To paſſe thorow an infected place is one thing, to dwell in it another: Each of theſe giue a new ſtate to the cauſe, and look for a diuerſe anſwer. But as in all theſe outward actions, ſo here, moſt force (I confeſſe) lies in the intention; which is able to giue not toleration onely, to our trauell, but praiſe. To conuerſe with them without, but in a purpoſe of their conuerſion, and with endeuour to fetch them in, can be no other then an holy courſe: wherein that the Ieſuits haue beene (by their owne ſaying) more ſeruiceable in their Indies and China; let them thank (after their number and leiſure) their ſhelter of Spaine: the opportunity of whoſe patronage hath preferred them to vs; not their more forward deſires. In ſhort, companying with Infidels may not be ſimply condemned; who can hold ſo, that ſees Lot in Sodō, Iſrael with the Ægyptians, Abraham & Iſaac with their Abimelechs; Roſes among thornes, and pearles among much mud; and, for all, Chriſt among Publicans & Sinners? ſo we neither be infected by them, nor they further infected by our confirmation; nor the weake Chriſtian by vs infected with offence, nor the Goſpel infected with reproch, what danger can there be? If neither we, nor they, nor the weake, nor (which is higheſt) the name of God be wronged, who can complaine? You haue mine opinion; diſpoſe now of your ſelfe as you dare: The earth is the Lords, and you are his; whereſoeuer he ſhall find you, be ſure you ſhall find him euery-where.

To the Gentlemen of his Highneſſe Court.

Ep. X. A deſcription of a good and faithfull Courtier.

WHiles I aduentured other Characters into the light, I reſerued one for you; whom I account no ſmall part of my ioy; The Character of What you are, of What you ſhould be: Not that I arrogate to my ſelfe, more then ordinary skill in theſe high points: I deſire not to deſcribe a Courtier; How ſhould I, that haue but ſeene and and saluted the seat of Princes? Or why should I, whose thoughts are sequestred to the Court of heauen? But if I would decypher a good Courtier, who can herein controll my endeauor? Goodnesse in all formes is but the iust subiect of our profession: what my obseruation could not, no lesse certaine rule shall afford me. Our Discourse hath this freedome, that it may reach beyõd our eyes with beleefe. If your experience agree not with my speculation, distrust me. I care not for their barking, which condemne me, at first, of incongruity: as if these two tearmes were so dissonant, that one sentence could not hold them. The Poet slanders, that abandons all good men from Courts. Who knowes not that the Ægyptian Court had a Moses; the Court of Samaria, an Obadiah; of Ierusalem an Ebed-melech; of Damascus a Naaman; of Babylon a Daniel; of Æthiopia a good Treasurer; and very Nero's Court in Pauls time, his Saints? That I may not tell, how the Courts of Christian Princes haue beene likened by our Ecclesiasticall Historians, to some royall Colledges for their order, grauity, goodnes mixed with their Maiesty; and that I may willingly forbeare to compare (as, but for enuy, I durst) yours with theirs; I speake boldly, the Court is as nigh to heauen as the Cell, and doth no lesse require and admit strict holinesse. I banish therefore hence all impietie, and dare presage his ruine, whose foundation is not laid in goodnesse. Our Courtier is no other then vertuous, and serues the God of heauen as his first Maker, and from him deriues his duty to these earthen gods; as one that knowes the thrones of heauen and earth are not contrary, but subordinate, and that best obedience springs from deuotion: his ability and will haue both conspired to make him perfectly seruiceable, and his diligence waits but for an opportunity. In the factions of some great riuals of honour, he holds himselfe in a free neutrality, accounting it safer in vniust frayes to look on, then to strike; and if necessity of occasion will needs wind him into the quarrell, he chuses not the stronger part, but the better; resoluing rather to fall with innocence and truth, then to stand with powerfull iniustice. In the changes of fauours and frowns he changeth not; his sincere honesty beares him thorow all alterations, with wise boldnesse, if not with successe: and when hee spies clouds in the eyes of his Prince (which of long he will not seeme to see) his cleare heart giues him a cleare face; and if he may be admitted, his loyall breath shall soone dispell those vapours of ill suggestion: but if after all attempts of wind and sunne he sees them setled, and the might of his accusers will not let him seeme as he is; he giues way in silence, without stomach, and waits vpon Time. He is not ouer-hastily intent vpon his owne promotion; as one that seekes his Prince, not himselfe; and studies more to deserue then rise, scorning either to grow great by his owne bribes, or rich by the bribes of others. His officious silence craues more then others words; and if that language be not heard, nor vnderstood, hee opens his mouth, yet late and sparingly; without bashfulnesse, without importunity; caring onely to motion, not caring to plead. He is affable and courteous; not vainly popular, abasing his Princes fauour to wooe the worthlesse applause of the vulgar; approuing by his actions that he seekes one, not many; if not rather one in many. His Alphabet is his Princes disposition; which once learned, hee plies with diligent seruice, not with flattery; not commending euery action as good, nor the best too much, and in presence. When hee finds an apparant growth of fauour, hee dares not glory in it to others, lest he should solicite their enuy, and hazard the shame of his owne fall; but enioyes it in quiet thankfulnesse: not neglecting it, nor drawing it on too fast: Ouer-much forwardnesse argues no perpetuity. How oft haue we knowne the weake beginnings of a likely fire scattered with ouer-strong a blast? And if another rise higher, he enuieth not; onely emulating that mans merit, and suspecting his own. Neither the name of the Court, nor the grace of a Prince, nor applause of his inferiors, can lift him aboue himselfe, or lead him to affect any other then a wise mediocrity. His owne sincerity cannot make him ouer-credulous. They are few and well tried, whom hee dares vse; or perhaps obliged by his owne fauours: so in all employments of friendship he is wary without suspicion, and without credulity charitable. He is free as of heare, so of tongue, to speake what he ought, not what he might: neuer but (what Princes eares are not alwayes inured to) meere Truth: yet that, tempred for the measure, and time, with honeſt diſcretion. But if he meet with ought that might bee beneficiall to his Maſter, or the State, or whoſe concealment might proue preiudiciall to either, neither feare nor gaine can ſtop his mouth. He is not baſely querulous, not forward to ſpend his complaints on the diſgraced, not abiding to build his owne fauours vpon the vniuſt ruines of an oppreſſed fortune. The errors of his fellowes hee reports with fauour; their vertues with aduantage. He is a good husband of his houres; equally deteſting idleneſſe and baſe diſports; and placing all his free time vpon ingenuous ſtudies, or generous delights; ſuch as may make either his body or minde, more fit for noble ſeruice. He liſteth not to come to councell vncalled, nor vnbidden to intermeddle with ſecrets, whether of perſon, or ſtate; which yet once impoſed, hee manageth, with ſuch fidelity and wiſedome, as well argue him to haue refrained, not out of feare, but iudgement. He knowes how to repay an iniury with thankes, and a benefit with vſury; the one out of a wiſe patience without malicious cloſeneſſe; the other out of a bounteous thankfulneſſe. His life is his owne willing ſeruant, and his Princes free vaſſall; which he accounts lent to him, that he may giue it for his maſter: the intercepting of whoſe harmes, he holds both his duty, and honour: and whether he be vſed as his ſword, or his ſhield, he doth both with cheerefulneſſe. He can ſo demeane himſelfe in his officious attendance, that he equally auoids ſatiety and obliuion; not needleſſy lauiſh of himſelfe, to ſet out and ſhew his parts alwayes at the higheſt; nor wilfully concealed in great occaſions. He loues to deſerue and to haue friends, but to truſt rather to his owne vertue. Reaſon and honeſty (next vnder religion) are his Councellers: which he followes without care of the euent, not without foreſight. In a iudgement of vnkindneſſe and enuy, he neuer caſts the firſt ſtone, and hates to picke thankes by detraction. He vndertakes none but worthy ſutes, ſuch as are free from baſeneſſe and iniuſtice; ſuch as is neither ſhame to aske, nor diſhonour to grant; not ſuffering priuate affections to ouer-weigh publique equity or conuenience; and better brooking a friends want, then an ill precedent; and thoſe which he yeeldeth to accept, hee loues not to linger in an afflicting hope: a preſent anſwer ſhall diſpatch the feares or deſires of his expecting client. His breſt is not a ciſterne to retaine, but as a conduit-pipe, to vent the reaſonable and honeſt petitions of his friend. Finally, he ſo liues, as one that accounts not Princes fauours hereditary; as one that wil deſerue their perpetuity, but doubt their change; as one that knowes there is a wide world beſide the Court, and aboue this world an Heauen.

Princes

THE FOVRTH DECAD.

To Mr Walter Fitzwilliams.

Ep. I. A discourse of the true and lawfull vse of pleasures; how we may moderate them, how we may enioy them with safety.

INdeed; wherein stands the vse of wisedome, if not in tempering our pleasures and sorrowes? and so disposing our selues in spight of all occurrents, that the world may not blow vpon vs with an vnequall gale, neither tearing our sailes, nor slackning them. Euents will varie; if we continue the same, it matters not: nothing can ouerturne him, that hath power ouer himselfe. Of these two, I confesse it harder to manage prosperity, and to auoid hurt from good: strong and cold winds do but make vs gather vp our cloake more round, more close; but to keepe it about vs in a hot Sunne-shine, to runne and not sweat; to sweat and not faint; how difficult it is! I see some that auoid pleasures for their danger, and which dare not but abandon lawfull delights, for feare of sinne; who seeme to mee like some ignorant Matallists, which cast away the precious Ore, because they cannot separate the gold from the drosse; or some simple Iew, that condemnes the pure streames of Iordan, because it falls into the dead sea. Why do not these men refuse to eate, because meat hath made many gluttons? Or how dare they couer themselues, that know there is pride in ragges? These hard Tutors, if not Tyrants, to themselues, whiles they pretend a mortified strictnesse, are iniurious to their owne libertie, to the liberalitie of their Maker: wherefore hath he created and giuen the choice commodities of this earth, if not for vse? or why placed he Man in a Paradise, not in a Desert? How can we more displease a liberall friend, then to depart from his delicate feast wilfully hungry? They are deceiued that call this holinesse; it is the disease of a mind sullen, distrustfull, impotent: There is nothing but euill, which is not from heauen; and he is none of Gods friends, that reiects his gifts for his owne abuse. Heare me therefore, and true Philosophy; There is a neater way then this, and a fairer; if you will be a wise Christian, tread in it. Learne first by a iust suruey, to know the due and lawfull bounds of pleasure; and then beware, either to go beyond a knowne Mere, or in the licence of your owne desires to remoue it. That God, that hath curb'd in the fury of that vnquiet and foaming element, and said of old, Here shalt thou stay thy proud waues, hath done no lesse for the rage of our appetite. Behold, our limits are not obscure; which if wee once passe, our inundation is perilous and sinfull. No iust delight wanteth either his warrant, or his tearmes. More plainely be acquainted both with the qualitie of pleasures, and the measure: Many a soule hath lost it selfe in a lawfull delight, through excesse: and not fewer haue perished in those, whose nature is vicious, without respect of immoderation. Your care must auoid both. The taste of the one is deadly; of the other, a full carouse: and in truth, it is easier for a Christian, not to taste of that, then not to be drunk with this: The ill is more easily auoided, then the indifferent moderated. Pleasure is of a winding and serpentine nature; admit the head, the body will aske no leaue: and sooner may you stop the entrance, then stay the proceeding. Withall, her insinuations are so cunning, that you shal not perceiue your excesse, till you be sicke of a surfet. A little honie is sweet; much, fulsome. For the attaining of this temper then, settle in your selfe a right estimation of that wherein you delight: resolue euery thing into his first matter, and there will bee more danger of contempt, then ouer-ioying. What are the goodly sumptuous buildings we admire, but a little burnt and hardned earth? What is the stately & wondrous building of this humane bodie, whose beauty we doat vpon, but the same earth wee tread on, better tempred; but worse, when it wants his guest? What are those precious metals whom we worship, but veines of earth better coloured? What are costly robes, but such as are giuen of worms, and consumed of moths? Then, from their beginning, looke to their end, and see laughter conclude in teares; see death, in this sweet pot. Thy conscience scourges thee with a long smart for a short libertie; and for an imperfect delight, giues thee perfect torment: Alas, what an hard peny-worth; so little pleasure for so much repentance! Enioy it, if thou canst: but if while the sword hangs ouer thee in an horses haire, still threatning his fall and thine, thou canst bee securely iocund: I wonder, but enuie not. Now I heare you recall mee, and after all my discourse (as no vvhit yet wiser) inquire by vvhat rule our pleasures shal be iudged immoderate? Wee are all friends to our selues, and our indulgence will hardly call any fauour too much. I send you not (tho I might) to your bodie, to your calling, for this tryall; while your delights exclude not the presence, the fruition of God, you are safe: the loue of the medicine is no hinderance to the loue of health; let all your pleasures haue reference to the highest Good, and you cannot exceed. You see the Angels sent about Gods messages to this earth; yet neuer out of their heauen, neuer without the vision of their Maker. These earthly things cause not distraction, if we rest not in them, if we can looke thorow them, to their giuer. The minde that desires them for their owne sakes, and suffers it selfe taken vp with their sweetnesse as his maine end, is already drunken. It is not the vse of pleasure that offends, but the affectation. How many great Kings haue beene Saints? they could not haue beene Kings, without choice of earthly delights; they could not haue been Saints, with earthly affections. If God haue mixed you a sweet cup, drinke it cheerefully; commend the taste, and be thankefull; but reioyce in it as his. Vse pleasures without dotage; as in God, from God, to God; you are as free from error, as miserie.

EP. II. A discourse of the bloody vse of single combats; the iniustice of all pretences of their lawfulnesse; setting forth the danger and sinfulnesse of this false and vnchristian manhood.

YOu haue receiued a proud challenge, and now hold your selfe bound vpon termes of honour, to accept it. Heare first the answer of a friend, before you giue an answer to your enemie; receiue the counsell of loue, ere you enter those courses of reuenge: Think not you may reiect me, because my profession is peace; I speake from him, which is not onely the Prince of Peace, but the God of Hosts; of vvhom if you will not learne to manage your hand and your sword, I shall grieue to see, that courage hath hath made you rebellious. Grant once that you are a Christian, and this victory is mine, I ouercome, and you fight not: would God the fury of mens passions could be as easily conquered, as their iudgements conuinced; how many thousands had beene free from blood! This conceit of false fortitude hath cost well-neere as many liues as lawfull warre, or as opinion of heresie. Let mee tell you with confidence, that all duels or single combats are murderous: blanch them ouer (how you list) with names of honour, and honest pretences; their vse is sinfull, and their nature diuelish.

Let vs two, if you please, (before hand) enter into these lists of words. Let reason (which is a more harmlesse fight) conflict with reason: Take vvhom you vvill vvith you into this field; of all the Philosophers, Ciuilians, Canonists; for Diuines (I hope) you shall finde none; and let the right of this truth betryed vpon a iust induction.

I only premise this caution, (lest wee quarrell about the cause of this quarrell) that necessity must be excluded from these vnlawfull fights; which euer alters their qualitie, and remoues their euill: The defence of our life, the iniunction of a Magistrate, are euer excepted: voluntary combats are onely questioned; or whose necessity wee doe not finde, but make. There are not many causes that can draw vs forth single into the field, with colour of equity. Let the first be the tryall of some hidden right; whether of innocence vpon a false accusation, or of title to inheritance, not determinable by course of Lawes; A proceeding not tolerable among Christians, because it wants both vvarrant and certaintie. Where euer did God bid thee hazard thy life for thy name? Where did he promise to second thee? When thou art without thy commandement, without his promise, thou art vvithout thy protection. Hee takes charge of thee, but vvhen thou art in thy wayes; yea in his. If this be Gods way, where did hee chalke it out? If thou want his Word, looke not for his aide. Miserable is that man, which in dangerous actions is left to his own keeping; yea how plainly doth the euent shew Gods dislike? How oft hath innocence lien bleeding in these combats, and guiltinesse insulted in the conquest? Those very decretals (whom we oft cite not, often trust not) report the inequalitie of this issue. Two men are brought to the barre, one accuses the other of theft, without further euidence, either to cleare, or conuince: The sword is called for, both witnesse, and Iudge: They meet, and combat: The innocent party is slaine: The stollen goods are found after in other hands, and confessed. O the iniustice of humane sentences! O vvretched estate of the party miscaried! his good name is lost with his life, which he would haue redeemed with his valour: he both dies and sinnes, while he striues to seeme cleare of a sinne. Therefore men say, he is guilty, because hee is dead, while the others wickednesse is rewarded with glory. I am deceiued, if in this case there were not three murderers; the Iudge, the aduersarie, himselfe. Let no man challenge God for neglect of innocence, but rather magnifie him for reuenge of presumption. What he enioynes, that he vndertakes, hee maintaines: Who art thou, O vaine man, that darest expect him a party in thine owne brawles? But there is no other vvay of tryall. Better none then this. Innocencie or land is questioned; and now wee send two men into the lists, to try vvhether is the better Fencer: vvhat is the strength or skill of the Champions, to the iustice of the cause? Wherefore serue our owne oathes? vvhereto vvitnesse, records, lotteries, and other purgations? Or why put wee not men as vvell to the old Saxon, or Liuonian, Ordalian tryals of hot yrons, or scalding liquors? It is farre better some truths should be vnknowne, then vnlawfully searched. Another cause seemingly warrantable may bee the determining of warre, preuention of common bloodshed: Two armies are readie to ioyne battell, the field is sure to bee bloody on both sides; either part chuses a champion; they two fight for all: the life of one shall ransome a thousand. Our Philosophers, our Lawyers shout for applause of this Monomachie, as a way neere, easie, safe: I dare not. Either the warre is iust, or vniust: if vniust, the hazard of one is too much; if iust, too little. The cause of a iust warre must be, besides true, important; the title common, wherein still a whole state is interessed; therefore may not, without rashnesse and tentation of God, be cast vpon two hands. The holy story neuer records any, but a barbarous Philistine, to make this offer, and that in the presumption of his vnmatchableneſſe. Profane monuments report many, and ſome on this ground wiſely reiected. Tullus challenged Albanus, that the right of the two Hoſts might be decided by the two Captaines; he returned a graue reply, (which I neuer read noted of cowardize) That this honour ſtood not in them two, but in the two Cities of Alba and Rome.

All cauſes of publike right are Gods: when we put to our hand in Gods cauſe, then we may looke for his. In vaine we hope for ſucceſſe, if we doe not our vtmoſt; wherefore either warre muſt be determined without ſwords, or vvith many: why ſhould all the heads of the Common-wealth ſtand vpon the necke and ſhoulders of one champion? If he miſ-carry, it is iniury to loſe her; if he preuaile, yet it is iniury to hazard her: yet reſpecting the parties themſelues. I cannot but grant it neereſt to equity, and the beſt of combats, that ſome blood ſhould be hazarded, that more might bee out of hazard. I deſcend to your caſe, which is yet further from likelihood of approoſe; for what can you plead but your credit? others opinion? You fight, not ſo much againſt anothers life, as your owne reproach: you are wronged, and now if you challenge not; or you are challenged, and if you accept not, the vvorld condemnes you for a coward: who would not rather hazard his life, then blemiſh his reputation? It were well, if this reſolution were as wiſe as gallant. If I ſpeake to a Chriſtian, this courage muſt be rectified. Tell me, what world is this, whoſe cenſure you feare? Is it not that which God hath branded long agoe with Poſitus in maligno? Is it not that which hath euer miſconſtrued, diſcouraged, diſgraced, perſecuted goodneſſe? that which reproached, condemned your Sauiour? What do you vnder theſe colours, if you regard the fauour of that, whoſe amitie is enmitie with God? What care you for the cenſure of him, whom you ſhould both ſcorne and vanquiſh? Did euer wiſe Chriſtians, did euer your Maſter, allow either this manhood, or this feare? Was there euer any thing more ſtrictly, more fearfully forbidden of him, then reuenge in the challenge; then in the anſwer, paiment of euill; and murder in both? It is pitie, that euer the water of Baptiſme was ſpilt vpon his face, that cares more to diſcontent the world, then to wrong God: He ſaith, Vengeance is mine; and you ſteale it from him in a glorious theft, hazarding your ſoule more then your body. You are weary of your ſelfe, while you thruſt one part vpon the ſword of an enemie; the other, on Gods. Yet perhaps I haue yeelded too much. Let goe Chriſtians; The wiſer world of men (and who elſe are worth reſpect) will not paſſe this odious verdict vpon your refuſall: valiant men haue reiected challenges, with their honours vntainted. Auguſtus, when he receiued a defiance, and braue appointment of combat from Antonie, could anſwer him, That if Antonie were weary of liuing, there vvere vvayes enow beſides to death. And that Scythian King returned no other reply to Iohn the Emperor of Conſtantinople. And Metellus challenged by Sertorius, durſt anſwer ſcornefully, vvith his pen, not vvith his ſword; That it vvas not for a Captaine, to dye a ſouldiers death. Was it not diſhonorable for theſe wiſe and noble Heathens to turne off theſe deſperate offers, What law hath made it ſo with vs? Shall I ſeriouſly tell you? Nothing but the meere opinion of ſome humorous Gallants, that haue more heart then braine; confirmed by a more idle cuſtome: Worthy grounds, whereon to ſpend both life and ſoule; vvhereon to neglect God, himſelfe, poſteritie. Goe now and take vp that ſword, of vvhoſe ſharpneſſe you haue boaſted, and haſten to the field; vvhether you die or kill, you haue murdered. If you ſuruiue, you are haunted vvith the conſcience of blood; if you die, with the torments; and if neither of theſe, yet it is murder, that you vvould haue killed. See whether the fame of a braue fight can yeeld you a counteruailable redreſſe of theſe miſchiefes: how much more happily valiant had it been to maſter your ſelfe, to feare ſinne more then ſhame, to contemne the world, to pardon a wrong, to preferre true Chriſtianitie before idle manhood, to liue and doe vvell.

Ep. III. A discourse of the pleasure of study and contemplation, with the varieties of schollar-like imployments, not without incitation of others thereunto; and a censure of their neglect.

I Can wonder at nothing more, then how a man can be idle; but of all other, a Scholar; in so many improuements of reason, in such sweetnesse of knowledge, in such variety of studies, in such importunity of thoughts. Other Artizans do but practise, we still learne; others runne still in the same gyre, to vvearinesse, to satietie; our choice is infinite: other labours require recreations, our very labour recreates our sports: wee can neuer want, either somewhat to doe, or somewhat, that we would do. How numberlesse are those volumes vvhich men haue vvritten, of Arts, of Tongues! How endlesse is that volume which God hath vvritten of the vvorld! wherein euery creature is a Letter, euery day a new Page: vvho can be weary of either of these? To finde wit in Poetry, in Philosophy profoundnesse, in Mathematicks acutenesse, in History wonder of euents, in Oratory sweet eloquence, in Diuinity supernatural! light and holy deuotion; as so many rich metals in their proper mynes, whom would it not rauish with delight? After all these, let vs but open our eyes, we cannot looke beside a lesson, in this vniuersall Booke of our Maker worth our study, worth taking out. What creature hath not his miracle? vvhat euent doth not challenge his obseruation? And if vveary of foraine imployment, we list to looke home into our selues, there wee finde a more priuate world of thoughts, which set vs on vvorke anew, more busily, not lesse profitably; now, our silence is vocall, our solitarinesse popular, and we are shut vp, to doe good vnto many. And if once we be cloyed with our owne company, the doore of conference is open; here interchange of discourse (besides pleasure) benefits vs: and he is a weake companion, from whom we returne not wiser. I could enuy, if I could beleeue that Anachoret, vvho secluded from the vvorld, and pent vp in his voluntary prison-wals, denied that hee thought the day long, vvhiles yet hee vvanted learning to vary his thoughts. Not to be cloyed with the same conceit, is difficult aboue humane strength; but to a man so furnished vvith all sorts of knowledge, that according to his dispositions he can change his studies, I should wonder, that euer the Sunne should seeme to pase slowly. How many busie tongues chase away good houres in pleasant chat, and complaine of the haste of night! What ingenuous minde can be sooner weary of talking vvith learned Authors, the most harmelesse, and sweetest of companions? What an heauen liues a Scholar in, that at once in one close roome can dayly conuerse vvith all the glorious Martyrs and Fathers? that can single out, at pleasure, either sententious Tertullian, or graue Cyprian, or resolute Hierome, or flowing Chrysostome, or diuine Ambrose, or deuout Bernard, or (vvho alone is all these) heauenly Augustine, and talke vvith them, and heare their wise and holy counsels, verdicts, resolutions: yea (to rise higher) with courtly Esay, with learned Paul, with all their fellow-Prophets, Apostles: yet more, like another Moses, with God himselfe, in them both? Let the vvorld contemne vs: while we haue these delights, we cannot enuy them; wee cannot wish our selues other then wee are. Besides, the way to all other contentments is troublesome; the onely recompence is in the end. To delue in the mynes, to scorch in the fire for the getting, for the fining of gold, is a slauish toyle; the comfort is in the wedge; to the owner, not the labourers; where our very search of knowledge is delightsome. Study it selfe, is our life; from which vve would not be barred for a world. How much sweeter then is the fruit of study, the conscience of knowledge? In comparison whereof, the ſoule that hath once taſted it, eaſily contemnes all humane comforts. Goe now yee worldlings, and inſult ouer our paleneſſe, our needineſſe, our neglect. Ye could not bee ſo iocund, if you vvere not ignorant: if you did not vvant knowledge, you could not ouer-looke him that hath it: For me, I am ſo farre from emulating you, that I profeſſe, I had as leiue be a brute beaſt, as an ignorant rich man. How is it then, that thoſe Gallants, vvhich haue priuiledge of blood and birth, and better education, do ſo ſcornfully turne off theſe moſt manly, reaſonable, noble exerciſes of ſcholarſhip? An hawke becomes their fiſt better then a booke: No dogge but is a better companion: Any thing, or nothing, rather then what we ought. O minds brutiſhly ſenſuall! Doe they thinke that God made them for diſport? who euen in his Paradiſe, would not allow pleaſure, without vvorke. And if for buſineſſe; either of body, or minde: Thoſe of the body are commonly ſeruile, like it ſelfe. The minde therefore, the mind onely, that honorable and diuine part, is fitteſt to be imployed of thoſe vvhich vvould reach to the higheſt perfection of men, and vvould be more then the moſt. And what vvorke is there of the minde but the trade of a ſcholar, ſtudy? Let me therefore faſten this probleme on our Schoole-gates, and challenge all commers, in the defence of it; that, No Scholar cannot be truely noble. And if I make it not good, let me neuer be admitted further then to the ſubiect of our queſtion. Thus we do vvell to congratulate, to our ſelues, our own happineſſe: if others will come to vs, it ſhall be our comfort, but more theirs; if not, it is enough that we can ioy in our ſelues, and in him in whom we are that we are.

To Mr J. P.

EP. IV. A diſcourſe of the increaſe of Popery; of the Oath of Allegeance; and theiuſt ſufferings of thoſe which haue refuſed it.

YOu ſay, your religion dayly winneth. Bragge not of your gaine: you neither need, nor can, if you conſider how it gets, and whom: How, but by cunning ſleights, falſe ſuggeſtions, impudent vntruths? Who cannot thus preuaile againſt a quiet and innocent aduerſarie? Whom, but ſilly women, or men notoriouſly debauched? A ſpoyle fit for ſuch a conqueſt, for ſuch Victors. We are the fewer, not the worſe: if all our licentious hypocrites vvere yours, wee ſhould not complaine: and you might be the prouder, not the better. Glory you in this triumph, free from our enuy; who know we haue loſt none, but (by whom you ſaue nothing) either looſe, or ſimple. It were pity that you ſhould not forgoe ſome in a better exchange. The ſea neuer incroacheth vpon our ſhore, but it loſeth elſe-where: ſome we haue happily fetcht into the fold of our Church, out of your waſts; ſome others (though few, and ſcarce a number) vvee haue ſent into their heauen. Among theſe, your late ſecond Garnet liu'd to proclaime himſelfe a Martyr; and by dying, perſwaded. Poore man, how happy were he, if he might be his owne Iudge. That which gaue him confidence, vvould giue him glory: you beleeue, and wel-nere adore him. That fatall cord of his, was too little for reliques, though diuided into Mathematicke quantities. Whither cannot conceit lead vs? vvhether for his reſolution, or your credulitie? His death vvas fearleſſe: I commend his ſtomack, not his minde. How many malefactors haue wee knowne that haue laughed vpon their executioner, and icſted away their laſt vvinde? You might know. It is not long ſince our Norfolke Arrian leapt at his ſtake. How oft haue you learned, in martyrdome to regard not the death, but the cauſe? Elſe, there ſhould be no difference in guilt and innocence, error and truth. What then? Died hee for Religion? This had bin but your owne meaſure: we endured your flames, which theſe gibbets could not acquit. But dare impudency it ſelfe affirme it? Not for meere ſhame, againſt the euidence euidence of ſo many tongues, eares, records. Your proſperitie, your numbers argue enough, that a man may be a Papiſt in Britaine, and liue. If treaſon be your religion, vvho will vvonder that it is capitall? Defie that Deuill vvhich hath mockt you with this madde opinion, that treacherie is holineſſe, deuotion cruelтie and diſobedience. I foreſee your euaſion: Alas, it is eaſie for a ſpightfull conſtruction to fetch religion within this compaſſe; and to ſay the ſwelling of the Foxes forehead is a horne. Nay then, let vs fetch ſome honeſt Heathen to be Iudge betwixt vs: Meere nature in him ſhall ſpeake vnpartially of both. To hold and perſwade, that a Chriſtian King may, yea muſt at the Popes will be dethroaned, and murdered; is it the voice of treaſon, or religion? And if traiterous, vvhether flatly, or by miſ-inferring? Beſides his practices, for this he died; witneſſe your own Catholikes. O God, if this be religion, what can be villany? Who euer dyed a Malefactor, if this be martyrdom? If this poſition be meritorious of heauen, hell is feared in vaine. O holy Scillæ, Marij, Catilines, Cades, Lopezes, Gowries, Vaivxes, and who euer haue conſpired againſt lawfull Maieſtie! all Martyrs of Rome, all Saints of Beckets heauen. How vvell do thoſe palmes of celeſtiall triumph become hands red with the ſacred blood of Gods anointed? I am aſhamed to thinke, that humanitie ſhould nouriſh ſuch monſters, whether of men, or opinions. But you defie this ſauage factiouſneſſe, this deuotion of deuils; and honeſtly vviſh both God and Cæſar his owne. I praiſe your moderation: but if you be true, let me yet ſearch you: Can a man be a perfect Papiſt, vvithout this opinion againſt it? If he may, then your Garnet and Drurie died not for religion: if he may not, then Poperie is treaſon. Chuſe now vvhether you will leaue your Martyrs, or your Religion. What you hold of merit, free-wil, tranſubſtantiation, inuocation of Saints, falſe adoration, ſupremacy of Rome, no man preſſes, no man inquires: your preſent inquiſition, your former examples would teach vs; mercy will not let vs learne. The only queſtion is, Whether our King may liue and rule; whether you may refraine from his blood, and not ſinne: Would you haue a man denie this, and not die? Would you haue a man thus dying honored? Dare you approue that religion, which defends the fact, canonizes the perſon? I heare your anſwer, from that your great Champion, which not many dayes ſince, with one blow hath driuen out three (not ſlight) vvedges: That not Ciuill obedience is ſtood vpon, but Poſitiue doctrine: That you are readie to ſweare for the Kings ſafetie, not againſt the Popes authoritie: King IAMES muſt liue and raigne; but Paulus Quintus muſt rule and be obeyed: and better were it for you to die, then your ſworne allegeance ſhould preiudice the Sea Apoſtolike. An eluſion fit for children. What is to daily, if not this? As if he ſaid, The King ſhall liue, vnleſſe the Pope will not, That hee ſhall not be diſcrowned, depoſed, maſſacred by your hands, vnleſſe your holy Father ſhould command. But (I aske, as vvho ſhould not?) What if he do command? What if your Paulus Quintus ſhould breathe out (like his predeceſſors) not threatnings, but ſtrong bellowings of Excommunications, of depoſition of Gods anointed? What if hee ſhall command (after that French faſhion) the throats of all Heretikes to bleed in a night? Pardon you in this: Now it is growne a point of doctrinall Diuinitie, to determine how farre the power of Peters ſucceſſor may extend: You may neither ſweare, nor ſay your hands ſhall not bee ſteep't in the blood of your true Soueraigne; and to die rather then ſweare it, is martyrdome. But what if heauen fall, ſay you? His Holineſſe (as you hope) vvill take none ſuch courſes. Woe vvere vs, if our ſafety depended vpon your hopes, or his mercies. Bleſſed be that God, which malgrè hath made and kept vs happie, and hath lift vs aboue our enemies. But what hope is there, that he who chargeth ſubiects not to ſweare allegeance will neuer diſcharge them from allegeance; that thoſe who clamorouſly and ſhameleſſely complaine to the world of our cruelty, will forbeare to ſollicit others cruelty to vs? Your hopes to you; to vs our ſecurities. Is this the Religion you father vpon thoſe Chriſtian Patriarkes of the Primitiue Age? O bleſſed Ireney, Clemens, Cyprian, Baſil, Chryſoſtome, Auguſtine, Ierome, and thou the ſeuereſt exactor of iuſt cenſures, holy Ambroſe! how vvould you haue ſpet at ſuch a rebellious aſſertion! What ſpeake I of Fathers? whoſe very mention in ſuch a cauſe were were iniury, were impiety. Which of those curſed hereſies of ancient times (for to them I hold it fitter to appeale) haue euer bin ſo deſperately ſhameleſſe, as to breed, to maintaine a conceit ſo palpably vnnaturall; vnleſſe perhaps thoſe old Antitactæ may vpon generall termes be compelled to patronize it, vvhile they held it pietie to breake the lawes of their Maker? For you, if you profeſſe not to loue willing errors, by this ſuſpect, and iudge the reſt: you ſee this defended with equall reſolution, and with no leſſe cheerefull expence of blood. In the body, where you ſee one monſtrous deformitie, you cannot affect; if you can doe ſo in your religion, yet how dare you? ſince the greater halfe of it ſtands on no other ground. Onely God make you wiſe, and honeſt, you ſhall ſhake hands with this faction of Popery; and I with you, to giue you a cheerefull welcome into the boſome of the Church.

To my brother M. SA. HALL.

EP. V. A diſcourſe of the great charge of the miniſteriall function; together with particular directions for due preparation thereunto, and cariage therein.

IT is a great and holy purpoſe (deare Brother) that you haue entertained, of ſeruing God in his Church: for what higher, or more worthy imploiment can there be, then to do theſe diuine duties, to ſuch a maſter, and ſuch a mother? wherin yet I ſhould little reioyce, if any neceſsity had caſt you vpon this refuge: for I hate and grieue to thinke that any deſperate mind ſhould make Diuinity but a ſhift, and diſhonour this Miſtreſſe by being forſaken of the world. This hath been the drift of your education: to this you were born, & dedicated in a direct courſe. I doe willingly incourage you, but not without many cautions. Enter not into ſo great a ſeruice, without much foreſight. When your hand is at the plow, it is too late to looke backe. Bethinke your ſelfe ſeriouſly of the weight of this charge: and let your holy deſire be allayed with ſome trembling. It is a fooliſh raſhneſſe of yong heads, when they are in Gods chaire, to wonder how they came thither, and to forget the awfulneſſe of that place, in the confidence of their owne ſtrength; which is euer ſo much leſſe, as it is more eſteemed. I commend not the waiward excuſes of Moſes, nor the peremptory vnwillingneſſe of Ammonius, and Frier Thomas, who maimed themſelues that they might be wilfully vncapable. Betwixt both theſe there is humble modeſty, and religious fearfulneſſe, eaſily to bee noted in thoſe, whom the Church honours with the name of her fathers, vvorthy your imitation: wherein yet you ſhall need no preſidents, if you well conſider vvhat worth of parts, what ſtrictneſſe of cariage, what weight of offices, God expects in this vocation. Know firſt, that in this place there wil be more holineſſe required of you, then in the ordinary ſtation of a Chriſtian: for whereas before you were but as a common line, now God ſets you for a copy of ſanctification vnto others, vvherein euery fault is both notable, and dangerous. Here is looked for a ſetled acquaintance with God, and experience both of the proceedings of grace, and of the offers and repulſes of tentations; which in vaine we ſhall hope to menage in other hearts, if we haue not found in our owne. To ſpeake by aime, or rote, of repentance, of contrition, of the degrees of regeneration, and faith, is both harſh, and ſeldom when, not vnprofitable. We truſt thoſe Phyſicians beſt, vvhich haue tryed the vertue of their drugs, eſteeming not of thoſe which haue onely borrowed of their bookes. Here will bee expected a free and abſolute gouernment of affections; that you can ſo ſtere your own veſſell, as not to be tranſported with fury, with ſelfe-loue, with immoderation of pleaſures, of cares, of deſires, with exceſſe of paſſions; in all which, ſo muſt you demeane your ſelfe, as one that thinkes hee is no man of the vvorld, but of God; as one too good (by his double calling) for that, which is either the felicitie, or impotency of beasts. Here must be continuall and inward exercise of mortification, and seuere Christianitie, whereby the heart is held in due awe, and the vveake flames of the spirit quickned, the ashes of our dulnesse blowne off; a practice necessary in him, whose deuotion must set many hearts on fire: Heere must be wisedome, and inoffensiuenesse of cariage, as of one that goes euer vnder monitors, and that knowes other mens indifferencies are his euils. No man had such need to keep a strict meane. Setting aside contempt, euen in obseruation, behold, wee are made a gazing stocke to the world, to Angels, to men. The very sayle of your estate must be moderated, which if it beare too high (as seldome) it incurres the censure of profusion and Epicurisme; if too low, of a base and vnbeseeming earthlinesse; your hand may not be too close for others need, nor too open for your owne; your conuersation may not be rough and sullen, nor ouer-familiar and fawning; whereof the one breeds a conceit of pride, and strangenesse; the other, contempt; not loosely mery, nor Cynically vnsociable; not contentious in small iniuries; in great, not hurtfully patient to the Church: your attire (for whither doe not censures reach?) not youthfully wanton; not, in these yeares affectedly ancient, but graue and comely, like the minde, like the behauiour of the vvearer; your gesture like your habit, neither sauouring of giddy lightnesse, nor ouerly insolence, nor wantonnesse; nor dull neglect of your selfe; but such, as may beseeme a mortified minde, full of worthy spirits: your speech like your gesture, not scurrilous, not detracting, not idle, not boasting, not rotten, not peremptorie; but honest, milde, fruitfull, sauourie, and such as may both argue and worke grace: your deliberations mature, your resolutions well grounded; your deuices sage and holy. Wherein let me aduise you, to vvalke euer in the beaten rode of the Church; not to runne out into single paradoxes. And if you meet at any time with priuate conceits, that seeme more probable, suspect them and your selfe; and if they can win you to assent, yet smother them in your breft, and doe not dare to vent them out, either by your hand or tongue, to trouble the common peace. It is a miserable praise, to bee a witty disturber. Neither will it serue you to be thus good alone; but if God shall giue you the honour of this estate, the world will looke, you should be the graue guide of a well-ordered family: for this is proper to vs, that the vices of our charge reflect vpon vs; the sinnes of others are our reproach. If another mans children mis-cary, the Parent is pitied; if a Ministers, censured; yea, not our seruant is faulty vvithout our blemish. In all these occasions (a misery incident to vs alone) our griefe is our shame. To descend nearer vnto the sacred affaires of this heauenly trade; in a Minister, Gods Church is accounted both his house to dwell in, and his field to worke in; vvherein (vpon the penalty of a curse) he faithfully, wisely, diligently, deuoutly, deales with God for his people, with his people, for and from God. Whether he instruct, hee must doe it with euidence of the spirit; or whether he reproue, with courage and zeale; or whether he exhort, with meeknesse, and yet with power; or whether he confute, with demonstration of truth, not with rage and personall maliciousnesse, not with a wilfull heat of contradiction; or whether he admonish, with long-suffering, and loue without preiudice, and partialitie: in a word, all these he so doth, as he that desires nothing but to honour God, and saue men. His wisdome must discerne betwixt his sheepe and wolues; in his sheepe, betwixt the wholesome and vnsound; in the vnsound, betwixt the weake and tainted; in the tainted, betwixt the natures, qualities, degrees of the disease, and infection; and to all these he must know to administer a word in season. He hath Antidotes for all tentations, counsels for all doubts, euictions for all errors, for all languishings incouragements. No occasion from any altered estate of the soule may finde him vnfurnished: He must ascend to Gods Altar with much awe, with sincere and cheerefull deuotion; so taking, celebrating, distributing his Sauiour, as thinking himselfe at table in heauen with the blessed Angels. In the meane time, as he wants not a thankefull regard to the Master of the feast, so not care of the guests. The greatnesse of an offender may not make him sacrilegiously partiall, nor the obscurity negligent. I

haue

haue said little of any of our duties; and of some, nothing: yet enough, I think, to make you (if not timorous) carefull. Neither vvould I haue you hereupon to hide your selfe from this calling, but to prepare your selfe for it. These times call for them that are faithfull: and if they may spare some learning; conscience they can not. Goe on happily: it argues a minde Christianly noble, to bee incouraged with the need of his labours, with the difficulties.

To Mrs. A. P.

Ep. VI. A discourse of the signes and proofes of a true faith.

THere is no comfort in a secret felicitie. To be happy, and not know it, is little aboue miserable. Such is your state: onely herein better then the common case of the most; that the well of life lyes open before you; but your eyes (like Agars) are not open to see it; vvhiles they haue neither water, nor eyes. We doe not much more want that which vve haue not, then that which we doe not know we haue. Let mee sell you some of that spirituall eye-salue which the Spirit commends to his Laodiceans; that you may clearely see how well you are. There is nothing but those scales betwixt you and happinesse. Thinke not much that I espy in you what your selfe sees not. Too much nearenesse oft-times hindreth sight: and if for the spots of our own faces we trust others eyes, why not for our perfections? You are in heauen, and know it not: He that beleeues, is already passed from death to life: You beleeue, whiles you complaine of vnbeleefe. If you complained not, I should mis-doubt you more, then you doe your selfe, because you complaine. Secure and insolent presumption hath killed many, that breathes nothing but confidence and safety; and abandons all doubts, and condemnes them. That man neuer beleeued, that neuer doubted. This liquor of faith is neuer pure in these vessels of clay, without these lees of distrust. What then? Thinke not that I incourage you to doubt more; but perswade you, not to bee discouraged with doubting. All vncertaintie is comfortlesse: those that teach men to coniecture and forbid to resolue, reade lectures of misery. Those doubts are but to make way for assurance; as the oft shaking of the tree, fastens it more at the root. You are sure of God, but you are afraid of your selfe. The doubt is not in his promise, but your application. Looke into your owne heart. How know you that you know any thing, that you beleeue, that you will, that you approue, that you affect any thing? If a man, like your selfe, promise you ought, you know whether you trust him, whether you relye your selfe on his fidelitie. Why can you not know it in him that is God and man? The difference is not in the act, but the obiect. But if these habits (because of their inward and ambiguous nature) seeme hard to be descried; turne your eyes to those open markes that cannot beguile you. How many haue bragged of their Faith, when they haue embraced nothing but a vaine cloud of presumption? Euery man repeats his Creed, few feele it, few practise it. Take two boughs in the dead of winter; how like is one wood to another? how hardly discerned? Afterwards, By their fruit you shall know them. That faith, whose nature was obscure, is euident in his effects. What is faith, but the hand of the soule? What is the dutie of the hand, but either to hold or worke? This hand then holds Christ, workes obedience and holinesse: and if this act of apprehension be as secret, as the cause; since the closed hand hideth still what it holdeth; see the hand of faith open; see what it worketh, and compare it vvith your owne proofe. Deny if you can (yet I had rather appeale to any Iudge, then your preiudiced selfe) that in all your needs you can step boldly to the Throne of Heauen; and freely powre out your enlarged heart to your God, and craue of him, vvhether to receiue what you vvant, or that

that you may vvant vvhat you haue, and would not. Be assured from God, this can be done by no power, but (that you feare to misse) of faith. God, as he is not, so he is not called a father without this. In vain doth he pray, that cannot cal God father: No father, without the spirit of adoption; no spirit, without faith: vvithout this, you may babble, you cannot pray. Assume you that you can pray, I dare conclude vpon my soule, You beleeue. As little as you loue your selfe, denie if you can, that you loue God. Say that your Sauiour from heauen should aske you Peters question, could your soule returne any other answer, then Lord thou knowest I loue thee? Why are you else in such awe to offend, that a world cannot bribe you to sinne? Why in such deepe griefe vvhen you haue sinned, that no mirth can refresh you? Why in such feruent desire of enioying his presence? Why in such agony when you enioy it not? neither doth God loue you, neither can you loue God without faith. Yet more: Doe you willingly nourish any one sinne in your brest; do you not repent of all? Doe you not hate all, tho you cannot leaue all? Doe you not complaine that you hate them no more? Doe you not, as for life, wish for holinesse, and endeuour it? Nothing but faith can thus cleanse the heart; that like a good houf-wife sweeps all the foule corners of the soule, and will not leaue so much as one webbe in this roomie house. Trust to it, you cannot hate sinne for it owne sake, and forsake it for Gods sake, without faith; the faithlesse hath had some remorse and feares, neuer repentance. Lastly, doe you not loue a good man for goodnesse, and delight in Gods Saints? Doth not your loue leade you to compassion; your compassion to relieue? An heart truely faithfull cannot but haue an hand christianly bountifull: Charitie and Faith make vp one perfect paire of Compasses, that can take the true latitude of a Christian heart: Faith is the one foot, pitcht in the centre vnmoueably, while Charitie vvalkes about, in a perfect circle of beneficence: these two neuer did, neither can goe asunder. Warrant you your loue, I dare warrant your faith: What need I say more? This heat of your affections, and this light of your workes, wil euince against all the gates of hell, that you haue the fire of Faith: let your soule then warme it selfe with these sweet and cordiall flames, against all those cold despaires, whereto you are tempted: say, Lord, I beleeue; and I will giue you leaue still to adde, Helpe my vnbeleefe.

To Mr Ed. Alleyne.

Ep. VII. A direction how to conceiue of God in our deuotions and meditations.

YOu haue chosen and iudged well: How to conceiue of the Deitie in our prayers, in our meditations, is both the deepest point of all Christianitie, and the most necessarie: so deepe, that if we wade into it, we may easily drowne, neuer finde the bottom: so necessarie, that without it, our selues, our seruices, are prophane, irreligious: wee are all borne Idolaters, naturally prone to fashion God to some forme of our owne, whether of an humane bodie, or of an admirable light; or if our minde haue any other more likely, and pleasing image. First then, away with all these wicked thoughts, these grosse deuotions; and with Iacob burie all your strange gods vnder the oake of Shechem, ere you offer to set vp Gods Altar at Bethel: and without all mentall representations, conceiue of your God purely, simply, spiritually; as of an absolute being, without forme, without matter, without composition; yea, an infinite, without all limit of thoughts. Let your heart adore a spirituall Maiestie, which it cannot comprehend, yet knowes to be; and, as it were, lose it selfe in his infiniteneſſe. Thinke of him, as not to be thought of; as one, whose wisedome is his iustice, whose iustice is his power, whose power is his his mercie; and whose wisedome, iustice, power, mercy, is himselfe; as without qualitie good, great without quantitie, euerlasting without time, present euery where without place, containing all things without extent: and when your thoughts are come to the highest, stay there, and be content to vvonder, in silence: and if you cannot reach to conceiue of him as he is, yet take heed you conceiue not of him as he is not. Neither will it suffice your Christian mind, to haue this awefull and confused apprehension of the Deitie, without a more speciall and inward conceit of three in this one; three persons in this one essence, not diuided, but distinguished; and not more mingled then diuided. There is nothing, vvherein the vvant of words can wrong and grieue vs, but in this: Here alone, as we can adore, and not conceiue, so we can conceiue, and not vtter; yea, vtter our selues, and not be conceiued; yet as wee may, Thinke here of one substance in three subsistences; one essence in three relations; one IEHOVAH begetting, begotten, proceeding; Father, Sonne, Spirit: yet so, as the Son is no other thing from the Father, but another person; or the Spirit, from the Sonne. Let your thoughts here vvalke warily, the path is narrow: the conceit either of three substances or but one subsistence, is damnable. Let me lead you yet higher, and further, in this intricate vvay, towards the Throne of grace: All this will not auaile you, if you take not your Mediator with you: if you apprehend not a true manhood, gloriously vnited to the Godhead, without change of either nature, without mixture of both; whose presence, vvhose merits must giue passage, acceptance, vigour to your prayers.

Here must be therefore (as you see) thoughts holily mixed: of a Godhead and humanitie: one person in two natures: of the same Deitie, in diuers persons, and one nature: wherein (if euer) heauenly wisdome must bestir it selfe, in directing vs, so to seuer these apprehensions, that none be neglected; so to conioyne them that they bee not confounded. O the depth of diuine mysteries, more then can be wondred at! O the necessitie of this high knowledge, which vvho attaines not, may babble, but prayeth not? Still you doubt, and aske if you may not direct your prayers to one person of three. Why not? Safely, and with comfort. What need we feare, while wee haue our Sauiour for our patterne: O my father (if possible) let this Cup passe: and Paul euery where both in thanks and requests: but with due care of worshipping all in one. Exclude the other, while you fix your heart vpon one, your prayer is sinne; retaine all, and mention one, you offend not. None of them doth ought for vs, without all. It is a true rule of Diuines: All their externall workes are common: To sollicit one therefore, and not all, were iniurious. And if you stay your thoughts vpon the sacred humanitie of Christ, with inseparable adoration of the Godhead vnited, and thence climbe vp to the holy conceit of that blessed and dreadfull Trinity, I dare not censure, I dare not but commend your diuine method. Thus should Christians ascend from earth to heauen, from one heauen to another. If I haue giuen your deuotions any light, it is well: the least glimpse of this knowledge is vvorth all the full gleames of humane and earthly skill. But I mistake, if your owne heart wrought vpon with serious meditations (vnder that spirit of illumination) will not proue your best master. After this vveake direction, studie to conceiue aright; that you may pray aright; and pray that you may conceiue; and meditate that you may doe both:

and the God of heauen direct you, inable you, that you may doe all.

To M. THOMAS IAMES of Oxford.

EP. VIII. A discourse of the grounds of the Papists confidence in appealing to the Fathers: applauding his worthy offers and indeauors of discouering the falsifications and deprauations of antiquity.

SIR, I know no man so like as you to make posterity his debter. I doe heartily congratulate vnto you so worthy labours, so noble a project. Our aduersaries knowing of themselues (that which Tertullian saith of all heresies) that if appeale bee made to the sacred bench of Prophets and Apostles, they cannot stand; remoue the suit of religion craftily, into the Court of the Fathers: A reuerend triall, as any vnder heauen; where, it cannot be spoken, how confidently they triumph ere the conflict. Giue vs the Fathers for our Iudges (say Campian and Possevine) the day is ours. And whence is this courage? Is antiquity our enemy, their aduocate? Certainly it cannot bee truth that is new: We would renounce our Religion, if it could be ouer-lookt for time. Let goe equity, the older take both. There bee two things then, that giue them heart in this prouocation: One, the bastardy of false Fathers; the other, the corruption of the true. What a flourish doe they make with vsurped names? Whom would it not amaze to see the frequent citations of the Apostles owne Canons, Constitutions, Liturgies, Masses: of Clemens, Dennys the Areopagite, Linus, Hippolitus, Martiall of Burdeaux, Egesippus: Donations of Constantine the great, and Lewis the godly: Of 50 Canons of Nice: of Dorotheus, Damasus his Pontificall; Epistles decretall of Clemens, Euaristus, Telesphorus, and an hundred other Bishops holy and ancient; of Euodius, Anastasius, Simeon Metaphrastes, and moe yet then a number moe; most whereof haue crept out of the Vatican, or Cloisters; and all cary in them manifest brands of falshood, and suppositions; that I may say nothing of those infinite writings, which either ignorance, or wilfulnesse, hath fathered vpon euery of the Fathers, not without shamelesse importunity, and grosse impossibilities: all which (as thine said of Peter) their speech bewrayeth; or (as Austen said of Cyprians stile) their face. This fraud is more easily auoided: For as in notorious burglaries, oft-times there is either an hat, or a gloue, or a weapon left behind, which descrieth the authors; so the God of truth hath beseemed these impostors to let fall some palpable error, (though but of false calculation) whereby, if not their names, yet their ages might appeare, to their conuiction. Most danger is in the secret corruption of the true and acknowledged issue of those gracious parents; whom, through close and crafty handling, they haue induced to belye those that begot them; and to betray their Fathers, either with silence, or false euidence. Plainly, how are the honoured Volumes of faithfull antiquity, blurred, interlined, altered, depraued by subtle trechery; and made to speake what they meant not? Fie on this, not so much iniustice, as impiety, to race the awefull monuments of the dead, and partially to blot and change the originall Will of the deceased, insert our owne Legacies. This is done by our guilty aduersaries, to the iniury not more of these Authors, then of the present and succeeding times. Hence those Fathers are some-where not ours: What wonder? while they are not themselues. Your industry hath offered (and that motion is liuely, and heroicall) to challenge all their learned and elegant pages, from iniury of corruption; to restore them to themselues, and to vs: that which all the learned of our times haue but desired to see done, you proffer to effect: your assay in Cyprian and Augustine is happy, and iustly applauded. All our Libraries, whom your diligent hand hath ransackt, offer their ayd, in such abundance of manuscripts, as all Europe would enuy to see met in one Iland. After all this, for that the most spightfull imputation to our Truth is nouelty, you offer to deduce her pedegree from those primitiue times, through the successions of all ages; and to bring into the light of the world many (as yet obscure) but no lesse certaine and authenticall Patrons, in a continued line of defence. You haue giuen proofe enough, that these are no glorious vaunts, but the zealous challenges of an able Champion. What wanteth then? Let mee say for you: Not an heart, not an head, not an hand; but (which I almost scorne to name in such a cause) a purse. If this continue your hinderance, it will not be more our losse then shame. Heare me a little, yee great and wealthy: Hath God loaded you with so much substance; and will you not lend him a little of his owne? Shall your riot bee fed with excesse, while Gods cause shall starue for want? Shall our aduersaries so insultingly out-bid vs; and in the zeale of our profession laugh at our heartlesse and cold niggardlinesse? Shall heauenly truth lie in the dust for want of a little stamped earth to raise her? How can you so much any way honor God, yea your selues, deserue of posterity, pleasure the Church, and make you so good friends of your Mammon? Let not the next Age say, that she had so vnkind predecessors. Fetch forth of your superfluous store, and cast in your rich gifts into this treasurie of the Temple. The Lord and his Church haue need. For you, it angers me to see how that flattering Possessuus smoothly intices you from vs with golden offers, vpon the aduantage of our neglect; as if he (measuring your mind by his owne) thought an Omnia dabo would bring you with himselfe on your knees to worship the deuill, the beast, the image of both: as if we were not as able to incourage, to reward desert. Hath Vertue no Patrons on this side the Alpes? Are those hils onely the thresholds of honour? I plead not, because I cannot feare you: But who sees not how munificently our Church scattereth her bountifull fauours vpon lesse merit. If your day be not yet come, expect it; God and the Church owe you a benefit; if their payment be long, it is sure. Onely goe you on with courage, in those your high endeauors; and in the meane time, thinke it great recompence to haue deserued.

To Mr E. A.

Ep. IX. A Discourse of fleeing or stay in the time of pestilence; whether lawfull for Minister or people.

HOw many hath a seduced conscience led vntimely to the graue? I speake of this sad occasion of Pestilence. The Angell of God followes you, and you doubt whether you should flye. If a Lyon out of the forest should pursue you, you would make no question: yet could he not doe it vnsent. What is the difference? Both instruments of diuine reuenge; both threaten death; one by spilling the blood, the other by infecting it. Who knowes whether he hath not appointed your Zoar out of the lists of this destruction? You say it is Gods visitation. What euill is not? If warre haue wasted the confines of your Country, you saue your throats by flight: Why are you more fauourable to Gods immediate sword of pestilence? Very leprosie, by Gods law, requires a separation; yet no mortall sickenesse. When you see a noted Leper proclaime his vncleannesse in the street, will you embrace him for his sake that hath stricken him, or auoid him for his sake that hath forbidden you? If you honour his rod, much more will you regard his precept. If you mislike not the affliction because he sends it, then loue the life which you haue of his sending; feare the iudgement which he will send, if you loue it not. He that bids vs flee when we are persecured, hath neither excepted Angell nor man; whether soeuer, I feare our guiltinesse, if wilfully we flee not. But whither shall we flee from God? say you: where shall he not both find and lead vs? whither shall ſhall not our deſtiny follow vs? Vaine men, we may runne from our home, not from our graue; Death is ſubtle, our time is ſet; we cannot, God will not alter it. Alas, how wiſe we are to wrong our ſelues! Becauſe Death will ouer-take vs, ſhall we runne and meet him? Becauſe Gods decree is ſure, ſhall we be deſperate? Shall we preſume, becauſe God changeth not? Why doe we not trye euery knife and cord, ſince our time is neither capable of preuention nor delay: our end is ſet, not without our meanes. In matter of danger where the end is not knowne, the meanes muſt be ſuſpected; in matter of hope where the end is not knowne, meanes muſt be vſed. Vſe then freely the meanes of your flight, ſuſpect the danger of your ſtay; and ſince there is no particular neceſſity of your preſence, know that God bids you depart and liue. You vrge the inſtance of your Miniſter: How vnequally? There is not more lawfulneſſe in your flight, then ſin in ours: you are your owne; wee our peoples: you are charged with a body, which you may not willingly leeſe, not hazard by ſtaying; wee with all their ſoules: which to hazard by abſence, is to loſe our owne: we muſt loue our liues; but not when they are riuals with our ſoules, or with others. How much better is it to bee dead, then negligent, then faithleſſe! If ſome bodies be contagiouſly ſicke, ſhall all ſoules bee wilfully neglected? There can be no time wherein good counſell is ſo ſeaſonable, ſo needfull. Euery threatning finds impreſſion, where the mind is prepared by ſenſible iudgements. When will the iron hearts of men bow, if not when they are heat in the flame of Gods affliction? now then to runne away from a neceſſary and publike good, to auoid a doubtfull and priuate euill, is to runne into a worſe euill then wee would auoid. He that will thus runne from Niniue to Tharſis, ſhall find a tempeſt, and a whale in his way. Not that I dare be an author to any, of the priuate viſitation of infected beds: I dare not without better warrant. VVho euer ſaid wee were bound to cloſe vp the dying eyes of euery departing Chriſtian? and vpon what-euer conditions, to heare their laſt grones? If we had a word, I would not debate of the ſucceſſe. Then, that were cowardlineſſe, which now is wiſedome. Is it no ſeruice, that wee publikely teach and exhort? that we priuately prepare men for death, and arme them againſt it? that our comfortable letters and meſſages ſtir vp their fainting hearts? that our loud voyces pierce their eares afarre; vnleſſe we feele their pulſes, and leane vpon their pillowes, and whiſper in their eares? Daniel is in the Lyons den; Is it nothing that Darius ſpeakes comfort to him thorow the grate, vnleſſe he goe in to ſalute him among thoſe fierce companions? A good Miniſter is the common goods: hee cannot make his life peculiar to one, without iniury to many. In the common cauſe of the Church, he muſt be no niggard of his life; in the priuate cauſe of a neighbours bodily ſickneſſe, he may ſoone be prodigall. A good father may not ſpend his ſubſtance on one child, and leaue the reſt beggers. If any man be reſolute in the contrary, I had rather praiſe his courage, then imitate his practice. I confeſſe, I feare; not ſo much death, as want of warrant for death.

To M. R. B.

Ep. X. A complaint of the iniquity of the Times; with a preſcription of the meanes to redreſſe it.

WHiles I accuſed the Times, you vndertooke their patronage. I commend your charity, not your cauſe. It is true: There was neuer any Age not complained of; neuer any that was not cenſured, as worſt. VVhat is, we ſee; what was, we neither inquire nor care. That which is out of ſight and vſe, is ſoone out of mind, and ere long out of memory. Yet the iniquity of others, cannot excuſe ours. And if you will be but as iuſt as charitable, you ſhall confeſſe, that both ſome times exceed others in euill; and these, all. This earthly Moone the Church hath her fuls and wainings, and sometimes her eclypses; whiles the shadow of this sinfull masse hides her beauty from the world. So long as she wadeth in this planetary world, it should be vaine to expect better: it is enough when she is fixed aboue, to be free from all change. This you yeeld: but nothing can perswade you, that shee is not now in the full of her glory. True: or else she were not subiect to this darkning. There was neuer more light of knowledge, neuer more darknesse of impiety: and there could not be such darknesse, if there were not such light. Goodnesse repulsed, giues height to sin: therefore are we worse then our predecessors, because we might be better. By how much our meanes are greater, by so much are our defects. Turne ouer all records; and parallell such helps, such care, such cost, such expectation, with such fruit, I yeeld: We see but our owne times: There was neuer but one Noah (whom the Heathen celebrate vnder another name) that with two faces saw both before and behind him: But loe, that Ancient of dayes, to whom all times are present, hath told vs, that these last shal be worst: Our experience iustifies him, with all but the wilfull. This censure (lest you should condemne my rigour, as vnnaturally partiall) is not confined to our seas; but, free and common, hath the same bounds with the earth. I ioy not in this large society. Would God we were euill alone. How few are those, whose cariage doth not say, that profession of any conscience is pusillanimity? How few that care so much, as to shew well? And yet of those few, how many care onely to seeme? whose words disagree from their actions, and their hearts from their words? Where shall a man mew vp himselfe, that he may not be a witnesse of what he would not? What can he see, or heare, and not bee either sad or guilty? Oathes striue for number with words; scoffes with oathes, vaine speeches with both. They are rare hands, that are free either from aspersions of blood, or spots of filthinesse. Let mee bee at once (as I vse) bold and plaine: VVanton excesse, excessiue pride, close Atheisme, impudent profaneneſſe, vnmercifull oppression, ouer-merciful conniuence, greedy couetousnesse, loose prodigality, simoniacall sacriledge, vnbridled luxury, beastly drunkennesse, bloody treachery, cunning fraud, slanderous detraction, enuious vnderminings, secret idolatry, hypocriticall fashionablenesse, haue spred themselues all ouer the world. The Sunne of peace looking vpon our vncleane heaps, hath bred these monsters, and hath giuen light to this brood of darknesse. Looke about you, and see if three great Idols, Honour, Pleasure, Gaine, haue not shared the earth amongst them, and left him least, whose all is. Your deniall driues mee to particulars. I vrge no further. If any aduersary insult in my confession, tell him, that I account them the greatest part of this euill; neither could thus complaine, if they were not. VVho knowes not, that as the earth is the dregs of the world, so Italy is the dregs of the earth, Rome of Italy? It is no wonder to finde Satan in his Hell; but to find him in Paradise, is vncouth, and grieuous. Let them alone that will dye and hate to be cured. For vs: O that remedies were as easie as complaints! That we could be as soone cleared, as conuinced! That the taking of the medicine were but so difficult as the prescription! And yet nothing hinders vs from health, but our wil: neither Gospell, nor Grace, nor Glory, are shut vp; onely our hearts are not open. Let me turne my stile from you, to the secure, to the peruerse, tho why doe I hope they will heare mee, that are deafe to God? they will regard words, that care not for iudgements? Let me tell them yet (if in vaine) they must breake, if they bow not: That if mercy may be refused, yet vengeance cannot be resisted: that God can serue himselfe of them perforce, neither to their thanke nor ease: that the present plagues doe but threaten worse. Lastly, that if they relent not, hell was not made for nothing. What should be done then? Except we would faine smart, each man amend one, and we all liue. How commonly doe men complaine, and yet adde to this heape? Redresse stands not in words. Let euery man pull but one brand out of this fire, and the flame will goe out alone. What is a multitude, but an heape of vnities? The more we deduce, the fewer we leaue. O how happy were it then, if euery man would begin at home, and take his owne heart to task, and at once be his owne Accuser, and Iudge; to condemne his priuate errors, yea to mulct them them with death! Till then, alas, what auailes it to talke? While euery man cenſures, and no man amends, what is it but buſie trifling? But tho our care muſt begin at our ſelues, it may not end there. Who but a Cain is not his brothers keeper? Publike perſons are not ſo much their owne, as others are theirs. Who ſits at the common ſterne, cannot diſtinguiſh betwixt the care of his owne ſafety, and his veſſels: both drowne at once, or at once ſalute the hauen. Ye Magiſtrates (for in you ſtand al our lower hopes) whom God hath on purpoſe, in a wiſe ſurrogation, ſet vpon earth, to correct her diſorders, take to your ſelues firme fore-heads, courageous hearts, hands buſie, and not partiall; to diſcountenance ſhameleſſe wickedneſſe, to reſiſt the violent ſway of euils, to execute wholeſome lawes, with ſtrictnes, with reſolutiō. The ſword of the Spirit meets with ſuch iron hearts, that it both enters not, and is rebated. Loe, it appeales to your arme, to your ayd. An earthen edge can beſt pierce this hardned earth: If iniquity die not by your hands, we periſh. And ye ſonnes of Leui gather to your Moſes in the gate of the Campe: conſecrate your hands to God in this holy ſlaughter of vice: Let your voice be both a trumpet to incite, and a two-edged ſword to wound and kill. Cry downe ſinne in earneſt, and thunder out of that ſacred chaire of Moſes; and let your liues ſpeake yet louder. Neither may the common Chriſtian ſit ſtill and looke on in ſilence: I am deceiued, if in this cauſe God allow any man for priuate. Here muſt bee all actors, no witneſſes. His diſcreet admonitions, ſeaſonable reproofes, and prayers neuer vnſeaſonable, beſides the power of honeſt example, are expected as his due tribute to the common health: What if we cannot turne the ſtreame? Yet we muſt ſwim againſt it: euen without conqueſt, it is glorious to haue reſiſted: in this alone, they are enemies, that doe nothing. Thus, as one that delights more in amendment, then excuſe, I haue both cenſured and directed. The fauour of your ſentence proceeds (I know) from your owne innocent vprightneſſe: So iudge of my ſeuere taxation. It ſhall be happy for vs, if wee can at once excuſe and diminiſh; accuſe and redreſſe iniquity. Let but the indeuour be ours, the ſucceſſe to GOD.

TO THE MOST HIGH AND EXCELLENT PRINCE, HENRY, PRINCE of WALES, All happineſſe.

MOſt Gratious Prince:

LEt me not (whiles I deſire to be dutifull) ſeeme importunate, in my dedications. I now bring to your Highneſſe theſe my laſt, and perhaps moſt materiall Letters: wherein, if I miſtake not, (as, how eaſily are wee deceiued in our owne?) the pleaſure of the variety ſhall ſtriue with the importance of matter. There is no worldly thing, I confeſſe, whereof I am more ambitious, then of your Highneſſes contentment; which that you place in goodneſſe, is not more your glory, then our ioy. Doe ſo ſtill, and heauen and earth ſhall agree to bleſſe you, and vs in you. For me, after this my officious boldneſſe, I ſhall betake my ſelfe in ſilence, to ſome greater worke, wherein I may approue my ſeruice to the Church, and to your Highneſſe, as her ſecond ioy and care. My heart ſhall be alwayes, and vpon all opportunities, my tongue and pen ſhall no leſſe gladly be deuoted to my gratious Maſter, as one

Who reioyce to be your Highneſſes (though vnworthy, yet) faithfull and obſequious Seruant,

THE

THE FIFT DECAD.

To my Lord Bishop of BATHE and WELLS.

EP. I. Discoursing of the causes and meanes of the increase of Poperie.

BY what meanes the Romish Religion hath in these later times preuailed so much ouer the world, (Right Reuerend and Honorable) is a consideration both weighty and vsefull; for hence may we frame our selues either to preuent, or imitate them: to imitate them in what we may; or preuent them in what they should not. I meddle not with the meanes of their first risings: the munificence of Christian Princes, the honest deuotions of wel-meaning Contributers, the diuision of the Christian world, the busie endeuours of forward Princes, for the recouerie of the Holy-land, with neglect of their own, the ambitious insinuations of that Sea, the farre and large dominion of those seuen hils; the compacted indulgence and conniuence of some treacherous, of other timorous Rulers; the shamelesse flatterie of Parasites; the rude ignorance of Times; or if there be any other of this kinde: My thoughts and words shall be spent vpon the present, and latest Age. All the world knowes, how that pretended Chaire of of Peter tottered, and cracked, some threescore yeares agoe, threatning a speedy ruine to her fearfull vsurper: How is it that still it stands, and seemes now to boast of some setlednesse? Certainly, if Hell had not contriued a new support, the Angell had long since said, It is fallen, it is fallen; and the Merchants, Alas, alas, the great Citie. The brood of that lame Loyola shall haue this miserable honour, without our enuy; that if they had not beene, Rome had not beene. By what meanes, it rests now to inquire.

It is not so much their zeale for falshood; which yet we acknowledge, and admire not. If Satan were not more busie then they, we had lost nothing. Their desperate attempts, bold intrusions, importunate sollicitations, haue not returned empty, yet their policy hath done more then their force. That Popish world was then foule, and debauched, as in doctrine, so in life; and now began to be ashamed of it selfe; When these holy Fathers, as some Saints dropt out of heauen, suddenly professed an vnusuall strictnesse, sad pietie, resolued mortification; and so drew the eyes and hearts of men after them, that poore soules began to thinke, it could not be other then diuine, which they taught; other then holy, which they touched. The very times (not seldome) giue as great aduantage, as our owne best strength: and the vices of others giue glory to those which either are, or appeare vertuous. They saw how ready the world was to bite at the bait; and now followed their successe, with new helps. Plenty of pretended miracles cles must blesse, on all sides, the endeuors of this new Sect; and cals for both approbation, and wonder. Those things by the report of their owne pens (other witnesses I see none) haue beene done by the ten Patriarkes of the Iesuitish Religion, both aliue and dead, which can hardly be matched of him, whose name they haue vsurped. And now the vulgar can say, If these men were not of God, they could doe nothing: How can a man that is a sinner doe such miracles? not distrusting either the fame, or the vvorke; but applauding the Authors, for what was said to be done. But now lest the enuy of the fact should surpasse the wonder, they haue learned to cast this glory vpon their woodden Ladies, and to communicate the gaine vnto the whole Religion: Two blockes at Hale and Scherpen heuuell, haue said and done more for Poperie, then all Friers, euer since Francis wore his breeches on his head. But because that praise is sweet, vvhich arises from the disgrace of a riuall; therefore this holy societie hath, besides, euer wont to honour it selfe by the brokage of shameless vntruths against the aduerse part; not caring how probable any report is, but how odious. A iust volume would not containe those willing lies, wherewith they haue purposely loaded religion, and vs; that the multitude might first hate vs, and then inquire: and these courses are held not tolerable, but meritorious. So the end may be attained, all meanes are iust; all wayes straight. Whom we may, we satisfie: but wounds once giuen are hardly healed without some scarres: and commonly accusations are vocall, Apologies dumbe. How easie is it to make any cause good, if we may take libertie of tongue and conscience? Yet lest some glimpse of our truth and innocence should perhaps lighten the eyes of some more inquisitiue Reader, they haue by strict prohibitions, whether of bookes, or conference, restrained all possibilitie of true informations: Yea their owne writings, vvherein our opinions are reported with confutation, are not allowed to the common view; lest if it should appeare vvhat we hold, our meere opinion should preuaile more then their subtilest answer. But aboue all, the restraint of Gods booke hath gained them most: If that might be in the hands of men, their religion could not be in their hearts; now, the concealement of Scriptures breeds ignorance, and ignorance superstition. But because forbiddance doth but whet desire, and worke a conceit of some secret excellence in things denied; therefore haue they deuised to affright this dangerous curiositie, vvith that cruell, butcherly, hellish inquisition; wherein yet there is not lesse craft then violence. For since they haue perceiued the blood of Martyrs to bee but the seede of the Church, and that these perfumes are more dispersed with beating; they haue now learned to murder without noise, and to bring forth (if at least they list sometimes to make the people priuy to some examples of terror) not men, but carcasses. Behold, the constant confessions of the dying Saints haue made them weary of publike executions: none but bare walles shall now testifie the courage and faith of our happy Martyrs. A disguised corpse is onely brought forth to the multitude, either for laughter, or feare. Yet because the very dead speake, for truth in a loud silence, these spectacles are rare; and the graues of heretikes are become as close as their death.

Yet lest (since neither liuing mouthes, nor faithfull pens may be suffered to insinuate any truth) those speeches should perhaps be receiued from the Ancients, which in vs were hereticall; the monuments of vnpartiall antiquitie must be depraued; all vvitnesses that might speake against them must be corrupted, with a fraudulent violence; and some of them purged to the death. So whiles ours are debarred, and the Ancients altered, posteritie shall acknowledge no aduersarie.

What should I speake of those plausible deuices, which they haue inuented, to make superstitious and fooliish Proselytes? Their proud vaunts of antiquitie, vniuersalitie, succession, and the name of their fore-fathers, doe not onely perswade, but amaze and besot an ignorant heart. The glorious shewes of their processions, the gaudy ornaments of their Altars, the pompe and magnificence of the places, and manner of their Seruices, the triumphs of their great Festiuals, are enough to bewitch any childish, simple, or vaine beholders. Who knowes not that nature is most led by sense? Sure, children and fooles (such are all meere naturall men) cannot be of any other Religion.

Besides

Besides all these, their personall vndertakings, vvhat for cunning, what for boldnesse, could promise nothing but successe. They can transforme themselues into all shapes, and in these false formes thrust themselues into all Courts, and companies; not oftner changing their habit, then their name. They can take the best opportunities to worke vpon those vvhich are either most vnable to resist, or most like to bestead them. That I may not speake of the wrongs of vnseasonable trauell; vvherein many vnsetled heads haue met dangers, and sollicited errors, who like fond and idle Dinahs, going abroad to gaze, haue been rauished ere their returne. Neuer was any bird so laid for by the nets and calls of the fowler, as the great heire of some noble family, or some fiery vvit, is by these impostors. They know that greatnesse is both lawlesse, and commanding; if not by precept, yet by example: their very silence is perswasorie, and imperious. But alas for that other sex: Still the Deuill begins with Eue; still his assault is strongest, where is weakest resistance. Simon Magus had his Helena, Nicolas the Deacon had his choros fœmineos, (as Hierome calls them) Marcion had his Factoresse at Rome; Appelles his Philumena, Montanus his Prisca and Maximilla; Arrius his Constantines sister, Donatus his Lucilla, Elpidius his Agape, Priscillianus his Galla: and our Iesuites haue their painted Ladies (not dead, but liuing) both forobiects and instruments. When they saw they could not blow vp religion with French powder into heauen, they now try by this Moabitish plot to sinke it downe to Hell. Those silly women, which are laden with sinnes, and diuers lusts, must now be the stales of their spirituall fornications: But for that these enterprises want not danger, that both parts may securely succeed, behold publique libertie of dispensations, vvhether for diffen[illegible] religion, or not vnprofitable filthinesse. These meanes are (like the Authors) dish-meat, and go[illegible]. Adde (if you please) hereto, those which pretend more innocent [illegible] their commendatory dances vpon one Commander, their intelligences giuen, their [illegible] receiued, their rewards and honours (perhaps of the Calender, perhaps of a [illegible] Hat) duely conferred. Neither may the least helpe be ascribed to the conference of studies; (the conioyned labours of whole Societies directed to one end, and shrouded vnder the title of one Author) to large maintenances, raised from the death-beds of some guilty benefactors: from whence flow both infinite numbers, and incomparable helps, of Students. Vnder which head, for the time past, not a few are moued by the remembrance of the bounteous hospitalitie of the religious; who hauing ingrossed the vvorld to themselues, seemed liberall in giuing some thing; like vnto some vaine-glorious theeues, which hauing robbed wealthy Merchants, bestow some pence vpon beggers. Further, the smothering, if not composing of their frequent strifes, and confining of brawles within their owne thresholds; vvith the nice menaging of their knowne oppositions, hath wonne many ignorant friends. Lastly, the excellent correspondence of their doctrines vnto nature, hath been their best sollicitor. We haue examined particulars in a former Epistle: vvherein wee haue made it euident, that Popery affects nothing but to make Nature either proud, or vvanton: it offers difficulties, but carnall; and such as the greatest louer of himselfe would easily embrace for an aduantage. That we may therefore summe vp all; I need not accuse our carelesnesse, indifferencie, idlenesse, loose cariage; in all vvhich, would God wee had not aided them, and wronged our selues; nor yet their zeale and forwardnesse, worse meanes are guilty of their gaine. In short, the faire outside which they set vpon Religion, which sure is the best they haue, if not all; their pretended miracles, vvilfull vntruths, strait prohibitions, bloody and secret inquisitions, deprauations of ancient witnesses, expurgation of their owne, gay and garish sights, glorious titles, crafty changes of names, shapes, habits, conditions; insinuations to the great, oppugnation of the vveaker sexe; falshood of answers, and oathes, dispensations for sinnes, vniting of forces, concealing of differences, largenesse of contributions, multitude of actors, and meanes, accordances to mens naturall dispositions: Where we on the contrarie care not to seeme but to be, disclaime miracles, dare not saue the life of Religion with a lye; giue free scope to all pens, to all tongues, to all eyes: shed no blood for Religion: suffer all Writers to speake like themthemſelues; ſhew nothing but poore ſimplicitie in our deuotions; goe euer, and looke, as we are; reach the truth right-downe in an honeſt plainneſſe, take no vantage of imbecilitie; ſweare true, though we die; giue no hope of indulgence for euill; ſtudy each retired to himſelfe, and the Muſes; publiſh our quarrels, and aggrauate them; anger nature, and conquer it. Such gaine ſhall be grauell in their throats: ſuch loſſes to vs (in our not daring to ſinne) ſhall bee happy and victorious; in all other regards are both blame-worthy, and recouerable. What dulneſſe is this? Haue wee ſuch a King, as in theſe liſts of Controuerſie, may dare to grapple with that great infallible Vicar, for his triple Crowne; ſuch Biſhops as may iuſtly challenge the whole Conſiſtorie of Rome; ſo many learned Doctors, and Diuines, as no Nation vnder heauen, more; ſo flouriſhing Vniuerſities, as Chriſtendome hath none; ſuch bleſſed opportunities, ſuch incouragements; and now when we want nothing elſe, ſhall we be vvanting to our ſelues? Yea aboue all theſe, the God of heauen fauours vs; and doe wee languiſh? The cauſe is his, and in ſpight of the gates of hell ſhall ſucceed, though wee were not: our neglect may ſlacken the paſe of truth, cannot ſtay the paſſage. Why are we not as buſie, as ſubtill, more reſolute? Such ſpirits, and ſuch hands as yours (Reuerend Lord) muſt put life into the cold breaſts of this frozen generation, and raiſe them vp to ſuch thoughts and endeuours, as may make the emulation of our aduerſaries equall to their enmitie.

To my Lord Biſhop of WORCESTER.

EP. II. Shewing the differences of the preſent Church from the Apoſtolicall; and needleſneſſe of our conformity thereto in all things.

I Feare not to ſay, thoſe men are but ſuperſtitiouſly curious (Right Reuerend, and Honorable) which would call backe all circumſtances to their firſt patternes. The Spouſe of Chriſt hath been euer cloathed with her own rites: and as apparell, ſo Religion hath her faſhions, variable according to ages and places. To reduce vs to the ſame obſeruations which were in Apoſtolicall vſe, were no better then to tie vs to the ſandals of the Diſciples, or ſeamleſſe coat of our Sauiour. In theſe caſes, they did what we need not; and we may, what they did not: God meant vs no bondage in their example: their Canons binde vs, whether for manners, or doctrine, not their Ceremonies. Neither Chriſt, nor his Apoſtles, did all things for imitation: I ſpeake not of miraculous acts. We need not be ſilent before a Iudge, as Chriſt was; we need not take a towell, and gird our ſelues, and waſh our ſeruants feet, as Chriſt did; we need not make tents for our liuing, as Paul; nor goe armed, as Peter; nor carry about our wiues, as he, and the other Apoſtles. I acknowledge the ground not onely of ſeparation, but Anabaptiſme, and wonder that theſe conceits doe not anſwer themſelues. Who can chuſe but ſee a manifeſt difference betwixt thoſe lawes, which Chriſt and his great Ambaſſadors made for eternall vſe, and thoſe rituall matters, which were confined to place and time? Euery Nation, euery perſon ſinnes that obſerues not thoſe; Theſe for the moſt part, are not kept of the moſt; and are as well left without ſinne by vs, as vſed without preſcription or neceſſitie by the Authors. Some of them we cannot doe: others we need not: which of vs can caſt out deuils by command? Who can cure the ſicke by oyntment, and impoſition of hands? The Diſciples did it. All thoſe Acts vvhich proceeded from ſupernaturall priuiledge, ceaſed with their cauſe: who now dare vndertake to continue them? Vnleſſe perhaps ſome bold Papiſts, who haue brought in groſſe groſſe magick in ſtead of miraculous authoritie; and daub very carcaſes in ſtead of healing diſeaſes. There be more yet which we need not do. What need we to chooſe Miniſters by lot? What need we to diſclaime all peculiaritie in goods? What need wee to Chriſten in riuers; or to meet vpon their bankes? What need we to receiue Gods Supper after our owne? What to leane in each others boſome vvhile we receiue it? what to abhorre leauen in that holy Bread? what to celebrate loue-feaſts vpon the receipt? what to abſtaine from all ſtrangled and blood? vvhat to depend vpon a maintenance arbitrarie, and vncertaine? vvhat to ſpend our dayes in a perpetuall pererration, as not onely the Apoſtles, but the Prophets and Euangeliſts ſome ages after Chriſt? whoſoeuer would impoſe all theſe on vs, he ſhould ſurely make vs, not the ſonnes, but the ſlaues of the Apoſtles. Gods Church neuer her ſelfe in ſuch ſeruile termes; yea Chriſt himſelfe gaue at firſt ſome precepts of this nature, which he reuerſed ere long: when he ſent the Diſciples to preach, he charges: Take not gold, nor ſiluer, nor money in your girdles; afterwards Iudas caried the bagge. He charges, not to take ſo much as a ſtaffe; yet after behold two ſwords: ſhould the Diſciples haue held their Maſter to his own rule? Is it neceſſary that what he once commanded, ſhould bee obſerued alwayes? The very next Age to theſe Chriſtian Patriarks, neither would nor durſt haue ſo much varied her rites, or augmented them; if it had found it ſelfe tyed either to number, or kinde: As yet it was pure, chaſte, and (which was ground of all) perſecuted. The Church of Rome diſtributed the ſacramentall Bread: the Church of Alexandria permitted the people to take it: the Churches of Affricke and Rome, mixed their holy wine with water; other colder Regions dranke it pure. Some kneeled in their prayers, others fell proſtrate; and ſome lifted vp eyes, hands, feet towards heauen: ſome kept their Eaſter according to the Iewiſh vſe, the fourteenth of March; the French (as Nicephorus) the eight of the Calends of April, in a ſet ſolemnitie: the Church of Rome the Sunday after the fourteenth Moone; which yet (as Socrates truely writes) was neuer reſtrained by any Goſpel, by any Apoſtle. That Romiſh Victor ouercame the other world in this point, with too much rigour; whoſe cenſure therefore of the Aſian Churches was iuſtly cenſured by Irenæus. What ſhould I ſpeake of their difference of faſts? there can ſcarce be more varietie in dayes, or meats. It hath euer been thus ſeene, according to our Anſelmes rule, that the multitude of different ceremonies in all Churches, hath iuſtly commended their vnitie in faith. The French Diuines preach couered (vpon the ſame rule which required the Corinthians to be vncouered) we bare: The Dutch ſit at the Sacrament, vve kneele; Geneua vſeth wafers, we leauened bread; they common veſtures in Diuine ſeruice, wee peculiar: each is free: no one doth either blame, or ouer-rule others. I cannot but commend thoſe very Nouatian Biſhops (though it is a wonder any precedent of peace ſhould fall from Schiſmaticks) who meeting in Councell together, enacted that Canon of indifferencie, when the Church was diſtracted with the differences of her Paſchal ſolemnities; concluding, how inſufficient this cauſe was to diſquiet the Church of Chriſt. Their owne iſſue (our Separatiſts) will needs be vnlike them in good; and ſtriue to a further diſtance from peace: whiles in a conceit not leſſe idle, then ſcrupulous, they preſſe vs to an vniforme conformity in our faſhions to the Apoſtles. Their own practice condemnes them: They call for ſome, and yet keepe not all: yet the ſame reaſon inforces all, that pleads for ſome: and that vvhich warrants the forbearance of ſome, holds for all. Thoſe tooles which ſerue for the foundation are not of vſe for the roofe. Yea the great maſter-builder choſe thoſe workmen for the firſt ſtones, which he meant not to imploy in the walls. Doe we not ſee all Chriſts firſt agents extraordinary; Apoſtles, Euangeliſts, Prophets, Propheteſſes? See we not fiery and clouen tongues deſcending? What Church euer ſince boaſted of ſuch founders, of ſuch means? Why would God begin with thoſe which he meant not to continue; but to ſhew vs we may not alwayes look for one face of things? The nurſe feeds and tends her child at firſt; afterward hee is vndertaken by the diſcipline of a Tutor: muſt he be alwayes vnder the ſpoone, and ferule, becauſe he began ſo? If he haue good breeding, it matters not by whoſe hands. Who can denie, that we haue the ſubſtance of all thoſe royall lawes, which Chriſt and his Apoſtles left to his Church; What doe we now thus importunately catching at ſhadowes? If there had been a neceſsitie of hauing what we want, or vvanting what we haue, let vs not ſo farre vvrong the wiſdom and perfection of the Law-giuer, as to thinke he would not haue inioyned that, and forbidden this. His ſilence in both argues his indifferencie, and calls for ours; which vvhile it is not peaceably entertained, there is clamour without profit, malice without cauſe, and ſtrife without end.

To my Lady MARY. DENNY.

EP. III. Containing the deſcription of a Chriſtian, and his differences from the worldling.

MADAM:

IT is true that worldly eyes can ſee no difference betwixt a Chriſtian, & another man; the out-ſide of both is made of one clay, and caſt in one mould; both are inſpired with one common breath: Outward euents diſtinguiſh them not; thoſe, God neuer made for euidences of loue or hatred. So the ſenſes can perceiue no difference betwixt the reaſonable ſoule, and that which informes the beaſt: yet the ſoule knowes there is much more, then betwixt their bodies. The ſame holds in this: Faith ſees more inward difference, then the eye ſees outward reſemblance. This point is not more high then materiall: which that it may appeare, let me ſhew what it is to be a Chriſtian: You that haue felt it, can ſecond mee with your experience; and ſupply the defects of my diſcourſe. He is the liuing temple of the liuing God, where the Deity is both reſident and worſhipped. The higheſt thing in a man is his own ſpirit; but in a Chriſtian the ſpirit of God, which is the God of ſpirits. No grace is wanting in him; and thoſe which there are, want not ſtirring vp. Both his heart and his hands are cleane: All his outward purity flowes from within; neither doth he frame his ſoule to counterfet good actions; but out of his holy diſpoſition commands and produces them, in the light of God. Let vs begin with his beginning, and fetch the Chriſtian out of his nature, as another Abraham from his Chaldea; whiles the worldling liues and dies, in nature, out of God. The true conuert therefore, after his wylde and ſecure courſes, puts himſelfe (through the motions of Gods Spirit) to ſchoole vnto the Law; there hee learnes what he ſhould haue done, what he could not do, what he hath done, what he hath deſerued. Theſe leſſons coſt him many a ſtripe, & many a teare, and not more griefe then terror: for this ſharpe maſter makes him feele what ſinne is, and what hell is, and in regard of both, what himſelfe is. When he hath vvell ſmarted vnder the whip of this ſeuere vſher, and is made vile enough in himſelf, then is he led vp into the higher ſchoole of Chriſt, and there taught the comfortable leſſons of grace; there hee learnes vvhat belongs to a Sauiour, what one he is, what he hath done, and for whom, how he became ours, vvhose his: and now finding himſelfe in a true ſtate of danger, of humilitie, of need, of deſire, of fitneſſe for Chriſt, he brings home to himſelfe all that he learnes, and what he knowes, he applyes. His former Tutor he feared, this he loueth; that ſhewed him his wounds, yea made them; this binds and heales them: that killed him; this ſhewes him life, and leades him to it. Now at once he hates himſelfe, defies Satan, truſts to Chriſt, makes account both of pardon & glory. This is his moſt precious Faith, whereby he appropriates, yea ingroſſes Chriſt Ieſus to himſelfe: whence he is iuſtified from his ſinnes, purified from his corruptions, eſtabliſhed in his reſolutions, comforted in his doubts, defended againſt temptations, ouercomes all his enemies. Which vertue, as it is moſt imployed, and moſt oppoſed, ſo caries the moſt care from the Chriſtian heart, that it be ſound, liuely, growing: ſound, not rotten, not hollow, not preſumptuous:

ſound in the act; not a ſuperficiall conceit, but a true, deepe, and ſenſible apprehenſion; an apprehenſion, not of the braine, but of the heart; and of the heart not approuing, or aſſenting, but truſting and repoſing. Sound in the obiect, none but Chriſt: he knowes, that no friendſhip in heauen can doe him good, without this? The Angels cannot: God will not: Ye beleeue in the Father, beleeue alſo in me.

Liuely; for it cannot giue life, vnleſſe it haue life; the faith that is not fruitfull, is dead: the fruits of faith are good workes; whether inward, within the roofe of the heart, as loue, awe, ſorrow, pietie, zeale, ioy, and the reſt; or outward towards God, or our brethren: obedience and ſeruice to the one; to the other reliefe and beneficence: Theſe he beares in his time; ſometimes all, but alwayes ſome.

Growing: true faith cannot ſtand ſtill; but as it is fruitfull in workes, ſo it increaſeth in degrees; from a little ſeed it proues a large plant, reaching from earth to heauen, and from one heauen to another: euery ſhower and euery Sun addes ſomething to it. Neither is this grace euer ſolitarie, but alwayes attended royally: for that he beleeues what a Sauiour he hath, cannot but loue him; and he that loues him, cannot but hate whatſoeuer may diſpleaſe him; cannot but reioyce in him, and hope to enioy him, and deſire to enioy his hope, and contemne all thoſe vanities which he once deſired and enioyed. His minde now ſcorneth to grouell vpon earth, but ſoareth vp to the things aboue, where Chriſt ſits at the right hand of God; and after it hath ſeene what is done in heauen lookes ſtrangely vpon all worldly things. He dare truſt his faith aboue his reaſon, and ſenſe: and hath learned to weane his appetite from crauing much. Hee ſtands in awe of his own conſcience, and dare no more offend it, then not diſpleaſe himſelfe. He feares not his enemies, yet neglects them not; equally auoiding ſecurity, and timorouſneſſe. He ſees him that is inuiſible; and walks with him awfully, familiarly. He knowes what he is borne to, and therefore digeſts the miſeries of his wardſhip, with patience: he findes more comfort in his afflictions, then any worldling in pleaſures. And as hee hath theſe graces to comfort him within, ſo hath hee the Angels to attend him without; ſpirits better then his owne; more powerfull, more glorious: Theſe beare him in their armes, wake by his bed, keepe his ſoule while he hath it, and receiue it when it leaues him. Theſe are ſome preſent differences: the greateſt are future; which could not be ſo great, if themſelues were not witneſſes; no leſſe then betwixt heauen and hell, torment and glory, an incorruptible crowne, and fire vnquenchable. Whether Infidels beleeue theſe things or no, we know them: ſo ſhall they, but too late. What remaines but that we applaud our ſelues in this happineſſe, and walke on cheerily in this heauenly profeſſion? acknowledging that God could not do more for vs; and that we cannot doe enough for him. Let others boaſt (as your Ladiſhip might with others) of ancient and Noble Houſes, large patrimonies, or dowries, honorable commands, others of famous names, high and enuied honours, or the fauours of the greateſt; others of vilour or beauty, or ſome perhaps of eminent learning and wit; it ſhall be our pride that we are Chriſtians.

To my Lady HONORIA HAY.

EP. IV. Diſcourſing of the neceſſitie of Baptiſme; and the eſtate of thoſe which neceſſarily want it.

MADAM:

METhinks children are like teeth, troubleſome both in the breeding, and loſing, and oftentimes painfull while they ſtand: yet ſuch, as wee neither would, nor can well be without. I goe not about to comfort you thus late, for your loſſe: I rather congratulate gratulate your wise moderation, and Christian care of these first spirituall priuiledges; desiring onely to satisfie you in what you heard as a witnesse; not in what you needed as a mother. Children are the blessings of Parents, and Baptisme is the blessing of children, and parents: wherein there is not onely vse, but necessitie; necessitie, not in respect so much of the end, as of the precept: God hath enioyned it, to the comfort of parents, and behoose of children: which therefore, as it may not be superstitiously hastened, so not negligently deferred. That the contempt of baptisme damneth, is past all doubt; but that the constrained absence thereof, should send infants to hell, is a cruell rashnesse. It is not their sinne to die early: death is a punishment, not an offence; an effect of sinne, not a cause of torment; they want nothing but time; which they could not command. Because they could not liue a while longer, that therefore they should die euerlastingly, is the hard sentence of a bloody religion. I am onely sorie, that so harsh an opinion should bee graced with the name of a Father, so reuerend, so diuine: whose sentence yet let no man plead by halues. He who held it vnpossible for a childe to be saued vnlesse the baptismall water were powred on his face, held it also as vnpossible, for the same Infant, vnlesse the sacramentall bread were receiued into his mouth. There is the same ground for both, the same error in both, a weaknesse fit for forgetfulnesse; see yet how ignorant, or ill-meaning posterity, could single out one halfe of the opinion for truth, and condemne the other of falshood. In spight of whom, one part shall easily conuince the other; yea, without all force: since both cannot stand, both will fall together, for company. The same mouth, which said, Vnlesse yee be borne-againe of water, and the Holy Ghost, said also, Except yee eat the flesh of the Sonne of Man, and drinke his blood: an equall necessitie of both. And lest any should plead different interpretations, the same S. Austin auerres this later opinion also, concerning the necessary communicating of children, to haue been once the common iudgement of the Church of Rome: A sentence so displeasing, that you shall finde the memory of it noted vvith a blacke coale, and wip't out in that infamous bill of Expurgations. Had the ancient Church held this desperate sequele, what strange, and yet wilfull cruelty had it beene in them, to deferre baptisme a whole yeare long: till Easter, or that Sunday, which hath his name (I thinke) from the white robes of the baptised?

Yea what an aduenture vvas it in some, to adiourne it till their age (with Constantine) if being vnsure of their life, they had been sure the prevention of death would haue inferred damnation? Looke vnto that legall Sacrament of circumcision, which (contrary to the fancies of our Anabaptists) directly answers this Euangelicall. Before the eight day, they could not be circumcised: before the eight day they might die. If dying the seuenth day, they were necessarily condemned: either the want of a day is a sinne, or God sometimes condemneth not for sinne: Neither of them possible, neither according with the iustice of the Law-giuer. Or if from this parallel, you please to looke either to reason or example, the case is cleere. Reason; no man that hath faith, can be condemned, for Christ dwels in our hearts by faith: and hee in whom Christ dwels, cannot be a reprobate. Now it is possible a man may haue a sauing faith, before baptisme: Abraham first beleeued to iustification: then after receiued the signe of circumcision, as a seale of the righteousnes of that faith, which he had when he was vncircumcised: Therefore some dying before their baptisme, may, yea must be saued. Neither was Abrahams case singular; he was the Father of all them also, which beleeue, not being circumcised: these, as they are his Sonnes in faith, so in righteousnesse, so in saluation: vncircumcision cannot hinder, where faith admitteth; These following his steps of beliefe before the Sacrament, shall doubtlesse rest in his bosome, without the Sacrament; without it, as fatally absent, not as willingly neglected. It is not the water, but the faith: not the putting away the filth of the flesh (saith S. Peter) but the stipulation of a good conscience; for who takes Baptisme without a full faith (saith Hierom) takes the water, takes not the spirit; Whence is this so great vertue of the water, that it should touch the body, and cleanse the heart (saith Austin) vnlesse by the power of the word; not spoken, but beleeued? Thou seest water (saith Ambrose:) euery water heales not; that water onely heales which hath the grace of God annexed; And if there bee any grace in the water (ſaith Baſil) it is not of the nature of the water, but of the preſence of the Spirit. Baptiſme is indeed, as Saint Ambroſe ſtiles it, the pawne and image of our reſurrection; yea (as Baſil) the power of God to reſurrection: but (as Ignatius expounds this phraſe aright) beleeuing in his death, we are by baptiſme made partakers of his reſurrection. Baptiſme therefore without faith cannot ſaue a man, and by faith doth ſaue him: and faith without baptiſme (where it cannot bee had; not where it may be had, and is contemned) may ſaue him: That ſpirit which workes by meanes, will not be tyed to meanes.

Examples. Caſt your eyes vpon that good thiefe; good in his death, though in his life abominable: he was neuer waſhed in Iordan, yet is receiued into Paradiſe; his ſoule was ſoule with rapines, and iniuſtice, yea bloody with murders: and yet being ſcoured onely with the blood of his Sauior, not with water of baptiſme, it is preſented glorious to God. I ſay nothing of the ſoules of Traian, and Falconella, meere heathens, liuing and dying without Chriſt, without baptiſme: which yet their honeſt Legend reports to be deliuered from hell, tranſported to heauen, not ſo much as ſcorched in Purgatory: The one by the prayers of Gregory, the other of Tecla. What partiality is this, to deny that to the children of Chriſtians, which they grant to knowne Infidels? The promiſe is made to vs, and our ſeed: not to thoſe that are without the pale of the Church. Thoſe Innocents which were maſſacred for Chriſt, are by them canonized for Saints, and make one day in their Kalendar (each yeare) both holy, and diſmall; whereof yet ſcarce any liued to know water, none to know baptiſme. Yea, all Martyrs are here priuiledged; who are Chriſtened in their owne blood, in ſtead of water: but where hath God ſaid, All that die without baptiſme, ſhall die for euer, except Martyrs; why not, except beleeuers? It is faith that giues life to Martyrs; which if they ſhould vvant, their firſt death could not auoid the ſecond. Ambroſe doubted not to ſay, his Valentinian was baptiſed becauſe he deſired it; not becauſe he had it: he knew the mind of God; who accounts vs to haue what we vnfainedly wiſh. Children cannot liue to deſire baptiſme: if their Parents deſire it for them, why may not the deſire of others be theirs, as well as (according to Auſtins opinion) the faith of others beleeuing, and the mouth of others confeſſing? In theſe caſes therefore, of any ſoules but our owne, it is ſafe to ſuſpend, and dangerous to paſſe iudgement. Secret things to God: He that made all ſoules, knowes vvhat to doe vvith them, neither will make vs of counſell: But if wee define either way, the errors of charitie are inoffenſiue. We muſt honour good means, and vſe them, and in their neceſſarie want depend vpon him, who can vvorke, beyond, vvithout, againſt meanes.

Thus haue I endeuoured your Ladiſhips ſatisfaction in what you heard, not without ſome ſcruple. If any man ſhall blame my choice in troubling you with a thornie and ſcholaſticall diſcourſe, let him know that I haue learned this faſhion of Saint Hierome the Oracle of Antiquitie, vvho was vvont to entertaine his Paula and Euſtochium, Marcella, Principia Hedibia, and other deuout Ladies, with learned canuaſes of the deepe points of Diuinitie. This is not ſo perplexed, that it need to offend: nor ſo vnneceſſary, that it may be vnknowne.

To Sir RICHARD LEA, ſince deceaſed.

EP. V. Diſcourſing of the comfortable remedies of all afflictions.

WISE men ſeeke remedies before their diſeaſe: ſenſible patients, when they begin to complaine: fooles, too late. Afflictions are the common maladies of Chriſtians:

ſtians: Theſe you feele, and vpon the firſt groanes ſeeke for eaſe. Wherefore ſerues the tongue of the learned, but to ſpeake words in ſeaſon? I am a Scholler of thoſe that can comfort you: If you ſhall, vvith me, take out my leſſons, neither of vs ſhal repent it. You ſmart and complaine: take heed leſt too much. There is no affliction not grieuous: the bone that vvas diſioynted, cannot bee ſet right without paine. No potion can cure vs, if it worke not: it vvorkes not, except it make vs ſicke: we are contented with that ſickneſſe, which is the vvay to health. There is a vexation without hurt: ſuch is this: We are afflicted, not ouer-preſſed; needie, not deſperate; perſecuted, not forſaken; caſt downe, but periſh not. How ſhould we, vvhen all the euill in a Citie comes from the prouidence of a good God; which can neither be impotent, nor vnmercifull? It is the Lord: let him doe vvhat hee will. Woe were vs if euils could come by chance; or were let looſe to alight where they liſt: now they are ouer-ruled; wee are ſafe. The deſtinie of our ſorrowes is written in heauen by a vviſe and eternall decree: Behold, he that hath ordained, moderates them. A faithfull God, that giues an iſſue vvith the tentation: An iſſue, both of their end, and their ſucceſſe. He chides not alwayes, much leſſe ſtriketh. Our light afflictions are but for a moment; not ſo long, in reſpect of our vacancy, and reſt. If wee weepe ſometimes, our teares are precious; As they ſhall neuer be dry in his bottle, ſo they ſhall ſoone be dry vpon our cheekes. He that wrings them from vs, ſhall vvipe them off: how ſweetly doth hee interchange our ſorrowes, and ioyes, that we may neither be vaine, nor miſerable? It is true; To be ſtrooke, once in anger, is fearfull: his diſpleaſure is more then his blow: In both, our God is a conſuming fire. Feare not, theſe ſtripes are the tokens of his loue: he is no Sonne, that is not beaten; yea till he ſmart, and cry; if not till he bleed: no Parent corrects anothers childe; and he is no good Parent that corrects not his owne. Oh rod worthy to be kiſſed, that aſſures vs of his loue, of our adoption! What ſpeake I of no hurt? ſhort praiſes doe but diſcommend; I ſay more, theſe euils are good: looke to their effects. What is good, if not patience? affliction is the mother of it; tribulation bringeth forth patience. What can earth or heauen yeeld better then the aſſurance of Gods Spirit: Afflictions argue, yea ſeale this to vs. Wherein ſtands perfect happineſſe, if not in our neere reſemblance of Chriſt? Why was man created happy, but becauſe in Gods image? The glory of Paradiſe, the beauty of his body, the duty of the creatures, could not giue him felicitie, without the likeneſſe to his Creator. Behold, what wee loſt in our height, wee recouer in our miſerie; a conformitie to the image of the Sonne of God: he that is not like his elder brother, ſhall neuer be coheire with him. Loe, his ſide, temples, hands, feet, all bleeding: his face blubbred, ghaſtly, and ſpitted on: his skin all pearled with a bloody ſweat, his head drouping, his ſoule heauy to the death: ſee you the vvorldling merry, ſoft, delicate, perfumed, neuer wrinkled with ſorrow, neuer humbled with afflictions? What reſemblance is here, yea what contrarietie? Eaſe ſlayeth the foole; it hath made him reſty, and leaues him miſerable. Be not deceiued; No man can follow Chriſt without his Croſſe, much leſſe reach him; and if none ſhall raigne with Chriſt, but thoſe that ſuffer vvith him, what ſhall become of theſe iolly ones? Goe now thou dainty worldling, and pleaſe thy ſelfe in thy happineſſe, laugh alwayes, and be euer applauded; It is a wofull felicitie that thou ſhalt finde in oppoſition to thy Redeemer: He hath ſaid, Woe to them that laugh: Beleeueſt thou, and doſt not weepe at thy laughter? and with Salomon, condemne it of madneſſe? And againe, with the ſame breath, Bleſſed are yee that weepe: who can beleeue this, and not reioyce in his owne teares, and not pitie the faint ſmiles of the godleſſe? Why bleſſed? For ye ſhall laugh: Behold, wee that weepe on earth, ſhall laugh in heauen: we that now weepe vvith men, ſhall laugh vvith Angels; while the fleering worldling, ſhall be gnaſhing, and howling with Diuels: we that weepe for a time, ſhall laugh for euer: who would not be content to deferre his ioy a little, that it may be perpetuall, and infinite? What mad man would purchaſe this crackling of thornes (ſuch is the vvorldlings ioy) with eternall ſhrieking and torment? hee that is the doore and the way, hath taught vs, that through many afflictions wee muſt enter into into heauen. There is but one passage, and that a strait one: If with much pressure vvee can get through, and leaue but our superfluous ragges as torne from vs in the crowd, we are happy. He that made heauen, hath on purpose thus framed it; wide when wee are entred, and glorious: narrow and hard in the entrance: that after our paine, our glory might be sweeter. And if before-hand you can climbe vp thither in your thoughts; looke about you, you shall see no more Palmes, then crosses: you shall see none crowned, but those that haue wrestled with crosses and sorrowes, to sweat, yea to blood; and haue ouercome. All runnes here to the ouer-comer: and ouercomming implyes both fighting and successe. Gird vp your loynes therefore, and strengthen your weake knees: resolue to fight for heauen, to suffer fighting, to persist in suffering; so persisting you shall ouercome, and ouercomming, you shall be crowned. Oh reward truely great, aboue desert, yea aboue conceit! A crowne for a few groanes: An eternal crowne of life and glory, for a short and momentany suffering: How iust is Saint Pauls account, that the afflictions of this present life are not worthy of the glory which shal be shewed vnto vs? O Lord let me smart that I may reigne; vphold thou mee in smarting, that thou mayest hold me worthy of reigning. It is no matter how vile I be, so I may be glorious. What say you? would you not be afflicted? Whether had you rather mourne for a vvhile, or for euer? One must be chosen: the election is easie: Whether had you rather reioyce for one fit, or alwayes? You would doe both. Pardon me, it is a fond couetousnesse, and idle singularitie to affect it. What? That you alone may fare better then all Gods Saints? That God should strew Carpets for your nice feet onely, to walke into your heauen, and make that way smooth for you, which all Patriarkes, Prophets, Euangelists, Confessors, Christ himselfe, haue found rugged and bloodie? Away with this selfe-loue; and come downe you ambitious sonnes of Zebedee: and ere you thinke of sitting neere the Throne, be content to be called vnto the Cup. Now is your tryall: Let your Sauiour see how much of his bitter potion you can pledge; then shall you see how much of his glory he can afford you. Be content to drinke of his vineger and gall, and you shall drinke new wine with him in his Kingdome.

To Mr Peter Moulin, Preacher of the Church at Paris.

Ep. VI. Discoursing of the late French occurrents, and what vse God expects to bee made of them.

SInce your trauels here with vs, we haue not forgotten you; but since that, your vvittie and learned trauels in the common affaires of Religion haue made your memorie both fresh, and blessed. Behold, whiles your hand vvas happily busie in the defence of our King, the heads and hands of traitors vvere busie in the massacring of your owne. God doth no memorable and publike act, which hee would not haue talked of, read, construed of all the world. How much more of neighbors, whom scarce a sea seuereth from each other? how much yet more of brethren, whom neither land, nor sea, can seuer? Your dangers, and feares, and griefes haue beene ours: All the salt water that runnes betwixt vs, cannot vvash off our interest in all your common causes: The deadly blow of that miscreant (vvhose name is iustly sentenced to forgetfulnesse) pierced euen our sides. Who hath not bled within himselfe, to thinke that he, which had so victoriously out-liued the swords of enemies, should fall by the knife of a villaine? and that hee should die in the peaceable streets, vvhom no no fields could kill? that all thoſe honorable and happy triumphs ſhould end in ſo baſe a violence? But oh our idleneſſe and impietie, if we ſee not a diuine hand from aboue, ſtriking vvith this hand of diſloyaltie. Sparrowes fall not to the ground vvithout him, much leſſe Kings. One dyes by a tyle-ſheard, another by the ſplinters of a Launce, one by Lice, another by a Fly, one by poiſon, another by a knife; What are all theſe but the executioners of that great God, vvhich hath ſaid, Ye are Gods, but ye ſhall die like men? Perhaps God ſaw (that we may gueſſe modeſtly at the reaſons of his acts) you repoſed too much, in this arme of fleſh; or perhaps he ſaw this ſcourge would haue beene too early, to thoſe enemies, whoſe ſinne, though great, yet was not full: or perhaps hee ſaw, that if that great ſpirit had beene deliberately yeelded in his bed, you ſhould not haue ſlept in yours: Or perhaps the ancient conniuence at thoſe ſtreames of blood, from your too common Duels was now called to reckoning; or, it may be, that weake reuolt from the truth. He whoſe the rod vvas, knowes why he ſtrooke: yet may it not paſſe without a note, that he fell by that religion, to vvhich he fell. How many Ages might that great Monarch haue liued (vvhatſoeuer the ripe head of your more then mellow Cotton could imagine) ere his leaſt finger ſhould haue bled, by the hand of an Huguenot? All religions may haue ſome monſters: but bleſſed bee the God of heauen, ours ſhall neuer yeeld that good Ieſuite, either a Mariana to teach treaſon, or a Rauillac to act it. But vvhat is that we heare? It is no maruell: That holy ſocietie is a fit Gardian for the hearts of Kings: I dare ſay, none more loues to ſee them: none takes more care to purchaſe them. How happy were that Chappell (thinke they) if it vvere full of ſuch ſhrines? I hope all Chriſtian Princes haue long, and vvell learned (ſo great is the courteſie of theſe good Fathers) that they ſhall neuer (by their vvils) need bee troubled with the charge of their owne hearts. An heart of a King in a Ieſuites hand, is as proper, as a wafer in a Prieſts. Iuſtly was it vvritten of old, vnder the picture of Ignatius Loyola, Cauete vobis Principes; Be vviſe O ye Princes, and learn to be the keepers of your owne hearts. Yea rather, O thou keeper of Iſrael, that neither ſlumbreſt nor ſleepeſt, keepe thou the hearts of all Chriſtian Kings, vvhether aliue or dead, from the keeping of this traiterous generation; whoſe very religion is holy rebellion, and whoſe merits bloody. Doubtleſſe, that murderer hoped to haue ſtabbed thouſands vvith that blow, and to haue let out the life of religion, at the ſide of her collapſed Patron: God did at once laugh and frowne at his proiect; and ſuffered him to liue to ſee himſelfe no leſſe a foole then a villaine. O the infinite goodneſſe of the wiſe and holy gouernour of the world! Who could haue looked for ſuch a calme in the middeſt of a tempeſt? who would haue thought that violence could beget peace? Who durſt haue conceiued that King Henry ſhould die alone? and that Religion ſhould loſe nothing but his perſon? This is the Lords doing, and it is maruellous in our eyes. You haue now parallel'd vs: Out of both our feares God hath fetched ſecuritie: Oh that out of our ſecuritie, wee could as eaſily fetch feare: not ſo much of euill, as of the Author of good; and yet truſt him in our feare, and in both magnifie him. Yea, you haue by this act gained ſome conuerts, againſt the hope of the agents: neither can I without many ioyfull congratulations, thinke of the eſtate of your Church; which euery day honours with the acceſſe of new clients; whoſe teares and ſad confeſſions make the Angels to reioyce in heauen, and the Saints on earth. We ſhould giue you example, if our peace were as plentifull of goodneſſe as of pleaſure. But how ſeldome hath the Church gained by eaſe? or loſt by reſtraint? Bleſſe you God for our proſperitie; and we ſhall praiſe him for your progreſſe.

Ep. VII. Exciting him, and (in him) all others, to early and cheerfull beneficence: shewing the necessitie and benefit of good workes.

SIR, I trouble you not with reasons of my writing, or with excuses: if I doe ill, no plea can warrant me; if well, I cannot be discouraged with any censures. I craue not your pardon, but your acceptation. It is no presumption to giue good counsell; and presents of loue feare not to be ill taken of strangers. My pen and your substance are both giuen vs for one end, to doe good: These are our talents; how happy are we, if we can improue them well! suffer me to doe you good with the one, that with the other you may doe good to many, and most to your selfe. You cannot but know, that your ful hand and worthy purposes, haue possessed the world with much expectation: what speake I of the world? whose honest and reasonable claimes yet, cannot bee contemned with honour, nor disappointed with dishonour. The God of heauen, which hath lent you this abundance, and giuen you these gracious thoughts of charity, of piety, lookes long for the issue of both; and will easily complaine either of too little, or too late. Your wealth and your will are both good: but the first is onely made good by the second. For if your hand were full, and your heart empty, we who now applaud you, should iustly pity you; you might haue riches, not goods, not blessings: your burthen should be greater then your estate; and you should be richer in sorrowes, then in metals. For (if we looke to no other world) what gaine is it to be the keeper of the best earth? That which is the common cofer of all the rich mynes, we do but tread vpon; and account it vile, because it doth but hold, and hide those treasures: Whereas the skilfull metallist, that findeth, and refineth those precious veines, for publike vse, is rewarded, is honoured. The very basest Element yeelds gold; the sauage Indian gets it, the seruile prentise workes it, the very Midianitish Camell may weare it, the miserable worldling admires it, the couetous Iew swallowes it, the vnthrifty Ruffian spends it: what are all these the better for it? Onely good vse giues praise to earthly possessions. Herein therefore you owe more to God, that he hath giuen you an heart to doe good: a will to be as rich in good workes, as great in riches. To be a friend to this Mammon, is to be an enemy to God: but to make friends with it, is royall, and Christian. His enemies may be wealthy: none but his friends can either be good, or do good. Da & accipe saith the Wise-man. The Christian, which must imitate the high patterne of his Creator, knowes his best riches to be bounty; God that hath all, giues all; reserues nothing. And for himselfe; he well considers, that God hath not made him an owner, but a seruant: and of seruants, a seruant not of his goods, but of the Giuer; not a Treasurer, but a Steward: whose praise is more To lay out well, then to haue receiued much. The greatest gaine therefore that he affects, is an euen reckoning, a cleare discharge: which since it is obtained by disposing, not by keeping, he counts reseruation losse. & iust expence his trade, and ioy; he knowes, that Wel done faithfull seruant is a thousand times more sweet a note, then Soule take thine ease; for that is the voice of the master recompencing, this of the carnall heart presuming: and what followes to the one, but his masters ioy? what to the other, but the losse of his soule? Blessed be that God which hath giuen you an heart to fore-thinke this; and in this dry and dead Age, a will to honour him with his owne; and to credit his Gospell, with your beneficence; Lo, we are vpbraided with barrennesse; your name hath beene publikely opposed to these challenges; as in whom it shall be seene, that the truth hath friends that can giue. I neither distrust, nor perswade you; whose resolutions are happily fixed on purposes of good: onely giue me leaue to hasten your pase a little, and to excite your Christian forwardnesse, to begin speedily, what you haue long and constantly vowed. You would not but doe good; why not now? I speake boldly, The more speed, the more comfort: Neither the times are in our disposing, nor our selues: if God had set vs a day, and made our wealth inseparable, there were no danger in delaying; now our vncertainty either must quicken vs, or may deceiue vs. How many haue meant well, and done nothing, and lost their crowne with lingring? whose destinies haue preuented their desires, and haue made their good motions the wards of their executors, not without miserable successe: to whom, that they would haue done good, is not so great a praise, as it is dishonour that they might haue done it: their wracks are our warnings, we are equally mortall, equally fickle. Why haue you this respite of liuing, but to preuent the imperious necessity of death? it is a wofull and remedilesse complaint, that the end of our dayes hath ouer-run the beginning of our good works. Early beneficence hath no danger, many ioyes: for the conscience of good done, the prayers and blessings of the releeued, the gratulations of the Saints, are as so many perpetuall comforters, which can make our life pleasant, and our death happy, our euill dayes good, and our good better. All these are lost with delay: few and cold are the prayers for him that may giue: and in lieu, our good purposes fore-slowed are become our tormentors vpon our death-bed. Little difference is betwixt good deferred, and euill done: Good was meant; who hindred it, will our conscience say? there was time enough, meanes enough, need enough, what hindred? Did feare of enuy, distrust of want? Alas what bugs are these to fright men from heauen? As if the enuy of keeping, were lesse then of bestowing: As if God were not as good a debtor, as a giuer: he that giues to the poore, lends to God, saith wise Salomon. If he freely giue vs what we may lend, & grace to giue; wil he not much more pay vs what we haue lent; and giue vs because we haue giuen? That is his bounty, this his iustice. O happy is that man that may be a creditor to his Maker: Heauen and earth shall be empty before he shall want a royall payment. If we dare not trust God whiles we liue, how dare we trust men when we are dead? men that are still deceitfull, & light vpon the balance, light of truth, heauy of selfe-loue. How many Executors haue proued the executioners of honest Wils? how many haue our eyes seene, that after most carefull choice of trusty guardians, haue had their children and goods so disposed, as if the Parents soule could returne to see it, I doubt whether it could bee happy. How rare is that man that prefers not himselfe to his dead friend? profit to truth? that will take no vantage of the impossibility of account? What-euer therefore men either shew, or promise, happy is that man that may be his own auditor, superuisor, executor. As you loue God and your selfe, be not afraid of being happy too soone. I am not worthy to giue so bold aduice; let the wise man of Syrach speak for me: Doe good before thou die, and according to thine ability stretch out thine hands, and giue: Defraud not thy selfe of thy good day; and let not the portion of thy good desires ouer-passe thee: Shalt thou not leaue thy trauels to another, and thy labours to them that will diuide thine heritage? Or let a wiser then he, Salomon: Say not, to morrow I will giue, if now thou haue it: for thou knowest not what a day will bring forth. It hath beene an old rule of liberality, He giues twice that giues quickly; whereas slow benefits argue vncheerfulnesse, and lose their worth. Who lingers his receits is condemned as vnthrifty: he that knoweth both, saith, It is better to giue, then to receiue. If we be of the same spirit, why are wee hasty in the worse, and slacke in the better? Suffer not your selfe therefore, good Sir, for Gods sake, for the Gospels sake, for the Churches sake, for your soules sake, to be stirred vp by these poore lines, to a resolute and speedy performing of your worthy intentions: and take this as a louing inuitation sent from heauen, by an vnworthy messenger. You cannot deliberate long of fit obiects for your beneficence, except it be more for multitude, then want: the streets, yea the world is full; How doth Lazarus lye at euery doore? how many sonnes of the Prophets in their meanly-prouided

Colledges

Colledges may say, not, Mors in olla, but fames? how many Churches may iustly plead that which our Sauiour bad his Disciples, The Lord hath need? And if this infinite store hath made your choice doubtfull, how easie were it to shew you, wherein you might oblige the whole Church of God to you, and make your memoriall both eternall and blessed; or, if you had rather, the whole Common-wealth? But now I finde myselfe too bold and too busie, in thus looking to particularities: God shall direct you; and if you follow him, shall crowne you: howsoeuer, if good bee done, and that betimes; he hath what he desired, and your soule shall haue more then you can desire. The successe of my weak yet hearty counsell, shall make me as rich, as God hath made you with all your abundance. That God blesse it to you, and make both our recknings cheerfull in the day of our common Audit.

To E.B. Dedicated to Sir George Goring.

Ep. VIII. Remedies against dulnesse and heartlesnesse in our callings, and incouragements to cheerfulnesse in labour.

IT falls out not seldome (if wee may measure all by one) that the minde ouer-layed with worke, growes dull and heauy: and now doth nothing because it hath done too much; ouer-lauish expence of spirits hath left it heartlesse: as the best vessell with much motion and vent, becomes flat, and dreggish. And not fewer (of more weake temper) discourage themselues with the difficulty of what they must doe: some Trauellers haue more shrunke at the Mappe, then at the way. Betwixt both, how many sit still with their hands folded, and wish they knew how to be rid of time? If this euill be not cured, we become miserable losers, both of good houres, and of good parts. In these mentall diseases, Empiricks are the best Physicians. I prescribe you nothing but out of feeling: If you will auoid the first, moderate your owne vehemency; suffer not your feite to doe all you could doe: Rise euer from your deske, not without an appetite. The best horse will tyre soonest, if the reines lye euer loose in his necke: Restraints in these cases are encouragements: obtaine therefore of your selfe to defer, and take new dayes. How much better is it to refesh your selfe with many competent meales, then to buy one dayes gluttony, with the fast of many? And if it bee hard to call off the mind, in the midst of a faire and likely flight; know that all our ease and safety begins at the command of our selues; he can neuer taske himselfe well, that cannot fauour himselfe. Perswade your heart, that perfection comes by leisure; and no excellent thing is done at once: the rising and setting of many Sunnes (which you thinke slackens your worke) in truth ripens it. That gourd which came vp in a night, withered in a day; whereas those plants which abide age, rise slowly. Indeed, where the heart is vnwilling, prorogation hinders: what I list not to doe this day, I loathe the next; but where is no want of desire, delay doth but sharpen the stomack. That which we doe vnwillingly leaue, we long to vndertake: and the more our affection is, the greater our intention, and the better our performance. To take occasion by the fore-top, is no small point of wisedome; but to make time (which is wyld and fugitiue) tame and pliable to our purposes, is the greatest improuement of a man: All times serue him, which hath the rule of himselfe.

If the second, thinke seriously of the condition of your being: It is that we were made for; the Bird to flye, and Man to labour. What doe we here, if we repine at our worke? We had not beene, but that we might be still busie; if not in this taske we dislike, yet in some other of no lesse toyle: there is no act that hath not his labour, which varies in measure, according to the will of the doer. This which you complaine of, hath beene vndertaken by others, not with facility onely, but with pleasure; and what you chuse for ease, hath beene abhorred of others, as tedious. All difficulty is not so much in the worke, as in the Agent. To set the mind on the racke of a long meditation (you say) is a torment: to follow the swift foot of your hound all day long, hath no wearinesse: what would you say of him that finds better game in his study, then you in the field, and would account your disport his punishment? Such there are, though you doubt and wonder. Neuer thinke to detract from your businesse, but adde to your wil. It is the policy of our great enemy, to driue vs with these feares, from that he foresees would grow profitable: like as some inhospitall Sauages make fearfull delusions by forcerie vpon the shore, to fright strangers from landing. Where you find therefore motions of resistance, awaken your courage the more, and know there is some good that appeares not; vaine endeauors find no opposition. All crosses imply a secret commoditie: resolue then to will, because you begin not to will: and either oppose your selfe, as Satan opposes you, or else you do nothing. We pay no price to God for any good thing, but labour; if we higgle in that, we are worthy to lose our bargaine. It is an inualuable gaine, that we may make in this traffique: for God is bountifull, as well as iust; and when he sees true endeauor, doth not onely sell, but giue: whereas idlenesse neither gets nor saues; nothing is either more fruitlesse of good, or more fruitfull of euill; for we doe ill whiles we doe nothing, and lose whiles wee gaine not. The sluggard is senslesse; and so much more desperate, because he cannot complaine: but (though he feele it not) nothing is more precious then time, or that shall abide a reckning more strict and fearfull: yea this is the measure of all our actions, which if it were not abused, our accounts could not bee but euen with God: so God esteemes it (what euer our price be) that he plagues the losse of a short time, with a reuenge beyond all times. Houres haue wings, and euery moment flie vp to the Author of time, and carie newes of our vsage: All our prayers cannot intreat one of them either to returne, or slacken his pace: the misspence of euery minute is a new record against vs in heauen. Sure, if we thought thus, we would dismisse them with better reports, and not suffer them either to goe away empty, or laden with dangerous intelligence: how happy is it that euery houre should conuey vp, not onely the message, but the fruits of good, and stay with the Ancient of dayes, to speake for vs before his glorious Throne? Know this, and I shall take no care for your paines, nor you for pastime. None of our profitable labours shall be transient; but euen when we haue forgotten them, shall welcome vs into ioy: wee thinke wee haue left them behind vs; but they are forwarder then our soules, and expect vs where we would be. And if there were no crowne for these toiles, yet without future respects there is a tediousnesse in doing nothing. To man especially, motion is naturall: there is neither mind, nor eye, nor ioint which moueth not: and a company makes a way short, houres neuer goe away so merrily, as in the fellowship of worke. How did that industrious Heathen draw out water by night, and knowledge by day, and thought both short; euer labouring, onely that he might labour? Certainly, if idlenesse were enacted by authority, there would not want some, which would pay their mulct, that they might worke: and those spirits are likest to heauen, which moues alwayes, and the freest from those corruptions, which are incident to nature. The running streame clenseth it selfe, whereas standing ponds breed weeds and mud.

These meditations must hearten vs to that we must doe: whiles we are chearfull, our labours shall striue whether to yeeld vs more comfort, or others more profit.

To Sir IOHN HARRINGTON.

EPIST. IX. Discussing this Question:

Whether a man and wife after some yeeres mutuall and louing fruition of each other, may vpon consent, whether for secular, or religious causes, vow and perform a perpetuall separation from each others bed, and absolutely renounce all carnall knowledge of each other for euer.

I Wish not my selfe any other aduocate, nor you any other aduersary, then S. Paul, who neuer gaue (I speake boldly) a direct precept, if not in this: his expresse charge whereupon I insisted, is, Defraud not one another, except with consent for a time, that you may giue your selues to fasting and prayer; and then againe come together, that Satan tempt you not for your incontinency. Euery word (if you weigh it well) opposes your part, and pleads for mine. By consent of all Diuines, ancient and moderne [defrauding] is refraining from matrimoniall conuersation: see what a word the Spirit of God hath chosen for this abstinence; neuer but taken in ill part. But there is no fraud in consent, as Chrysostome, Athanasius, Theophylact, expound it: true; therefore S. Paul addes (vnlesse with consent) that I may omit to say, that in saying (vnlesse with consent) he implies, both that there may be a defrauding without it, and with consent a defrauding, but not vnlawfull: but see what he addes, (for a time) consent cannot make this defrauding lawfull, except it be temporary: No defrauding without consent, no consent for a perpetuity. How long then, and wherefore? Not for euery cause, not for any length of time, but onely for a while, and for deuotion (vt vacetis, &c.) Not that you might pray onely (as Chrysostome notes iustly) but that you might (giue your selues to prayer.) In our mariage society (saith he, against that paradox of Hierome) we may pray, and woe to vs if we doe not; but wee cannot (vacare orationi.) But we are bidden to pray continually: Yet not I hope, euer to fast and pray. Marke how the Apostle addes (that you may giue your selues to fasting and prayer.) It is solemne exercise, which the Apostle here intends, such as is ioyned with fasting, and externall humiliation; wherein all earthly comforts must be forborne. But what if a man list to taske himselfe continually, and will be alwayes painfully deuote? may he then euer abstaine? No: Let them meet together againe, saith the Apostle; not as a toleration, but as a charge. But what if they both can liue safely thus seuered? This is more then they can vndertake: here is danger, saith our Apostle, in this abstinence (lest Satan tempt you for your incontinency) what can be more plaine? Neither may the maried refraine this conuersation without consent: neither may they without consent refraine it for euer. What can you now vrge vs with, but the examples, and sentences of some Ancients? Let this stand cuicted for the true and necessary sense of the Apostle; and what is this, but to lay men in the balance with God? I see and confesse how much some of the Fathers admired virginity; so farre, that there wanted not some, which both detested mariage as vicious, and would force a single life vpon mariage, as commendable: whose authority should moue me, if I saw not some of them opposite to others, and others no lesse to S. Paul himselfe. How oft doth S. Austin redouble that rule, and importunately vrge it to his Ecdicia, in that serious Epistle, that without consent the continence of the maried, cannot be warrantable: teaching her (from these words of S. Paul, which he charges her, in the contrary practice, not to haue read, heard, or marked) that if her husband should containe, and she would not, hee were bound to pay her the debt of mariage benevolence; and that God would impute it to him for continence notwithstanding.

Homil. 1 Cor. 7.

ſtanding. Hence is that of Chryſoſtome, that the wife is both the ſeruant and the miſtris of her husband; a ſeruant to yeeld her body, a miſtris to haue power of his: who alſo in the ſame place determines it forbidden fraud, for the husband, or wife, to containe alone: according to that of the Paraphraſt; Let either both containe, or neither. Hierome contrarily, defines thus: But if one of the two (ſaith he) conſidering the reward of chaſtity, will containe, he ought not to aſſent to the other which containes not, &c. becauſe luſt ought rather to come to continency, then continency decline to luſt: concluding that a brother, or a ſiſter is not ſubiect in ſuch a caſe; and that God hath not called vs to vncleanneſſe, but to holineſſe. A ſtrange gloſſe to fall from the pen of a father: which yet I durſt not ſay, if it were more boldneſſe for me to diſſent from him, then for him to diſſent from all others. He that cenſures S. Paul to argue groſly to his Galatians, may as well taxe him of an vnfit direction to his Corinthians: It ſhall be no preſumption to ſay, that in this point all his writings bewray more zeale then truth: whether the conſcience of his former ſlip cauſed him to abhorre that ſex; or his admiration of Virginity tranſported him to a contempt of mariage. Antiquity will afford you many examples of holy men voluntarily ſequeſtred from their wiues: Precepts muſt be our guides, and not patternes. You may tell mee of Sozomens Ammon, that famous Monke, who hauing perſwaded his bride the firſt day to continuance of Virginity, liued with her 18 yeares in a ſeuerall bed, and in a ſeuerall habitation, vpon the mountaine Nitria, 22 yeares: you may tell me of Ieromes Malchus, Auſtins Edicia, and ten thouſand others: I care not for their number, and ſuſpect their example: Doe but reconcile their practice with S. Pauls rule, I ſhall both magnifie and imitate them. I profeſſe before God and men, nothing ſhould hinder me but this law of the Apoſtle: whereto conſider I beſeech you, what can be more oppoſite then this opinion, then this courſe of life.

The Apoſtle ſayes, Refraine not but with conſent for a time: your words, and their practice ſaith, Refraine with conſent for euer: hee ſaith (meet together againe) you ſay, neuer more: hee ſaith (meet leſt you be tempted) you ſay, meet not though you be tempted. I willingly grant with Athanaſius, that for ſome ſet time, eſpecially (as Anſelme interprets it) for ſome holy time, we may, (and in this latter caſe) we muſt forbeare all matrimoniall acts, and thoughts: not for that they are ſinfull, but vnſeaſonable. As mariage muſt bee alwayes vſed chaſtly, and moderately: ſo ſometimes it muſt be forgotten. How many are drunke with their owne vines, and ſurfet of their owne fruits: either immodeſty, or immoderation in man or wife, is adulterous. If yet I ſhall further yeeld, that they may conditionally agree, to refraine from each other, ſo long till they be perplexed with temptations, on either part: I ſhall goe as farre as the reach of my warrant, at leaſt; perhaps beyond it: ſince the Apoſtle chargeth, Meete againe leſt you be tempted; not, meet when you are tempted: But to ſay, abſolutely, and for euer renounce (by conſent) the conuerſation of each other, what temptation ſo euer aſſault you, is directly, not beyond, but againſt Pauls diuinity, no leſſe then my aſſertion is againſt yours. The ground of all theſe errors in this head of Matrimony, is an vnworthy conceit of ſome vnchriſtian filthineſſe in the mariage-bed: Euery man will not vtter, but too many hold that concluſion of Hierome: It is good for a man not to touch a woman, therefore to touch her, is euill; whom I doubt not, but S. Auſtin meant to oppoſe, while he writes, Bonum inquam ſunt nuptiæ, & contra omnes calumniæs poſſunt ſana ratione defendi: Mariage (I ſay) is a good thing, and may by ſound proofe be defended, againſt all ſlanders: well may man ſay, that it is good, which God ſaith is honourable; and both good and honourable muſt that needs bee, which was inſtituted by the honourable author of goodneſſe, in the ſtate of mans perfect goodneſſe: Let vs take heed of caſting ſhame vpon the ordinance of our Maker. But there was no carnall knowledge in Paradiſe. But againe, in Paradiſe God ſaid, Increaſe and multiply: there ſhould haue beene, if there were not. Thoſe that were naked without ſhame ſhould haue been conioyned without ſhame, becauſe without ſinne. Meats and drinks, and acts of mariage (ſaith Auſtin) for theſe he compares both in lawfulneſſe, and neceſſity) ceſſity) are, as they are vſed, either lawfull, veniall, or damnable. Meats are for the preſeruation of man: mariage acts for the preſeruation of mankinde: neither of them without ſome carnall delight: which yet, if by the bridle of temperance it be held to the proper and naturall vſe, cannot bee tearmed luſt. There is no ordinance of God, which either is of more excellent vſe, or hath ſuffered more abuſe in all times: the fault is in men, not in mariage: let them rectifie themſelues, their bed ſhall be bleſſed. Here need no ſeparation from each other, but rather a ſeparation of brutiſhneſſe, and cloſe corruption from the ſoule; which whoſoeuer hath learned to remoue, ſhall finde the crowne of matrimoniall chaſtity, no leſs glorious then that of ſingle continence.

Ep. X. Incouraging him to perſiſt in the holy calling of the miniſtery; which vpon conceit of his inſufficiency, and want of affection, hee ſeemed inclining to forſake and change.

I Am not more glad to heare from you, then ſory to heare of your diſcontentment: whereof, as the cauſe is from your ſelfe, ſo muſt the remedy. We Scholars are the apteſt of all others to make our ſelues miſerable: you might be your owne beſt counſellor, were you but indifferent to your ſelfe. If I could but cure your preiudice, your thoughts would heale you: and indeed the ſame hand that wounded you, were fitteſt for this ſeruice. I need not tell you, that your calling is honourable: if you did not thinke ſo, you had not complained. It is your vnworthineſſe that troubles you. Let me boldly tell you, I know you in this caſe better then your ſelfe: you are neuer the more vnſufficient, becauſe you thinke ſo: if we will be rigorous, Pauls queſtion (τις ικανος) will appoſe vs all: but according to the gratious indulgence of him that cals things which are not as if they were, we are that we are, yea, that we ought; and muſt be thankfull for our any thing. There are none more fearfull then the able, none more bold then the vnworthy. How many haue you ſeene and heard, of weaker graces (your owne heart ſhall be the iudge) which haue ſate without paleneſſe, or trembling, in that holy chaire, and ſpoken as if the words had beene their owne, ſatisfying themſelues, if not the hearers? And doe you (whoſe gifts many haue enuied) ſtand quaking vpon the loweſt ſtaire? Hath God giuen you that vnuſuall variety of tongues, ſtill of Arts, a ſtile worth emulation, and (which is worth all) a faithfull and honeſt heart; and doe you now ſhrinke backe, and ſay, Send him by whom thou ſhouldſt ſend? Giue God but what you haue; he expects no more: This is enough to honour him, and crowne you. Take heed while you complaine of want, leſt pride ſhroud it ſelfe vnder the skirts of modeſty: How many are thankfull for leſſe? You haue more then the moſt; yet this contents you not; it is nothing vnleſſe you may equall the beſt, if not exceed; yea, I feare how this may ſatisfie you, vnleſſe you may thinke your ſelfe ſuch as you would be. What is this but to grudge at the beſtower of graces? I tell you without flattery, God hath great gaines by fewer talents: ſet your heart to employ theſe, and your aduantage ſhall be more then your maſters. Neither doe now repent you of the vnaduiſedneſſe of your entrance; God called you to it vpon an eternall deliberation, & meant to make vſe of your ſuddenneſſe, as a meanes to fetch you into his worke, whom more leiſure would haue found refractary: Full little did the one Saul thinke of a kingdome, when he went to ſeeke his fathers ſtrayes in the land of Shaliſhah; or the other Saul of an Apoſtleſhip, when he went with his Commiſſion to Damaſcus: God thought of both; and effected what they meant not. Thus hath hee done to you: acknowledge this this hand, and follow it. He found and gaue both facultie and opportunity to enter: find you but a will to proceed, I dare promiſe you abundance of comfort. How many of the Ancients, after a forceable ordination, became not profitable onely, but famous in the Church? But, as if you ſought ſhifts to diſcourage your ſelfe, when you ſee you cannot maintaine this hold of inſufficiency, you flie to alienation of affection; in the truth whereof, none can controll you but your owne heart; in the iuſtice of it, we both may, and muſt. This plea is not for Chriſtians; we muſt affect what we ought, in ſpight of our ſelues: wherefore ſerues religion, if not to make vs Lords of our owne affections? If we muſt be ruled by our ſlaues, what good ſhould we doe? Can you more diſlike your ſtation, then we all naturally diſtaſte goodneſſe? Shall we neglect the purſuit of vertue, becauſe it pleaſes not; or rather diſpleaſe, and neglect our ſelues, till it may pleaſe vs? Let me not aske whether your affections be eſtranged, but wherefore? Diuinity is a miſtreſſe worthy your ſeruice: All other Arts are but drudges to her alone: Fooles may contemne her, who cannot iudge of true intellectuall beauty: but if they had our eyes, they could not but bee rauiſhed with admiration. You haue learned (I hope) to contemne their contempt, and to pity iniurious ignorance. Shee hath choſen you as a worthy client, yea a fauorite; and hath honored you with her commands, and her acceptations; who but you would plead ſtrangeneſſe of affection? How many thouſands ſue to her, and cannot be look't vpon? You are happy in her fauours, and yet complaine; yea ſo farre, as that you haue not ſtucke to thinke of a change. No word could haue fallen from you more vnwelcome. This is Satans policy, to make vs out of loue with our callings, that our labours may be vnprofitable, and our ſtandings tedious. He knowes that all changes are fruitleſſe, and that while we affect to be other, we muſt needs be weary of what wee are: That there is no ſucceſſe in any endeauor without pleaſure; that there can be no pleaſure, where the mind longs after alterations. If you eſpy not this craft of the common enemy, you are not acquainted with your ſelfe. Vnder what forme ſoeuer it come, repell it; and abhorre the firſt motion of it, as you loue your peace, as you hope for your reward. It is the miſery of the moſt men, that they cannot ſee when they are happy; and whiles they ſee but the outſide of others conditions, prefer that which their experience teaches them afterwards to condemne, not without loſſe and teares. Far be this vnſtableneſſe from you, which haue beene ſo long taught of God. All vocations haue their inconueniencies; which if they cannot be auoided, muſt be digeſted. The more difficulties, the greater glory: Stand faſt therefore, and reſolue that this calling is the beſt, both in it ſelfe, and for you: and know that it cannot ſtand with your Chriſtian courage to run away from theſe incident euils, but to encounter them. Your hand is at the plough: if you meet with ſome tough clods, that will not eaſily yeeld to the ſhare, lay on more ſtrength rather; ſeek not remedy in your feet by flight, but in your hands by a conſtant endeuour. Away with this weake timerouſneſſe, and wrongful humility. Be cheerfull and couragious in this great worke of God; the end ſhall be glorious, your ſelfe happy, and many in you.

THE SIXT DECAD.

To my Lord DENNY.

EPIST. I. A particular account how our dayes are, or ſhould be ſpent, both common and holy.

EVery day is a little life; and our whole life is but a day repeated: whence it is that old Iacob numbers his life by dayes, and Moſes deſires to bee taught this point of holy Arithmeticke, To number not his yeares, but his dayes: Thoſe therefore that dare loſe a day, are dangerouſly prodigall; thoſe that dare miſ-ſpend it, deſperate. We can beſt teach others by our ſelues: let me tell your Lordſhip, how I would paſſe my dayes, whether common or ſacred; that you (or whoſoeuer others, ouer-hearing mee) may either approue my thriftineſſe, or correct my errors: To whom is the account of my houres either more due, or more knowne? All dayes are his, who gaue time a beginning, and continuance; yet ſome hee hath made ours, not to command, but to vſe. In none may wee forget him: in ſome wee muſt forget all, beſides him. Firſt therefore, I deſire to awake at thoſe houres, not when I will, but when I muſt; pleaſure is not a fit rule for reſt, but health; neither doe I conſult ſo much with the Sunne, as mine owne neceſſity, whether of body, or in that, of the mind. If this vaſſall could well ſerue me waking, it ſhould neuer ſleepe: but now, it muſt be pleaſed, that it may be ſeruiceable. Now, when ſleepe is rather driuen away, then leaues mee; I would euer awake with God; my firſt thoughts are for him, who hath made the night for reſt, and the day for trauell: and as he giues, ſo bleſſes both. If my heart bee early ſeaſoned with his preſence, it will ſauour of him all day after. While my body is dreſſing, not with an effeminate curioſity, nor yet with rude neglect; my mind addreſſes it ſelfe to her enſuing taske; bethinking what is to bee done, and in what order; and marſhalling (as it may) my houres with my worke: That done, after ſome whiles meditation, I walke vp to my maſters and companions, my bookes; and ſitting downe amongſt them, with the beſt contentment, I dare not reach forth my hand to ſalute any of them, till I haue firſt looked vp to heauen, and craued fauour of him to whom all my ſtudies are duly referred: without whom, I can neither profit, nor labour. After this, out of no ouer-great variety, I call forth thoſe, which may beſt fit my occaſions; wherein, I am not too ſcrupulous of age: Sometimes I put my ſelfe to ſchoole, to one of thoſe Ancients, whom the Church hath honoured with the name of Fathers; whoſe Volumes, I confeſſe not to open, without a ſecret reuerence of their holineſſe, and grauity: Sometimes to thoſe later Doctors, which want nothing but age to make them claſſicall: alwayes, to Gods Booke. That day is loſt, whereof ſome houres are not not improued in those Diuine Monuments: others I turne ouer out of choice; these out of duty. Ere I can haue sate vnto wearinesse, my family, hauing now ouercome all houshold-distractions, inuites me to our common deuotions: not without some short preparation. These heartily performed, send me vp, with a more strong and cheerfull appetite to my former worke, which I find made easie to me by intermission, and varietie: Now therefore can I deceiue the houres with change of pleasures, that is, of labours. One while mine eyes are busied, another while my hand, and sometimes my mind takes the burthen from them both: Wherein, I would imitate the skilfullest Cookes, which make the best dishes with manifold mixtures: one houre is spent in Textuall Diuinity, another in Controuersie: Histories relieue them both. Now, when the mind is weary of others labours, it begins to vndertake her owne: sometimes it meditates and winds vp for future vse; sometimes it layes forth her conceits into present discourse; sometimes for it selfe, ofter for others. Neither know I whether it workes or playes in these thoughts: I am sure no sport hath more pleasure, no worke more vse: Onely the decay of a weake body, makes me thinke these delights insensibly laborious. Thus could I all day (as Ringers vse) make my selfe Musicke with changes, and complaine sooner of the day for shortnes, then of the businesse for toyle; were it not that this faint monitor interrupts me still in the midst of my busie pleasures, and inforces me both to respite and repast: I must yeeld to both; while my body and mind are ioyned together in these vnequall couples, the better must follow the weaker. Before my meales therefore, and after, I let my selfe loose from all thoughts; and now, would forget that I euer studied: A full mind takes away the bodies appetite, no lesse then a full body makes a dull and vnweildy mind: Company, discourse, recreations, are now seasonable and welcome; These prepare me for a diet, not gluttonous, but medicinall; The palate may not bee pleased, but the stomacke; nor that for it owne sake: Neither would I thinke any of these comforts worth respect in themselues, but in their vse, in their end; so farre, as they may inable me to better things. If I see any dish to tempt my palate, I feare a Serpent in that Apple, and would please my selfe in a wilfull deniall: I rise capable of more, not desirous: not now immediately from my trencher, to my booke; but after some intermission. Moderate speed is a sure helpe to all proceedings; where those things which are prosecuted with violence of indeuour, or desire, either succeed not, or continue not.

After my later meale, my thoughts are sleight: onely my memory may be charged with her taske, of recalling what was committed to her custody in the day; and my heart is busie in examining my hands and mouth, and all other senses, of that dayes behauiour. And now the euening is come, no Trades-man doth more carefully take-in his wares, cleare his shop-board, and shut his Windowes, then I would shut vp my thoughts, and cleare my minde. That Student shall liue miserably, which like a Camell lies downe vnder his burden. All this done, calling together my family, we end the day with God. Thus doe we rather driue away the time before vs, then follow it. I grant, neither is my practice worthy to be exemplary, neither are our callings proportionable. The liues of a Nobleman, of a Courtier, of a Scholler, of a Citizen, of a Countriman, differ no lesse then their dispositions: yet must all conspire in honest labour. Sweat is the destiny of all trades, whether of the browes, or of the mind. God neuer allowed any man to doe nothing. How miserable is the condition of those men, which spend the time as if it were giuen them, and not lent: as if houres were waste creatures, and such as should neuer be accounted for: as if God would take this for a good bill of reckoning; Item, spent vpon my pleasures forty yeares. These men shall once finde, that no blood can priuiledge idlenesse; and that nothing is more precious to God, then that which they desire to cast away; Time. Such are my common dayes: but Gods day cals for another respect. The same Sunne arises on this day, and enlightens it; yet because that Sunne of righteousnesse arose vpon it, and gaue a new life vnto the world in it, and drew the strength of Gods morall precept vnto it, therefore iustly doe we sing with the Psalmist; This is the day which the Lord hath made. Now, I forget the world, & in a sort my selfe; and deale with my wonted thoughts, as great men vse, who, at some times of their priuacie, forbid the accesse of all suters. Prayer, meditation, reading, hearing, preaching, singing, good conference, are the businesses of this day; which I dare not bestow on any worke, or pleasure, but heauenly. I hate superstition on the one side, and loosenesse on the other; but I finde it hard to offend in too much deuotion, easie in prophanenesse. The whole weeke is sanctified by this day: and according to my care of this, is my blessing on the rest. I show your Lordship what I would doe, and what I ought: I commit my desires to the imitation of the weake; my actions to the censures of the Wise and Holy, my weaknesses to the pardon and redresse of my mercifull God.

To Mr T. S. Dedicated to Sir Fulke Greuill.

Ep. II. Discoursing how we may vse the world without danger.

HOw to liue out of the danger of the World, is both a great and good care, and that which troubles too few. Some, that the world may not hurt them, run from it; and banish themselues to the tops of solitarie mountaines: changing the Cities for Deserts, houses for Caues, and the societie of men for beasts; and lest their enemie might insinuate himselfe into their secrecie, haue abridged themselues of dyet, cloathing, lodging, harbour, fit for reasonable creatures; seeming to haue left off themselues, no lesse then companions.

As if the world were not euery where; as if wee could hide our selues from the Diuell; as if solitarinesse were priuiledged from Temptations: as if we did not more violently affect restrained delights; as if these Icromes did not finde Rome in their heart, when they had nothing but rocks and trees in their eye. Hence, these places of retirednesse, founded at first vpon necessity mixt with deuotion, haue proued infamously vncleane; Cels of lust, not of pietie. This course is preposterous; if I were worthy to teach you a better way, learne to be an Hermite at home: Begin with your owne heart, estrange and weane it from the loue, not from the vse of the world: Christianitie hath taught vs nothing, if we haue not learned this distinction; It is a great weaknesse not to see, but we must be inamoured: Elisha saw the secret state of the Syrian Court, yet as an enemy: The blessed Angels see our earthly affaires, but as strangers: Moses his bodie was in the Court of Pharaoh, amongst the delicate Egyptians, his heart was suffering with the afflicted Israelites. Lot tooke part of the faire medowes of Sodom, not of their sinnes. Our blessed Sauiour saw the glory of all Kingdomes, and contemned them: and cannot the world looke vpon vs Christians, but wee are bewitched? We see the Sunne dayly, and warme vs at his beames, yet make not an Idol of it; doth any man hide his face, lest he should adore it? All our safety or danger therefore, is from within. In vaine is the body an Anachoret, if the heart be a Ruffian: And if that bee retired in affection, the body is but a Cipher: Lo then the eyes will looke carelesly and strangely on what they see, and the tongue will sometimes answer to that was not asked. Wee eate and recreate, because we must, not because we would: and when we are pleased, wee are suspitious: Lawfull delights, wee neither refuse nor dote vpon, and all contentments goe and come like strangers. That all this may be done, take vp your heart with better thoughts; be sure it will not be empty: if heauen haue fore-stalled all the roomes, the world is disappointed, and either dares not offer, or is repulsed. Fixe your selfe vpon the glory of that eternitie, which abides you after this short pilgrimage. You cannot but contemne what you finde, in comparison of what you expect.

Leaue not till you attaine to this, that you are willing to liue, becauſe you cannot as yet be diſſolued: Bee but one halfe vpon earth, let your better part conuerſe aboue whence it is, and inioy that whereto it was ordained. Thinke how little the World can doe for you, and what it doth how deceitfully: what ſtings there are with this Honey, what Farewell ſucceeds this Welcome.

When this Iael brings you milke in the one hand, know ſhe hath a nayle in the other. Aske your heart what it is the better, what the merier, for all thoſe pleaſures wherewith it hath befriended you: let your owne tryall teach you contempt; Thinke how ſincere, how glorious thoſe ioyes are, which abide you elſewhere, and a thouſand times more certaine (though future) then the preſent.

And let not theſe thoughts be flying, but fixed: In vaine doe we meditate, if we reſolue not: when your heart is once thus ſetled, it ſhall command all things to aduantage. The World ſhall not betray, but ſerue it; and that ſhall bee fulfilled which God promiſes by his Salomon; When the wayes of a man pleaſe the Lord, he will make his enemies alſo at peace with him.

Sir, this aduice my pouertie afforded long ſince to a weake friend; I write it not to you any otherwiſe, then as Schollers are wont to ſay their part to their Maſters. The world hath long and iuſtly both noted and honoured you for eminence in wiſedome and learning, and I aboue the moſt; I am ready with the awe of a Learner, to imbrace all precepts from you: you ſhall expect nothing from me, but Teſtimonies of reſpect and thankfulneſſe.

To Sir George Fleetwood.

Ep. III. Of the remedies of ſinne, and motiues to auoid it.

THere is none, either more common or more troubleſome gueſt, then Sinne. Troubleſome, both in the ſolicitation of it, and in the remorſe. Before the act it wearies vs with a wicked importunitie; after the act, it torments vs with teares, and the painfull gnawings of an accuſing Conſcience: Neither is it more irkeſome to men, then odious to God; who indeed neuer hated any thing but it; and for it any thing. How happy were we, if we could be rid of it? This muſt be our deſire, but cannot bee our hope, ſo long as we carry this body of ſinne and death about vs: yet (which is our comfort) it ſhall not cary vs, though we carie it: It will dwell with vs, but with no command; yea, with no peace: We grudge to giue it houſe-roome; but wee hate to giue it ſeruice. This our Hagar wil abide many ſtrokes, ere ſhe be turned out of doores: ſhe ſhall goe at laſt, and the ſeed of promiſe ſhall inherit alone. There is no vnquietneſſe good, but this: and in this caſe, quietneſſe cannot ſtand with ſafety: neither did euer warre more truely beget peace, then in this ſtrife of the ſoule.

Reſiſtance is the way to victorie; and that, to an eternall peace and happineſſe. It is a bleſſed care then, how to reſiſt ſinne, how to auoid it: and ſuch as I am glad to teach and learne. As there are two grounds of all ſinne, ſo of the auoidance of ſinne; Loue, and Feare: Theſe if they be placed amiſſe, cauſe vs to offend: if right, are the remedies of euill: The Loue muſt be of God; Feare, of iudgement.

As he loues much, to whom much is forgiuen: ſo he that loues much, will not dare to doe that which may need forgiueneſſe. The heart that hath felt the ſweetneſſe of Gods mercies, will not abide the bitter relliſh of ſinne: This is both a ſtronger motiue then Feare; and more Noble; None but a good heart is capable of this grace: which who ſo hath receiued, thus powerfully repels tentations.

Haue

Haue I found my God ſo gracious to me that he hath denied me nothing; either in earth or heauen: and ſhall not I ſo much as deny my owne will for his ſake? Hath my deare Sauiour bought my ſoule at ſuch a price, and ſhall he not haue it? Was he crucified for my ſinnes, and ſhall I by my ſinnes crucifie him againe? Am I his in ſo many bonds, and ſhall I ſerue the Diuell? O God! is this the fruit of thy beneficence to me, that I ſhould wilfully diſhonor thee? Was thy blood ſo little worth, that I ſhould tread it vnder my feet? Doth this become him that ſhall be once glorious with thee? Haſt thou prepared heauen for me, and doe I thus prepare my ſelfe for heauen? Shall I thus recompence thy loue, in doing that which thou hateſt? Satan hath no Dart (I ſpeake confidently) that can pierce this ſhield: Chriſtians are indeed too oft ſurprized, ere they can hold it out: there is no ſmall policy in the ſuddenneſſe of temptation: but if they haue once ſetled it before their breſt, they are ſafe, and their enemy hopeleſſe. Vnder this head therefore, there is ſure remedy againſt ſinne, by looking vpwards, backwards, into our ſelues, forwards. Vpwards, at the glorious Maieſtie, and infinite goodneſſe of that God whom our ſinne would offend, and in whoſe face wee ſinne: whoſe mercies, and whoſe holineſſe is ſuch, that if there were no hell, wee would not offend. Backwards, at the manifold fauours, whereby we are obliged to obedience. Into our ſelues, at that honorable vocation, wherewith hee hath graced vs, that holy profeſſion we haue made of his calling, and grace, that ſolemne vow and couenant, whereby wee haue confirmed our profeſſion; the gracious beginnings of that Spirit in vs, which is grieued by our ſinnes, yea quenched. Forwards, at the ioy which vvill follow vpon our forbearance, that peace of conſcience, that happy expectation of glory, compared with the momentarie and vnpleaſing delight of a preſent ſinne; All theſe, out of loue; Feare is a retentiue, as neceſſarie, not ſo ingenuous. It is better to be wonne, then to be frighted from ſinne: to be allured, then drawne. Both are little inough in our proneneſſe to euill: Euill is the onely obiect of feare. Herein therefore, we muſt terrifie our ſtubbornneſſe, with both euils; Of loſſe, and of ſenſe: that if it be poſſible, the horror of the euent may counteruaile the pleaſure of the tentation: Of loſſe; remembring that now we are about to loſe a God; to caſt away all the comforts and hopes of another world; to rob our ſelues of all thoſe ſweet mercies we inioyed; to thruſt his ſpirit out of dores (vvhich cannot abide to dwel vvithin the noiſome ſtench of ſinne,) to ſhut the doores of heauen againſt our ſelues. Of ſenſe; That thus we giue Satan a right in vs; power ouer vs; aduantage againſt vs; That wee make God to frowne vpon vs in heauen; That we arme all his good creatures againſt vs on earth; That we doe as it vvere take Gods hand in ours, and ſcourge our ſelues with all temporall plagues, and force his curſes vpon vs, and ours: That we wound our owne conſciences with ſinnes, that they may wound vs with euerlaſting torments; That we doe both make a hell in our breaſts beforehand, and open the gates of that bottomleſſe pit, to receiue vs afterwards: That we doe now caſt brimſtone into the fire; and leſt wee ſhould faile of tortures, make our ſelues our owne fiends: Theſe, and vvhat euer other terrors of this kinde, muſt be laid to the ſoule: vvhich, if they be throughly vrged to an heart, not altogether incredulous, vvell may a man aske himſelfe, how he dare ſinne? But if neither this Sunne of mercies, nor the tempeſtuous windes of iudgement can make him caſt off Peters cloake of vvickedneſſe: hee muſt be clad vvith confuſion, as vvith a cloake, according to the Pſalmiſt.

I tremble to thinke how many liue, as if they vvere neither beholden to God, nor afraid of him, neither in his debt, nor danger: As if their heauen and hell vvere both vpon earth; ſinning not onely vvithout ſhame, but not vvithout malice: It is their leaſt ill to doe euill: Behold they ſpeake for it, ioy in it, boaſt of it, inforce to it; as if they would ſend challenges into heauen, and make loue to deſtruction: Their lewdneſſe cals for our ſorrow, and zealous obedience; that our God may haue as true ſeruants, as enemies. And as vve ſee naturall qualities, increaſed vvith the reſiſtance of their contraries; ſo muſt our grace vvith others ſinnes: vvee ſhall redeeme ſomewhat of Gods diſhonour by ſinne, if vve ſhall thence grow holy.

To Mr Doctor MILBVRNE.

EP. IV. Discoursing how farre, and wherein Popery destroyeth the foundation.

THe meane in all things is not more safe then hard; whether to finde or keepe: and as in all other moralitie, it lyeth in a narrow roome; so most in the matter of our censure, especially concerning Religion: wherein we are wont to be either careleſſe or too peremptorie. How farre, and wherein Popery raceth the foundation, is worth our inquirie: I need not stay vpon words. By foundation, we meane the necessary grounds of Christian faith. This foundation Papistry defaces, by laying a new, by casting down the old. In these cases, addition destroyes: he that obtrudes a new word, no lesse ouerthrowes the Scripture, then he that denies the old; yea this, very obtrusion denies: he that sets vp a new Christ, reiects Christ: Two foundations cannot stand at once; the Arke and Dagon: Now Papistry layes a double new foundation: the one, a new rule of faith, that is, a new vvord; the other, a new Author, or guide of faith, that is a new head besides Christ. God neuer laid other foundation, then in the Prophets and Apostles: vpon their diuine writing, he meant to build his Church; which he therefore inspired, that they might be (like himselfe) perfect and eternall: Popery builds vpon an vnwritten word; the voice of old (but doubtfull) Traditions; the voice of the present Church, that is, as they interpret it, theirs; vvith no lesse confidence and presumption of certainty, then any thing euer written by the finger of God: If this be not a new foundation, the old vvas none. God neuer taught this holy Spouse to know any other husband, then Christ; to acknowledge any other head; to follow any other Shepheard; to obey any other King: he alone may be enioyed without iealousie, submitted to without danger, without error beleeued, serued without scruple: Popery offers to impose on Gods Church a King, Shepheard, Head, Husband, besides her own: A man; a man of sinne. He must know all things, can erre in nothing: direct, informe, animate, command, both in earth and Purgatorie; expound Scriptures, canonize Saints, forgiue sinnes, create new Articles of Faith; and in all these, is absolute and infallible as his Maker: who sees not, that if to attribute these things to the Son of God, be to make him the foundation of the Church; then to ascribe them to another, is to contradict him that said, Other foundation can no man lay, then that which is laid, which is Iesus Christ. To lay a new foundation, doth necessarily subuert the old: yet see this further actually done in particulars; wherin yet this distinction may cleare the way: The foundation is ouerthrown two wayes; either in flat tearmes, when a maine principle of faith is absolutely denyed, as the deity and consubstantialitie of the Son by Arrius, the Trinity of persons by Sabellius and Seruetus, the resurrection of the body by Himeneus & Philetus, the last Iudgement by S. Peters mockers: Or secondly, by consequent, vvhen any opinion is maintained, which by iust sequel ouer-turneth the truth of that principle, which the defendant professes to hold; yet so, as he will not grant the necessitie of that deduction. So the ancient Minæi, of whom Ierome speaketh, while they vrged Circumcision, by consequent, according to Pauls rule, reiected Christ: So the Pelagians, while they defended a full perfection of our righteousnes in our selues, ouerthrew Christs iustification: and in effect said, I beleeue in Christ, and in my selfe: So some Vbiquitaries, while they hold the possibilitie of conuersion and saluation of reprobates, ouerthrow the doctrine of Gods eternall Decree, and immutabilitie. Poperie comes in this latter ranke, and may iustly bee tearmed Heresie, by direct consequent; though not in their grant, yet in necessarie proofe and inference. Thus it ouerthrowes the truth of Christs humanitie, humanitie, while it holds his whole humane body locally circumscribed in heauen, and at once (the same instant) wholly present in ten thousand places on earth, without circumscription: That whole Christ is in the formes of bread, with all his dimensions, euery part hauing his owne place and figure; and yet so, as that hee is wholly in euery part of the bread. Our iustification, while it ascribes it to our owne workes: The all-sufficiencie of Christs owne sacrifice, whiles they reiterate it dayly by the hands of a Priest. Of his satisfaction, while they hold a paiment of our vtmost farthings, in a deuised Purgatory. Of his mediation, while they implore others to aide them, not onely by their intercession, but their merits; suing not onely for their prayers, but their gifts: The value of the Scriptures, whiles they hold them insufficient, obscure, in points essentiall to saluation, and binde them to an vncertaine dependance vpon the Church. Besides hundreds of this kinde, there are Heresies in actions, contrary to those fundamentall practices which God requires of his: as prohibitions of Scriptures to the Laitie: Prescriptions of deuotion in vnknowne tongues: Tying the effect of Sacraments and Prayers to the externall worke; Adoration of Angels, Saints, Bread, Reliques, Crosses, Images: All vvhich, are so many reall vnderminings of the sacred foundation, which is no lesse actiue, then vocall. By this the simplest may see, what wee must hold of Papists; neither as no Hereticks, nor yet so palpable as the worst. If any man aske for their conuiction: In the simpler sort, I grant this excuse faire and tolerable; poore soules, they cannot be any otherwise informed, much lesse perswaded: Whiles in truth of heart, they hold the maine principles which they know; doubtlesse the mercy of God may passe ouer their ignorant weakenesse, in what they cannot know. For the other, I feare not to say, that many of their errors are wilfull. The light of truth hath shined out of heauen to them, and they loue darkenesse more then light. In this state of the Church, he shall speake and hope idly, that shall call for a publique and vniuersall euiction: How can that be, when they pretend to be Iudges in their owne cause? Vnlesse they will not be aduersaries to themselues, or judge of vs, this course is but impossible. As the Diuell, so Antichrist, will not yeeld: both shall bee subdued; neither will treat of peace: what remaines, but that the Lord shall consume that wicked man (which is now clearely reuealed) with the breath of his mouth, and abolish him vvith the brightnesse of his comming. Euen so, Lord Iesus come quickly. This briefely is my conceit of Popery: which I willingly referre to your cleare and deepe iudgement; being not more desirous to teach the ignorant vvhat I know, then to learne of you what I should teach, and know not: The Lord direct all our thoughts to his glory, and the behoofe of his Church.

Written long since to Mr I. W.

EP. V. Dissvvading from separation, and shortly oppugning the grounds of that error.

IN my former Epistle (I confesse) I touched the late separation with a light hand: onely setting down the iniury of it (at the best) not discussing the grounds in common: now your danger drawes me on to this discourse: it is not much lesse thankeworthy, to preuent a disease, then to cure it: you confesse that you doubt; I mislike it not: doubting is not more the way to error, then to satisfaction; lay downe first, all pride and preiudice, and I cannot feare you: I neuer yet knew any man of this vvay, which hath not bewraide himselfe far gone with ouer-weening: and therefore it hath been iust with God, to punish their selfe-loue with error: an humble spirit is a fit subiect iect for truth: prepare you your heart, and let me then answer, or rather God for me; you doubt whether the notorious sinne of one vnreformed, vncensured, defile not the whole Congregation; so as we may not without sinne communicate therewith: and why not the whole Church? woe were vs, if wee should thus liue in the danger of all men: haue we not sinnes enow of our owne, but wee must borrow of others? Each man shall beare his owne burden: is ours so light, that we call for more weight, and vndertake what God neuer imposed? It was enough for him that is God and Man to beare others iniquities; it is no taske for vs, which shrinke vnder the least of our owne. But it is made ours, you say (though anothers) by our toleration and conniuence: indeed, if we consent to them, incourage them, imitate, or accompany them in the same excesse of ryot; yet more, the publique person that forbeares a knowne sinne, sinneth; but if each mans knowne sinne, be euery mans, what difference is betwixt the root and the branches? Adams sinne spred it selfe to vs, because we were in him, stood or fell in him; our case is not such. Doe but see how God scorneth that vniust Prouerbe of the Iewes, That the fathers haue eaten sowre grapes, and the childrens teeth are set on edge? How much lesse are strangers? Is any bond so neere as this of blood? Shall not the child smart for the Parent; and shall we (euen spiritually) for others? You obiect Achans stealth, and Israels punishment: an vnlike case, and extraordinary: for see how direct Gods charge is. Be ye ware of the execrable thing, lest ye make your selues execrable, and in taking of the execrable thing, make also the Hoast of Israel execrable and trouble it. Now euery man is made a partie, by a peculiar iniunction: and not onely all Israel is as one man; but euery Israelite is a publike person in this act, you cannot show the like in euery one, no, not in any: it was a law for the present, not intended for perpetuity: you may as well challenge the Trumpets of Rams-hornes, and seuen dayes walke vnto euery siege. Looke else-where: the Church of Thyatira suffers the woman Iezabel to teach and deceiue. A great sinne, Yet to you (saith the Spirit) the rest of Thyatira, as many as haue not this learning, I will put vpon you none other burden, but that which you haue, hold fast; He saith not, Leaue your Church, but Hold fast your owne. Looke into the practice of the Prophets, ransacke their burdens, and see if you find this there; yea, behold our best patterne, the Sonne of God. The Iewish Rulers in Christ's time were notoriously couetous, proud, oppressing, cruell, superstitious: our Sauiour feared not polluting, in ioyning with them; and was so farre from separating himselfe, that hee called and sent others to them. But, a little Leauen leauens the whole lumpe: it is true; by the infection of it, sinne, where it is vnpunished, spreadeth; it sowreth all those whose hands are in it, not others. If we dislike it, detest, desist, reproue, and mourne for it, we cannot bee tainted: the Corinthian loue-feasts had grosse and sinfull disorder: yet you heare not Paul say, Abstaine from the Sacrament till these be reformed; Rather he enioynes the act, and controules the abuse: God hath bidden you heare and receiue: shew me, where he hath said, except others be sinfull. Their vncleannesse can no more defile you, then your holinesse can excuse them. But while I communicate (you say) I consent; God forbid. It is sinne, not to cast out the deseruing: but not yours; who made you a Ruler and a Iudge? The vncleane must bee separated; not by the people: Would you haue no distinction betwixt priuate and publike persons? What strange confusion is this? And what other then the old note of Corah and his company, Ye take too much vpon you, seeing all the Congregation is holy, euery one of them, and the Lord is among them: wherefore then lift ye vp your selues aboue the Congregation of the Lord? What is (if this be not) to make a Monster of Christs body? hee is the head, his Church the body, consisting of diuers limbes. All haue their seuerall faculties and imployments; not euery one, all; who would imagine any man so absurd, as to say, that this bodie should be all tongue, or all hands; euery man a Teacher, euery man a Ruler? As Christ had said to euery man, Goe teach, and whose sinnes yee remit: How senseless are these two extreames? Of the Papists, that one man hath the Keyes: Of the Brownists, that euery man hath them. But these priuiledges and charges are giuen to the Church: True; to be executed by her Gouernors: the facultie of speech is giuen to the vvhole man, but the vse of it to the proper instrument. Man speaketh; but by his tongue; if a voice should be heard from his hand, eare, foot, it were vnnaturall. Now, if the tongue speake not when it ought, shall we bee so fooliſh as to blame the hand? But you say; if the tongue speake not, or speake ill, the whole man smarteth; the man sinneth: I grant it, but you shall set the naturall body on too hard a rack, if you straine it in all things, to the likenesse of the spirituall, or ciuill. The members of that being quickned by the same soule, haue charge of each other, and therefore either stand or fall together: It is not so in these. If then notwithstanding vnpurged sinnes, we may ioyne with the true Church: Whether is ours such? You doubt, and your solicitors deny: surely, if we haue many enormities, yet none worse then rash and cruell iudgement; let them make this a colour to depart from themselues: there is no lesse woe to them that call good, euill. To iudge one man is bold and dangerous. Iudge then vvhat it is to condemn a vvhole Church; God knowes, as much vvithout cause, as without shame. Vaine men may libell against the Spouse of Christ: her husband neuer diuorced her: No, his loue is still aboue their hatred, his blessings aboue their censures: Do but aske them, were we euer the true Church of God? If they deny it, Who then were so? Had God neuer Church vpon earth, since the Apostles time, till Barrow and Greenwood arose? And euen then scarce a number? nay, when or where vvas euer any man in the vvorld (except in the schooles perhaps of Donatus or Nouatus) that taught their doctrine; and now still hath he none, but in a blind lane at Amsterdam? Can you thinke this probable? If they affirme it, when ceased we? Are not the points controuerted still the same? The same gouernment, the same doctrine? Their minds are changed, not our estate: Who hath admonished, euinced, excommunicated vs; and when? All these must be done. Will it not be a shame to say, that Francis Iohnson, as he tooke power to excommunicate his Brother, and Father; so had power to excommunicate his Mother, the Church? How base and idle are these conceits? Are wee then Heretikes condemned in our selues? Wherein ouerthrow wee the foundation? What other God, Sauiour, Scriptures, Iustification, Sacraments, Heauen, do they teach besides vs? Can all the Masters of Separation, yea can all the Churches in Christendome, set forth a more exquisite and worthy confession of faith, then is contained in the Articles of the Church of England? Who can hold these and bee heretical? Or, from which of these are we reuolted? But to make this good, they haue taught you to say, that euery truth in Scripture is fundamentall; so fruitfull is erreur of absurdities; Whereof still one breeds another more deformed then it selfe. That Trophimus vvas left at Miletum sicke, that Pauls Cloake was left at Troas, that Gaius, Pauls hoast, saluted the Romanes, that Nabal was drunke; or that Thamar baked Cakes, and a thousand of this nature are fundamentall: how large is the Separatists Creed, that hath all these Articles? If they say all Scripture is of the same Author, of the same authoritie; so say we, but not of the same vse: is it as necessarie for a Christian to know that Peter hosted with one Simon a Tanner in Ioppa, as that Iesus Christ the Sonne of God vvas borne of the Virgin Mary? What a monster is this of an opinion, that all truths are equall? that this spirituall house should be all foundation, no walls, no roofe? Can no man be saued but he that knowes euery thing in Scripture? Then both they and vvee are excluded: heauen would not haue so many, as their Parlor at Amsterdam. Can any man be saued that knowes nothing in Scripture? It is farre from them to be so ouercharitable to affirme it: you see then that both all truths must not of necessitie bee knowne, and some must; and these we iustly call fundamentall: which who so holdeth, all his hay and stubble (through the mercy of God) condemne him not: still he hath right to the Church on earth, and hope in heauen: but whether euery truth bee fundamentall, or necessarie? discipline (you say) is so: indeed necessarie to the well-being of a Church, no more: it may be true without it, not perfect. Christ compares his Spouse to an Army with banners: as order is to an Armie, so is discipline to the Church: if the troopes be not well marshalled in their seuerall rankes, and moue not forward according to the discipline of warre, it is an Armie still: confusion may hinder their successe, it can not bereaue them of their name: it is, as beautifull proportion to the bodie, an hedge to a vineyard, a wall to a City, an hem to a garment, seeling to an house. It may be a body, vineyard, citie, garment, house, without them: it cannot be well and perfect: yet which of our aduersaries will say we haue no discipline? Some they grant, but not the right: as if they said, Your Citie hath a bricke wall indeed, but it should haue one of hewne stone; your Vineyard is hedged, but it should be paled and ditched: while they cauill at what we want, we thanke God for what we haue; and so much wee haue, in spight of all detraction, as makes vs both a true Church, and a worthy one.

But the maine quarrell is against our Ministerie, and forme of worship: let these be examined; this is the circle of their censure. No Church, therefore no Ministery: and no Ministerie, therefore no Church: vnnaturall sonnes, that spit in the face of those spirituall Fathers that begot them, and the Mother that bore them. What vvould they haue? Haue we not competent gifts from aboue, for so great a function? Are wee all vnlearned, vnsufficient? Not a man that knowes to diuide the word aright? As Paul to the Corinths, Is it so that there is not one wise man amongst vs? No man will affirme it: some of them haue censured our excesse in some knowledge; none, our defect in all: What then? Haue wee not a true desire to doe faithfull seruice to God and his Church? No zeale for Gods glory? Who hath been in our hearts to see this? Who dare vsurpe vpon God, and condemne our thoughts? Yea, wee appeale to that onely Iudge of hearts, whether he hath not giuen vs a sincere longing for the good of his Sion: he shall make the thoughts of all hearts manifest: and then shall euery man haue praise of God. If then we haue both ability and will to doe publike good: our inward calling (which is the maine point) is good and perfect; for the outward, what want we? Are wee not first (after good tryall) presented and approued by the learned in our Colledges: examined by our Church-gouernors, ordain'd by imposition of hands of the Eldership, allowed by the Congregations we are set ouer: doe wee not labour in word and doctrine? doe we not carefully administer the Sacraments of the Lord Iesus? haue we not by our publike meanes wonne many soules to God? what should we haue and doe more? All this, and yet no true Ministers? we passe very little to bee iudged of them, or of mans day: but our Ordainers (you say) are Antichristian: surely our censurers are vnchristian: tho we should grant it, some of vs vvere baptized by Hereticks: is the Sacrament annihilated, and must it be redoubled? How much lesse Ordination, vvhich is but an outward admission to preach the Gospell? God forbid that we should thus condemne the innocent: more hands vvere laid vpon vs, then one: and of them, for the principall, except but their perpetuall honour, and some few immateriall rites, let an enemie say what they differ, from Super-intendents; and can their double honour make them no Elders? If they haue any personall faults, why is their calling scourged? Looke into our Sauiours times: vvhat corruptions were in the very Priesthood? It vvas now made annuall, which was before fixed and singular. Christ saw these abuses, and was silent: here was much dislike and no clamour; we, for lesse, exclaime and separate: euen personall offences are fetcht into the condemnation of lawfull courses. God giue both pardon and redresse to this foule vncharitableneſse. Alas! how ready are we to tosse the fore-part of our Wallet, whiles our own faults are ready to breake our necks behind vs: all the world sees and condemnes their Ordination to be faulty: yea none at all: yet they cry out first on vs, craftily (I thinke) lest we should complaine: that Church-gouernors should ordaine Ministers, hath bin the constant practice of the Church, from Christs time, to this houre. I except onely, in an extreame desolation, meerely for the first course: that the people should make their Ministers, was vnheard of in all ages and Churches, till Bolton, Browne, and Barrow: and hath neither colour nor example: Doth not this comparison seeme strange and harsh? Their Tradesmen may make true Ministers, our Ministers cannot: who but they would not be ashamed of such a position? Or who but you would not thinke the time mis-spent in answering it? No lesse friuolous are those exceptions that are taken against our worship of God, condemned for false and idolatrous, whereof Volumes of

Apologies

Apologies are written by others: we meet together, pray, reade, heare, preach, ſing, adminiſter, and receiue Sacraments: wherein offend we? How many Gods doe we pray to? or to whom but the True God? In what words but holy? whom do we preach but the ſame Chriſt vvith them? what point of faith, not theirs? What Sacraments but thoſe they dare not but allow? Where lyes our Idolatry, that we may let it out? In the manner of performing: in ſet Prayers, Antichriſtian Ceremonies of croſſing, kneeling, &c. For the former: what ſinne is this? The original and truth of prayer is in the heart the voice is but as accidentall; if the heart may often conceiue the ſame thought, the tongue her ſeruant may often vtter it, in the ſame words: and if dayly to repeat the ſame ſpeeches bee amiſſe, then to entertaine the ſame ſpirituall deſires, is ſinfull: to ſpeake once vvithout the heart is hypocriticall: but to ſpeake often the ſame requeſt with the heart, neuer offendeth. What intolerable boldneſſe is this; to condemne that in vs which is recorded to haue been the continuall practice of Gods Church in al ſucceſſions? Of the Iewes, in the time of Moſes, Dauid, Salomon, Iehoſaphat, Ezekiah, Ieremie: Of the ancient Chriſtian aſſemblies, both Greeke and Latine, and now at this day of all reformed Churches in Chriſtendome; yea, which our Sauiour himſelfe ſo directly allowed, and in a manner preſcribed, and the bleſſed Apoſtles Paul and Peter in all their formall ſalutations (which were no other then ſet prayers) ſo commonly practiſed: for the other (leſt I exceed a Letter) tho wee yeeld them ſuch as you imagine (worſe they cannot bee) they are but Ceremonious appendances, the body and ſubſtance is ſound. Bleſſed be God that we can haue his true Sacraments at ſo eaſie a rate, as the payment (if they were ſuch) of a few circumſtantiall inconueniences: how many deare children of God in all ages, euen neere the golden times of the Apoſtles, haue gladly purchaſed them much dearer, and not complained: but ſee how our Church impoſes them: not as to binde the conſcience, otherwiſe then by the common bond of obedience; not as actions, wherein Gods worſhip eſſentially conſiſteth, but as themſelues, Ceremonies: comely or conuenient, not neceſſarie; whatſoeuer: is this a ſufficient ground of ſeparation? How many moderate and wiſer ſpirits haue we, that cannot approue the Ceremonies, yet dare not forſake the Church? and that hold your departure farre more euill, then the cauſe. You are inuited to a feaſt, if but a Napkin or Trencher be miſ-placed, or a diſh ill carued; do you run from the Table, and not ſtay to thanke the Hoaſt? Either bee leſſe curious or more charitable. Would God both you and all other, vvhich either fauour the Separation or profeſſe it, could but reade ouer the ancient ſtories of the Church, to ſee the true ſtate of things and times; the beginnings, proceedings, increaſes, encounters, yeeldings, reſtaurations of the Goſpell, what the holy Fathers of thoſe firſt times were glad to ſwallow for peace; what they held, practiſed, found, left: whoſoeuer knowes but theſe things, cannot ſeparate; and ſhal not be contented only, but thankfull: God ſhall giue you ſtill more light: in the meane time, vpon the perill of my ſoule, ſtay, and take the bleſſed offers of your God, in peace: And ſince Chriſt ſaith by my hand, will you alſo goe away? Anſwer him with that worthy Diſciple, Maſter whither ſhall I goe from thee? thou haſt the words of eternall life.

To Mr I. B.

EP. VI. A complaint of the miſ-education of our Gentry.

I Confeſſe, I cannot honour blood without good qualities; not ſpare it, with ill. There is nothing that I more deſire to be taught, then what is true Nobilitie: What thanke is it to you, that you are borne well? If you could haue loſt this priuiledge of Nature,

Nature, I feare you had not beene thus farre Noble: that you may not plead deſert, you had this before you vvere; long ere you could either know or preuent it; you are deceiued if you thinke this any other then the bodie of Gentilitie: the life and ſoule of it, is in noble and vertuous diſpoſition, in gallantneſſe of ſpirit vvithout haughtineſſe, vvithout inſolence, vvithout ſcornfull ouerlineſſe: ſhortly, in generous qualities, cariage, actions. See your errour, and know that this demeanor doth not anſwer an honeſt birth: If you can follow all faſhions, drink all healths, weare fauours & good cloathes, conſort vvith Ruffianly companions, ſweare the biggeſt oathes, quarrell eaſily, fight deſperately, game in euery inordinate Ordinarie, ſpend your patrimonie ere it fall, looke on euery man betwixt ſcorne and anger; vſe gracefully ſome geſtures of apiſh complement; talke irreligiouſly, dallie vvith a Miſtris, or (which terme is plainer) hunt after Harlots, take ſmoake at a Play-houſe, and liue as if you vvere made all for ſport, you thinke you haue done enough, to merit, both of your blood, and others opinions. Certainly, the vvorld hath no baſeneſſe, if this be generoſitie: well-fare the honeſt and ciuill rudeneſſe of the obſcure ſonnes of the earth, if ſuch be the graces of the eminent: The ſhame whereof (me thinkes) is not ſo proper to the wildneſſe of youth, as to the careleſneſſe or vanity of Parents: I ſpeake it boldly; our Land hath no blemiſh comparable to the miſ-education of our Gentry: Infancie and youth are the ſeed-times of all hopes: if thoſe paſſe vnſeaſonably, no fruit can be expected from our age, but ſhame and ſorrow: vvho ſhould improue theſe, but they vvhich may command them? I cannot altogether complaine of our firſt yeares. How like are wee to children, in the training vp of our children! Giue a childe ſome painted Babe; hee ioyes in it at firſt ſight: and for ſome dayes vvill not abide it out of his hand or boſome; but when he hath fated himſelfe with the new pleaſure of that gueſt, he now (after a while) caſts it into corners, forgets it, and can looke vpon it, vvith no care: Thus doe we by ours. Their firſt times findes vs not more fond, then carefull: vve doe not more follow them vvith our loue, then ply them with inſtruction: When this delight begins to grow ſtale, we begin to grow negligent. Nothing that I know can bee faulted in the ordering of Childhood, but indulgence. Fooliſh Mothers admit of Tutors, but debar rods. Theſe, while they deſire their children may learne, but not ſmart, as is ſaid of Apes, kill their yong ones vvith loue; for vvhat can worke vpon that age, but feare? And what feare without correction? Now at laſt, vvith what meaſure of Learning their owne vvill would vouchſafe to receiue, they are too early ſent to the common Nurſeries of Knowledge; There (vnleſſe they fall vnder carefull tuition) they ſtudy in jeſt, and play in earneſt. In ſuch vniuerſall meanes of Learning, all cannot fall beſides them; vvhat their company, what their recreation vvould either inſtill or permit, they bring home to their glad Parents. Thence are they tranſplanted to the Collegiate Innes of our common Lawes: and there too many learne to be lawleſſe, and to forget their former little: Pauls is their Weſtminſter, their Studie, an Ordinarie, or Play-houſe, or Dancing-ſchoole, and ſome Lambert their Ployden. And now after they haue (not without much expence) learned faſhions and licentiouſneſſe, they returne home, full of welcomes and gratulations. By this time ſome bloſſomes of youth appearing in their face, admoniſh their Parents to ſeeke them ſome ſeaſonable match; Wherein the Father inquires for wealth, the ſonne for beauty, perhaps the mother for Parentage, ſcarce any for Vertue, for Religion. Thus ſetled, What is their care; their diſcourſe, yea, their Trade, but either an Hound, or an Hawke? And it is vvell, if no worſe: And now, they ſo liue, as if they had forgotten that there were bookes: Learning is for Prieſts, and Pedants; for Gentlemen, pleaſure. Oh! that either wealth or vvit ſhould be caſt away thus baſely: That euer reaſon ſhould grow ſo debauched, as to thinke any thing more worthy then knowledge. With what ſhame and emulation may wee looke vpon other Nations (whoſe apiſh faſhions we can take vp in the channels, neglecting their imitable examples) and with what ſcorne doe they looke vpon vs? They haue their ſolemne Academies for all thoſe qualities, which may accompliſh Gentility: from which they returne richly furniſhed, both for action and ſpeculation. They account knowledge and abilitie

of discourse as essentiall to greatnesse,as blood: neither are they more aboue the vulgar in birth,then in vnderstanding: They trauell with iudgement, and returne with experience: so doe they follow the exercises of the body, that they neglect not the culture of the minde. From hence growes ciuilitie, and power to manage affaires, either of Iustice,or State: From hence incouragement to learning, and reuerence from inferiors. For those onely can esteeme knowledge, which haue it; and the common sort frame either obseruance, or contempt, out of the example of their Leaders.

Amongst them, the sonnes of Nobles scorne not either Merchandize, or learned professions; and hate nothing so much as to doe nothing: I shame and hate to thinke, that our Gallants hold, there can bee no disparagement, but in honest callings. Thus perhaps I haue abated the enuy of this reproofe,by communicating it to more;which I had not done, but that the generalitie of euill importunes redresse. I well see that either good or euill descends: In vaine shall we hope for the reformation of the many, while the better are disordered. Whom to solicite herein, I know not, but all: How glad should I be to spend my light to the snuffe, for the effecting of this! I can but perswade and pray; these I will not faile of: The rest to him that both can amend and punish.

To M. Ionas Reigesbergius in Zeland.

Ep. VII. Written some whiles since, concerning some new opinions then broached in the Churches of Holland; and vnder the name of Arminius (then liuing:) perswading all great wits to a study and care of the common peace of the Church, and disswading from all affectation of singularity.

I Receiued lately a short relation of some new Paradoxes from your Leiden; you would know what wee thinke: I feare not to be censured,as medling: your truth is ours: The Sea cannot diuide those Churches,whom one faith vnites. I know not how it comes to passe,that most men,while they too much affect ciuilitie, turne flatterers; and plaine truth is most-where counted rudenesse. He that tels a sicke friend he lookes ill,or termes an angry tumour the Gowt, or a waterish swelling Dropsie; is thought vnmannerly. For my part,I am glad that I was not borne to feed humors: How euer you take your owne euils, I must tell you, we pitie you,and thinke you haue iust cause of dejection,and we for you: not for any priuate cares, but (which touch a Christian neerest) the Common-wealth of God. Behold, after all those hils of carkases, and streames of blood,your ciuill sword is sheathed,wherein we neither congratulate, nor feare your peace; lo now,in stead of that,another while,the spirituall sword is drawne and shaken,and it is well,if no more. Now the politick State sits still, the Church quarrels: Oh! the insatiable hostilitie of our great enemy, with what change of mischiefes doth he afflict miserable man? No sooner did the Christian world begin to breathe from persecution, but it was more punished with Arrianisme: when the red Dragon cannot deuoure the childe, hee tryes to drowne the mother; and when the vvaters faile,he raises warre. Your famous Iunius had nothing more admirable then his loue of peace: when our busie Separatists appealed him, with what a sweet calmnesse did he reiect them, and with a graue importunitie call'd them to moderation! How it would haue vexed his holy soule (now out of the danger of passions) to haue foreseene his chaire troublesome. God forbid that the Church should finde a Challenger, in stead ſtead of a Champion: Who vvould thinke but you ſhould haue bin taught the benefit of peace, by the long vvant? But if your temporal ſtate (beſides either hope, or beleefe) hath growne wealthy with warre, like thoſe Fowles which fatten vvith hard weather: yet bee too ſure, that theſe ſpirituall broyles cannot but impouerish the Church; yea, affamiſh it. It vvere pitie that your Holland ſhould bee ſtill the Amphitheatre of the world, on whoſe ſcaffolds all other Nations ſhould ſit, & ſee varietie of bloody ſhews, not without pitie, and horror. If I might challenge ought in that your acute and learned Arminius; I would thus ſolicit and coniure him: Alas that ſo wiſe a man ſhould not know the worth of peace; that ſo noble a ſonne of the Church ſhould not bee brought to light, without ripping the vvombe of his mother! What meane theſe ſubtil Nouelties? If they make thee famous, and the Church miſerable, vvho ſhall gaine by them? Is ſingularitie ſo precious, that it ſhould coſt no leſſe, then the ſafety and quiet of our common mother? If it be truth thou affecteſt, what alone? Could neuer any eyes (till thine) be bleſſed with this obiect? where hath that ſacred veritie hid herſelfe thus long from all her carefull Inquiſitors, that ſhee now firſt ſhewes her head to thee vnſought? Hath the Goſpell ſhined thus long, and bright, and left ſome corners vnſeene? Away with all new truths; faire and plauſible they may be, ſound they cannot? ſome may admire thee for them; none ſhall bleſſe thee. But grant that ſome of theſe are no leſſe true, then nice points: what doe theſe vnſeaſonable crochets and quauers trouble the harmonious plaine-ſongs of our peace? Some quiet error may bee better then ſome vnruly truth. Who binds vs to ſpeake all we thinke? So the Church may be ſtill, would God thou wert wiſe alone. Did not our aduerſaries quarrell enough before, at our quarrels? Were they not rich enough with our ſpoiles? By the deare name of our common parents, vvhat meaneſt thou Arminius? Whither tend theſe new-rais'd diſſenſions? Who ſhall thriue by them, but they which inſult vpon vs, and riſe by the fall of truth? who ſhall be vndone, but thy brethren? By that moſt precious, and bloodie ranſome of our Sauiour, and by that awfull appearance we ſhall once make before the glorious Tribunall of the Sonne of God, remember thy ſelfe, and the poore diſtracted limmes of the Church: Let not thoſe excellent parts, wherewith God hath furniſhed thee, lye in the narrow vvay, and cauſe any weake one either to fall, or ſtumble, or erre. For Gods ſake, either ſay nothing, or the ſame. How many great wits haue ſought no by-paths, and now are happy vvith their fellowes! Let it bee no diſparagement to goe vvith many to heauen. What could he reply to ſo plaine a charge? No diſtinction can auoid the power of ſimple truth. I know he heares not this of me firſt: Neither that learned and vvorthy Fran. Gomarus, nor your other graue fraternitie of reuerend Diuines, haue beene ſilent in ſo maine a cauſe. I feare rather too much noiſe in any of theſe tumults: There may too many contend, not intreat. Multitude of ſuters is commonly powerfull; how much more in iuſt motions? But if either he, or you, ſhal turne me home, and bid mee ſpend my little moiſture vpon our owne brands, I grant there is both the ſame cauſe, and the ſame need. This counſell is no whit further from vs, becauſe it is directed to you: Any Reader can change the perſon: I lament to ſee, that euery where peace hath not many clients, but fewer louers; yea, euen many of thoſe that praiſe her, follow her not. Of old, the very Nouatian men, women, children, brought ſtones and morter (vvith the Orthodoxe) to the building of the Church of the reſurrection, and ioyned louingly with them, againſt the Arrians: leſſer quarrels diuide vs; and euery diuiſion ends in blowes, and euery blow is returned; and none of all lights beſide the Church. Euen the beſt Apoſtles diſſented; neither knowledge, nor holineſſe can redreſſe all differences: True, but wiſdome and charitie could teach vs to auoid their preiudice. If we had but theſe two vertues, quarrels ſhould not hurt vs, nor the Church by vs: But (alas) ſelfe-loue is too ſtrong for both theſe: This alone opens the floud-gates of diſſenſion, and drownes the ſweet, but low valley of the Church. Men eſteeme of opinions, becauſe their owne; and will haue truth ſerue, not gouerne. What they haue vndertaken, muſt bee true: Victory is ſought for, not ſatisfaction; victory of the Author, not of the cauſe: Hee is a rare man that knowes to yeeld,as well as to argue: vvhat ſhould we doe then, but beſtow our ſelues vpon that vvhich too many neglect,publike peace; firſt,in prayers that we may preuaile, then in teares that we preuaile not? Thus haue I beene bold to chat with you of our greateſt and common cares. Your old loue,and late hoſpitall entertainment in that your Iland, called for this remembrance; the rather to keepe your Engliſh tongue in breath,vvhich was wont not to be the leaſt of your deſires. Would God you could make vs happie with newes,not of truce,but ſincere amitie and vnion; not of Prouinces, but ſpirits. The God of ſpirits effect it both here and there,to the glory of his Name and Church.

To W. ſ. condemned for murder.

EP. VIII. Effectually preparing him, and (vnder his name) whatſoeuer Malefactor for his death.

IT is a bad cauſe that robbeth vs of all the comfort of friends; yea, that turnes their remembrance into ſorrow. None can do ſo,but thoſe that proceed from our ſelues: for outward euils,vvhich come from the infliction of others, make vs cleaue faſter to our helpers, and cauſe vs to ſeeke and find eaſe in the very commiſeration of thoſe that loue vs: whereas thoſe griefes which ariſe from the iuſt diſpleaſure of conſcience,will not abide ſo much as the memorie of others affection; or if it doe,makes it ſo much the greater corraſiue,as our caſe is more vncapable of their comfort. Such is yours. You haue made the mention of our names tedious to your ſelfe,and yours to vs. This is the beginning of your paine, that you had friends: If you may now ſmart ſoundly from vs,for your good,it muſt be the only ioy you muſt expect, and the finall dutie we owe to you. It is both vaine and comfortleſſe, to heare what might haue beene; neither would I ſend you backe to what is paſt,but purpoſely to increaſe your ſorrow; vvho haue cauſed all our comfort to ſtand in your teares. If therefore our former counſels had preuailed,neither had your hands ſhed innocent blood,nor iuſtice yours. Now,to your great ſinne,you haue done the one; and the other muſt bee done to your paine: and we your well-willers,with ſorrow and ſhame liue to be witneſſes of both. Your ſinne is gone before,the reuenge of iuſtice will follow: ſeeing you are guilty, let God be iuſt. Other ſinnes ſpeake,this cryeth,and will neuer be ſilent,till it be anſwered with it ſelfe. For your life; the caſe is hopeleſſe; feede not your ſelfe with vaine preſumptions,but ſettle your ſelfe to expiate anothers blood with your own. Would God your deſert had been ſuch,that we might with any comfort haue deſired you might liue. But now,alas, your fact is ſo hainous, that your life can neither bee craued without iniuſtice,nor be protracted without inward torment. And if our priuate affection ſhould make vs deafe to the ſhouts of blood,and partialitie ſhould teach vs to forget all care of publique right; yet reſolue,there is no place for hope. Since then you could not liue guiltleſſe,there remaines nothing,but that you labour to die penitent; and ſince your bodie cannot bee ſaued aliue, to endeuour that your ſoule may bee ſaued in death. Wherein,how happie ſhall it be for you, if you ſhall yet giue eare to my laſt aduice; too late indeed for your recompence to the world, not too late for your ſelfe. You haue deſerued death, and expect it: Take heed leſt you ſo faſten your eyes vpon the firſt death of the bodie, that you ſhould not looke beyond it to the ſecond, which alone is vvorthy of trembling, vvorthy of teares.

For, this,though terrible to Nature,yet is common to vs, with you. You muſt die: what doe we elſe? And what differs our end from yours, but in haſte and violence?

And vvho knowes vvhether in that? It may be a ſickneſſe as ſharpe, as ſudden, ſhal fetch vs hence: it may be the ſame death, or a vvorſe, for a better cauſe: Or if not ſo, there is much more miſery in lingring: Hee dies eaſily, that dies ſoone: but the other is the vtmoſt vengeance that God hath reſerued for his enemies: This is a matter of long feare, and ſhort paine. A few pangs lets the ſoule out of priſon: but the torment of that other is euerlaſting; after ten thouſand yeares ſcorching in that flame, the paine is neuer the neerer to his ending. No time giues it hope of abating; yea, time hath nothing to doe vvith this eternitie. You that ſhall feele the paine of one minutes dying, thinke what paine it is to be dying for euer and euer. This, although it be attended with a ſharpe paine, yet is ſuch as ſome ſtrong ſpirits haue endured without ſhew of yeeldance. I haue heard of an Iriſh Traitor, that when he lay pining vpon the vvheele with his bones broke, asked his friend if he changed his countenance at all; caring leſſe for the paine, then the ſhew of feare. Few men haue died of greater paines, then others haue ſuſtained and liue. But that other ouerwhelmes both bodie and ſoule, and leaues no roome for any comfort in the poſſibilitie of mitigation. Here, men are executioners, or diſeaſes; there fiends. Thoſe Deuils that were ready to tempt the graceleſſe vnto ſinne, are as ready to follow the damned vvith tortures. Whatſoeuer become of your carkaſe, ſaue your ſoule from the flames; and ſo manage this ſhort time you haue to liue, that you may die but once. This is not your firſt ſinne; yea, God hath now puniſhed your former ſinnes vvith this: a fearfull puniſhment in it ſelfe, if it deſerued no more: your conſcience (which now begins to tell truth) cannot but aſſure you, that there is no ſinne more worthy of hell, then murder; yea, more proper to it. Turne ouer thoſe holy leaues (which you haue too much neglected, and now ſmart for neglecting) you ſhall finde murderers among thoſe that are ſhut out from the preſence of God: you ſhall find the Prince of that darkneſſe, in the higheſt ſtile of his miſchiefe, termed a man-ſlayer. Alas! how fearfull a caſe is this, that you haue herein reſembled him, for vvhom Topheth was prepared of old; and imitating him in his action, haue endangered your ſelfe to partake of his torment! Oh, that you could but ſee what you haue done, what you haue deſerued; that your heart could bleed enough within you, for the blood your hands haue ſhed: That as you haue followed Satan our common enemy in ſinning, ſo you could defie him in repenting: That your teares could diſappoint his hopes of your damnation. What a happie vnhappineſſe ſhall this be to your ſad friends, that your better part yet liueth? That from an ignominious place your ſoule is receiued to glory? Nothing can effect this but your repentance; and that can doe it. Feare not to looke into that horror, which ſhould attend your ſinne: and bee now as ſeuere to your ſelfe, as you haue been cruell to another. Thinke not to extenuate your offence vvith the vaine titles of manhood: vvhat praiſe is this, that you vvere a valiant murderer? Strike your owne breſt (as Moſes did his Rocke) and bring downe riuers of teares to waſh away your bloodſhed. Doe not ſo much feare your iudgement, as abhorre your ſinne; yea, your ſelfe for it. And vvith ſtrong cries lift vp your guilty hands to that God whom you offended, and ſay, Deliuer me from blood-guiltineſſe, O Lord. Let me tel you: As vvithout repentance there is no hope; ſo with it, there is no condemnation. True penitence is ſtrong, and can grapple with the greateſt ſinne, yea with all the powers of hell. What if your hands be red vvith blood? Behold, the blood of your Sauiour, ſhall waſh away yours: If you can bathe your ſelfe in that; your Scarlet ſoule ſhall bee as white as Snow. This courſe alone ſhall make your Croſſe the way to the Paradiſe of God. This plaiſter can heale all the ſores of the ſoule, if neuer ſo deſperate: Only take heed that your heart be deepe enough pierced, ere you lay it on; elſe, vnder a ſeeming skin of diſſimulation, your ſoule ſhall feſter to death. Yet ioy vs with your true ſorrow, vvhom you haue grieued with your offence; and at once comfort your friends, and ſaue your ſoule.

To

To Mr. IOHN MOLE, of a long time now prisoner vnder the Inquisition at Rome.

EPIST. IX. Exciting him to his wonted constancy, and encouraging him to Martyrdome.

WHat passage can these lines hope to find into that your strait and curious thraldome? Yet who would not aduenture the losse of this paines for him, which is ready to lose himselfe for Christ? what doe we not owe to you which haue thus giuen your selfe for the common faith? Blessed bee the name of that God who hath singled you out for his Champion, and made you inuincible: how famous are your bonds? how glorious your constancy? Oh, that out of your close obscurity, you could but see the honour of your suffering, the affections of Gods Saints, and in some, an holy enuie at your distressed happinesse. Those wals cannot hide you: No man is attended with so many eyes from earth and heauen: The Church your Mother beholds you, not with more compassion, then ioy: Neither can it be sayd, how shee at once pities your misery, and reioyces in your patience: The blessed Angels looke vpon you with gratulation and applause. The aduersaries with an angry sorrow to see themselues ouercome by their captiue, their obstinate cruelty ouer-matched with humble resolution, and faithfull perseuerance. Your Sauiour sees you from aboue, not as a meere spectator, but as a patient with you, in you, for you: yea, as an agent in your indurance and victory, giuing new courage with the one hand, and holding out a Crowne with the other. Whom would not these sights incourage? who now can pity your solitarines? The hearts of all good men are with you. Neither can that place be but full of Angels, which is the continuall obiect of so many prayers, yea the God of heauen was neuer so neere you, as now you are remoued from men. Let me speake a bold, but true word. It is as possible for him to be absent from his heauen, as from the prisons of his Saints. The glorified spirits aboue sing to him; the persecuted soules below, suffer for him, and cry to him; he is magnified in both, present with both; the faith of the one, is as pleasing to him, as the triumph of the other. Nothing obligeth vs men so much, as smarting for vs; words of defence are worthy of thankes, but paine is esteemed aboue recompence. How do we kisse the wounds which are taken for our sakes, & professe that we would hate our selues, if we did not loue those that dare bleed for vs: How much more shall the God of mercies bee sensible of your sorrowes, and crowne your patience? To whom you may truly sing that ditty of the Prophet, Surely for thy sake am I slaine continually, and am counted as a sheepe for the slaughter. What need I to stir vp your constancy, which hath already amazed, and wearied your persecutors? No suspition shall driue me hereto; but rather the thirst of your praise. He that exhorts to persist in well doing, while he perswades, commendeth. Whither should I rather send you, then to the sight of your owne Christian fortitude? which neither prayers, nor threats, haue beene able to shake: Here stands on the one hand, liberty, promotion, pleasure, life, and (which easily exceeds all these) the deare respect of wife and children (whom your only resolution shall make widow and orphanes) these with smiles, and vowes, and teares, seeme to importune you. On the other hand, bondage, solitude, horror, death, (and the most lingring of all miseries) ruine of posterity: these with frownes and menaces labour to affright you: Betwixt both, you haue stood vnmoued; fixing your eyes either right forward vpon the cause of your suffering, or vpwards vpon the crowne of your reward: It is an happy thing when our own actions may be either examples, or arguments of good. These blessed proceedings call you on to your perfection; The reward of good beginnings prosecuted, is doubled; neglected, is lost. How vaine are those temptations, which would make you a loser of all this praise, this recompence? Goe on therefore happily; keepe your eyes where they are, and your heart cannot be but where it is, and where it ought: Looke still, for what you suffer, and for whom: For the truth, for Christ: what can be so precious as truth? Not life it selfe. All earthly things are not so vile to life, as life to truth; Life is momentarie, Truth eternall; Life is ours, the truth, Gods: Oh happy purchase, to giue our life for the truth. What can we suffer too much for Christ? He hath giuen our life to vs; hee hath giuen his owne life for vs. What great thing is it, if he require what he hath giuen vs, if ours for his? Yea, rather if he call for what he hath lent vs; yet not to bereaue, but to change it; giuing vs gold for clay, glory for our corruption. Behold that Sauiour of yours weeping, and bleeding, and dying for you: alas! our soules are too strait for his sorrowes; wee can be made but paine for him; He was made sinne for vs: wee sustaine, for him, but the impotent anger of men; he strugled with the infinite wrath of his Father for vs. Oh, who can endure enough for him, that hath passed thorow death and hell for his soule? Thinke this, and you shall resolue with Dauid, I will bee yet more vile for the Lord. The worst of the despight of men, is but Death; and that, if they inflict not, a disease will; or if not that, Age. Here is no imposition of that, which would not be; but an hastning of that which will be: an hastning to your gaine. For behold, their violence shall turne your necessitie, into vertue and profit. Nature hath made you mortall: none but an enemie can make you a Martyr; you must die, though they will not; you cannot die for Christ, but by them. How could they else deuise to make you happie? since the giuer of both lifes hath said, He that shall lose his life for my sake shall saue it. Loe, this alone is lost with keeping, and gained by losse. Say you were freed, vpon the safest conditions, and returning: (as how welcome should that newes bee, more to yours, than to your selfe) perhaps, Death may meet you in the way, perhaps ouertake you at home: neither place, nor time, can promise immunitie from the common destinie of men: Those that may abridge your houres, cannot lengthen them; and while they last, cannot secure them from vexation; yea, themselues shall follow you into their dust; and cannot auoid what they can inflict; death shall equally tyrannize by them, and ouer them: so their fauours are but fruitlesse, their malice gainfull. For it shall change your Prison into Heauen, your Fetters into a Crowne, your Iaylors to Angels, your miserie into glory. Looke vp to your future estate, and reioyce in the present: Behold, the Tree of Life, the hidden Manna, the Scepter of power, the Morning-Starre, the white garment, the new name, the Crowne, and Throne of Heauen, are addressed for you. Ouercome and enioy them: oh glorious condition of Martyrs! whom conformity in death, hath made like their Sauiour in blessednesse; whose honour is to attend him for euer, whom they haue ioyed to imitate. What are these which are araied in long white robes, and whence came they? These are (sayes that heauenly Elder) they which came out of great tribulation, and washed their long Robes, and haue made their Robes white, in the blood of the Lambe.

Therefore they are in the presence of the Throne of God, and serue him day and night in his Temple: and he that sitteth on the Throne, will dwell among them, and gouerne them, and lead them vnto the liuely Fountaines of waters, and God shall wipe all teares from their eyes.

All the elect haue Seales in their fore-heads: but Martyrs haue Palmes in their hands. All the elect haue white Robes; Martyrs, both white and long: white, for their glory; long, for the largenesse of their glory. Once red with their owne bloud; now white with the bloud of the Lambe: there is nothing in our bloud, but weake obedience; nothing but merit in the Lambes bloud. Behold, his merit makes our obedience glorious. You doe but sprinkle his feet with your bloud; loe, hee washes your long white Robes, with his. Euery drop of your bloud is answered with a streame of his; and euery drop of his is worth Riuers of ours: Precious in the sight of the Lord is the death death of his Saints : Precious in preuention, precious in acceptation, precious in remuneration. Oh, giue willingly that which you cannot keepe, that you may receiue what you cannot leese. The way is steepe, but now you breathe towards the top. Let not the want of some few steps, lose you an eternall rest. Put to the strength of your owne Faith : The prayers of Gods Saints shall further your pace ; and that gracious hand that sustaines heauen and earth, shall vphold, and sweetly draw you vp to your glory. Goe on to credit the Gospell with your perseuerance : and shew the false-hearted clients of that Roman-Court, that the Truth yeelds reall and hearty professors ; such as dare no lesse smart, than speake for her.

Without the wals of your restraint, where can you looke beside incouragements of suffering ? Behold in this, how much you are happier than your many predecessors. Those haue found friends, or wiues, or children, the most dangerous of all tempters. Suggestions of weakenesse, when they come masked with loue, are more powerfull to hurt. But you, all your many friends, in the valour of their Christian loue, wish rather a blessed Martyr, than a liuing and prosperous reuolter : yea, your deare wife (worthy of this honour, to be the wife of a Martyr) prefers your faith, to her affection ; and in a courage beyond her sex, contemnes the worst misery of your losse ; professing shee would redeeme your life with hers, but that she would not redeeme it with your yeeldance : and while she lookes vpon those many pawnes of your chaste loue, your hopefull children, wishes rather to see them fatherlesse, than their father vnfaithfull : The greatest part of your sufferings are hers : She beares them with a cheerefull resolution : She diuides with you in your sorrowes, in your patience ; she shall not bee diuided in your glory : For vs, we shall accompany you with our prayers, and follow you with our thankfull commemorations ; vowing to write your name in red letters in the Kalendars of our hearts ; and to register it in the monuments of perpetuall Records, as an example to all posterity, The memoriall of the iust shall be blessed.

To all READERS.

EP. X. Containing Rules of good aduice for our Christian and ciuill cariage.

I Grant, breuity where it is neither obscure, nor defectiue, is very pleasing, euen to the daintiest indgments. No maruell therefore, if most men desire much good counsell in a narrow roome ; as some affect to haue great personages drawne in little tablets; or, as we see worlds of Countries described in the compasse of small maps : Neither do I vnwillingly yeeld to follow them; for both the powers of good aduice are the stronger when they are thus vnited ; and breuity makes counsell more portable for memorie, and readier for vse. Take these therefore for more ; which as I would faine practise, so am I willing to commend. Let vs begin with him who is the first and last : Informe your selfe aright concerning God ; without whom, in vaine doe we know all things : Be acquainted with that Sauiour of yours, which paid so much for you on earth, and now sues for you in heauen ; without whom we haue nothing to doe with God, nor he with vs. Adore him in your thoughts, trust him with your selfe : Renew your sight of him euery day, and his of you. Ouer-looke these earthly things ; and when you doe at any time cast your eyes vpon heauen, think, there dwels my Sauiour, there I shall be. Call your selfe to often recknings ; cast vp your debts, payments, graces, wants, expences, employments ; yeeld not to thinke your set deuotions troublesome : Take not easie denials from your selfe ; yea, giue peremptory denials to your selfe : Hee can neuer bee good that flatters himselfe : hold nature to her allowance ; and let your will stand at courteſie : happy is that man which hath obtained to be the maſter of his owne heart. Thinke all Gods outward fauours and prouiſions the beſt for you : your owne abilitie, and actions the meaneſt. Suffer not your mind to be either a Drudge, or a Wanton ; exerciſe it euer, but ouer-lay it not : In all your buſineſſes, looke through the world, at God ; whatſoeuer is your leuell, let him be your ſcope : Euery day take a view of your laſt ; and thinke either it is this, or may be : Offer not your ſelfe either to honour, or labour ; let them both ſeeke you : Care you onely to be worthy, and you cannot hide you from God. So frame your ſelfe to the time and company, that you may neither ſeruile it, nor ſullenly neglect it ; and yeeld ſo far, as you may neither betray goodneſſe, nor countenance euill. Let your words be few, and digeſted: It is a ſhame for the tongue to cry the heart mercy, much more to caſt it ſelfe vpon the vncertaine pardon of others eares. There are but two things which a Chriſtian is charged to buy, and not to ſell, Time and Truth ; both ſo precious, that we muſt purchaſe them at any rate. So vſe your friends, as thoſe which ſhould be perpetuall, may be changeable. While you are within your ſelfe, there is no danger : but thoughts once vttered muſt ſtand to hazard. Do not heare from your ſelfe, what you would be loth to heare from others. In all good things, giue the eye and eare the full of ſcope, for they let into the mind : reſtraine the tongue, for it is a ſpender. Few men haue repented them of ſilence. In all ſerious matters, take counſell of dayes, and nights, and friends; and let leiſure ripen your purpoſes: neither hope to gaine ought by ſuddenneſſe. The firſt thoughts may be confident, the ſecond are wiſer. Serue honeſtly euer, though without apparent wages : ſhee will pay ſure, it ſlow. As in apparell, ſo in actions, know not what is good, but what becomes you. How many warrantable acts haue miſ-ſhapen the Authors ? Excuſe not your owne ill, aggrauate not others : and if you loue peace, auoid cenſures, compariſons, contradictions. Out of good men chuſe acquaintance ; of acquaintance, friends ; of friends, familiars : after probation admit them, and after admittance change them not: Age commendeth friendſhip. Doe not alwayes your beſt : it is neither wiſe, nor ſafe for a man euer to ſtand vpon the top of his ſtrength. If you would bee aboue the expectation of others, be euer below your ſelfe. Expend after your purſe, not after your mind: take not where you may deny, except vpon conſcience of deſert, or hope to requite. Either frequent ſuits, or complaints, are wearieſome to a friend. Rather ſmother your griefes and wants as you may, than be either querulous, or importunate. Let not your face belie your heart, nor alwayes tell tales out of it : he is fit to liue amongſt friends or enemies, that can be ingenuouſly cloſe. Giue freely, ſell thriftily : Change ſeldome your place, neuer your ſtate : either amend inconueniences, or ſwallow them, rather then you ſhould run from your ſelfe to auoid them.

In all your recknings for the world, caſt vp ſome croſſes that appeare not ; either thoſe will come, or may : Let your ſuſpicions be charitable ; your truſt fearfull ; your cenſures ſure. Giue way to the anger of the great : The thunder and cannon will abide no fence. As in throngs we are afraid of loſſe ; ſo while the world comes vpon you, looke well to your ſoule ; There is more danger in good than in euill : I feare the number of theſe my rules ; for Precepts are wont (as nayles) to driue out one another: but theſe, I intended to ſcatter amongſt many : and as I was loth that any gueſt ſhould complaine of a niggardly hand ; Dainty diſhes are wont to be ſparingly ſerued out : homely ones ſupply in their bigneſſe, what they want in their worth.

Except your righteousnesse exceed the righteousnesse of the Scribes and Phariſes, yee ſhall not enter into the Kingdome of Heauen.

Imprinted at LONDON, 1627.

TO THE RIGHT REVEREND FATHER IN GOD, AND MY VERY good Lord, THOMAS, Lord Bishop of LONDON, I. H. wisheth all Grace and Happinesse.

RIght Reuerend and Honourable:

I Know there is store of Sermons extant: The Pulpit scarce affordeth more than the Presse. If adde to the number, and complaine not: in all good things, abundance is an easie burden. If the soule may feed it selfe with varietie, both by the eare, and by the eye, it hath no reason to finde fault with choice. But if any weaker stomacke (as in our bodily Tables) shall feare to surfet at the sight of too much, it is easie for that man to looke off, and to confine his eyes to some few: Who cannot much sooner abate to himselfe, than multiply to another? Let not his nice sullennesse preiudice that delight and profit which may arise to others from this number. For mee, I dare not be so enuious, as not to blesse God for this plenty, and seriously to reioyce that Gods people may thus liberally feast themselues by both their senses: neither know I for whether more:

more: The sound of the word spoken pierceth more; the letter written endureth longer: the eare is taught more suddenly, more stirringly; the eye with leisure and continuance. According to my poore abilitie, I haue desired to doe good both wayes; not so much fearing censures, as caring to edifie. This little labour submissely offers it selfe to your Lordship, as iustly yours: being both preached at your call, and (as it were) in your charge, and by one vnder the charge of your fatherly iurisdiction, who vnfainedly desires by all meanes to shew his true heart to Gods Church, together with his humble thankefulnesse to your Lordship: and professeth still to continue duty and obseruance,

Ios. Hall.

PHARISAISME AND CHRISTIANITIE.

MATTH. CHAP. 5. Vers. 20.

Except your righteousnesse exceed the righteousnesse of the Scribes and Pharises, ye shall not enter into the kingdome of heauen.

THE curious Doctors of the Iewes had reduced all Gods statute-law to six hundred and thirteene precepts; so many as there are dayes in the yeere, and members in the body. It was an honest and (which were strange) a Christian conceit of one of their Rabbins, that Dauid abridges all these to eleuen, in his Psalme 15. Esay to six, in his 33. 15. Michai yet lower to three, in his 6, 8. Esay yet againe to two, in his 56. 1. Habacuc to one, The iust man shall liue by faith. So yee see, the Law ends in the Gospell: and that Father said not amisse, The Law is the Gospell foretold; and the Gospell is the Law fulfilled. These two are the freehold of a Christian; and what but they?

Petr. Galatin. de arcan. fidei Cath. ad finem ex glos. Rab. Shelomoh.

Lex est Euangelium praedictum: Euangelium lex completa.

The Iewes of these times peruerted the Law, reiected the Gospell. Our Sauiour therefore, that great Prophet of the world (as it was high time) cleares the Law, deliuers and settles the Gospell, well approuing in both these, that he came not to consume, but to consummate the Law. Wherein (as Paul to his Corinths) he had a great doore, but many aduersaries: amongst these were the great masters of Israel (so our Sauiour tearmes the Pharises) and their fellowes (and yet their riuals) the Scribes: both so much harder to oppose, by how much their authority was greater.

1 Cor. 16. 9. Iohn 3. Art thou a Master in Israel?

Truth hath no roome till falshood be remoued: Our Sauiour therefore (as behoueth) first shewes the falshood of their Glosses, and the hollownesse of their profession: and if both their life and doctrine be naught; what free part is there in them? And loe both of these so faulty, that Except your righteousnesse exceed the righteousnesse of the Scribes and Pharises, ye shall not enter into the kingdome of Heauen.

What were the men? What was their righteousnesse? What wanted it? Follow me, I beseech you, in these three: and if my discourse shall seeme, for a while, more thorny and perplexed, remedy it with your attention.

Those things which are out of the ken of sense or memory, must be fetcht from Story. The Sect (or order whether) of the Pharises ceased with the Temple; since that, no man reades of a Pharise; and now is growne so farre out of knowledge, that the moderne Iewes are more ready to learne of vs who they were: There is no point, wherein it is more difficult to auoid variety, yea oſtentation of reading; without any curious trauerſing of opinions, I ſtudy for ſimple truth, as one that will not lead you out of the rode-way to ſhew you the turnings. Scribes were ancient; Ezra is called (Sopher mahir) a prompt Scribe. As long before him, ſo euer ſince they continued till Chriſts time; but in two rankes; ſome were γραμματεῖς λαϊκοὶ: others νόμικοι. Some popular, others legall; Some the peoples; others, Gods; the one, Secretaries, Recorders, Notaries, as 2 Chron: 24. 11. (Sopher hamelec) the Kings Scribe: The other Doctors of the Law of God: The Law of the Lord is with vs, in vaine made he it, the penne of the Scribe is in vaine.

Ezr. 6. 7.

Ier 8. 8.

As the Phariſes were (νομοδιδάσκαλοι;) Law maſters: ſo theſe are the ſame which Luke 11. 45. are called (νομικοὶ) interpreters of the Law. Tho to ſome not meane Critickes it ſeemes theſe ſhould be a third ſort; which conſider not that our Sauiour on purpoſe addreſſing his ſpeech to the Phariſes, fell by the way vpon the Scribes; and being admoniſhed by one of them, as of an ouer-ſight, now auerres right downe of the Scribes, what before he had but indifferently glanced at. What they were, is plaine by Ezraes pulpit, and Moſes his chaire. Theſe and Phariſes differed not ſo much; they agreed in ſome good, but in more euill. But the profeſſion of Phariſes, becauſe it is more obſcure, you ſhall giue me leaue to fetch ſomewhat further.

Ante aduentum Chriſti, non tot & tam blaſphemiæ hereſes Iren. lib. 5.*

There were, ſaith old Egeſippus (as Euſebius cites him) diuers opinions in the Circumciſion; which all croſſed the Tribe of Iuda: Eſſens, Galileans, Emerobaptiſts, Masbutheans, Samaritans, Phariſes, Sadduces. It were eaſie to helpe him with more, Sebuaans, Cannæans, Sampſæans; and if need were, yet more. Where are thoſe wauerers, that ſtagger in their truſt to the Church, becauſe of different opinions, receiuing that rotten argument of profane Celſus againſt the Chriſtians? Say the Papiſts, one ſaith I am Caluins, another, I am Luthers. We diſclaime, we defie theſe titles, theſe diuiſions: we are one in truth: would God we were yet more one: It is the lace and fringe of Chriſts garment that is queſtioned amongſt vs, the cloth is ſound. But what? Was the Iewiſh Church before Chriſt, Gods true Church, or not? If it were not, which was it? If it were: ſo that here rent in more then eight parts, & one of them differing from it ſelfe in eighteene opinions: and yet as Irenæus well obſerues, Before Chriſt, there were neither ſo many hereſies, nor ſo blaſphemous.

Act. 15. 5.

Shew me a Church on earth without theſe wrinkles of diuiſion, and I will neuer ſeeke for it in heauen: although to ſome, Phariſaiſme ſeemes rather a ſeuerall order, then a ſect: but S. Luke that knew it better, hath (αἵρεσιν φαρισαίων) the ſect of the Phariſes. When the Profeſſion began, no hiſtory recordeth. Some would faine fetch them Eſay 65. 5. Touch me not, for I am holier then thou. But theſe ſtraine too farre; for in the verſe before, the ſame men eat Swines fleſh; which to the Phariſes is more then piacular. Heare briefly their name, their original, their office. Their name (though it might admit of other probable deriuations, yet) by conſent of all * Hebrew Doctors (I haue a great author for it) is fetcht from ſeparation; tho vpon what grounds, all agree not; doubtleſſe for the perfection of their doctrine, and auſterity of life. Their originall is more intricate; which after ſome ſcanning, I haue thus learned of ſome great Maſters of Iewiſh Antiquities. Before there was any open breach in the old Iewiſh Church, there were two generall and diuers conceits about Gods ſeruice: One that tooke vp onely with the law of God; and if they could keepe that, thought they needed no more; neither would they ſapere ſupra ſcriptum, be wiſer than their Maker: Theſe were called (Karraim) of which ſort there are diuers at this day in Conſtantinople, and other-where, at deadly feod with the other Iewes, which they now call Rabbiniſts.

In eam conſentiunt omnes Hebræi, teſte Babal. Haruch, Pagnin. in ברש Ar. Montanus Ioſ. Scal. I. Druſius, &c.

The other, that thought it ſmall thanks to doe onely what they were bidden; Gods Law was too ſtraight for their holineſſe: It was nothing, vnleſſe they did more than content God, earne him (for theſe were popiſh Iewes) and ſupererrogate of him. Theſe were therefore called Chaſidim, Holy, aboue the Law. They plyed God with vnbidden oblations, gaue more than needed, did more than was commanded; yet ſo, as both parts pleaſed themſelues, reſiſted not the other. The more franke ſort vpbraided not the

the other, with too much niggardlinesse; neither did the straiter-handed enuy the other for too much lauishnesse. Would God we could doe thus. They agreed, though they differed. But now, when these voluntary seruices began to be drawne into Canons (as Scaliger speaketh) and that which was before but arbitrary, was imposed as necessary, (necessary for beleefe, necessary for action) questions arose, and the rent began in the Iewes. Those dogmaticall Doctors which stood for supererogation, and traditions aboue Law, were called (Perushim) Pharises; separate fō the other in strict iudgement, in superfluous holinesse: These, as they were the brood of those (Chasidim) whom wee find first mentioned in the Machabees, by the corrupt name of Asideans; so from them againe, in a second succession proceeded (as their more refined issue) the Essens, both Collegiate and Eremiticall: These Pharises then, were a fraternitie or College of extraordinary deuotion; whose rule was Tradition, whose practise voluntary austereneſse: To them the Scribes ioyned themselues, as the purer Iewes; for Paul calls them [ακριβεστάτην αἵρεσιν] the most exquisite sect; yea, & (as Iosephus) the best expositors; willingly expounding the law according to their Traditiōs, & countenancing their traditions by the forced senses of the Law. Both which professions were greatly inlarged & graced by two famous Doctors, Sammai & Hillel (whom some, though falsly, would haue the founders of them) not long before Christs time; for old Hillel of a 120. yeeres, protracted his daies by likely cōputation, to ten yeeres after Christs birth. How Hierom fetcheth their names with more wittines than probabilitie, from Dissipating & Profaning the Law; and what bickerings & deadly quarels were euen amongst themselues in those two famous houses; and what were the foure expositions of the Law which they followed, I list not now to discourse. Their imploiment was, expounding the Law, and vrging Traditions; therefore their auditors had wont to say, when they called one another to Church (as S^t. Hierome tells vs) [οἱ σοφοὶ διατιθῶσι] The wise, that is, the Pharises, expound to day. Whence perhaps, that may be interpreted of S. Paul to the Corinths, Where is the wise? where is the Scribe? So did the Scribes too; but the difference was, that the Scribes were more Textuall, the Pharises more Traditionall: therefore obserue, that the Scribe findes fault with the suspicion of blasphemy; the Pharise, with vnwashen hands: the Scribes (their Doctors) exceld for learning, the Pharises for piety. Their attire was the same, and their fashions: but the Pharises had [πολιτείας μείζους] more sway; and were more strict and Cappucine-like; professed more yeeres continency; and in a word, tooke more paines to goe to hell. These did so carry away the hearts of the Iewes, that there was no holy man, which was not tearmed a Pharise; and therefore among the seuen kindes of Pharises in their Talmud, they make Abraham a Pharise of Loue, Iob a Pharise of Feare. And if from the men you cast your eyes vpon their righteousnesse, you cannot but wonder at the curiosity of their zeale. Wherein looke (I beseech you) first at their deuotion, then their holy carriage, lastly their strict obseruation of the Law.

Such was their deuotion, that they prayed [σωρηδὸν] as a Father saith, oft and long: thrise a day was ordinary; at nine, twelue, and three a clocke: yea their progenitors (whom they would scorne not to match) diuided the day into three parts; whereof one was bestowed on prayer, the next on the Law, the third on their worke. See here, God had two parts of three, themselues but one: besides at their meales what strictnesse?

Their very disciples were taught (to shame vs Christians) if they had forgotten to giue thankes, to returne from the field to the boord to say grace. For diuine seruice; the Decalogue must be read once a day of euery man: the Scribes say the first watch; the Pharises, any houre of the night: others, twice, without mouing eye, hand, foot, in a cleane place, free from any excrement, and foure cubits distant from any sepulchre. For fasting, they did it twice a weeke; not popishly (which Wickliffe iustly calls Foole-fasting) but in earnest; on Monday and Thursday. Besides (to omit their almes, which were euery way proportionable to the rest) what miserable penance did they wilfully? They beat their heads against the walls, as they went, till bloud came: whence one of their seuen Pharises is called (Kizai) a Pharise-draw-bloud: They put thornes in their skirts, to sting them themselues; they lay, on plankes, on stones, on thornes: and Banus that Heremiticall Phariſe drencht himſelfe oft, night and day, in cold water [ἀκλὶς ἀγνείας] for chaſtity; or (if you read it without an aſpiration) it ſignifies for folly rather: what could that apiſh and ſtigmaticall Frier haue done either more or worſe? This was their deuotion. The holineſſe of their carriage was ſuch, that they auoided euery thing that might carry any doubt of pollution: they would not therefore conuerſe with any different religion; and this Law went currant amongſt them: He that eats a Samaritans bread, be as he that eats ſwines fleſh. An Hebrew Midwife might not helpe a Gentile; not bookes, not wax, not incenſe, might be ſold to them: yea, no familiarity might be ſuffered with their owne vulgar. For whereas there were three ranks among the Iewes; the wiſe, (thoſe were the Phariſes) their Diſciples, and the populus terræ, (as they called them) this was one of the ſix reproaches to a nouice of the Phariſes, To eat with the vulgar ſort: and leſt (when they had beene abroad) they ſhould haue beene toucht by any, contrary to the warning of their phylacteries, they ſcoure themſelues at their returne; and eat not, vnleſſe they haue waſht [πυγμὴ] that is, accurately, as the Syriac; oft, as Eraſmus; or with the grip't fiſt, as Beza following Hierome. And not with euery water (marke the niceneſſe) but with that onely which they had drawne vp with their owne labour: and to make vp the meaſure of their pretended ſanctimony, they vowed continency, not perpetuall (as our Romaniſts vrge) but for eight or tenne yeeres. Thus they did vnbidden. How ſtrictly did they performe what was inioyned? No men ſo exact in their tithes: I pay tithes of all, ſaith the boaſting Phariſe: Of all (as a great Doctor noteth) it was more than he needed. God would haue a Sabbath kept; they ouerkeepe it. They would not on that day ſtop a running veſſell, not lay an apple to the fire, not quench a burning, not knocke on a table to ſtill a childe: what ſhould I note more? not rub or ſcratch in publike. God commands them to weare (Totaphoth) phylacteries: they do (which our Sauiour reproues) [πλατύνουσι] enlarge them: and theſe muſt be written with right lines in a whole parchment of the hide of a cleane beaſt. God commands to celebrate and roſt the Paſſeouer; they will haue it done (in an exceſſe of care) not with an iron, but a woodden ſpit, and curiouſly chuſe the wood of Pomegranate: God commanded to auoid Idolatry; they taught their Diſciples, if an Image were in the way, to fetch about ſome other; if they muſt needs goe that way, to runne: and if a thorne ſhould light in their foot (neere the place) not to kneele, but ſit downe to pull it out, leſt they ſhould ſeeme to giue it reuerence. I weary you with theſe Iewiſh niceties. Conſider then how deuout, how liberall, how continent, how true dealing, how zealous, how ſcrupulous, how auſtere theſe men were, and ſee if it be not a wonder that our Sauiour thus brandeth them; Except your righteouſneſſe exceed the righteouſneſſe of the Scribes and Phariſes, yee ſhall not enter into the Kingdome of Heauen: That is, If your doctrine be not more righteous, you ſhall not be entred of the Church: if your holineſſe be not more perfect, you ſhall not enter into heauen: behold, Gods kingdome below and aboue is ſhut vpon them.

The poore Iewes were ſo beſotted with the admiration of theſe two, that they would haue thought if but two men muſt go to heauen, the one ſhould be a Scribe, the other a Phariſe. What ſtrange newes was this from him that kept the keyes of Dauid, that neither of them ſhould come there? It was not the perſon of theſe men, not their learning, not wit, not eloquence, not honour they admired ſo much, but their righteouſneſſe: and loe nothing but their righteouſnes is cenſured: Herein they ſeemed to exceed all men: herein all that would be ſaued, muſt exceed them. Doe but thinke how the amazed multitude ſtared vpon our Sauiour, when they heard this Paradox. Exceed the Phariſes in righteouſneſſe? It were much for an Angell from Heauen. What ſhall the poore ſonnes of the earth doe, if theſe Worthies be turned away with a repulſe? yea perhaps, your ſelues, all that heare me this day, receiue this not without aſtoniſhment and feare, whiles your conſciences ſecretly comparing your holineſſe with theirs, finde it to come as much ſhort of theirs, as theirs of perfection. And would to God you could feare more, and be more amazed with this compariſon; for (to ſet you forward) muſt we exceed them, or elſe not be ſaued? If we let them exceed vs, what hope, what what possibilitie is there of our saluation? Ere we therefore shew how farre we must goe before them, looke backe with me (I beseech you) a little, and see how farre we are behinde them.

They taught diligently, and kept Moses his chaire warme: how many are there of vs, whom the great Master of the Vineyard may finde loytering in this publike market-place, and shake vs by the shoulder with a Quid statis otiosi? Why stand you here idle? Matth. 23. 3.

They compast sea and land (Satans walke) to make a proselyte: we sit still and freeze in our zeale, and lose proselytes with our dull and wilfull neglect. They spent one quarter of the day in prayer: how many are there of vs that would not thinke this an vnreasonable seruice of God? Wee are so farre from this extreme deuotion of the old Euchitæ, that we are rather worthy of a censure with those Spanish Priests for our negligence. How many of you Citizens can get leaue of Mammon to bestow one houre of the day in a set course, vpon God? How many of you Lawyers, are first clients to God, ere you admit others, clients to you? How many of you haue your thoughts fixed in Heauen, ere they be in Westminster? Alas, what dulnesse is this? what iniustice? All thy houres are his, and thou wilt not lend him one of his owne for thine owne good. They read, they recited the Law, (some) twice a day; neuer went without some parts of it about them: but to what effect? There is not one of our people (saith Iosephus) but answers to any question of the Law as readily as his owne name. How shall their diligence vpbraid, yea condemne vs? Alas! how doe our Bibles gather dust for want of vse, while our Chronicle, or our Statute-booke, yea perhaps our idle and scurrilous play-bookes, are worne with turning? Oh how happy were our fore-fathers (whose memory is blessed for euer) if they could with much cost and more danger get but one of Pauls Epistles in their bosomes; how did they hugge it in their armes, hide it in their chest, yea in their hearts! How did they eat, walk, sleep, with that sweet companion, and in spight of persecution, neuer thought themselues well, but when they conuersed with it in secret! Lo now these shops are all open, we buy them not; these books are open, we read them not, and we will be ignorant because we will. The Sunne shines and we shut our windowes. It is enough for the miserable Popish Laitie to be thus dark, that liue in the perpetual night of Inquisition. Shall this be the only difference betwixt them and vs; that they would reade these holy leaues, & may not; we may, & will not? There is no ignorance, to the wilfull. I stand not vpon a formall and verball knowledge: that was neuer more frequent, more flourishing. But if the maine grounds of Christianity were throughly setled in the hearts of the multitude, we should not haue so much cause of shame and sorrow, nor our aduersaries of triumph and insultation. Shew lesse therefore for Gods sake, and learne more; and ballace your wauering heart with the sound truth of godlinesse, that you may flie steadily thorow all the tempests of errours. Make Gods Law of your learned counsell with Dauid, and be happy. Else if you will needs loue darknesse, you shall haue enough of it: you haue here inward darknesse, there outward (σκότος ἐξώτερον) This is your owne darknesse, that his of whom the Psalmist; He sent darknesse, and it was darke: Darke indeed: A thicke and terrible darknesse, ioyned with weeping and gnashing. I vrge not their awfull reuerence in their deuotion, our sleepy or wilde carelesnesse; their austere and rough discipline of the bodie, our wanton pampering of the flesh; though who can abide to thinke of a chaste Pharise, and a filthy Christian? a temperate Pharise, and a drunken Christian? how shamefully is this latter vice (especially) growne vpon vs with time? we knew it once in our ordinary speech appropriated to beggers, now gallants fight for it. This beastlinesse had wont be bashfull, now it is impudent; once children were wont to shout at a drunkard (as some foule wonder) now not to be drunke is quarrell enough among men, among friends: Those knees that we were wont to bow to the God of Heauen, are now bent to Bacchus, in a paganish, bestiall, deuillish deuotion. To leaue the title of Christians, for shame let vs be either men or beasts. My speech hastens to their holy and wise strictnesse of carriage; wherein I can neuer complaine enough of our inequality: They hated the presence, the fire, the fashion, the bookes of a Gentile, of a Samaritane; neither was there any hatred loſt on the Samaritans part; for if he had but toucht a Iew, hee would haue throwne himſelfe into the water, cloathes and all: both of them equally ſicke of a Noli me tangere; Touch me not, for I am holier, Eſay 65.

Our Romiſh Samaritanes haunt our tables, our cloſets, our eares; we frowne not, we diſlike not: We match, conuerſe, conferre, conſult with them careleſly, as if it were come to the old ſtay of that indifferent Apelles in Euſebius; Sat eſt credere in crucifixum: but that which I moſt lament, and yee, Fathers and Brethren, if my voice may reach to any whom it concerneth, in the bowels of Chriſt let me boldly (though moſt vnworthy) moue your wiſdoms, your care to redreſſe it. Our young ſtudents (the hope of poſterity) newly crept out of the ſhell of Philoſophie, ſpend their firſt houres in the great Doctors of Popiſh controuerſies; Bellarmine is next to Ariſtotle: yea, our very vngrounded Artizans, young Gentlemen, fraile Women, buy, reade, trauerſe promiſcuouſly the dangerous Writings of our ſubtileſt Ieſuits. What is the iſſue? Many of them haue taken poyſon, ere they know what milke is; and when they haue once taſted this bane, they muſt drinke and die. Oh what pity, what vexation is it to a true heart, to ſee vs thus rob'd of our hopes; them of their ſoules! I haue heard, yea I haue ſeene and enuied the cautelous ſeueritie of our Aduerſaries, which vpon the deepeſt paines forbid the ſale, yea the ſight of thoſe Authors, which they terme infectious; where was euer Caluin publikely bought in one of their Church-yards? where euer read without licence, without ſecurity? I cenſure not this as the peculiar fault of this place: would God this open remiſſeneſſe were not a common euill, and had not ſpred it ſelfe wide thorow all thoſe Churches that are gone out of Babylon. Let no man tell me of the diſtinction of that old Canoniſt: Some things (ſaith he) we reade leſt they ſhould be neglected, as the Bible; ſome leſt they ſhould be vnknowne, as Arts and Philoſophie; ſome that they may be reiected, as Hereticall bookes. True; But let them reade that can reiect, that can confute; we diſtruſt not our cauſe, but their weake iudgements. A good Apothecary can make a good medicine of a ſtrong poyſon; muſt children therefore be allowed that box? I know how vnworthy I am to aduiſe; only I throw downe my ſelfe at your feet, and beſeech you, that our loſſes and their examples may make vs no leſſe wiſe in our generation.

Matth. 23. 23.

I follow the compariſon; They paid tithes of all they had: not a pot-herbe, but they tithed it. Heare this ye ſacrilegious Patrons, the merchants of ſoules, the Pirats of the Church, the enemies of religion; they tithed all; you nothing; they paid to their Leuites, your Lenites muſt pay to you: Your Cures muſt be purchaſed, your tithes abated or compounded for: O the ſhame of Religion! How too iuſtly may I vſurpe of you that of Seneca? Petties ſacrileges are puniſhed, while great ones ride in triumph. Neuer excuſe it with pretence of Ceremonie; Moſes neuer gaue ſo ſtrict a charge for this, as Paul [ἐν πᾶσι ἀγαθοῖς] communicate all thy goods with thy Teacher; All, with an emphaſis. Wel-fare yet the honeſt Phariſes, whoſe rule was: (Decima vt dines fias) Tithe and be rich: If euer thou be the fatter for this grauell, or the richer with that thou ſtealeſt from God, let me come to begge at thy doore.

Woe to you ſpirituall robbers. Our blinde forefathers clothed the Church; you deſpoile it: their ignorant deuotion ſhall riſe in iudgement againſt your rauening couetouſneſſe. If robbery, ſimony, periury will not carry you to hell; hope ſtill that you may be ſaued. They gaue plentifull almes to the poore: we in ſtead of filling their bellies, grinde their faces. What excellent Lawes had we lately enacted that there ſhould be no begger in Iſrael? Let our ſtreets, wayes, hedges, witneſſe the execution. Thy liberality releeues ſome poore. It is well. But hath not thy oppreſſion made more? Thy vſury, extorting, racking, incloſing, hath wounded whole Villages, and now thou befriendeſt two or three with the plaiſters of thy bounty. The mercies of the wicked are cruel. They were preciſe in their Sabbath; we ſo looſe in ours, as if God had no day: See whether our Tauerns, ſtreets, high-waies deſcry any great difference. Theſe things I vowed in my ſelfe to reproue, if too bitterly, (as you thinke) pardon (I beſeech you) this holy impatience: and blame the fouleneſſe of theſe vices, not my iuſt vehemency. And you (Chriſtian hearers) than which no name can be dearer: be perſwaded to ranſacke your secure hearts; and if there be any of you whose awaked conscience strikes him for these sinnes, and places him below these Iewes in this vnrighteousnesse, if you wish or care to be saued, thinke it high time, as you would euer hope for entrance into Gods Kingdome, to strike your selues on the thigh, and with amazement and indignation to say, What haue I done? to abandon your wicked courses; to resolue, to vow, to striue vnto a Christian and conscionable reformation. Paul, a Pharise, was according to the righteousnesse of the Law vnreproueable: yet if Paul had not gone from Gamaliels feet, to CHRISTS, he had neuer beene saued. Vnreproueable, and yet reiected? Alas, my brethren, what shall become of our gluttony, drunkennesse, pride, oppression, bribing, cousenages, adulteries, blasphemies, and our selues for them? God and men reproue vs for these; what shall become of vs? If the ciuilly righteous shall not be saued, where shall the notorious sinner appeare? A Christian below a Iew? For shame, where are we? where is our emulation? Heauen is our goale, we all runne; loe the Scribes and Pharises are before thee; what safety can it be to come short of those that come short of Heauen? Except your righteousnesse, &c. Phil 3.

You haue seene these Scribes and Pharises; their righteousnesse and our vnrighteousnesse. See now with like patience, their vnrighteousnesse that was, and our righteousnesse that must be, wherein they failed, and we must exceed. They failed then in their Traditions and Practice. May I say they failed, when they exceeded? Their Traditions exceeded in number and prosecution, faulty in matter.

To runne well, but out of the way, (according to the Greeke Prouerbe) is not better than to stand still. Fire is an excellent thing: but if it be in the top of the chimney, it doth mischiefe rather. It is good to be zealous in spight of all scoffes, but [ἐν καλῷ] in a good thing. If they had beene as hot for God, as they were for themselues, it had beene happy: but now in vaine they worship me (saith our Sauiour) teaching for doctrines the Traditions of men. Hence was that axiome receiued currantly amongst their Iewish followers: There is more in the words of the wise than in the words of the Law: More; that is, more matter, more authoritie: and from this principally arises and continues that mortall quarrell betwixt them and their (Karraim) and (Minim) vnto this day. A great Iesuite (at least that thinks himselfe so) writes thus in great earnest: The Pharises (saith he) may not vnfitly be compared to our Catholikes. Some men speake truth ignorantly, some vnwillingly; Caiaphas neuer spake truer, when he meant it not: one egge is not liker to another, than the Tridentine Fathers to these Pharises in this point, besides that of free-will, merit, full performance of the Law, which they absolutely receiued from them: For marke, With the same reuerence and deuotion doe wee receiue and respect Traditions, that we doe the Bookes of the Old and New Testament, say those Fathers in their fourth Session: Heare both of these speake, and see neither; if thou canst discerne whether is the Pharise, refuse me in a greater truth. Not that we did euer say with that Arrian in Hilary: We debarre all words that are not written: or would thinke fit with those phanaticall Anabaptists of Munster, that all bookes should be burnt besides the Bible: some Traditions must haue place in euery Church; but, Their place: they may not take wall of Scripture: Substance may not in our valuation giue way to circumstance, God forbid. If any man expect that my speech on this opportunity should descend to the discourse of our contradicted ceremonies, let him know that I had rather mourne for this breach than meddle with it. God knowes how willingly I would spend my self into persuasions if those would auaile any thing: but I well see that teares are fitter for this Theame than words. The name of our Mother is sacred, and her peace precious. As it was a true speech cited from that Father by Bellarmine: The war of Heretikes is the peace of the Church: so would God our experience did not invert it vpon vs: The war of the Church is the peace of Heretikes. Our discord is their musicke; our ruine their glory: Oh what a sight is this, Brethren striue, while the enemy stands still, and laughs and triumphs. If we desired the griefe of our common mother, the languishing of the Gospel, the extirpation of Religion, the losse of posteritie, the aduantage of our aduersaries, which way could these be better effected than by our dissentiõs? That Spanish Prophet in in our Age (for ſo I finde him ſtiled) when King Philip asked him how hee might become maſter of the Low-Countries, anſwered: If he could diuide them from themſelues; According to that old Machiuellian principle of our Ieſuites, Diuide and Rule. And indeed it is concord onely (as the Poeſie or Mot of the vnited States runs) which hath vpheld them in a rich and flouriſhing eſtate againſt ſo great and potent enemies. Our Aduerſaries already brag of their victories: and what good heart can but bleed to ſee what they haue gained ſince we diſſented; to foreſee what they will gaine? They are our mutuall ſpoiles that haue made them proud and rich. If you euer therefore looke to ſee the good daies of the Goſpell, the vnhorſing and confuſion of that ſtrumpet of Rome, for Gods ſake, for the Churches ſake, for our owne ſoules ſake, let vs all compoſe our ſelues to peace and loue: Oh pray for the peace of Ieruſalem: that peace may be within her walls and proſperitie within her palaces.

Concordiâ res paruæ creſcunt, &c.

Noſtrâ miſeriâ tu es magnus de Pomp. Mimus.

For the matter of their Traditions, our Sauiour hath taxed them in many particulars; about waſhings, oathes, offerings, retribution: whereof he hath ſaid enough when hee hath tearmed their doctrine, the Leauen of the Phariſes, that is, ſowre and ſwelling. S. Hierome reduces them to two heads: They were Turpia anilia; ſome ſo ſhamefull that they might not bee ſpoken; others idle and dotiſh; both ſo numerous that they cannot be reckoned. Take a taſte for all; and to omit their reall Traditions, heare ſome of their interpretatiue. The Law was, that no Leper might come into the Temple; their Tradition was, if he were let downe thorow the roofe, this were no irregularity. The Law was, a man might not carry a burthen on the Sabbath: their Traditionall gloſſe; if he caried ought on one ſhoulder, it was a burthen; if on both, none. If ſhooes alone, no burthen; if with nailes, not tolerable. Their ſtint of a Sabbaths iourney was a thouſand cubits; their gloſſe was, That this is to be vnderſtood without the walls: but if a man ſhould walke all day thorow a Citie as bigge as Ninive, he offends not. The Church of Rome ſhall vie ſtrange gloſſems and ceremonious obſeruations with them, whether for number or for ridiculouſneſſe. The day would faile mee if I ſhould either epitomize the volume of their holy rites, or gather vp thoſe which it hath omitted. The new elected Pope in his ſolemne Lateran proceſſion muſt take copper money out of his Chamberlaines lap, and ſcatter it among the people, and ſay; Gold and ſiluer haue I none. Seuen yeeres penance is inioyed to a deadly ſinne; becauſe Miriam was ſeparated ſeuen daies for her leproſie; and God ſayes to Ezekiel, I haue giuen thee a day for a yeere. Chriſt ſaid to Peter, Lanch forth into the deepe: therefore he meant that Peters ſucceſſor ſhould catch the great fiſh of Conſtantines donation. But I fauour your eares. That one I may not omit, how S. Hierome, whom they fondly terme their Cardinall, compares ſome Popiſh faſhions of his time with the Phariſaicall; who when he had ſpoken of their purple fringes in the foure corners of their (Tallin) and the thornes which theſe Rabbins tie in their skirts, for penance, and admonition of their dutie: Hoc apud nos (ſaith he) ſuperſtitioſæ mulierculæ in parvulis Euangelijs, in crucis ligno & iſtiuſmodi rebus factitant: That is, Thus ſuperſtitious old wines doe amongſt vs with little Goſpels of Ioh. with the wood of the Croſſe, and the like. Thus that Father directly taxeth this Romiſh vſe: who if he were now aliue, and ſhould heare their Church groaning vnder the number of Ceremonies more than the Iewiſh, would (beſides holy Auſtins complaint) redouble that cenſure of our Sauiours, Woe to you Scribes, Phariſes, hypocrites: for yee finde heauy burthens and grieuous to be borne, and lay them on mens ſhoulders. I forbeare to ſpeake of the erroneous opinions of theſe Iewiſh Maſters concerning that Pythagorian tranſanimation or paſſage of the ſoule from one body to another (a point which the Iewes had learned from them, Matth. 16.14.) concerning the not riſing vp of the wicked, Aſtronomicall deſtinie, free will, merit of workes, perfection of obedience; in euery of which it were eaſie to loſe my ſelfe and my ſpeech. I haſte to their maine vnrighteouſneſſe; which was not ſo much the planting of theſe ſtocks, which God neuer ſet, as the graffing of all holineſſe & Gods ſeruice, vpon them; a faſhionable obſeruation of the outward letter, with neglect of the true ſubſtance of the Law; a vaine-glorious oſtentation of piety and perfection; and more care to be thought, than to be good; a greater desire to be great, than good; crueltie and oppression coloured with deuotion. My speech now towards the closure shall draw it selfe vp within these two lists; of their Hypocrisie, their Worldlinesse: Hypocrisie in Fashionablenesse and Ostentation; Worldlinesse in Couetousnesse, Ambition. Only stirre vp your selues a while, and suffer not your Christian attention to faile in this last act.

Some of their Rabbins say well, that God requires two things concerning his law; Custodie and Worke. Custodie in the heart; worke in the execution: These vnsound and ouerly Pharises did neither. It was enough if they kept the Law in their hands; so they had a formall shew of godlinesse, it was enough: if the outside of the platter were cleane, they cared for no more. God had charged them to binde the Law to their hand, and before their eyes, Deut.6. wherein, as Ierome and Theophylact well interpret it, he meant the meditation and practise of his Law: they, like vnto the foolish Patient, which when the Physitian bids him take that prescript, eats vp the paper; if they could get but a list of parchment vpon their left arme next their heart, and another scroll to tie vpon their forehead, and foure corners of fringe, or (if these be denied) a red threed in their hand, thought they might say with SAVL, Blessed be thou of the Lord, I haue done the commandement of the Lord. That Opus operatum of the Papists (for I still parallel them) is not more false Latine than false Diuinity: it is not the outside of thy obedience that God cares for, if neuer so holy, neuer so glorious; it is enough that men are couzened with these flourishes: the heart and the reins are those that God looks after. What cares a good market-man how good the fleece be, when the liuer is rotten? God doth not regard fashion so much as stuffe. Thou deceiuest thy selfe, if thou thinke those shewes that bleared the eyes of the world, can deceiue him. God shall smite thee thou whited wall, God shall smite thee. Doest thou thinke he sees not how smoothly thou hast dawbed on thine whorish complexion? He sees thee a far off, and hates thee while thy parasites applaud thy beauty. I speake not of this carrion-flesh which thou wantonly infectest with the false colours of thy pride, which God shall once wash off with riuers of brimstone: I speake of thy painted soule, and thy counterfeit obedience. Giue me leaue (yea let me take it) to complaine that we are fallen into a cold and hollow age, wherein the religion of many is but fashion, and their piety gilded superstition: Men care onely to seeme Christians; if they can get Gods liuerie on their backes, and his name in their mouthes, they out-face all reproofes. How many are there, which if they can keepe their Church, giue an almes, bow their knee, say their prayers, pay their tithes, and once a yeere receiue the Sacrament (it matters not how corrupt hearts, how filthy tongues, how false hands they beare) can say in their hearts with Esau, I haue enough my brother? As if God cared for this thy vaine formalitie; as if he hated thee not so much more than a Pagan, by how much thou would'st seeme more good. Be not deceiued: If long deuotions, sad looks, hard penances, bountifull almes, would haue carried it (without the solid substance of godlinesse) these Scribes and Pharises had neuer beene shut out of heauen. Consider this therefore (deare brethren) none but your owne eyes can looke into your hearts: we see your faces, the world sees your liues; if your liues be not holy, your hearts sound, though your faces were like Angels, you shall haue your portion with Deuils. Tell not me thou heares't, prayest, talkest, beleeuest: How liuest thou? What doest thou? Shew me thy faith by thy workes, saith Iames. It was an excellent answer that good Moses gaue to Lucius in the Church-story: The faith that is seene, is better than the faith that is heard; and that of Luther not inferiour, that faith doth pinguescere operibus, grow fat and well-liking with good workes. It is a leane starued carcasse of faith thou pretendest without these. If profession be all, the Scribes and Pharises are before thee. Ransacke thy heart, and finde sound affection to God, firme resolutions to goodnesse, true hatred of sinne: ransacke thy life, and finde the truth of works, the life of obedience; then alone thy righteousnesse exceeds the righteousnesse of the Scribes and Pharises, and thou shalt enter into Heauen. Their ostentation follows; wherein it is strange to consider, how those that cared not to be good, should desire yet to seeme good: so did these Pharises. They would not fast without a smeared face, face, not giue an almes without a trumpet, not pray without witneſſes. Scribes, Phariſes, hypocrites. They did act a religious part, they did but play deuotion. They were nothing beſide the ſtage: all for ſight, nothing for ſubſtance. Would God this vice of hypocriſie had either died with them, or had only hereditarily deſcended to their ſucceſſors. Satan will not let vs be thus happy. I ſee no mans heart: but I dare boldly ſay, the world is full of hypocriſie. By their fruits yee ſhall know them (ſaith our Sauiour:) By their fruits; not by the bloſſomes of good purpoſes, nor the leaues of good profeſſion, but by the fruits of their actions. Not to ſpeake how our mint and cummin hath incroched vpon iudgement and iuſtice: Search your ſelues (yee Citizens:) now you draw neere to God with your lips, with your eares, where is your heart? Here your deuout attention ſeemes to crie, The Lord is God: how many are there of you, that haue any God at home? how many that haue a falſe God? God at Church; Mammon in your ſhops? I ſpeake not of all; God forbid. This famous Citie hath in the darkeſt, in the wantoneſt times, afforded (and ſo doth) many, that haue done God honour, honeſty to the Goſpell. But how many are there of you that vnder ſmooth faces haue foule conſciences? Faire words, falſe meaſures, forſworne valuations, adulterate wares, griping vſuries, haue filled many of your coffers, and feſtered your ſoules: You know this, and yet like Salomons Curtizan you wipe your mouthes, and it was not you. Your almes are written in Church-windowes, your defraudings in the ſand; all is good ſaue that which appeares not. How many are there euery where, that ſhame Religion by profeſſing it? whoſe beaſtly life makes Gods truth ſuſpected: for as, howſoeuer the Samaritan, not the Iew, releeued the diſtreſſed traueller, yet the Iewes religion was true, not the Samaritans; ſo in others, truth of cauſes muſt not be iudged by acts of perſons; yet, as he ſaid, It muſt needs be good that Nero perſecutes; ſo who is not readie to ſay: It cannot be good that ſuch a miſcreant profeſſes? Woe to thee Hypocrite, thou canſt not touch, not name goodneſſe, but thou defileſt it; God will plague thee for acting ſo high a part: See what thou art, and hate thy ſelfe; or (if not that) yet ſee how God hates thee: he that made the heart, ſayes thou art no better than an handſome tombe, the houſe of death. Behold here a greene turfe, or ſmooth marble, or ingrauen braſſe, and a commending Epitaph; all ſightly: but what is within? an vnſauoury, rotten carcaſſe. Though thou were wrapt in gold, and perfumed with neuer ſo loud prayers, holy ſemblances, honeſt proteſtations; yet thou art but noyſome carrion to God: Of all earthly things, God cannot abide thee; and if thou wouldſt ſee how much lower yet his deteſtation reacheth, know that when he would deſcribe the torments of Hell, he calls them (as their worſt title) but the portion of hypocrites. Wherefore

My ſpeech muſt end in their Couetouſneſſe and Ambition: A paire of hainous vices. I ioyne them together: for they are not only brethren, but twins; yet ſo as the elder here alſo ſerues the younger. It is Ambition that blowes the fire of Couetouſneſſe. Oppreſſion gets wealth; that wealth may procure honour. Why doe men labour to be rich, but that they may be great? Their couetouſneſſe was ſuch, that their throat (an open ſepulchre) ſwallowed vp whole houſes of Widowes. Whence their goods

Let me boldly ſay, Ieruſalem neuer yeelded ſo very Phariſes as Rome. Theſe old diſciples of Sammai and Hillel were not Phariſes in compariſon of our Ieſuites. From iudgement (you ſee) I am deſcended to practice: wherein it is no leſſe eaſily made good that theſe are more kindly Phariſes, than the ancient. Gentlemen * Druryed by them (pardon the word, it is their owne; the thing I know and can witnesse) haue gone downe the throat of these Loyolists, let their owne Quodlibet and Catechisme report. What speake I of secular inheritances? these eyes haue seene no meane houses of deuotion and charitie swallowed vp by them. As for their ambitious insinuations, not only all their owne Religious enuiously crie downe, but the whole world sees and rings of. What oare of State can stir without their rowing? What Kingdome either stands or falls without their intermedling? What noble Family complaines not of their proling and stealth? And all this with a sterne face of sad pietie and sterne mortification. Yea what other is their great Master, but the King of Pharises? who, vnder a pretence of simple pietie, challenges without shame to haue deuoured the whole Christian world, the naturall inheritances of secular Princes, by the foisted name of Peters patrimony, and now in most infamous and shamelesse ambition calls great Emperours to his stirrup, yea to his foot-stoole. But what wander we so far from home? Va nobis miseris (saith S. Ierome) ad quos Pharisæorum vitia transierunt, (Woe to vs wretched men, to whom the Pharises vices are deriued) The great Doctor of the Gentiles long agoe said, All seeke their owne, and not the things of God; and is the world mended with age? would God we did not finde it a sure rule; that (as it is in this little world) the older it growes, the more diseased, the more couetous: we are all too much the true sonnes of our great grandmother; and haue each of vs an Eues sweet tooth in our heads, we would be more than we are: and euery man would be either (τις) or (ὁ) either the man, or some-body. If a number of your consciences were ript, O yee that would be Christian Gentlemen, Lawyers, Citizens, what doe we thinke would be found in your mawes? Here the deuoured patrimonie of poore Orphans; there the commons of whole Townships: here the impropriate goods of the Church; their piles of vsury: here bribes and vnlawfull fees; there the raw and indigested gobbets of Simony: yea, would God I might not say, but I must say it, with feare, with sorrow, euen of our sacred & diuine profession, that which our Sauiour of his Twelue, Yee are cleane, but not all. The multitude of our vnregarded Charges, and soules dying and starued, for want of spirituall prouision, (while they giue vs bodily) would condemne my silence for too partiall. In all conditions of men (for particulars are subiect to enuie and exception) the daughters of the horse-leach had neuer such a fruitfull generation: They crie still, Giue, Giue: not giue alone, that is, the bread of sufficiencie; but giue, giue; that is, more than enough. But what is more than enough? What is but enough? What is not too little for the insatiable gulfe of humane desires? Euery man would ingrosse the whole world to himselfe, and with that ambitious Conquerour feares it will be too little: and how few Agurs are there, that pray against too much? From hence it is, that yee Courtiers grate vpon poore Trades with hard Monopolies. Hence, yee Merchants load them with deepe and vnreasonable prices, and make them pay deare for daies. Hence yee great men wring the poore sponges of the Commonaltie into your priuate purses, for the maintenance of pride and excesse. Hence yee cormorant corne-mongers hatch vp a dearth in the time of plenty. God sends graine, but many times the Deuill sends garners. The earth hath beene no niggard in yeelding: but you haue beene lauish in transporting, and close in concealing. Neuer talke of our extreme frosts: we see Gods hand, and kisse the rod; but if your hearts, your charitie, were not more frozen than euer the earth was, meane House-keepers should not need to beg, nor the meanest to starue for want of bread. Hence lastly, our loud oppressions of all sorts crie to heauen, and are answered with threats, yea with variety of vengeances. Take this with thee yet, O thou worldling, which hast the greedy-worme vnder thy tongue with Esaies dogges, and neuer hast enough; Thou shalt meet with two things as vnsatiable as thy selfe: the Graue and Hell; and thou, whom all the world could not satisfie, there be two things whereof thou shalt haue enough: Enough mould in the graue, enough fire in hell.

how worthleſſe. We know where there are better things, which we profeſſe our ſelues made for, and aſpiring to: Let vs vſe the world like it ſelfe, and leaue this importunate wooing of it, to Heathens and Infidels, that know no other heauen, no other God. Or if you like that counſell better; Be couetous: Be ambitious; Couet ſpirituall gifts, 1 Cor. 14.1. Neuer thinke you haue grace enough; deſire more, ſeeke for more: this alone is worthy your affections, worthy your cares: Be ſtill poore in this, that you may be rich; be rich that you may be full; be full that you may be glorious. Be ambitious of fauour, of honour, of a kingdome; of Gods fauour, of the honour of Saints, of the Kingdome of glory: whither, he that bought it for vs, and redeemed vs to it, in his good time, ſafely and happily bring vs.

To that bleſſed Sauiour of ours, together with the Father and his good Spirit: the God of all the world, our Father, Redeemer, and Comforter, be giuen all praiſe, honour, and glory now and for euer. Amen.

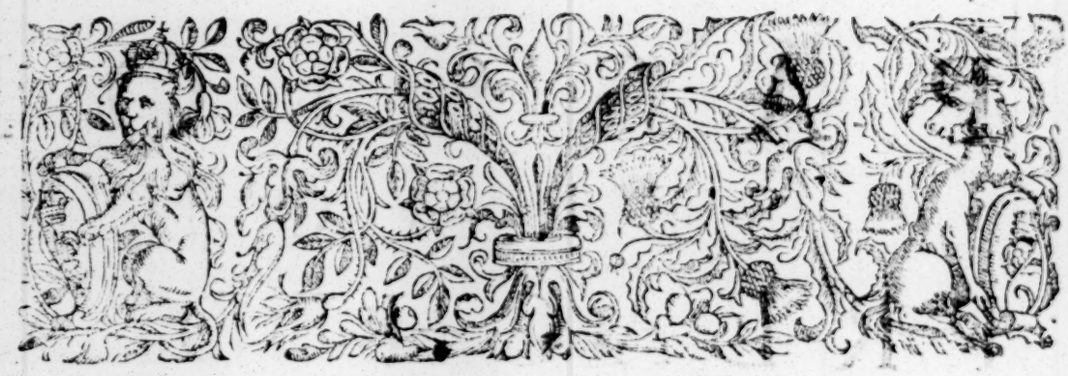
THE PASSION SERMON. PREACHED AT PAVLS CROSSE ON GOOD-FRIDAY. Aprill. 14. 1609.

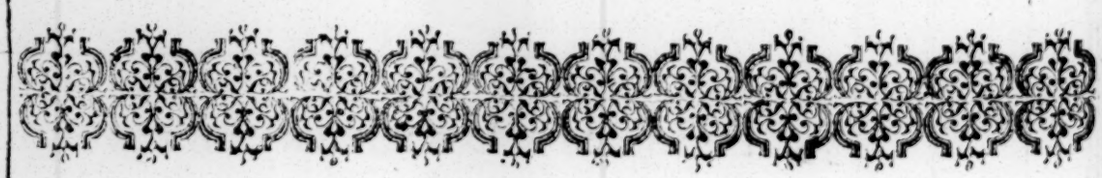
By Ios. Hall.

Imprinted at London, 1627.



TO THE ONELY HONOVR AND GLORY OF GOD MY DEARE AND BLESSED SAVIOVR (WHICH HATH DONE AND SVFFERED AL THESE THINGS FOR MY SOVLE.)

HIS WEAKE AND VNWORTHY SERVANT HVMBLY DESIRES TO CONSECRATE HIMSELFE AND HIS POORE LABOVRS: BESEECHING HIM TO ACCEPT AND BLESSE THEM TO THE PVBLIKE GOOD, AND TO THE PRAISE OF HIS OWNE GLORIOVS NAME.



TO THE READER.

I Deſire not to make any Apologie for the Edition of this my Sermon: It is motiue enough, that herein I affect a more publike and more enduring good. Spirituall niceneſſe, is the next degree to vnfaithfulneſſe: this point cannot be too much vrged, either by the tongue, or Preſſe. Religion and our ſoules depend vpon it, yet are our thoughts too much beſide it. The Church of Rome ſo fixes her ſelfe (in her adoration) vpon the Croſſe of Chriſt, as if ſhe forgat his glorie: Many of vs ſo conceiue of him glorious, that we neglect the meditation of his Croſſe, the way to his glorie and ours. If we would proceed aright, we muſt paſſe from his Golgotha to the mount of Oliues, and from thence to heauen, and there ſeeke and ſettle our reſt. According to my weake abilitie, I haue led this way in my ſpeech, beſeeching my Readers to follow me with their hearts, that we may ouertake him which is entred into the true Sanctuarie, euen the higheſt heauens, to appeare now in the ſight of GOD for vs.

THE PASSION SERMON.

IOH. 19. VER. 30.

When Iesus therefore had received the Vineger, he said, It is finished ; and bowing the head, he gaue vp the ghost.

THE bitter and yet victorious passion of the Sonne of God, (Right Honourable and beloued Christians) as it was the strangest thing that euer befell the earth ; so is both of most soueraigne vse, and lookes for the most frequent and carefull meditation. It is one of those things, which was once done, that it might bee thought of for euer. Euery day therefore must be the Good-Friday of a Christian : who, with that great Doctor of the Gentiles, must desire to know nothing but Iesus Christ, and him crucified.

There is no branch or circumstance in this wonderfull businesse, which yeelds not infinite matter of discourse. According to the solemnitie of this time and place, I haue chosen to commend vnto your Christian attention, our Sauiours Farewell to Nature (for his reuiuing was aboue it) in his last word, in his last act. His last word, It is finished ; his last act, He gaue vp the Ghost. That which he said, hee did. If there be any theame that may challenge and command our eares and hearts, this is it : for behold, the sweetest word that euer Christ spake, and the most meritorious act that euer he did, are met together, in this his last breath. In the one ye shall see him triumphing ; yeelding in the other, yet so as he ouercomes. Imagine therefore, that you saw Christ Iesus, in this day of his passion (who is euery day here crucified before your eyes) aduanced vpon the Chariot of his Crosse ; and now, after a weary conflict, cheerefully ouer-looking the despight and shame of men, the wrath of his Father, the Law, sinne, death, hell ; which all lie gasping at his foot : and then you shall conceiue, with what spirit he saith, Consummatum est, It is finished. What is finished ? Shortly ; All the prophecies that were of him ; All legall obseruations, that prefigured him ; his owne sufferings ; our saluation. The prophecies are accomplisht, the ceremonies abolisht, his sufferings ended, our saluation wrought : these foure heads shall limit this first part of my speech ; only let them finde and leaue you attentiue.

Euen this very word is prophesied of ; All things that are written of me haue an end, saith Christ. What end ? This, It is finished. This very end hath his end here. What therefore is finished ? Not this prediction only of his last draught, as Augustine : that were too particular. Let our Sauiour himselfe say, All things that are written of mee by the Prophets. It is a sure and conuertible rule ; Nothing was done by Christ, which was not foretold : Nothing was euer foretold by the Prophets of Christ, which was not done.

It would take vp a life to compare the Prophets and Euangeliſts, the predictions and the hiſtorie, and largely to diſcourſe how the one foretels, and the other anſwers: let it ſuffice to looke at them running. Of all the Euangeliſts, Saint Matthew hath beene moſt ſtudious, in making theſe references and correſpondences; with whom, the burden or vnderſong of euery euent, is ſtill (vt impleretur) that it might be fulfilled. Thus hath he noted (if I haue reckoned them aright) two and thirtie ſeuerall prophecies concerning Chriſt, fulfilled in his birth, life, death.

To which S. Iohn addes many more. Our ſpeech muſt be directed to his Paſſion: Omitting the reſt, let vs inſiſt in thoſe.

He muſt be apprehended: it was fore-propheſied; The Anointed of the Lord was taken in their nets, ſaith Ieremie: but how? he muſt bee ſold: for what? for thirtie ſiluer peeces; and what muſt thoſe doe? buy a field: all foretold; And they tooke thirtie ſiluer peeces, the price of him that was valued, and gaue them for the potters field, ſaith Zacharie (miſwritten Ieremie, by one letter miſtaken in the abbreuiation.) By whom? That childe of perdition, that the Scripture might bee fulfilled. Which was hee? It is foretold; He that eateth bread with me, ſaith the Pſalmiſt. And what ſhall his Diſciples doe? Runne away: ſo ſaith the Prophecie: I will ſmite the ſhepherd, and the ſheepe ſhall be ſcattered, ſaith Zacharie. What ſhall bee done to him? Hee muſt bee ſcourged and ſpet vpon: behold, not thoſe filthy excrements could haue light vpon his ſacred face, without a prophecie; I hid not my face from ſhame and ſpetting, ſaith Eſay. What ſhall bee the iſſue? In ſhort, he ſhall be led to death: it is the prophecie, The Meſſias ſhall be ſlaine, ſaith Daniel: what death? He muſt be lift vp; Like as Moſes lift vp the Serpent in the wilderneſſe, ſo ſhall the Sonne of man bee lift vp. Chryſoſtome ſaith well, that ſome actions are parables; ſo may I ſay, ſome actions are prophecies, ſuch are all types of Chriſt, and this with the formoſt. Lift vp, whither? to the Croſſe: it is the prophecie, hanging vpon a tree, ſaith Moſes: how lift vp? nailed to it: ſo is the prophecie, Foderunt manus, They haue pierced my hands and my feet, ſaith the Pſalmiſt: With what companie? Two theeues: With the wicked was hee numbred, ſaith Eſay: Where? Without the gates, ſaith the prophecie: What becomes of his garments? They cannot ſo much as caſt the dice for his coat, but it is propheſied: They diuided my garments, and on my veſtures caſt lots, ſaith the Pſalmiſt. He muſt die then on the Croſſe: but how? voluntarily. Not a bone of him ſhall be broken: what hinders it? loe, there he hangs, as it were neglected and at mercie; yet all the raging Iewes, no, all the Deuils in hell cannot ſtir one bone in his bleſſed bodie: It was propheſied in the Eaſter-Lamb, and it muſt be fulfilled in him, that is the true Paſſeour, in ſpight of fiends and men: how then? he muſt be thruſt in the ſide: behold, not the very ſpeare could touch his precious ſide being dead, but it muſt be guided by a prophecie; They ſhall ſee him whom they haue thruſt thorow, ſaith Zacharie: what ſhall he ſay the while? not his very words but are fore-ſpoken: his complaint, Eli Eli lamma ſabactani, as the Chaldee, or עזבתני as the Hebrew, Pſal. 22.2. his reſignation, In manus tuas, Into thy hands I commend my ſpirit, Pſal. 31.5. his requeſt, Father forgiue them: He prayed for the tranſgreſſors, ſaith Eſay. And now when he ſaw all theſe prophecies were fulfilled, knowing that one remained, he ſaid I thirſt. Domine, quid ſitis? ſaith one, O Lord, what thirſteſt thou for? A ſtrange hearing, that a man, yea that GOD and MAN dying, ſhould complaine of thirſt.

Could he endure the ſcorching flames of the wrath of his Father, the curſe of our ſinnes, thoſe tortures of bodie, thoſe horrours of ſoule, and doth he ſhrinke at his thirſt? No, no: he could haue borne his drought, he could not beare the Scripture not fulfilled. It was not neceſſity of nature, but the neceſſitie of his Fathers decree, that drew forth this word, I thirſt. They offered it before, he refuſed it: Whether it were an ordinarie potion for the condemned to haſten death (as in the ſtorie of M. Antonie which is the moſt receiued conſtruction) or whether it were that Iewiſh potion, whereof the Rabbines ſpeake; whoſe tradition was, that the malefactor to be executed, ſhould after ſome good counſell from two of their Teachers, be taught to ſay; Let my death be to the remiſſion of all my ſinnes; and then that he ſhould haue giuen him a boule of mixt wine, with a graine of Frankincenſe, to bereaue him both of reaſon and paine.

Sit mors mea in remiſſionem omnium iniquitatũ mearum. Vt vſus rationis tollatur.

I durſt be confident in this latter; the rather for that Saint Marke calls this draught, οἶνον ἐσμυρνισμένον, Myrrhe-wine, mingled (as is like) with other ingredients. And Montanus agrees with me in the end, Ad ſtuporem & mentis alienationem: A faſhion which Galatine obſerues out of the Sannedrim, to be grounded vpon Prou. 31. 6. Giue ſtrong drinke to him that is ready to periſh. I leaue it modeſtly in the middeſt; let the learneder iudge. Whatſoeuer it were, he would not die till he had complained of thirſt, and in his thirſt taſted it. Neither would he haue thirſted for, or taſted any but this bitter draught; that the Scripture might bee fulfilled; They gaue me vineger to drinke: And loe, now Conſummatum eſt; All is finiſhed.

If there be any Iew amongſt you, that like one of Iohns vnſeaſonable Diſciples, ſhall aske, Art thou he, or ſhall we looke for another? he hath his anſwer; Yee men of Iſrael, why ſtand you gazing and gaping for another Meſſias? In this alone, all the Prophecies are finiſhed; and of him alone, all was propheſied, that was finiſhed. Paul's old rule holds ſtill, To the Iewes a ſtumbling blocke; and that more ancient curſe of Dauid, Let their table bee made a ſnare: And Steuens two brands ſticke ſtill in the fleſh of theſe wretched men: One in their necke, ſtiffe-necked; the other in their heart, vncircumciſed; the one, Obſtinacie; the other, Vnbeleefe: ſtiffe necks indeed, that will not ſtoope and relent with the yoke of ſixteene hundred yeeres iudgement and ſeruilitie; vncircumciſed hearts, the filme of whoſe vnbeleefe would not be cut off with ſo infinite conuictions. Oh mad and miſerable Nation! let them ſhew vs one prophecie that is not fulfilled, let them ſhew vs one other in whom all the prophecies can be fulfilled, and we will mix pittie with our hate: If they cannot, and yet reſiſt, their doome is paſt; Thoſe mine enemies, that would not haue me to reigne ouer them, bring them hither, and ſlay them before me. So let thine enemies periſh, O Lord.

σκληροτράχηλοι. ἀπερίτμητοι.

But what goe I ſo far? Euen amongſt vs (to our ſhame) this riotous age hath bred a monſtrous generation (I pray God I be not now in ſome of your boſomes, that heare me this day) compounded, much like to the Turkiſh religion, of one part, Chriſtian; another, Iew; a third, worldling; a fourth, Atheiſt; a Chriſtians face, a Iewes heart, a worldlings life; and therefore Atheous in the whole; that acknowledge a God, and know him not; that profeſſe a Chriſt, but doubt of him; yea, beleeue him not: The foole hath ſaid in his heart, There is no Chriſt. What ſhall I ſay of theſe men? They are worſe than deuils: that yeelding ſpirit could ſay, Ieſus I know: and theſe miſcreants are ſtill in the old tune of that tempting deuill; Si tu es filius Dei, If thou be the Chriſt. Oh God, that after ſo cleare a Goſpell, ſo many miraculous confirmations, ſo many thouſand martyrdomes, ſo many glorious victories of truth, ſo many open confeſſions of Angels, men, deuils, friends, enemies; ſuch conſpirations of heauen and earth, ſuch vniuerſall conteſtations of all Ages and people; there ſhould be left any ſparke of this damnable infidelitie in the falſe hearts of men. Behold then, yee deſpiſers, and wonder, and vaniſh away: Whom haue all the Prophets foretold? or what haue the prophecies of ſo many hundreds, yea thouſands of yeeres, foreſaid, that is not with this word finiſhed? who could foretell theſe things, but the Spirit of God? who could accompliſh them, but the Sonne of God? He ſpake by the mouth of his holy Prophets, ſaith Zacharie: he hath ſpoken, and he hath done; one true God in both: none other ſpirit could foreſay theſe things ſhould be done; none other power could doe theſe things, thus fore-ſhewed: this word therefore can fit none but the mouth of God our Sauiour, It is finiſhed. We know whom we haue beleeued; Thou art the Chriſt the Sonne of the liuing God. Let him that loues not the Lord Ieſus be accurſed to the death.

Aug. ad Hie. Dum volunt & Iudei eſſe & Chriſtiani, nec Iudei ſunt, nec Chriſtiani.

Thus the prophecies are finiſhed: Of the legall obſeruations, with more breuitie. Chriſt is the end of the Law: What Law? Ceremoniall, Morall. Of the Morall; it was kept perfectly by himselfe, satisfied fully for vs: Of the Ceremoniall; it was referred to him, obserued of him, fulfilled in him, abolisht by him. There were nothing more easie, than to shew you how all those Iewish Ceremonies lookt at Christ: how Circumcision, Passeouer, the Tabernacle, both outer and inner, the Temple, the Lauer, both the Altars, the Tables of Shew-bread, the Candlesticks, the Vaile, the Holy of Holies, the Arke, the Propitiatorie, the pot of Manna, Aarons Rod, the High Priest, his Order & Line; his Habits, his Inaugurations, his Washings, his Anointings, his Sprinklings, Offerings, the Sacrifices, ἱλαστικὰ, εὐχαριστικὰ, and what euer Iewish Rite; had their vertue from Christ, relation to him, and their end in him. This was then their last gaspe; for, now straight they died with Christ, now the vaile of the Temple rent: as Austin well notes out of Matthewes order; It tore then, when Christs last breath passed. That conceit of Theophylact is wittie; that as the Iewes were wont to rend their garments, when they heard blasphemie: so the Temple not enduring these execrable blasphemies against the Sonne of God, tore his vaile in peeces. But that is not all: the vaile rent, is the obligation of the rituall Law cancelled; the way into the heauenly Sanctuarie opened; the shadow giuing roome to the substance: in a word, it doth that which Christ saith, Consummatum est. Euen now then the Law of Ceremonies died: It had a long and solemne burtiall, as Augustine saith well; perhaps figured in Moses, who died not lingeringly, but was thirtie dayes mourned for: what meanes the Church of Rome to digge them vp, now rotten in their graues? and that, not as they had beene buried, but sowen with a plenteous increase; yea, with the inuerted vsurie of too many of you Citizens; ten for one. It is a graue and deepe censure of that resolute Hierome; Ego è contrario loquar, &c. I say, saith he, and in spight of all the world dare maintaine, that now the Iewish ceremonies are pernicious and deadly,; and whosoeuer shall obserue them, whether hee bee Iew or Gentile, in barathrum Diaboli devolutum; shall frie in Hell for it. Still Altars? still Priests? sacrifices still? still washings? still vnctions? sprinkling, shauing, purifying? still all, and more than all? Let them heare but Augustines censure, Quisquis nunc, &c. Whosoeuer shall now vse them, as it were raking them vp out of their dust, hee shall not be Pius deductor corporis, sed impius sepulturæ violator; an impious and sacrilegious wretch, that ransacks the quiet tombes of the dead.

I say not that all Ceremonies are dead; but the Law of Ceremonies, and of Iewish. It is a sound distinction of them, that profound Peter Martyr hath in his Epistle to that worthy Martyr, Father, Bishop Hooper: Some are typicall, fore-signifying Christ to come: some of order and decencie, those are abrogated, not these: the Iewes had a fashion of Prophesying in the Churches; so the Christians from them, as Ambrose: the Iewes had an eminent pulpit of wood; so we: they gaue names at their Circumcision; so we at Baptisme: they sung Psalmes, melodiously in Churches, so doe we: they paid and receiued tithes, so doe we: they wrapt their dead in linnen with odors; so we: the Iewes had sureties at their admission into the Church; so wee: these instances might be infinite: the Spouse of Christ cannot be without her laces, and chaines, and borders. Christ came not to dissolue order. But thou O Lord, how long? how long shall thy poore Church finde her ornaments, her sorrowes? and see the deare sonnes of her wombe, bleeding about these apples of strife: let me so name them, not for their value (euen small things, when they are commanded, looke for no small respect) but for their euent: the enemie is at the gates of our Siracuse; how long will we suffer our selues, taken vp with angles and circles in the dust: yee Men, Brethren, and Fathers, helpe; for Gods sake put to your hands, to the quenching of this common flame: the one side by humilitie and obedience; the other by compassion; both by prayers and teares: who am I, that I should reuiue to you the sweet spirit of that diuine Augustine, who when he heard and saw the bitter contentions betwixt two graue and famous Diuines, Ierome and Russine; Heu mihi, saith he, qui vos alicubi simul inuenire non possum; Alas, that I should neuer finde you two together, how I would fall at your feet, how I would embrace them, and weepe vpon them, and beseech you, either of you for other, and each for himselfe, both of you for the Church of God, but especially, for the weake, weake, for whom Chriſt died, who not without their owne great danger, ſee you two fighting in this Theatre of the world. Yet let me doe what he ſaid he would doe; begge for peace, as for life: by your filiall pietie to the Church of God, whoſe ruines follow vpon our diuiſions; by your loue of Gods truth; by the graces of that one bleſſed Spirit, whereby we are all informed and quickned; by the precious bloud of that Sonne of God, which this day, and this houre, was ſhed for our redemption, be inclined to peace and loue: and though our braines be different, yet let our hearts be one. It was, as I heard, the dying ſpeech of our late reuerend, worthy and gracious Dioceſin; Modo me moriente viuat ac floreat Eccleſia; Oh, yet if, when I am dead, the Church may liue and flouriſh.

What a ſpirit was here? what a ſpeech? how worthy neuer to die? how worthy of a ſoule ſo neere to his heauen? how worthy of ſo happy a ſucceſſion? Yee whom God hath made inheritours of this bleſſed care, who doe no leſſe long for the proſperitie of Sion, liue you to effect what he did but liue to wiſh; all peace with our ſelues, and warre with none but Rome and Hell. And if there bee any wayward Separatiſt, whoſe ſoule profeſſeth to hate peace; I feare to tell him Pauls meſſage, yet I muſt: Would to God thoſe were cut off that trouble you. How cut off? As good Theodoſius ſaid to Demophilus, a contentious Prelate; Si tu pacem fugis, &c. If thou flee peace, I will make thee flie the Church. Alas, they doe flie it: that which ſhould be their puniſhment, they make their contentment; how are they worthy of pitie? As Optatus of his Donatiſts; they are Brethren, might be companions, and will not. Oh wilfull men; whither doe they runne? from one Chriſt to another? Is Chriſt diuided? wee haue him, thanks be to our good God, and we heare him daily; and whither ſhall wee goe from thee? thou haſt the words of eternall life.

Si tu pacem fugis, ego te ab Eccleſia fugere mando.

Thus the Ceremonies are finiſhed: now heare the end of his ſufferings, with like patience and deuotion: his death is here included; it was ſo neere, that he ſpake of it as done; and when it was done, all was done. How eaſie is it to loſe our ſelues in this diſcourſe! how hard not to be ouerwhelmed with matter of wonder; and to finde either beginning or end! his ſufferings found an end, our thoughts cannot. Lo, with this word, he is happily waded out of thoſe deeps of ſorrowes, whereof our conceits can finde no bottome: yet let vs, with Peter, gird our coat, and caſt our ſelues a little into this ſea.

All his life was but a perpetuall Paſſion: In that hee became man, hee ſuffered more than we can doe, either while wee are men, or when wee ceaſe to be men; he humbled, yea, he emptied himſelfe. Wee, when we ceaſe to be here, are cloathed vpon, 2 Cor. 5. Wee both winne by our being, and gaine by our loſſe; he loſt by taking our more or leſſe to himſelfe, that is, manhood. For, though euer as God, I and my Father are one: yet as man, My Father is greater than I. That man ſhould be turned into a beaſt, into a worme, into duſt, into nothing; is not ſo great a diſparagement, as that God ſhould become man: and yet it is not finiſhed; it is but begunne. But what man? If, as the abſolute Monarch of the world, hee had commanded the vaſſalage of all Emperours and Princes, and had trod on nothing but Crownes and Scepters, and the necks of Kings, and bidden all the Potentates of the earth to attend his traine; this had carried ſome port with it; ſuitable to the heroicall Maieſtie of Gods Sonne. No ſuch matter: here is neither Forme nor Beautie; vnleſſe perhaps (μορφὴν δούλου) the forme of a ſeruant: you haue made me to ſerue with your ſinnes. Behold, hee is a man to God; a ſeruant to man; and, be it ſpoken with holy reuerence, a grudge to his ſeruants. Hee is deſpiſed and reiected of men; yea (as himſelfe, of himſelfe) a worme, and no man, the ſhame of men, and contempt of the people. Who is the King of glorie? the Lord of Hoaſts, hee is the King of glorie. Set theſe two together; the King of glorie; the ſhame of men: the more honour, the more abaſement. Looke backe to his Cradle: there you finde him reiected of the Bethlemites; borne and laid, alas, how homely, how vnworthily; ſought for by Herod, exiled to Ægypt, obſcurely brought vp in the Cottage of a poore Foſter-Father, tranſported and tempted by Sathan, derided of his kindred, blaſphemouſly traduced by the Iewes, pinched with hunger, reſtleſſe, harbouleſſe, ſorrowfull, perſecuted by the Elders and Phariſes, ſold by his owne ſeruant, uant, apprehended, arraigned, ſcourged, condemned, and yet it is not finiſhed. Let vs, with that Diſciple, follow him a far off; and paſſing ouer all his contemptuous vſage in the way, ſee him brought to his Croſſe. Still the further we looke, the more wonder: euery thing addes to this ignominie of ſuffering, and triumph of ouer-comming. Where was it? not in a corner, as Paul ſaith to Feſtus, but in Ieruſalem, the eye, the heart of the world. Obſcuritie abateth ſhame: publique notice heightens it: Before all Iſrael and before this Sunne, ſaith God to Dauid, when hee would throughly ſhame him: In Ieruſalem, which he had honoured with his preſence, taught with his preachings, aſtoniſht with his miracles, bewayled with his teares; O Ieruſalem, Ieruſalem, how oft would I, and thou wouldſt not: O yet, if in this thy day. Crueltie and vnkindneſſe, after good deſert, afflict ſo much more, as our merit hath beene greater. Wherabouts? without the gates: in Caluarie, among the ſtinking bones of execrable Malefactors. Before, the glory of the place bred ſhame; now the vileneſſe of it. When? but in the Paſſeouer; a time of greateſt frequence, and concourſe of all Iewes and Proſelytes: An holy time: when they ſhould receiue the figure, they reiect the ſubſtance: when they ſhould kill and eat the Sacramentall Lambe, in faith; in thankfulneſſe, they kill the Lambe of God, our true Paſſeouer, in crueltie and contempt. With whom? The qualitie of our companie either increaſes or leſſens ſhame. In the midſt of theeues (ſaith one) as the Prince of theeues: there was no guile in his mouth, much leſſe in his hands: yet behold he that thought it no robberie to be equall with God, is made equall to robbers and murderers; yea ſuperiour in euill. What ſuffered he? As all lifes are not alike pleaſant, ſo all deaths are not equally fearefull. There is not more difference betwixt ſome life and death, than betwixt one death and another. See the Apoſtles gradation: He was made obedient to the death, euen the death of the Croſſe. The Croſſe, a lingring, tormenting, ignominious death. The Iewes had foure kindes of death for malefactors; the towell, the ſword, fire, ſtones; each of theſe aboue other in extremitie. Strangling with the towell, they accounted eaſieſt: the ſword worſe than the towell; the fire worſe than the ſword: ſtoning worſe than the fire: but this Romane death was worſt of all. Curſed is euery one that hangeth on a Tree. Yet (as Ierome well) he is not therefore accurſed, becauſe he hangeth; but therefore he hangeth, becauſe he is accurſed. He was made (κατάραν) a Curſe for vs. The curſe was more than the ſhame: yet the ſhame is vnſpeakable; and yet not more than the paine. Yet all that die the ſame death, are not equally miſerable: the very theeues fared better in their death than he. I heare of no irriſion, no inſcription, no taunts, no inſultation on them: they had nothing but paine to encounter, he paine and ſcorne. An ingenuous and noble Nature can worſe brooke this than the other; any thing rather than diſdainfulneſſe and deriſion: eſpecially, from a baſe enemie. I remember that learned father begins Iſraels affliction, with Iſmaels perſecuting laughter. The Iewes, the Souldiers, yea, the very Theeues flouted him, and triumpht ouer his miſerie; his bloud cannot ſatisfie them, without his reproch. Which of his ſenſes now was not a window to let in ſorrow? his eyes ſaw the teares of his Mother and friends, the vnthankfull demeanure of Mankinde, the cruell deſpight of his enemies: his eares heard the reuilings and blaſphemies of the multitude; and (whether the place were noyſome to his ſent) his touch felt the nailes, his taſte the gall. Looke vp, O all ye beholders, looke vpon this precious body, and ſee what part yee can finde free. That head which is adored and trembled at by the Angelicall ſpirits, is all raked and harrowed with thornes: that face, of whom it is ſaid; Thou art fairer than the children of men, is all beſmeared with the filthy ſpittle of the Iewes, and furrowed with his teares; thoſe eyes, cleerer than the Sunne, are darkned with the ſhadow of death; thoſe eares that heare the heauenly conſorts of Angels, now are filled with the curſed ſpeakings and ſcoffs of wretched men: thoſe lips that ſpake as neuer man ſpake, that command the ſpirits both of light and darkneſſe, are ſcornfully wet with vineger and gall: thoſe feet that trample on all the powers of hell (his enemies are made his footſtoole) are now nailed to the footſtoole of the Croſſe: thoſe hands that freely ſway the ſcepter of the heauens, now carry the reede of reproach, and are nailed to the tree tree of reproch: that whole bodie, which was conceiued by the Holy-Ghoſt, was all ſcourged, wounded, mangled: this is the out-ſide of his ſufferings. Was his heart free? Oh no: the inner part or ſoule of this paine, which was vnſeene, is as far beyond theſe outward and ſenſible, as the ſoule is beyond the bodie; Gods wrath beyond the malice of men: theſe were but loue-ticks to what his ſoule endured. O all yee that paſſe by the way, behold and ſee, if there be any ſorrow like to my ſorrow: Alas, Lord, what can we ſee of thy ſorrowes? we cannot conceiue ſo much as the hainouſnes and deſert of one of thoſe ſinnes which thou bareſt: we can no more ſee thy paine, than we could vndergoe it; onely this we ſee, that what the infinite ſinnes, of almoſt infinite men, committed againſt an infinite Maieſtie, deſerued in infinite continuance; all this thou in the ſhort time of thy Paſſion haſt ſuſtained. We may behold and ſee; but all the glorious ſpirits in Heauen cannot looke into the depth of this ſuffering. Doe but looke yet a little into the paſſions of this his Paſſion: for, by the manner of his ſufferings, we ſhall beſt ſee, what he ſuffered. Wiſe and reſolute men doe not complaine of a little; holy Martyrs haue beene racked, and would not be looſed; what ſhall we ſay if the author of their ſtrength, God and Man, bewray paſſions? what would haue ouerwhelmed men, would not haue made him ſhrinke; and what made him complaine, could neuer haue beene ſuſtained by men. What ſhall we then thinke, if he were affrighted with terrors, perplexed with ſorrowes, and diſtracted with both theſe; And lo, he was all theſe: for, firſt, here was an amazed feare; for millions of men to deſpaire was not ſo much as for him to feare: and yet it was no ſlight feare: he began (ἐκθαμβεῖσθαι) to be aſtoniſhed with terror, which in the dayes of his fleſh, offered vp prayers and ſupplications, with ſtrong cries and teares, to him that was able to helpe him, and was heard in that he feared. Neuer was man ſo afraid of the torments of Hell, as Chriſt (ſtanding in our roome) of his Fathers wrath. Feare is ſtill ſutable to apprehenſion. Neuer man could ſo perfectly apprehend this cauſe of feare; he felt the chaſtiſements of our peace, yea, the curſe of our ſinnes; and therefore might well ſay with DAVID; I ſuffer thy terrors with a troubled mind; yea, with IOB; The arrowes of God are in me, and the terrors of God fight againſt me. With feare, there was a deiecting ſorrow (ἀδημονία) My ſoule is on all ſides heauy to the death: his ſtrong cries, his many teares, are witneſſes of this Paſſion: he had formerly ſhed teares of pittie, and teares of loue, but now of anguiſh: he had before ſent forth cries of mercy; neuer of complaint till now: when the Sonne of God weeps and cries, what ſhall we ſay or thinke? yet further, betwixt both theſe and his loue what a conflict was there? It is not amiſſe diſtinguiſhed, that he was alwayes in Agone; but now in ἀγωνίᾳ, in a ſtrugling paſſion of mixed griefe. Behold, this field was not without ſweat and bloud; yea, a ſweat of bloud. Oh what Man or Angell can conceiue the taking of that heart, that without all outward violence, meerely, out of the extremitie of his owne Paſſion, bled (through the fleſh and skin) not ſome faint deaw, but ſolid drops of bloud? No thornes, no nailes fetcht bloud from him, with ſo much paine as his owne thoughts: he ſaw the fierce wrath of his Father, and therefore feared: he ſaw the heauy burden of our ſinnes to be vndertaken; and thereupon, beſides feare, iuſtly grieued; he ſaw the neceſſitie of our eternall damnation, if he ſuffered not: if he did ſuffer, of our redemption; and therefore his loue incountred both griefe and feare. In it ſelfe, he would not drinke of that cup. In reſpect of our good, and his decree, he would and did; and while he thus ſtriueth, he ſweats and bleeds. There was neuer ſuch a combat, neuer ſuch a bloudſhed, and yet it is not finiſhed; I dare not ſay with ſome Schoolemen, that the ſorrow of his Paſſion, was not ſo great as the ſorrow of his compaſſion: yet that was ſurely exceeding great. To ſee the vngratious careleſneſſe of mankinde, the ſlender fruit of his ſufferings, the ſorrowes of his Mother, Diſciples, friends; to fore-ſee, from the watch-tower of his Croſſe, the future temptations of his children, deſolations of his Church; all theſe muſt needs ſtrike deepe into a tender heart. Theſe he ſtill ſees & pitties, but without paſſion; then he ſuffered in ſeeing them.

Can we yet ſay any more? Lo, all theſe ſufferings are aggrauated by his fulneſſe of know-knowledge, and want of comfort: for, he did not ſhut his eyes, as one ſaith, when hee drunke this cup: he ſaw how dreggiſh, and knew how bitter it was. So daine euils afflict, if not leſſe, ſhorter. He fore-ſaw, and fore-ſaid, euerie particular he ſhould ſuffer: ſo long as he fore-ſaw, he ſuffered: the expectation of euill, is not leſſe than the ſenſe: to looke long for good, is a puniſhment; but for euill, is a torment. No paſſion workes vpon an vnknowne obiect: as no loue, ſo no feare is of what we know not. Hence men feare not Hell, becauſe they fore-ſee it not: if we could ſee that pit open before wee come at it, it would make vs tremble at our ſins, and our knees to knocke together, as Baltazars; and perhaps without faith, to runne madde at the horror of iudgement. He ſaw the burden of all particular ſinnes to be laid vpon him; euery dramme of his Fathers wrath was meaſured out to him, ere he toucht this potion; this cup was full, and hee knew that it muſt be wring'd, not a drop left: it muſt be finiſhed. Oh yet, if as he fore-ſaw all his ſorrowes, ſo hee colud haue ſeene ſome mixture of refreſhing. But I found none to comfort me, no, none to pitty me. And yet it is a poore comfort that ariſes from pittie. Euen ſo, O Lord, thou treadeſt this wine-preſſe alone; none to accompanie, none to aſſiſt thee. I remember Ruffinus in his Eccleſiaſticall ſtorie reports, that one Theodorus a Martyr, told him, that when he was hanging ten houres vpon the racke for religion vnder Iulians perſecution, his ioynts diſtended and diſtorted, his body exquiſitely tortured with change of executioners; ſo as neuer age (ſaith he) could remember the like: he felt no paine at all, but continued indeed all the while in the ſight of all men ſinging & ſmiling: for there ſtood a comely young man by him on his libbet (an Angell rather, in forme of a man) which with a cleane towell, ſtill wip't off his ſweat, and powred coole water vpon his racked limbs; wherewith he was ſo refreſhed, that it grieued him to be let downe. Euen the greateſt torments are eaſie, when they haue anſwerable comforts: but a wounded and comfortleſſe ſpirit, who can beare? If yet but the ſame meſſenger of God might haue attended his Croſſe, that appeared in his agonie; and might haue giuen eaſe to their Lord, as he did to his ſeruant. And yet, what can the Angels helpe, where God will ſmite? Againſt the violence of men, againſt the furie of Satan, they haue preuailed in the cauſe of God, for men: they dare not, they cannot comfort, where God will afflict. When our Sauiour had beene wreſtling with Satan in the end of his Lent, then they appeared to him, and ſerued; but now, while about the ſame time, hee is wreſtling with the wrath of his Father for vs, not an Angell dare be ſeene to looke out of the windowes of heauen to releeue him. For men, much leſſe could they, if they would; but what did they? Miſerable comforters are ye all: the Souldiers, they ſtript him, ſcorned him with his purple crowne, reed, ſpat on him, ſmote him; the paſſengers, they reuiled him; and inſulting, wagging their heads and hands at him, Hey thou that deſtroyedſt the Temple, come downe &c. The Elders and Scribes; alas, they haue bought his bloud, ſuborned witneſſes, incenſed Pilate, preferred Barrabas, vndertooke the guilt of his death, cried out, Crucifie, Crucifie. He thou that ſauedſt others. His Diſciples: alas, they forſooke him, one of them forſweares him, another runnes away naked, rather than hee will ſtay and confeſſe him. His mother and other friends, they looke on indeed, and ſorrow with him; but to his diſcomfort. Where the griefe is extreme, and reſpects neere, partnerſhip doth but increaſe ſorrow. Paul chides this loue: What doe you weeping & breaking my heart? The teares of thoſe we loue, doe either ſlacken our hearts, or wound them. Who then ſhall comfort him? himſelfe? Sometimes our owne thoughts finde a way to ſuccour vs, vnknowne to others; no, not himſelfe. Doubtleſſe (as Aquinas) the influence of the higher part of the ſoule, was reſtrained from the aid of the inferiour: My ſoule is filled with euills, Pſalm. 87. 4. Who then? his Father? here, here was his hope: If the Lord had not holpen me, my ſoule had almoſt dwelt in ſilence: I and my Father are one. But now (alas) hee, euen hee, deliuers him into the hands of his enemies; when he hath done, turnes his backe vpon him as a ſtranger; yea, hee woundeth him as an enemy. The Lord would breake him, Eſay 53. 10. yet any thing is light to the ſoule whiles the comforts of God ſuſtaine it: who can diſmay, where God will releeue releeue? But here, My God, my God, why haſt thou forſaken me? What a word was here, to come from the mouth of the Son of God? My diſciples are men, weake and fearefull; no maruell if they forſake me. The Iewes are themſelues, cruell and obſtinate. Men are men, graceleſſe & vnthankfull. Deuills are, according to their nature, ſpightfull and malicious. All theſe doe but their kinde; and let them doe it: but thou, O Father, thou that haſt ſaid, This is my welbeloued Sonne, in whom I am well pleaſed: thou of whom I haue ſaid, It is my Father that glorifies me; what? forſaken mee? Not onely brought me to this ſhame, ſmitten me, vnregarded me; but, as it were, forgotten, yea, forſaken me? What, euen mee, my Father? How many of thy conſtant ſeruants haue ſuffered heauy things: yet in the multitudes of the ſorrowes of their hearts, thy preſence and comforts haue refreſhed their ſoules. Haſt thou releeued them, and doſt thou forſake me? me, thine onely, deare, naturall, eternall Son? O ye heauens and earth, how could you ſtand, whiles the Maker of you thus complained? Ye ſtood: but partaking after a ſort of his Paſſion: the earth trembled and ſhooke, her rocks tore, her graues opened, the heauens withdrew their light, as not daring to behold this ſad and fearefull ſpectacle.

Oh deare Chriſtians, how ſhould theſe earthen and rockie hearts of ours ſhake, and rend in peeces at this Meditation? how ſhould our faces be couered with darkneſſe, and our ioy be turned into heauineſſe? All theſe voyces, & teares, and ſweats, and pangs are for vs; yea from vs. Shall the Sonne of God thus ſmart for our ſinnes, yea with our ſins, and ſhall not we grieue for our owne? ſhall he weepe to vs in this Market-place, and ſhall not we mourne? Nay, ſhall he ſweat and bleed for vs, and ſhall not we weepe for our ſelues? Shall he thus lamentably ſhrieke out, vnder his Fathers wrath, and ſhall not we tremble? Shall the heauens and earth ſuffer with him, and we ſuffer nothing? I call you not to a weake and idle pitie of our glorious Sauiour: to what purpoſe? His iniurie was our glorie. No, no; Ye daughters of Ieruſalem, weepe not for me, but weepe for your ſelues: for our ſinnes, that haue done this; not for his ſorrow that ſuffered it: not for his pangs, that were; but for our owne, that ſhould haue beene, and (if wee repent not) ſhall be. Oh how grieuous, how deadly are our ſins, that coſt the Sonne of God (beſides bloud) ſo much torment? how farre are our ſoules gone, that could not be ranſomed with an eaſier price? that, that tooke ſo much of this infinite Redeemer of men, God and man, how can it chuſe but ſwallow vp, and confound thy ſoule, which is but finite and ſinfull? If thy ſoule had beene in his ſoules ſtead, what had become of it? it ſhall be, if his were not in ſtead of thine. This weight that lies thus heauie on the Son of God, and wrung from him theſe teares, ſweat bloud, and theſe vnconceiueable groanes of his afflicted ſpirit, how ſhould it chuſe but preſſe down thy ſoule to the bottome of hell? and ſo it will doe: if he haue not ſuffered it for thee, thou muſt and ſhalt ſuffer it for thy ſelfe. Goe now thou lewd man, and make thy ſelfe merry with thy ſins; laugh at the vncleanneſſes, or bloudineſſe of thy youth: thou little knoweſt the price of a ſin; thy ſoule ſhall doe, thy Sauiour did, when he cried out, to the amazement of Angels, and horror of men; My God, my God, why haſt thou forſaken me? But now no more of this; It is finiſhed: the greater conflict, the more happy victorie. Well doth he finde and feele of his Father, what his type ſaid before, He will not chide alwaies, nor keepe his anger for euer. It is fearefull; but in him, ſhort: eternall to ſinners; ſhort to his Son, in whom the God-head dwelt bodily. Behold; this ſtorme, wherewith all the powers of the world were ſhaken, is now ouer. The Elders, Phariſies, Iudas, the Souldiers, Prieſts, witneſſes, Iudges, theeues, executioners, deuils, haue all tyred themſelues in vaine, with their owne malice; and he triumphs ouer them all, vpon the throne of his Croſſe: his enemies are vanquiſht, his Father ſatisfied, his ſoule with this word at reſt and glory; It is finiſhed. Now there is no more betraying, agonies, arraignements, ſcourgings, ſcoffing, crucifying, conflicts, terrors; all is finiſhed. Alas, beloued, and will we not let the Sonne of God be at reſt? do we now againe goe about to fetch him out of his glorie, to ſcorne and crucifie him? I feare to ſay it: Gods ſpirit dare and doth; They crucifie againe to themſelues the Sonne of God, and make a mocke of him. To themſelues, not in himſelfe: that they cannot, it is no thanke to them; they would doe it. See and conſider: the notoriouſly-ſinfull conuerſations of thoſe, that ſhould be Chriſtians, offer violence vnto our glorified Sauiour, they ſtretch their hand to heauen, and pull him downe from his throne, to his Croſſe: they teare him with thornes, pierce him with nailes, load him with reproches. Thou hateſt the Iewes, ſpitteſt at the name of Iudas, raileſt on Pilate, condemneſt the cruell butchers of Chriſt; yet, thou canſt blaſpheme, and ſweare him quite ouer, curſe, ſwagger, lye, oppreſſe, boyle with luſt, ſcoffe, ryot, and liueſt like a debauched man; yea like an humane Beaſt; yea like an vncleane Deuill. Cry Hoſanna as long as thou wilt; thou art a Pilate, a Iew, a Iudas, an Executioner of the Lord of life; and ſo much greater ſhall thy iudgement be, by how much thy light and his glory is more. Oh, beloued, is it not enough that he died once for vs? Were thoſe paines ſo light, that we ſhould euery day redouble them? Is this the entertainment that ſo gracious a Sauiour hath deſerued of vs by dying? Is this the recompence of that infinite loue of his, that thou ſhouldeſt thus cruelly vex and wound him with thy ſinnes? Euery of our ſinnes is a thorne, and nayle, and ſpeare to him: while thou powreſt downe thy drunken carowſes, thou giueſt thy Sauiour a potion of gall; while thou deſpiſeſt his poore ſeruants, thou ſpitteſt on his face: while thou putteſt on thy proud dreſſes, and liſteſt vp thy vaine heart with high conceits, thou ſetteſt a Crowne of thornes on his head: while thou wringeſt and oppreſſeſt his poore children, thou whippeſt him, and draweſt bloud of his hands and feet. Thou hypocrite; how dareſt thou offer to receiue the Sacrament of God, with that hand, which is thus imbrued with the bloud of him whom thou receiueſt? In euery Ordinary thy profane tongue walkes, in the diſgrace of the religious and conſcionable. Thou makeſt no ſcruple of thine owne ſinnes, and ſcorneſt thoſe that doe: Not to be wicked, is crime enough. Heare him that ſaith, Saul, Saul, why perſecuteſt thou me? Saul ſtrikes at Damaſcus; Chriſt ſuffers in heauen. Thou ſtrikeſt; Chriſt Ieſus ſmarteth, and will reuenge. Theſe are the [ὑστερήματα] afterings of Chriſts ſufferings: In himſelfe it is finiſhed; in his members it is not, till the world bee finiſhed. We muſt toile, and groane, and bleed, that we may reigne: if he had not done ſo, It had not beene finiſhed. This is our warfare; this is the region of our ſorrow & death. Now are we ſet vpon the ſandie pauement of our Theatre, and are marched with all ſorts of euills; euill men, euill ſpirits, euill accidents; and (which is worſt) our owne euill hearts; temptations, croſſes, perſecutions, ſickneſſes, wants, infamies, death; all theſe muſt in our courſes, be encountred by the Law of our profeſſion. What ſhould we doe but ſtriue and ſuffer, as our Generall hath done, that we may reigne as he doth, and once triumph in our Conſummatum eſt? God and his Angells ſit vpon the ſcaffolds of heauen, and behold vs: our Crowne is readie: our day of deliuerance ſhall come; yea our redemption is neere, when all teares ſhall be wip't from our eies; and we that haue ſowne in teares, ſhall reape in ioy. In the meane time, let vs poſſeſſe our ſoules not in patience only, but in comfort: let vs adore and magnifie our Sauiour in his ſufferings, and imitate him in our owne: our ſorrowes ſhall haue an end, our ioyes ſhall not: our paines ſhall ſoone be finiſhed; our glory ſhall be finiſhed, but neuer ended.

Thus his ſufferings are finiſhed; now together with them, mans ſaluation. Who knowes not, that man had made himſelfe a deepe debtor, a bankrupt, an out-law to God? Our ſins are our debts; and by ſins, death. Now, in this word and act, our ſinnes are diſcharged, death endured, and therefore we cleared: the debt is paid, the ſcore is croſſed, the Creditor ſatisfied, the Debtors acquitted, & ſince there was no other quarrell, ſaued: we are all ſicke, and that mortally: ſinne is the diſeaſe of the ſoule: Quot vitia, tot febres, ſaith Chryſoſtome; ſo many ſinnes, ſo many feuers, and thoſe peſtilent. What wonder is it, that we haue ſo much plague, while we haue ſo much ſinne? Our Sauiour is the Phyſitian: The whole need not the Phyſitian, but the ſicke: wherein? He healeth all our infirmities: he healeth them after a miraculous manner; not by giuing vs receits, but by taking our receits for vs. A wonderfull Phyſitian; a wonderfull courſe of cure: One while he would cure vs by abſtinence; our ſuperfluity, by his fortie dayes emptineſſe, according to that old rule; Hunger cures the diſeaſes of gluttony: Another ther while, by exerciſe: He went vp and downe from City to City, and in the day was preaching in the Temple; in the night praying in the Mount. Then, by dyet; Take, eat, this is my body: and, Let this cup paſſe. After that yet, by ſweat, ſuch a ſweat as neuer was, a bloudy one: yet more, by inciſion; they pierced his hands, feet, ſide: and yet againe by potion; a bitter potion, of vineger and gall. And laſtly, which is both the ſtrangeſt and ſtrongeſt receit of all, by dying: Which died for vs, that whether wee wake or ſleepe, we ſhould liue together with him. We need no more, we can goe no further; there can be no more phyſicke of this kinde: there are cordials after theſe, of his Reſurrection and Aſcenſion; no more penall receits. By this bloud we haue redemption, Epheſ. 1.7. Iuſtification, Rom. 3.24. Reconciliation, Coloſ. 1.20. Sanctification, 1 Pet. 1.2. Entrance into glory, Heb. 10.19. Is it not now finiſhed? Woe were vs if he had left but one mite of ſatisfaction vpon our ſcore, to be diſcharged by our ſoules: and woe be to them that derogate from Chriſt, that they may charge themſelues; that botch vp theſe all-ſufficiently meritorious ſufferings of Chriſt, as imperfect, with the ſuperfluities of fleſh and bloud. Maledictus homo qui ſpem ponit in homine. We may not with patience ſee Chriſt wrong'd by his falſe friends; As that heroicall Luther ſaid in the like; Curſed be that ſilence that here forbeareth. To be ſhort, here be two iniuries intolerable; both giue Chriſt the lie vpon his Croſſe: It is finiſhed. No: ſomewhat remaines: the fault is diſcharged, not the puniſhment. Of puniſhments, the eternall is quit, not the temporall. It is finiſhed by Chriſt: No, there wants yet much; the ſatisfaction of Saints applied by this Vicar; adde mens ſufferings vnto Chriſts; then the treaſure is full; till then, It is not finiſhed.

1 Theſſ. 5.10.

Maledictum ſilentium quod hic committit.

Two qualities ſtriue for the firſt place in theſe two opinions; impietie and abſurditie: I know not whether to preferre. For impietie; here is God taxed of iniuſtice, vnmerciſulneſſe, inſufficiencie, falſhood. Of iniuſtice, that he forgiues a ſinne, and yet puniſhes for that which he hath forgiuen: vnmerciſulneſſe, that he forgiues not while he forgiues, but doth it by halues: inſufficiencie, that his ranſome muſt be ſupplied by men: falſhood, in that he ſaith, It is finiſhed, when it is not. For abſurditie; how groſſe and monſtrous are theſe poſitions? that at once the ſame ſinne ſhould bee remitted and retained; that there ſhould be a puniſhment, where there is no fault; that what could ſtrike off our eternall puniſhment, did not wipe off the temporall; that he which paid our pounds, ſticks at our farthings; that God will retaine what man may diſcharge; that it is, and it is not finiſhed.

If there be any opinions, whoſe mention confutes them, theſe are they. None can be more vaine, none had more need of ſoliditie: for this prop beares vp, alone, the weight of all thoſe millions of indulgences, which Rome creates and ſels to the world. That Strumpet would well-neere goe naked, if this were not. Theſe ſpirituall Treaſures fetcht in the temporall: which yet our reuerend and learned Fulke, iuſtly cals, a moſt blaſphemous and beggerly principle: It brings in whole cheſts, yea mines of gold, like the Popes Indies; and hath not ſo much as a ragge of proofe to couer it, whether of Antiquitie, of Reaſon, of Scripture. Not of Antiquitie: for theſe Iubilie proclamations beganne but about three hundred yeares agoe. Not of Reaſon: how ſhould one meere man pay for another, diſpenſe with another, to another, by another? Not of Scripture, which hath flatly ſaid, The bloud of Ieſus Chriſt his Sonne, purgeth vs from all ſinne: and yet I remember that acute Sadeel hath taught mee, that this practiſe is according to Scripture: what Scripture? He caſt the money-changers out of the Temple, and ſaid; Ye haue made my houſe a denne of theeues. Which alſo Ioachim, their Propheticall Abbot, well applies to this purpoſe. Some modeſt Doctors of Louan would faine haue minced this Antichriſtian blaſphemie; who began to teach, that the paſſions of the Saints are not ſo by Indulgences applied, that they become true ſatisfactions; but that they only ſerue to moue God by the ſight of them to apply vnto vs Chriſts ſatisfaction. But theſe meale-mouth'd Diuines were ſoone charm'd; foure ſeuerall Popes (as their Cardinall confeſſeth) fel vpon the necke of them and their opinion; Leo the tenth, Pius the fift, Gregory the thirteenth, and Clemens the ſixt: and with their furious Buls bellow out threats againſt them, and toſſe them in the aire for Hereticks, and teach them vpon paine of a curſe, to ſpeake home with Bellarmine, Paſsionibus ſanctorum expiari delicta, and ſtraight, Applicari nobis ſanctorum paſsiones ad redimendas pœnas, quas pro peccatis Deo debemus: That by the ſufferings of Saints, our ſinnes are expiated; and that, by them applied, we are redeemed from thoſe puniſhments, which we yet owe to God. Blaſphemie, worthy the tearing of garments: How is it finiſhed by Chriſt, if men muſt ſupply? Oh bleſſed Sauiour, was euery drop of thy bloud enough to redeeme a world, and doe we yet need the helpe of men? How art thou a perfect Sauiour, if our brethren alſo muſt be our Redeemers? Oh ye bleſſed Saints, how would you abhorre this ſacrilegious glory? and with thoſe holy Apoſtles, yea, that glorious Angell, ſay, Vide ne feceris: and with thoſe wiſe Virgins; Leſt there will not be enough for vs and you, goe to them that ſell, and buy for your ſelues. For vs, we enuie not their multitude: let them haue as many Sauiours as Saints, and as many Saints as men; we know with Ambroſe, Chriſti paſsio adiutore non eguit; Chriſts paſsion needs no helper: and therefore, with that worthy Martyr, dare ſay, None but Chriſt, none but Chriſt. Let our ſoules die, if he cannot ſaue them; let them not feare their death or torment, if he haue finiſhed. Heare this thou languiſhing and afflicted ſoule: There is not one of thy ſins but it is paid for; not one of thy debts in the ſcroll of God, but it is croſſed; not one farthing of all thine infinite ranſome is vnpaid. Alas, thy ſinnes (thou ſayeſt) are euer before thee, and Gods indignation goes ſtill ouer thee, and thou goeſt mourning all the day long, & with that pattern of diſtreſſe, cryeſt out in the bitterneſſe of thy ſoule, I haue ſinned, what ſhall I doe to thee, O thou preſeruer of men? What ſhouldſt thou doe? Turne & beleeue. Now thou art ſtung in thy conſcience with this fiery Serpent, looke vp with the eies of faith to this brazen Serpent, Chriſt Ieſus, and be healed. Behold, his head is humbly bowed down in a gracious reſpect to thee; his arms are ſtretched out louingly to embrace thee; yea, his precious ſide is open to receiue thee, & his tongue interprets all theſe to thee for thine endleſſe comfort; It is finiſhed. There is no more accuſatiõ, iudgment, death, hel for thee: all theſe are no more to thee than if they were not. Who ſhall condemne? It is Chriſt which is dead. I know how ready euery man is to reach forth his hand to this dole of grace, & how angry to be beaten from this dore of mercy. We are all eaſily perſwaded to hope well, becauſe we loue our ſelues well: Which of all vs in this great congregation, takes exceptions to himſelfe, and thinks, I know there is no want in my Sauiour; there is want in me. He hath finiſhed, but I beleeue not, I repent not. Euery preſumptuous & hard heart ſo catches at Chriſt, as if he had finiſht for all, as if he had broken downe the gates of hell, and looſed the bands of death, and had made forgiueneſſe as common as life: Proſperitas ſtultorũ perdit eos, ſaith wiſe Salomon; Eaſe ſlayeth the fooliſh, and the proſperitie of fooles deſtroyeth them; yea, the confidẽce of proſperity. Thou ſayeſt, God is merciful, thy Sauiour bounteous, his paſſion abſolute: all theſe, and yet thou maieſt be condemned. Merciſull, not vniuſt; bountifull, not lauiſh; abſolutely ſufficient for all, not effectuall to all. Whatſoeuer God is, what art thou? Here is the doubt: Thou ſayeſt well; Chriſt is the good Shepheard. Wherein? He giues his life: but for whom? for his ſheepe. What is this to thee? While thou art ſecure, prophane, impenitent, thou art a Wolfe or a Goat: My ſheep heare my voice: what is his voice, but his precepts? Where is thine obedience to his cõmandements? If thou wilt not heare his Law, neuer hearken to his Goſpell. Here is no more mercy for thee, than if there were no Sauiour. He hath finiſhed, for thoſe in whom he hath begunne: if thou haue no beginnings of grace as yet, hope not for euer finiſhing of ſaluation: Come to me all yee that are heauy laden, ſaith Chriſt: thou ſhalt get nothing, if thou come when he calls thee not. Thou art not called, and canſt not be refreſhed, vnleſſe thou be laden, not with ſinne (this alone keepes thee away from God) but with conſcience of ſinne: A broken and a contrite heart, O God, thou wilt not deſpiſe. Is thy heart wounded with thy ſinne? doth griefe and hatred ſtriue within thee, whether ſhall be more? Are the deſires of thy ſoule with God? Doeſt thou long for holineſſe, complaine of thy imperfections, ſtruggle againſt thy corruptions? Thou art the man, feare not, It is finiſhed. That Law which thou wouldeſt haue kept, and couldeſt not, thy Sauiour could, and did keep for thee: that ſaluation which thou couldeſt neuer worke-out alone (alas, poore impotent creatures, what can we doe towards heauen without him, which cannot moue on earth but in him?) he alone for thee hath finiſhed. Looke vp therefore boldly to the throne of God, and vpon the truth of thy repentance and faith, know that there is no quarrell againſt thee in heauen, nothing but peace and ioy. All is finiſhed. He would be ſpitted on, that he might waſh thee; he would be couered with ſcornfull robes, that thy ſinnes might be couered; he would be whipped, that thy ſoule might not bee ſcourged eternally; he would thirſt, that thy ſoule might be ſatisfied; he would beare all his Fathers wrath, that thou mighteſt beare none; he would yeeld to death, that thou mighteſt neuer taſte of it; hee would be in ſenſe for a time as forſaken of his Father, that thou mighteſt be receiued for euer.

Now bid thy ſoule returne to her reſt, and enioyne it Dauids taske: Praiſe the Lord, O my ſoule; and, What ſhall I render to the Lord for all his benefits? I will take the cup of ſaluation, and call vpon the name of the Lord. And, as rauiſht from thy ſelfe with the ſweet apprehenſion of this mercy, call all the other creatures to the fellowſhip of this ioy, with that diuine Eſay: Reioyce O yee heauens, for the Lord hath done it: ſhout yee lower parts of the earth, burſt forth into praiſes ye mountaines: for the Lord hath redeemed Iacob, and will be glorified in Iſrael. And euen now beginne that heauenly Song, which ſhall neuer end with thoſe glorified Saints; Praiſe, and honour, and glory, and power, be to Him that ſitteth vpon the Throne, and to the Lambe for euermore.

Thus our ſpeech of Chriſts laſt word is finiſhed. His laſt act accompanied his words: our ſpeech muſt follow it. Let it not want your deuout and carefull attention; He bowed and gaue vp the ghoſt.

The Croſſe was a ſlow death, and had more paine than ſpeed; whence a ſecond violence muſt diſpatch the crucified: their bones muſt be broken, that their hearts might breake. Our Sauiour ſtayes not deaths leiſure, but willingly and couragiouſly meets him in the way; and like a Champion that ſcornes to bee ouercome, yea, knowes hee cannot be, yeeldeth in the middeſt of his ſtrength, that he might by dying, vanquiſh death. He bowed and gaue vp: Not bowing, becauſe he had giuen vp, but becauſe he would. Hee cried with a loud voice, ſaith Matthew. Nature was ſtrong, hee might haue liued; but he gaue vp the ghoſt, and would die, to ſhew himſelfe Lord of life and death. Oh wondrous example! he that gaue life to his enemies, gaue vp his owne: hee giues them to liue, that perſecute and hate him; and himſelfe will die the whiles for thoſe that hate him. Hee bowed and gaue vp: not they; they might crowne his head, they could not bow it: they might vex his ſpirit, not take it away: they could not doe that without leaue; this they could not doe, becauſe they had no leaue. Hee alone would bow his head, and giue vp his ghoſt: I haue power to lay downe my life. Man gaue him not his life; man could not bereaue it. No man takes it from me. Alas, who could? The High-Prieſts forces, when they came againſt him armed, he ſaid but, I am hee, they flee and fall backward. How eaſie a breath diſperſt his enemies? whom hee might as eaſily haue bidden the earth, yea, hell to ſwallow, or fire from heauen to deuoure. Who commanded the Deuils and they obeyed, could not haue beene attached by men: hee muſt giue not onely leaue, but power to apprehend himſelfe, elſe they had not liued to take him: hee is laid hold of; Peter fights: Put vp, ſaith Chriſt; Thinkeſt thou that I cannot pray to my Father, and he will giue me more than twelue Legions of Angels? What an Armie were here? more than threeſcore and twelue thouſand Angels, and euery Angell able to ſubdue a world of men: he could, but would not be reſcued; hee is led by his owue power, not by his enemies; and ſtands now before Pilate, like the ſcorne of men; crowned, robbed, ſcourged, with an Ecce homo; Yet thou couldſt haue no power againſt me, vnleſſe it were giuen thee from aboue.

Behold, he himſelfe muſt giue Pilate power againſt himſelfe, elſe he could not be condemned: he will be condemned, lifted vp, nailed; yet no death without himſelfe. Hee ſhall giue his ſoule an offering for ſinne, Eſay 53. 10. No action, that ſauours of conſtraint, can be meritorious: he would deſerue, therefore he would ſuffer and dye. Hee bowed his head, and gaue vp the ghoſt. O gracious and bountifull Sauiour: hee might haue kept his ſoule within his teeth, in ſpight of all the world; the weakneſſe of God is ſtronger than men: and if he had but ſpoken the word the heauens and earth ſhould haue vaniſht away before him: but he would not. Behold, when hee ſaw, that impotent man could not take away his ſoule, he gaue it vp, and would die, that we might liue. See here a Sauiour, that can contemne his owne life for ours; and cares not to be diſſolued in himſelfe, that we might be vnited to his Father. Skin for skin, ſaith the Deuill, and all that he hath a man will giue for his life. Loe here, to proue Satan a lyer, skinne and life and all hath Chriſt Ieſus giuen for vs. We are beſotted with the earth, and make baſe ſhifts to liue; one with a maimed body, another with a periured ſoule, a third with a rotten name: and how many had rather neglect their ſoule than their life, and will rather renounce and curſe God, than die? It is a ſhame to tell; Many of vs Chriſtians dote vpon life, and tremble at death; and ſhew our ſelues fooles in our exceſſe of loue, cowards in our feare. Peter denies Chriſt thrice, and forſweares him; Marcellinus twice caſts graines of incenſe into the Idols fire; Ecebolius turnes thrice; Spira reuolts and deſpaires: Oh let me liue, ſaith the fearfull ſoule. Whether doeſt thou reſerue thy ſelfe, thou weake and timorous creature? or what wouldeſt thou doe with thy ſelfe? Thou haſt not thus learned Chriſt: he died voluntarily for thee, thou wilt not be forced to die for him: he gaue vp the ghoſt for thee; thou wilt not let others take it from thee for him, thou wilt not let him take it for himſelfe.

When I looke backe to the firſt Chriſtians, and compare their zealous contempt of death with our backwardneſſe; I am at once amazed and aſhamed: I ſee there euen women (the feebler ſex) running with their little ones in their armes, for the preferment of Martyrdome, and ambitiouſly ſtriuing for the next blow. I ſee holy and tender Virgins, chuſing rather a ſore and ſhamefull death, than honourable Eſpouſals. I heare the bleſſed Martyrs, intreating their tyrants and tormentors for the honour of dying. Ignatius, amongſt the reſt, fearing leſt the beaſts will not deuoure him; and vowing the firſt violence to them, that he might bee diſpatched. And what leſſe courage was there in our memorable and glorious fore-fathers of the laſt of this age? and doe we, their cold and feeble off-ſpring, looke pale at the face of a faire and naturall death; abhorre the violent, though for Chriſt? Alas, how haue we gathered ruſt with our long peace? Our vnwillingneſſe is from inconſideration, from diſtruſt. Looke but vp to Chriſt Ieſus vpon his Croſſe, and ſee him bowing his head, and breathing out his ſoule, and theſe feares ſhall vaniſh: hee died, and wouldeſt thou liue? hee gaue vp the ghoſt, and wouldeſt thou keepe it? whom wouldeſt thou follow, if not thy Redeemer? If thou die not, if not willingly, thou goeſt contrary to him, and ſhalt neuer meet him. Though thou ſhouldeſt euery day die a death, for him, thou couldeſt neuer requite his one death; and doeſt thou ſticke at one? Euery word hath his force; both to him and thee: he died, which is Lord of life, and commander of death; thou art but a tenant of life, a ſubiect of death: and yet it was not a dying, but a giuing vp, not of a vaniſhing and aërie breath, but of a ſpirituall ſoule, which after ſeparation, hath an entire life in it ſelfe, Hee gaue vp the ghoſt: hee died, that hath both ouercome, and ſanctified, and ſweetned death. What feareſt thou? Hee hath pull'd out the ſting and malignitie of death: If thou be a Chriſtian, carry it in thy boſome, it hurts thee not. Dareſt thou not truſt thy Redeemer? If he had not died, Death had beene a Tyrant; now he is a ſlaue. O death where is thy ſting? O graue where is thy victorie? Yet the Spirit of God ſaith not, he died, but gaue vp the ghoſt. The very Heathen Poet ſaith; He durſt not ſay, that a good man dies. It is worth the noting (mee thinks) that when Saint Luke would deſcribe to vs the death of Ananias and Sapphira, he ſaith (ἐξέψυξε) he expired: but when Saint Iohn would deſcribe to vs the death, hee ſaith, παρέδωκε τὸ πνεῦμα, He gaue vp the ghoſt: How? How gaue hee it vp, and whither? So, as after a ſort he retained it: his ſoule parted from his bodie; his God-head was neuer diſtracted either from ſoule or body: this vnion is not in nature, but in perſon. If the natures of Chriſt could be diuided, each would haue his ſubſiſtence; ſo there ſhould

Quod ſi venire noluerint, ego vim faciam vt devorer.

Si per ſingulos dies pro eo more remuneratio nos dilexit, nam ſic debitū exoluere-mus Chriſto.

ſhould be more perſons. God forbid, one of the natures thereof may haue a ſeparation in it ſelfe: the ſoule from the bodie: one nature cannot be ſeparate from other, or either nature from the perſon. If you cannot conceiue, wonder: the Sonne of God hath wedded vnto himſelfe our humanity, without all poſſibility of diuorce; the body hangs on the Croſſe, the ſoule is yeelded, the Godhead is eufternally vnited to them both; acknowledges, ſuſtaines them both. The ſoule in his agony feeles not the preſence of the Godhead; the body vpon the Croſſe feeles not the preſence of the ſoule. Yet as the Fathers of Chalcedon ſay truly, (ἀδιαιρέτως, ἀχωρίστως) indiuiſibly, inſeparably is the Godhead, with both of theſe, ſtill and euer, one and the ſame perſon. The Paſſion of Chriſt (as Auguſtine) was the ſleepe of his Diuinitie: ſo I may ſay, The Death of Chriſt was the ſleepe of his humanity. If hee ſleepe, hee ſhall doe well, ſaid that Diſciple, of Lazarus. Death was too weake to diſſolue the eternall bonds of this heauenly coniunction. Let not vs Chriſtians goe too much by ſenſe; wee may bee firmely knit to God, and not feele it: thou canſt not hope to be ſo neere thy God, as Chriſt was, vnited perſonally: thou canſt not feare, that God ſhould ſeeme more abſent from thee, than he did from his own Son: yet was he ſtill one with both body and ſoule, when they were diuided from themſelues; when he was abſent to ſenſe, he was preſent to faith; when abſent in viſion, yet in vnion one and the ſame: ſo will he be to thy ſoule, when he is at worſt. He is thine, and thou art his: if thy hold ſeeme looſened, his is not. When temptations will not let thee ſee him, he ſees thee and poſſeſſes thee; onely beleeue thou againſt ſenſe, aboue hope; and though he kill thee, yet truſt in him. Whither gaue he it vp? Himſelfe expreſſes; Father, into thy hands; And, This day ſhalt thou bee with me in Paradiſe. It is iuſtice to reſtore whence wee receiue; Into thy hands. Hee knew where it ſhould be both ſafe and happy: True; hee might bee bold (thou ſayeſt) as the Sonne with the Father. The ſeruants haue done ſo; Dauid before him, Steuen after him. And leſt we ſhould not thinke it our common right; Father, (ſaith he) I will that thoſe thou haſt giuen me, may be with me, euen where I am: he wills it, therefore it muſt be. It is not preſumption, but faith, to charge God with thy ſpirit; neither can there euer be any beleeuing ſoule ſo meane, that he ſhould refuſe it; all the feare is in thy ſelfe: how canſt thou truſt thy iewell with a ſtranger? What ſudden familiarity is this? God hath beene with thee, and gone by thee; thou haſt not ſaluted him: and now in all the haſte thou bequeatheſt thy ſoule to him. On what acquaintance? How deſperate is this careleſneſſe? If thou haue but a little money, whether thou keepe it, thou layeſt it vp in the Temple of truſt; or whether thou let it, thou art ſure of good aſſurance, ſound bonds. If but a little land, how carefully doeſt thou make firme conueyances, to thy deſired heires? If goods, thy Will hath taken ſecure order, who ſhall enioy them: We need not teach you Citizens to make ſure worke for your eſtates. If children, thou diſpoſeſt of them in trades, with portions: onely of thy ſoule (which is thy ſelfe) thou knoweſt not what ſhall become. The world muſt haue it no more; thy ſelfe wouldſt keepe it, but thou knoweſt thou canſt not: Satan would haue it, & thou knoweſt not whether he ſhall: thou wouldſt haue God haue it, and thou knoweſt not whether he will: yea, thy heart is now ready with Pharaoh to ſay, Who is the Lord? O the fearefull and miſerable eſtate of that man, that muſt part with his ſoule, he knowes not whither: which if thou wouldeſt auoid, (as this very warning ſhall iudge thee if thou doe not) be acquainted with God in thy life, that thou maiſt make him the Guardian of thy ſoule in thy death. Giuen vp it muſt needs be, but to him that hath gouerned it: if thou haue giuen it to Satan in thy life, how canſt thou hope God will in thy death entertaine it? Did you not hate me, and expell me out of my Fathers houſe? how then come yee to me now in this time of your tribulation, ſaid Ieptha to the men of Gilead. No, no, either giue vp thy ſoule to God while he cals for it in his word, in the prouocations of his loue, in his afflictions, in the holy motions of his ſpirit to thine: or els when thou wouldſt giue it, he will none of it, but as a Iudge to deliuer it to the Tormentor.

What ſhould God doe with an vncleane, drunken, prophane, proud, couetous ſoule? Without holineſſe, it is no ſeeing of God. Depart from me, ye wicked, I know ye not: Goe to the gods you haue ſerued. See how God is euen with men: they had, in the time of the Goſpell, ſaid to the holy one of Iſrael, Depart from vs; now in the time of iudgement, he ſaith to them, Depart from me: They would not know God when they might: now God will not know them when they would.

Now therefore (beloued) if thou wouldſt not haue God ſcorne the offer of thy death-bed, fit thy ſoule for him in thy health; furniſh it with grace; inure it to a ſweet conuerſation with the God of heauen: then mayeſt thou boldly giue it vp, and he ſhall as graciouſly receiue it, yea fetch it by his Angels to his glory.

He gaue vp the ghoſt. We muſt doe as he did: not all with the ſame ſucceſſe. Giuing vp, ſuppoſes a receiuing, a returning. This inmate that we haue in our boſome, is ſent to lodge here for a time, may not dwell here alwayes. The right of this tenure is the Lords, not ours: As he ſaid of the hatchet; It is but lent, it muſt be reſtored: It is ours to keepe, his to diſpoſe and require. See and conſider both our priuiledge and charge. It is not with vs as with bruit creatures: we haue a liuing ghoſt to informe vs, which yet is not ours, (&, alas, what is ours, if our ſoules be not?) but muſt be giuen vp to him that gaue it.

Why doe we liue as thoſe that tooke no keepe of ſo glorious a gueſt? as thoſe that ſhould neuer part with it, as thoſe that thinke it giuen them to ſpend, not to returne with a reckoning?

If thou hadſt no ſoule, if a mortall one, if thine owne, if neuer to be required, how couldſt thou liue but ſenſually? Oh remember but who thou art, what thou haſt, and whither thou muſt; and thou ſhalt liue like thy ſelfe, while thou art, and giue vp thy ghoſt confidently, when thou ſhalt ceaſe to be. Neither is there here more certaintie of our departure, than comfort. Carry this with thee to thy death-bed, and ſee if it can refreſh thee, when all the world cannot giue thee one dram of comfort. Our ſpirit is our deareſt riches: if we ſhould loſe it, here were iuſt cauſe of griefe. Howle and lament, if thou thinkeſt thy ſoule periſheth: it is not forfeited, but ſurrendred. How ſafely doth our ſoule paſſe through the gates of death, without any impeachment, while it is in the hand of the Almightie? Woe were vs, if he did not keep it while we haue it; much more when we reſtore it. We giue it vp to the ſame hands that created, infuſed, redeemed, renewed; that doe protect, preſerue, eſtabliſh, and will crowne it: I know whom I haue beleeued, and am perſwaded that he is able to keepe that which I haue committed to him againſt that day. O ſecure and happy eſtate of the godly: O bleſſed exchange of our condition: while our ſoule dwels in our breaſt, how is it ſubiect to infinite miſeries, diſtempered with paſſions, charged with ſinne, vexed with tentations? aboue, none of theſe: how ſhould it be otherwiſe? This is our pilgrimage, that our home: this is our wildernes, that our land of promiſe: this our bondage, that our kingdom: our impotency cauſeth this our ſorrow.

When our ſoule is once giuen vp, what euill ſhall reach vnto heauen, and wreſtle with the Almightie? Our lothneſſe to giue vp, comes from our ignorance and infidelitie. No man goes vnwillingly to a certaine preferment. I deſire to be diſſolued, ſaith Paul; I haue ſerued thee, I haue beleeued thee, and now I come to thee, ſaith Luther. The voice of Saints, not of men. If thine heart can ſay thus, thou ſhalt not need to intreat with old Hilarion, Egredere mea anima, egredere, quid times? Goe thy wayes forth my ſoule, goe forth, what feareſt thou? but it ſhall flie vp alone cheerefully from thee, and giue vp it ſelf into the armes of God, as a faithfull Creator & Redeemer. This earth is not the element of thy ſoule, it is not where it ſhould be. It ſhall be no leſſe thine, when it is more the owners. Thinke now ſeriouſly of this point; Gods Angell is abroad, & ſtrikes on all ſides; we know not which of our turnes ſhall be the next: we are ſure, we carry deaths enow within vs. If we be ready, our day cannot come too ſoone. Stirre vp thy ſoule to an heauenly cheerefulneſſe, like thy Sauiour: Know but whither thou art going; and thou canſt not but, with diuine Paul, ſay from our Sauiours mouth, euen in this ſenſe: It is a more bleſſed thing to giue, than to receiue. God cannot abide an vnwilling gueſt: giue vp that ſpirit to him, which he hath giuen thee; and he will both receiue what thou giueſt, and giue it thee againe, with that glory and happineſſe, which can neuer be conceiued, and ſhall neuer be ended. Euen ſo LORD IESVS come quickly.

Gloria in excelſis Deo.

THE FIRST PART.

ZACHAR. 14. 20.

In that day ſhall be written vpon the bridles (or, bels) of the Horſes, Holineſſe vnto the Lord: and the pots of the Lords houſe, ſhall be like the bowles before the Altar.

IF any man wonder whither this diſcourſe can tend, of horſes, and bells, and pots, and bowles for the Altar; Let him conſider that of Tertullian, Ratio diuina in medulla eſt, non in ſuperficie: These Horſes if they be well menaged, will proue like thoſe fierie Horſes of Elias, to carry vs vp to our heauen, 2 King. 2. 11. These Bells, like thoſe golden bels of Aarons robe, Exod. 39. 25. These Pots like that Olla pulmenti of the Prophets, after Eliſha's meale, 2 King. 4. and these Bowles, like that bleſſed and fruitfull nauell of the CHVRCH, Cant. 7. 2.

S. Paul asks, Doth God take care for oxen? ſo may I hare, Doth God take care for horſes? Surely, to prouide for them, nor to propheſie of them; much leſſe of their bells, the vnneceſſarie ornaments of a neceſſary creature; But he that forbids vs to learne of the horſe that leſſon of ſtubborneſſe, by the PSALMIST, and checks vs oft by the oxe and aſſe, for their good nature, would haue vs learne here, vnder this parable of the horſe, and the bells of the horſe, and the writing on thoſe bells the eſtate of our owne peace and ſanctification. God doth both ſpeake, and worke in Parables, as that Father ſaith well: Of this then I may truly ſay, as Hierome ſaid of the booke of IOB, Singula verba plena ſunt ſenſibus: Suffer your ſelues with Abrahams Ram, to bee perplexed a while in theſe bryers, that you may be prepared for a fit ſacrifice to God.

In that day:] What day is that? All dayes are his, who is the Ancient of dayes; and yet he ſayes, Abraham ſaw my day, and reioyced. He that made all dayes, ſayes yet againe, This is the day which the Lord hath made: There is one day of the weeke, Gods; κυριακη Reuel. 1. and yet I would it were his; Gods day by creation, by ordination I would it were his by obſeruation too: There is one day in an Age his: While it is called to day, Heb 3. The day of viſitation; and yet This thy day, Luk. 19. 42. One day in a world his, Matth. 7. 22. In that day: A day beyond the world, his. To day haue I begotten thee, Hodie i. ab Eterno, which is a nunc ſtans, as Aquinas defines it

The Heathens had fiue famous periods of computations, Ninus Monarchie, Ogyges Flood, Troian Warre, Olympiads, Vrbs condita; All ours is ab illo die, which S. Paul cals, The fulneſſe of Time; But Chriſt hath two dayes, as two commings: His firſt, In die illa radix Ieſſe, ſaith Eſay 11.10. The day of his comming to ſoiourne in the world; His ſecond, 1 Cor. 1.8. The day of his returne, which S. Paul cals ἡμέρα ἀπολυτρώσεως, Epheſ. 4.30. when he comes to ranſome vs, and to iudge the world: Both are dayes indeed; In the firſt, there is no night of his abſence, though to our ſenſe there be ſome little darkneſſe of our miſerie: In the ſecond, no abſence, nor no miſerie; A day without night, Reuel. 21.25. This prophecie is true of both; Partially, and inchoately of the firſt; totally and abſolutely of the ſecond: Of the firſt ſo farre as it makes way for, and reſembles the ſecond: and this as it is here principally intended, ſo ſhall it be the drift of our diſcourſe.

This is the day: Now what of this day? There ſhall be a Motto written: An honourable Motto; ſuch as was written vpon the מִיצְנֶפֶת the Turbant of the High Prieſt, Holineſſe to the Lord: And where ſhall it be written? An honourable Motto in an ignoble place; עַל מִיצְלוֹת; Not as Aquila and Theodotion, vnder the belly of the horſe, ſuper profundum; Nor as Symmachus, vnder his feet, ſuper inceſſum vmbroſum; Theſe ſenſes are ſenſeleſſe (though you take them cum grano ſalis, as the Lawyers admoniſh) they ſauour neither the ſenſe, nor word; Not, as Ierome, the Septuagint and Geneue, ſuper frænum; Tho this hath the ſenſe well, not the word; Hieroms maſter came a little neerer (ſuper phaleras); Thoſe of the Rabbins yet light righteſt both on the word, and ſenſe, which turne ſuper Tintinnabula; For ten times at leaſt in the Chronicles and Ezra, is the ſame word dually vſed; for Cymbals; and the Verbe of this root, is the ſame, whereby God would expreſſe the tingling of the eares; תְּעַלֶּנָּה Tinnient aures audientium, Ier. 19. To adorne their horſes with bels, was not onely a faſhion in thoſe South-Eaſt Countries, but in our fore-fathers dayes in this Land: as it were eaſie to ſhow you, but out of Chaucers Antiquitie; and ſome of vs haue ſeene it ſtill in vſe elſewhere. What bells then were theſe? Not of the Prieſt; It had beene eaſie to transferre his embleme from his forehead, to his skirts; but of the horſes: The horſe an vncleane beaſt, Leuit. 11. A warlike beaſt, Equus paratur in diem belli, Prou. 21.31. Whence ſtill ſhall you finde Horſes and Chariots put together; and In bello & equis, Oſe. 1.7. Behold this Motto had wont to be written vpon a man, now vpon a beaſt; had wont vpon an holy man, The High Prieſt: now vpon an vncleane beaſt; before, vpon a man of peace, now on a beaſt of warre; Before vpon the forehead of the High Prieſt, now (as Rab. Eliezer) inter oculos, betwixt the eyes of the Horſe. But what? not to continue there; as ſome Rabbins and good Interpreters; but ſo that of theſe very Bells ſhall be made Pots for the vſe of ſacrifice; Like as of the glaſſes of the Iewiſh women was made a Lauer; and of the iewels of the Midianitiſh Camels, a rich Ephod. This is well, to come thus neere; yet they ſhall be promoted higher: They ſhall be bowles for the Altar: The Pots might be greater, for there was Olla Grandis, 2 King. 4. But the bowles were more noble, and more peculiarly deuoted to Gods ſeruice: Moſes ſhall comment vpon Zacharie: Num. 7. Twelue ſeuerall times you haue the matter of theſe bowles (ſiluer) the weight, 70. ſhekels; The vſe, for floure and oyle for the meat-offering, beſides that following imployment for the incenſe. But I hold not this dependance neceſſary: Here are rather two diſtinct prophecies, though to one purpoſe as we ſhall ſee in the proceſſe.

You ſee now Zacharies holy riddle read; That God, vnder the Goſpell will effect a gracious ſanctification both of things, and perſons; and by thoſe things which in their vſe haue beene altogether prophane will indifferently glorifie himſelfe, and worke them both to peace, and holineſſe: And as Cyprian ſaith, Fidem rerum curſus impleuit.

What now is more fit for Courtiers to heare of, than an Impreſe of honour? What more fit for Kings and Princes than the Impreſe of the God of heauen? And as in all Impreſes, there is a body, and a ſoule, as they are termed; ſo are both here without any affectation: The ſoule of it is the Motto, or Word, Holineſſe to the Lord: The bodie, is the the ſubiect it ſelfe ; As oft-times the very ſhield is the deuice : The ſubiect, Bells of the horſes.

In the Word, firſt ſee the ancient vſe of Heraldry in the Scriptures ; That part eſpecially which concernes Inſcriptions ; as on Coynes, Shields, Enſignes : If the Teſtament of the Patriarcks had as much credit, as antiquitie, all the Patriarcks had their Armes aſſign'd them by IACOB ; Iudah a Lion, Dan a Serpent, Nepthali an Hinde, Beniamin a Wolfe, Ioſeph a bough, and ſo the reſt. The Coyne which Iacob paid to the Shechemites, was ſtamped with a Lambe, Gen. 32. And, if Iudahs ring that he left with Thamar, had not had an inſcription, it could not ſo certainly haue deſcryed his maſter. Theſe coynes had a figure without a word ; The frontall of the High Prieſt had a word, without a figure ; The ſhekel of the Sanctuarie (whoſe Character we haue oft ſeene) had both a word and a figure : the word, Holy Ieruſalem ; the figure, A pot of Manna, like a large chalice, and Aarons rod, not budding but branching out. Salomon compares the Church, to an Armie with Banners ; there could be no vſe, no diſtinction of Banners, without inſcriptions ; The Maccabees had foure Hebrew letters in their Enſigne, for both their word, and deuice ; whence they had their name : Yea, this is not in vià onely, but in patria : They ſhall haue a white ſtone, and a new name written in it : The field and the armes, both named, and vnknowne : The vſe therefore of inſcriptions and armes muſt needs be very laudable, as ancient ; ſince God himſelfe was the firſt Herald, and ſhall be the laſt. Yea the very Anabaptiſts, that ſhake off all the yoke of Magiſtracie, yet when they had ripened their fanaticall proiects, and had raiſed their King Becold, from the ſhop-boord to the Throne, would not want this point of honour : And therefore, he muſt haue one henchman on the right hand, to carry a Crowne, and a Bible, with an inſcription ; On the left, another, that carried a ſword naked, and a ball of Gold : Himſelfe in great ſtate carries a Globe of Gold, with two ſwords acroſſe. His preſſing yron and ſheeres would haue become him better.

And if I ſhould looke to heatheniſh Antiquitie, I ſhould neede to ſay no more, than that the Ægyptian Hieroglyphicks, whereof they ſay Horus Apollo was the inuenter, were nothing elſe, but Emblemes, and Impreſes : among the reſt, it is memorable that Ruffinus reports, that the ſigne of the Croſſe was one of their χαμματα ιερατικα, their ancient figures long before CHRIST : which (ſaith he) ſignified to them, eternall life : and Socrates adds, that when they found the ſigne of the Croſſe (in templo Serapidis) the Heathen and Chriſtians contended for it, each challenged it for theirs ; and when the Heathen knowing the ſignification of it, ſaw it thus fulfilled to the Chriſtians, many of them conuerted to Chriſtianitie. Be it farre from vs, to put any ſuperſtition in this ; I thinke it done, by the ſame inſtinct whereby the Sybils propheſied of Chriſt. And as Armes, and Embleticall deuices are thus ancient, and commendable ; ſo more directly Poſies and words, whether for inſtruction, or diſtinction, are here warranted. So the word of a faithfull King, is Dominus mihi adiutor ; or when he would thankfully aſcribe his peace to God ; Exurgat Deus, diſſipentur inimici : ſo of a good Prince, either, I ſerue, to expreſſe his officious care ; Or, One of your owne, to ſignifie his reſpectiue loue. So the good Stateſman's ſhould be giuen him by Salomon, Non eſt conſilium contra Dominũ, No policie againſt the Lord : A good Courtier's, by Samuel, Honorantes me honorabo : A good Biſhop's, by Paul, ευκαιρως ακαιρως ; In ſeaſon, out of ſeaſon. A good ſubiect's, Not for feare but Conſcience. A good Chriſtians, Chriſtus mihi viuere eſt. So the Iſraelites were charged to make their Embleme the Law of God ; for their poſts, for their garments. But theſe things may not be written vpon our walls, or ſhields only ; They muſt be written vpon our hearts ; elſe we are as very painted walls, as our walls themſelues : Elſe we ſhall be like ſome Inne, that hath a Crowne for the ſigne without, and within there is none but Peſants ; or a Roſe vpon the poſt without, and nothing but ſluttiſhneſſe and filth within : Or an Angell without, and nothing within, but lewd drunkards. As it is ſaid of God, Dixit, & factum eſt ; So alſo, ſcripſit, & factum eſt ; They ſhall be written holy, that is, they ſhall be made holy : Happy is it for vs, tho we write no new Emblemes of our owne, if we can haue this holy Impreſe of God, written not in our fore-heads, but in our hearts, Holineſſe to the Lord. Thus much of the Embleme, or word. Now for the ſubiect and circumſtances: In that day, aboue this; there is the proficiencie of the Church; Holineſſe ſhall bee written vpon the Bells; prophane things ſhall be holy, There is the ſanctification of the Church: The bells of warlike horſes ſhall bee turned to the quiet vſe of Religion; There is the religious peace of the Church. Thirdly, the pots to ſeeth in, ſhall be as Bowles to offer vp incenſe in; There is the degrees of the Churches perfection: ſo that here ariſe foure heads of our ſpeech; The proficiencie, Sanctification, Peace, Perfection of the Church. All which craue your gracious and Chriſtian attention; or leſt I be too long, two of them onely.

Impreſe

When therefore ſhall this be fulfilled? Not vnder the Law: It had beene a great profanation: For none but the High-Prieſt might weare this poſie: the place oft times diſpaſages; As to put the Arke of God into a Cart, or to ſet it by Dagon.

It is vnder the Goſpell, that this poſie of Holineſſe ſhall be ſo common: in illa die; and this is that day: How great is this proficiencie of the Church? Looke how much difference there is betweene one and many, betweene the holieſt of men, and an ordinary beaſt, betweene the frontall of the High-Prieſt, and the Bells of horſes, ſo much there muſt be betwixt the Church in that day, and in this. It is the faſhion of the true Church, to grow vp ſtill, from worſe to better, as it is ſaid of the head of the Church, Creſcebat & corroborabatur. As it is compared to ſtones for firmneſſe, ſo to gritts for growth; Yea the Kingdome of heauen is like a graine of muſtard-ſeed, that of the leaſt ſeed, proues the greateſt plant, in his kind: the riuer of God flowes firſt vp to the ankles, then to the knees, and at laſt to the chin.

The Church was an Embryo till Abrahams time; In ſwathing-bands till Moſes; In child-hood till Chriſt; A man in Chriſt, A man full-growne in glory. As man is an Epitome of the World, ſo is euery Chriſtian an abridgment of the Church; Beſt at laſt; In illa die. He is like to the feaſt of Cana, where the beſt wine was brought in laſt: not naturally, but by tranſmutation. It was a blaſphemous, and (mee thinks) a Vorſtian reaſon, that Toſtatus brings, why God did not create the voices out of the Propitiatorie, Quia Deus non poteſt agere per ſucceſſionem: Surelie in vs hee doth; and as wee can doe nothing, in inſtante, no more doth God in vs. As in the Creation hee could haue made all at once, but hee would take dayes for it, ſo in our re-creation by grace: As naturall, ſo ſpirituall agents, doe agere per moram. That rule of Aquinas is ſure, Succeſſiuorum non ſimul eſt eſſe & perfectio: to which that accords of Tertullian, Perfectio ordine poſt-humat. There muſt be an illa dies, for our full ſtature; till which, if we be true Chriſtians, we muſt grow from ſtrength to ſtrength: herein grace is contrary to nature, ſtrongeſt at laſt. We muſt change till then, but in melius; till we come to our beſt; and then, we muſt be like him, in whom is no ſhadow by turning.

But, where wee ſhould be like the Sunne till noone, euer riſing; there be many like Ezekiacs Sunne, that goe backe many degrees in the diall: whoſe beginnings are like Neroes firſt fiue yeares, full of hope, and peace. Or, like the firſt moneth of a new ſeruant; or like vnto the foure Ages, whoſe firſt was gold, the laſt iron: Or to Nebuchadnezzars image, which had a precious head, but baſe feet. Looke to your ſelues, this is a fearefull ſigne, a fearefull condition: Can hee euer bee rich, that growes euery day poorer? Can he euer reach the Goale, that goes euery day a ſtep backe from it? Alas then, how ſhall he euer reach the Goale of glory, that goes euery day a ſtep backward in grace? He that is worſe euery day, can neuer be at his beſt, In illa die, In that day.

Hitherto the proficiencie; The ſanctification followes. The Moſaicall Law was ſcrupulous: There were vnholy places, vnholy garments, perſons, beaſts, fowles, veſſels, touches, taſts: Vnder the Goſpell all is holy. All was made vnholy, when the firſt Adam ſinned; when the ſecond Adam ſatisfied for ſinne, all was made holy: Moſes the ſeruant built his houſe, with a τὸ μεσοτοῖχον φραγμὸν, Epheſ. 2. 14. A partition wall in the midſt:

midſt : Chriſt the Sonne pull'd downe that ſcreene, and caſt all into one ἀμφότερα : Iewes and Gentiles, whole hooſes and clouen, dwell now both vnder a roofe. Moſes branded ſome creatures with vncleanneſſe ; he that redeemed his children from morall impuritie, redeemed his creatures from legall : What ſhould S. Peters great ſheet let downe by foure corners teach vs, but that all creatures through the foure corners of the world, are cleane and holy ? S. Paul proclaimes the ſumme of Peters viſion ; Omnia munda mundis : It is an iniurious ſcrupulouſneſſe, to make differences of creatures ; iniurious to God, to the creature, to our ſelues : To God, while we will not let him ſerue himſelfe of his owne : To the creature, while we powre that ſhame vpon it, which God neuer did : To our ſelues, while we bring our ſelues into bondage, where God hath inlarged vs. When Iulian had poyſoned the wells, and ſhambles, and fields, with his heathenilh Luſtrations ; the Chriſtians (ſaith Theodoret) ate freely of all, by vertue of PAVLS, Quicquid in macello : To let paſſe the idle curiouſnes of our ſemi-Anabaptiſts, of the ſeparation, at whoſe follie, if any man be diſpoſed to make himſelfe ſport, let him read the Tragicomicall relation of the Troubles and Excommunication of the Engliſh at Amſterdam ; There ſhall he ſee ſuch warres waged betwixt brothers, for but a buske, or whale-bone, or lace, or cork-ſhooe, as if all Law and Goſpell ſtood vpon this point ; as if heauen and earth were little enough to be minged in this quarrell ; Nec gemino bellum Troianum. To paſſe ouer all other lighter niceneſſe of this kinde : Who can chooſe but be aſhamed of the Church of Rome ; which is here in a double extremitie, both groſſe : In denying, wiping out holineſſe, where God hath written it : and in writing it, where God hath not written it : in the firſt, how doe they driue out Deuils out of good creatures, by fooliſh exorciſmes ? I would he were no more in themſelues. How doe they forbid meats, drinks, dayes, mariage which God hath written holy ? Hee that reads Nauars Manuall, ſhall finde cholericke blaſphemie a veniall ſinne, pag. 91. ſome theft veniall, p. 140. Common lying, veniall, p. 191. Curſing of Parents, if not malicious, veniall, p. 100. and yet the ſame Author, chap. 21. nu. 11. p. 209. to eat of a forbidden diſh, or an allowed diſh more than once on a forbidden day, is a mortall ſinne : And now theſe venials (ſaith Francis a Victoria) by a Pater-noſter, or ſprinkling of holy water, or knocke of the breaſt are cleared ; but that mortall eater is ἔνοχος τῇ κρίσει : guilty of iudgement, yea, of hell it ſelfe : Scribes, Phariſes, Hypocrites, which prate of Peters chaire, but will neuer take out Peters leſſon, That which God hath ſanctified, pollute thou not. In the other : What Holineſſe doe they write in religious cowles, Altars, Reliques, Aſhes, Candles, Oyles, Salts, Waters, Enſignes, Roſes, Words, Graines, Agnus Dei, Medalls, and a world of ſuch traſh : So much, that they haue left none in themſelues. Let me haue no faith, if euer play-booke were more ridiculous, than their Pontificall, and booke of holy Ceremonies. It is well that Ierome reads theſe words, ſuper frænum, not ſuper Tintinnabulum ; Elſe, what a rule ſhould we haue had; tho he had ſaid, Equorum, not Templorum : What compariſons would haue beene ; If Holineſſe to the Lord muſt be written on the Bells of Horſes, much more on the Bells of Churches. What a colour would this haue beene for the waſhing, anointing, bleſſing, chriſtening of them ? What a warrant for driuing away Deuils, chaſing of ghoſts, ſtilling of tempeſts, ſtaying of thunders, yea deliuering from Tentations, which the Pontificall aſcribes to them ? By whoſe account, there ſhould be more vertue in this peece of metall, than in their holy Father himſelfe, yea than in any Angell of heauen : But their vulgar bridles them in this, which reads it, ſuper frænum, which ſome ſuperſtitious man would ſay were fulfilled in Conſtantines ſnaffle made of the nailes that pierced Chriſt. How worthy are they in the meane time of the whip, not of men onely, but of God, which thus in a ridiculous preſumption write Holineſſe, where God would haue a blanke ; and wipe out Holineſſe, where God hath written it.

For vs, there is a double holineſſe; for vſe, for vertue : All things are holy to vs for vſe ; nothing is holy for vertue of ſanctification, but thoſe things which God hath ſanctified to this vertue ; his word, his ſacraments : We may vſe the other, and put no holineſſe in them ; we muſt vſe theſe, and expect holineſſe from them : ἐξεσ κοινοι, Nothing vncleane, is Peters rule, but with Pauls explication, Munda mundis : All things are cleane in themſelues ; to thee they are not cleane, vnleſſe thou be cleane. Mine owne clothes ſhall make me filthy, ſaith Iob, 9. 31. Many a one may ſay ſo, more iuſtly. The proud mans gay coat, the wanton womans beaſtly faſhions, both ſhew them to be vncleane, and make them ſo. But the lewd man makes his owne clothes filthy ; his meats, drinks, ſports, garments, are vncleane to him, becauſe he is vncleane to God ; they are curſed to him, becauſe he is curſed of God : God hath written on the outſide of his creatures, Holy to the Lord ; we write on the inſide, Vnholy to men ; becauſe our outſide and inſide is vnholy to God : yea, we doe not onely deface this inſcription of holineſſe in other creatures to vs, but we will not let God write it vpon vs, for himſelfe. O our miſerie and ſhame : All things elſe are holy ; Men, Chriſtians, are vnholy. There is no impuritie but where is Reaſon, and Faith, the grounds of Holineſſe. How oft would God haue written this title vpon our foreheads ? and ere he can haue written one full word, we blot out all : One ſweares it away, another drinks it away, a third ſcoffs it away, a fourth riots it away, a fift ſwaggers it away ; and I would to God it were vncharitable to ſay, that there is as much holineſſe in the Bridles of the Horſes, as in ſome of their Riders. Oh holineſſe, the riches of the Saints, the beauty of Angels, the delight of God, whither haſt thou withdrawne thy ſelfe ? where ſhould we finde thee if not among Chriſtians ? and yet how can we be, or be named Chriſtians without thee ? I ſee ſome that are afraid to be too holy : and I ſee but ſome that feare to be too prophane. We are all Saints, κλητοι ἁγιοι, 1 Cor. 1. 2. All by calling ; and ſome but by calling : By calling of men, not of God : As the Church of Rome hath ſome Saints which are queſtioned whether euer they were in nature ; others, whether they be not in hell ; burning Tapers to them on earth, to whom perhaps the fiends light firebrands below. As Cæſarius the Monke brings in Petrus Cantor, and Roger the Norman diſputing the caſe of Becket ; ſo we haue many titular Saints, few reall ; many which are written in red Letters in the Calendar of the world, Holy to the Lord, whom God neuer canonizes in heauen, and ſhall once entertaine with a Neſcio, I know you not. Theſe men yet haue Holineſſe written vpon them, and are like, as Lucian compares his Græcians, to a faire, gilt, boſſed booke : looke within, there is the Tragedie of Thyeſtes, or perhaps Arrius his Thalia ; the name of a Muſe, the matter hereſie ; or Conradus Vorſtius his late monſter, that hath De Deo in the front, and Atheiſme and Blaſphemie in the text. As S. Paul ſayes to his Corinths, would God yee could ſuffer me a little : Yee cannot want praiſers, ye may want reprouers ; and yet you haue not ſo much neede of Panegyricks, as of reprehenſions. Theſe by how much more rare they are, by ſo much more neceſſarie. Nec cenſura deeſt quæ increpet, nec medicina quæ ſanet, ſaith Cyprian. A falſe praiſe grieues, and a true praiſe ſhames, ſaith Anaſtaſius. As Kings are by God himſelfe called Gods (for there are Dij nuncupatiuè, and not eſſentialiter, as Gregorie diſtinguiſhes) becauſe of their reſemblance of God, ſo their Courts ſhould be like to heauen, and their attendants like Saints and Angels : Decet domum tuam ſanctitudo, agrees to both. Thus you ſhould be : But alas, I ſee ſome care to be gallant, others care to be great, few care to be holy. Yea I know not what Deuil hath poſſeſſed the hearts of many great ones of our time in both ſexes, with this conceit, that they cannot be gallant enough, vnleſſe they be godleſſe. Holineſſe is for Diuines, or men of meane ſpirits, for graue, ſubdued, mortified, retired minds ; not for them that ſtand vpon the tearmes of honour, height of place and ſpirit, noble humours ; hence are our oathes, duels, profaneneſſes. Alas, that we ſhould be ſo beſotted, as to thinke that our ſhame, which is our onely glory : It is reaſon that makes vs men, but it is holineſſe that makes vs Chriſtians. And woe to vs that wee are men, if wee be not Chriſtians. Thinke as baſely of it as yee will : you ſhall one day finde, that one dram of holineſſe is worth a whole world of greatneſſe ; yea, that there is no greatneſſe, but in holineſſe. For Gods ſake therefore doe not ſend holineſſe to Colledges or Hoſpitals for her lodging, but entertaine her willingly into the Court, as a moſt happy gueſt. Thinke it a ſhame, and danger, to goe in fine clothes, while you haue foule hearts; and know, that in vaine ſhall you be honour'd of men, if you be not holy to the Lord. Your goodly outſides may admit you into the Courts on earth; but you ſhall neuer looke within the gates of the Court of heauen without holineſſe: Without holineſſe no man ſhall ſee God. O God, without holineſſe we ſhall neuer ſee thee; and without thee wee ſhall neuer ſee holineſſe: write thou vpon theſe ſinfull hearts of ours, Holineſſe to thy ſelfe: Make vs holy to thee, that wee may be glorious with thee and all thy Saints and Angels.

All this onely for thy Chriſts ſake, and to whom, &c.

THE IMPRESE OF GOD.

THE SECOND PART.

ZACH. vlt. 20.

IT is well-neere a yeere agoe, ſince in this Gracious Preſence, wee entred vpon this myſticall, yet pertinent Text. You then heard what This day is; what theſe Bells or Bridles; what this inſcription; what theſe Pots and Bowles: And out of That day you heard the proficiencie of the Church; out of Holineſſe written on the Bells, the ſanctification of the Church: You ſhall now heare, out of theſe Bells, or Bridles of warlike horſes, thus inſcribed, the change of the holy warre, and peace of the Church; out of theſe Pots, aduanced to the likeneſſe of the Bowles of the Altar, the degrees of the Churches perfection, and acceptation; All which craue your gracious and honourable attention. That conceit (which yet is graced with the name of ſome Fathers) that takes this in the literall ſenſe of Conſtantines bridle, wee paſſe, as more worthy of ſmiles than confutation: Queſtionleſſe, the ſenſe is ſpirituall; and it is a ſure rule, that as the hiſtoricall ſenſe is fetcht from ſignification of words, ſo the ſpirituall from the ſignification of thoſe things, which are ſignified by the words.

For this inſcription then, it ſhall not be vpon the bells, for their owne ſakes, but for the horſes: not as bells, but as bells of the horſes; And on the horſes, not for their owne ſakes, but as they ſerue for their Riders. The horſe, a militarie creature; there is no other mention of him in Scripture, no other vſe of him of old: when the eyes of Eliſhaes ſeruant were open, he ſaw the hill full of horſes, 2 Kings 6. Euen the celeſtiall warfare is not expreſſed without them: Hence you ſhall euer finde them matcht with Chariots in the Scripture: And the Poet, Nunc tempus equos, nunc poſcere currus: he ruſheth into the battell, ſaith Ieremy; and he is made for it; for he hath both ſtrength and nimbleneſſe. He is ſtrong: there is fortitudo equi, Pſalm. 47. and God himſelfe acknowledges it. Haſt thou giuen the horſe his ſtrength, Iob 39. He is ſwift, ſaith Ieremy, 4. 13. yea as Eagles, or Leopards, ſaith Abacuc. We muſt take theſe horſes then, either as continuing themſelues, or as altered. If the firſt; The very warres vnder the Goſpell ſhall be holy; and God ſhall much glorifie himſelfe by them: He ſaith not, There ſhall be no horſes, or thoſe horſes ſhall haue no bells, or thoſe bells no inſcription; but thoſe horſes, and their vſe, which is warre, and their ornaments, which are bells, ſhall haue a title of Holineſſe. While Cornelius Agrippa writes of the vanitie of Sciences, wee may well wonder at the vanitie of his opinion, that all warre was forbidden vnder the Goſpell. But let Agrippa be vaine in this, as a meere Humaniſt, and the Anabaptiſts groſly falſe, as being franticke heretiques: It is maruell how Eraſmus ſo great a ſcholler, and Ferus ſo great a Text-man could miſcarry in this Manichean conceit. Alphonſus à Caſtro would faine haue our Oecolampadius to keepe them company, but Bellarmine himſelfe can hardly beleeue him: No maruell, when he ſees Zuinglius die in the field, tho as a Paſtor, not as a ſouldier: and when our ſwords haue ſo well taught them, beſides our tongues, that the hereticks are as good friends to warre, as enemies to them. It is Gods euerlaſting title, Dominus exercituum. To ſpeake nothing of the old Teſtament; What can Cornelius Agrippa ſay to Cornelius the Centurion; I feare no man would giue that title to him that oppoſed warre, which Gods ſpirit giues to this agent in warre; A iuſt man, and fearing God: His warfare, ſaith Chryſoſtome, hurt him not. Did not Chriſt himſelfe bid (euen hee that ſaid, Whoſo ſmites with the ſword, ſhall periſh with the ſword, in caſe of priuate reuenge) Qui non habet gladium, vendat tunicam, emat gladium? The Angels themſelues are heauenly ſouldiers; Euery Chriſtian is a ſouldier: As he is a Chriſtian, he fights not againſt fleſh and bloud, but principalities and powers; as he is a Chriſtian ſouldier, he fights both againſt fleſh and bloud, and principalities; All the warres of God: So that contrary to S. Martin, who ſaid, I am a Chriſtian, I may not fight; he muſt ſay, I am a Chriſtian, I muſt fight. And why may he not? God when he makes vs Chriſtians, leaues vs the ſame wit to deuiſe ſtratagems, the ſame hands to execute them. All things (as Eraſmus wittily) haue in them naturally a meanes of defence; the Horſe heeles, Dog teeth, Oxe hornes, Porcupine quills, Bee ſting, Serpent poyſon; thoſe weaker creatures that cannot reſiſt, haue either nimble feet to out-run vs, or wings to out-flie vs: Only man is left naked: Yet ſo, as his furniture within can ſoone furniſh him for without: Yet all horſes, all warres, are not written holy; As there is a ſpirituall euill warre, of the fleſh againſt the ſpirit: ſo there is a temporall of fleſh, againſt fleſh. Vnde bella? ſaith Saint Iames. Militare propter prædam, to fight for a booty (ſaith Ambroſe) is ſinne. That witty Alphonſus King of Arragon (to whom wee are beholden for ſo many Apothegmes) had for his Impreſe a Pellican ſtriking her ſelfe in the breſt, and feeding her young with the bloud; with a word, Pro lege, & grege. All warre drawes bloud: oft of the innocent part, πολεμος is πολυ-αιμος, and therefore muſt neuer be but pro lege, for Religion; or pro grege, for the Common-wealth. And as it hath theſe two grounds; ſo alſo two directors; Iuſtice and Charitie. Iuſtice, that requires both authoritie in the menager, and innocence in menaging; Authoritie; A ſubordinate power is not capable of holy warre: He only may ſay pro lege, that is cuſtos vtriuſque tabulæ; he only pro grege, that is ποιμην λαων: If priuate men ſhall ſay, pro lege, or pro grege, they are traitors, and not ſouldiers; In them, as he ſaid to Alexander, warre is but theft and murder. Only Kings are the publike Iuſticers of the world: which can command peace, with their owne, and puniſh the breach of peace in others Innocence. Wrong no man, ſaith Ioh. Bapt. That non ex iure, is more than vnchriſtian, bruitiſh.

Charitie; whether in the intention; Peace muſt be the end of warre. Bellarmine ſaid this one thing well, that warre to the Common-wealth is as vulnera Chirurgi: or, in the action; both of vndertaking and ceſſation: vndertaking; according to the Iewiſh prouerbe, Firſt we muſt inquire of Abel; and the heathen Poet could ſay, extrema nemo primo tentauit loco: no iuſt warre is ακηρυκτος: Ceſſation, vpon iuſt ſatisfaction; as Shebaes head raiſes the ſiege of Abel: This is bellum Domini; and Holineſſe is written vpon the bells of theſe horſes of warre. Such were the warres of that bleſſed Conſtantine, both Theodoſij, Honorius, and all whom God wrote Holy, and made happy. Such were many gallant Princes of old perſwaded that thoſe warres of Paleſtine were; who in a cunning cunning wile were ſent to get the Holy Land, that in the meane time they might leeſe their owne: How many Councels were ſummon'd, how many Armies leuied, one of 300000 at once, by Pope Vrbans procurement? how many ſtreames of Chriſtian bloud ſpilt to recouer the land of them that murdred Chriſt, which God had curſed to confuſion, terram ſacerrimam, in the Plautine ſenſe? Such are thoſe that are vndertaken againſt the ſcourge of Chriſtendome, the creature of Mahomet, that Turkiſh Magog. Such are thoſe that the Defender of the Chriſtian faith hath beene iuſtly prouoked to vndertake againſt that Romiſh vſurper, PETERS ſucceſſor in nothing, but in denying his Maſter. The inclemencie of the late Pope labouring to foreſtall him in his iuſt throne, and the abſurd pragmaticall impudencie of the preſent, in that groſſe prohibition of a fauourable and naturall oath, for his Maieſties ſecurity, in a fort countenancing rebellion againſt his Perſon; beſide thoſe ſhameleſſe libels of his factors, to the ſcorne of Gods Anointed, haue ſeemed to vſurpe Samuels meſſage, Vade, percute, demolire. To omit priuate moriues; Pope Vrbane in that his zealous Oration to the Councell of Cleremont vſed no one reaſon to perſwade the world to draw their ſword againſt the Turkes which might not iuſtly be vrged to Chriſtian Princes, to ſcale the wals of Rome. Doth hee ſpeake of the Saracens prophaning of Ieruſalem? we paralliel the ſhametull profanations of the ſpirituall Ieruſalem; their heatheniſme was neuer ſo idolatrous. Doth he ſpeake of abuſing the ſepulcher of Chriſt? we parallel them with the abuſing of his ſacred body. Doth he ſpeake of the cruelty of thoſe ſauages? we alſo may ſay of them, Effunditur ſanguis Chriſtianus, Chriſti ſanguine redemptus &c. neither need I feare to lay with Iunius, that in this they are Turcis Truciores. But I know what difference there is betwixt a Preacher, and an Herald: our title is Euangelizantes pacem: And tho the ſword of the hand doth well, yet it is the ſword of the mouth, that muſt ſlay that Man of ſinne: Yet this I dare ſay, that if in the cauſe of God and his Church, this warre ſhould be vndertaken, Holineſſe ſhould be written vpon our Horſes bridles; and, as we ſhall enter with fewer croſſes vpon our breſts, than thoſe honeſt ſouldiers into their holy warre: ſo both our cauſe ſhould be more holy, and we ſhould returne with fewer croſſes on our backes; But I meddle not with this. There is a warre that wee cannot ſhake off: Not with the perſon, but the corruptions of that foule Church, wee haue long waged it. God had neuer any quarrell vpon earth, if this be not his. Our bleſſed forefathers haue ſhed their bloud in this field, and are glorious: let vs ſtir vp our chriſtian courage to this ſeruice, vpon our horſes heads ſhall be written holines; vpon ours, glory and immortality. But take theſe horſes and bels altered (as fits better) by this writing from themſelues; what God writes is done: Write this man childleſſe: therefore he muſt be ſo: Ioel doth not ſo well comment vpon this place, Breake your plow-ſhares into ſwords, and your ſithes into ſpeares, Ioel 3. 10. as Micach 4. 3. They ſhall break their ſwords into mattocks, and their ſpeares into ſithes; Mattocks and ſithes the inſtruments of profit, one for the commodities aboue the earth, the other for thoſe vnder it: which as I take it, would not be ſo ſtrictly reſtrained to the very time of Chriſts comming, when there was an vniuerſall peace on earth, and the Temple of Ianus was ſhut: as Cyril, Chryſoſtome, Euſebius, Hierome, vnderſtand it: rather it is a prophecie of that outward and during peace vnder the Goſpell which all the true profeſſors of it ſhould maintaine with themſelues. All nations, though fierce and ſterne of diſpoſition, yet if they once ſtoop ſincerely to the Goſpell, ſhall compoſe themſelues to a ſweet accordance, and imploy their vnited ſtrength to the ſeruice of God: But how is this fulfilled? Some in all ages haue run forth into fury, & troubled the common peace: It is true; but theſe are blanks, ſuch as vpon whom God hath not written holines. It is no hoping that all horſes ſhall be bridled, or all bridles written on. As grace, ſo peace is not in ſuch ſort vniuerſall, that all ſhould incline to it, on all conditions: There are ſome שׂנאי שלום Peace-haters; it is as poſſible to tame a waſpe, as to incline them to peace: Such are the wilful Romaniſts of our time (to omit Schiſmes) which will rather mingle heauen & earth together, than remit one gainefull error. But what euer become of theſe Mamzers, which doe thus exclude themſelues from the congregation of God, it were happy, if al the true and acknowledged ledged ſonnes of the Church would admit the inſcription of an holy peace. Alas, why doe wee that are brethren fall out for our change of ſuits by the way? and make thoſe quarrels deadly, which deſerue not to be quarrels? Oh that ſome bleſſed Doue would bring an Oliue of peace into this Arke of God! Who is ſo fit for this glorious ſeruice as our gracious peace-maker? Nemo me impune lacesſet, is a good Poſie; but Beati pacifici, is a better. Let the Vice-gerent of him which is the Prince of peace, as he was made for the peace of the walls, and proſperity of the gates of Sion, be that Angelus pacis, Eſ. 33.7. Let his wiſedome and ſweet moderation proceed to allay all theſe vnkindly ſtormes of the Church, that we may liue to ſee that happy greeting of the Pſalmiſt, Righteouſneſſe and Peace haue kiſſed each other. And as this holds in matter of iudgment, ſo of practiſe too. Do you ſee a looſe & lawleſſe man, wilfull in his deſires, vnbridled in his affections, inordinate in his life, imploying his wit to ſcoffe at his Creator, caring for nothing but the worſe part of himſelfe? There is one of Zacharies horſes; when Gods ſpirit breaths vpon the ſoule of this man, he is now another from himſelfe: Holineſſe to the Lord is written vpon his Bels. This was done ſometimes of old: Saul was among the Prophets; Salomon and Manaſſes, great patternes of conuerſion; but rarely in reſpect of the dayes of the Goſpell. What ſhould I ſpeake of S. Paul? No ground would hold him, he runs chafing and foaming from Hieruſalem to Damaſcus; of his Iaylor? of Mary Magdalen? Behold whole troupes of wilde natures reclaimed, Eph. 4. Coloſſ. 3. Act. 2. Who can deſpaire where God vndertakes? Shew me neuer ſo violent and deſperate a ſinner, let him be as Iobs wilde aſſe in the deſart, or as Amos his horſe, that will run vpon the rocks, Amos 6.12. if God once take him in hand, thou ſhalt ſoone ſee that this horſe is fleſh, and not ſpirit; and ſhalt ſing Deborahs, Vngulæ ceciderunt, Iudg. 5.22. or Ioſhuahs, Subneruabis, Ioſ. 11.6. Now ſhalt thou ſee him ſtand quaking vnder the almighty hand of God, ſo that he may write what he will in his bridle, yea in his skin. And if there be any ſuch headſtrong and reſtie ſteed here among vs, let him know, that God will either breake his ſtomacke or his heart: Flagellū equo, ſaith Salomon; and if that will not ſerue, Collidā in te equum & equitē, Ier. 51.21. But alas, how rare are theſe examples of reclamation? Where is this power of the Goſpell? Men continue beaſts ſtill, and with that filthy Gryllus plead for the priuiledge of their beſtialitie. The ſins of men ſtriue to outface the glory of the Goſpell. What ſhall I ſay to this? If after all theſe meanes thou haue no bridle, or thy bridle no inſcription, it is a fearfulll doome of the Apoſtle; If our Goſpell be hid, it is hid to them that periſh. Thus much of the horſes and bels. Now from the pots and bowles you ſhall ſee the degrees of the Churches perfection: and ſee it, I beſeech you, without wearineſſe, with intention. The pots of the Temple were ſeething veſſels for the vſe of ſacrifice: Theſe are the Prieſts themſelues here, for that there is a diſtinction made betwixt the Pots of the Lords houſe, and euery pot in Ieruſalem. The ordinarie Iew was euery pot: therefore the Pots of the Lords houſe muſt be his Miniſters. Theſe vnder the Goſpel ſhall be of more honorable vſe; (as the bowles before the Altar) like as the Altar of perfumes was more inward, and of higher reſpect. The pots were of ſhining braſſe; bowles of gold, 1 King. 7.50. It is no brag to ſay, that the Miniſterie of the Goſpell is more glorious than that of the Law: The leaſt in the kingdome of heauen (ſaith CHRIST) is greater than Iohn Baptiſt, Matth. 11.11. The kingdome of heauen, that is, the Church; not as Auſten, Ierome, Bede expound it, of the third heauen; for Chriſt would make an oppoſition betwixt the old and new Teſtament. The not vnlearned Ieſuite Maldonat, while he taxeth vs for preferring euery Miniſter of the Goſpell to Iohn Baptiſt, mends the matter ſo well, that he verifies it of euery perſon; Minimus quiſque in Euangelio, that is, qui Euangelium recipit, maior eſt illo; not feeling how he buffets himſelfe: for if the leaſt of thoſe that receiue the Goſpell, how much more the leaſt of thoſe that preach it? This is no arrogance. God would haue euery thing in the laſt Temple more glorious than in the firſt, which was figured by the outward frame, more glorious in CHRISTS time, than that of SALOMON; as that was beyond the Tabernacle. This is a better Teſtament, Heb. 7.22. That had the ſhadow, this the ſubſtance, Heb. 10. Vnder this, is greater illumination; Effundam ſpiritum meum, ſaith the Prophet; before, before, ſome few drops diſtilled ; now a whole current of graces ; Effundam. If therefore Iohn Baptiſt were greater than the ſonnes of men, becauſe they ſaw Chriſt to come, he pointed at him comming ; ours muſt needs be more glorious, becauſe we ſee and point at him now come, and fully exhibited. We will not conteſt with the Leuiticall Prieſthood, for coſt of clothes, for price of veſſels ; let the Church of Rome emulate this pompe, (which cares not if ſhee haue golden veſſels, though ſhee haue leaden Prieſts,) we enuie it not ; but for inward graces, for learning, knowledge, power of teaching, there is no leſſe difference, than betwixt the pots of the Temple, and bowles of the Altar : God ſayes of them in way of reiection, Non eſt mihi voluntas in vobis, Mal. 1. Hence the Prieſthood of the new Law is Leui refined, Mal. 3. 3. Et purgabit filios Leui ; which Hierome not vnlikely, interprets of the Miniſterie of the Goſpell : They are the ſonnes of Leui, which ſignifies Copulation ; quia homines cum Deo copulant ; but of Leui purged, and purged as gold : As much difference betweene them, as betwixt gold in the Ore, and in the wedge. Hence is double honour challenged to the Euangelicall Miniſterie, yea, and giuen : Yee receiued me, ſaith S. Paul, as an Angell of God, yea as Chriſt Ieſus, Gal. 4. 14. Hence the Angell, of himſelfe to IOHN, I am thy fellow-ſeruant. Woe be to them therefore which ſpet in the faces of thoſe whom God hath honoured : It is Gods ſecond charge, this of his Prophets : His firſt is, Touch not mine anointed ; his ſecond, Hurt not my Prophets. And if one diſgraceſull word ſpoken but by rude children to a Prophet of the old Teſtament, coſt ſo many throats, God be merciſull to thoſe dangerous and deadly affronts that haue beene, and are daily offered to the Prophets of the new : What can wee ſay, but with the women of Tekoah, Serua ô Rex. We bleſſe God that we may bemoane our ſelues to the tender and indulgent eares of a gracious Soueraigne, ſenſible of theſe ſpirituall wrongs ; who yet (we know) may well anſwer vs with Iacobs queſtion, An loco Dei ego ſum ? It grieues me to thinke and ſay of our ſelues, that for a great part of this, Perditio tua ex te. Woe to thoſe corrupted ſonnes of Heli, which through their inſufficiencie and vnconſcionableneſſe, haue powred contempt on their owne faces. That proud fugitiue Campian could ſay, Miniſtris illorum nihil vilius, &c. As falſly as ſpightfully. Let heauen and earth witneſſe, whether any Nation in the world can afford ſo learned, ſo glorious a Clergie. But yet, among ſo many pots of the Temple, it is no maruell if ſome be drie for want of liquor, others ruſtie for want of vſe, others full of liquor without meat, others ſo full of meat that they want liquor. Let the Lords anointed, whoſe example and incouragements haue raiſed euen this diuine learning to this excellent perfection, by his gracious countenance, diſpell contempt from the profeſſors of it, and by his effectuall endeuours remoue the cauſes of this contempt.

But as euery Chriſtian vnder the Goſpell is a Prieſt and Prophet, let the people be theſe pots, or the offerings of the people. That ſhall be in reſpect of the frequence, or fragrance, according to the double acception of that particle of compariſon (Camiſrachim) as the bowles ; for number, or qualitie. For the frequence. A few ſeething pots ſerued the ſacrifice ; but bowles they vſed many : what for the vſe of the Altar of incenſe, what for the receiuing of the bloud of the ſacrifice, Salomon made an 100 of gold. Now then ſaith God, in the dayes of the Goſpell, there ſhall be ſuch ſtore of oblations to God, that the number of the pots ſhall equalize the number of the bowles of the Altar : not vnlike, becauſe of the following words ; Euery pot in Ieruſalem ſhall be faine to be employed to the ſacrifices. This frequence then, is either of the officers, or offerings ; perſons, or acts. For the perſons ; they were few in compariſon, vnder the Law. All Paleſtine, which comprehends all their officers, except ſome few Proſelytes, was but (as Ierome, which was a Lieger there, reckons it) an 160 miles long from Dan to Beerſheba, and 46 miles broad from Ioppa to Bethleem. Now the partition wall is broken downe, all nations vnder heauen yeeld franke offerers to the Altar of God. There was no offering then but at Ieruſalem : now Ieruſalem is euery where. So much therefore as the world is wider than Iudea, ſo much as Chriſtendome is larger than the walles of the Temple ; ſo many more officers hath the Goſpell than the Law. And it were were well, if there were as many, as they ſeeme. If but as many as all the world ouer offer their preſence to Gods ſeruice on Gods day (leaue thoſe that ſpend it in the Stewes and Tauernes, to him whom they ſerue) were true offerers, how rich would the Altar be, and the Temple how glorious? But alas, if God will be ſerued with mouthes full of oathes, curſes, bitterneſſe, with heads full of wine, with eyes full of luſt, with hands full of bloud, with backs full of pride, with panches full of gluttonie, with ſoules and liſes full of horrible ſinnes, he may haue offerers as many as men: elſe as Eſay, relicta eſt in vrbe ſolitudo; a few pots will hold our ſacrifices: and what is this, but through our wilfull diſobedience, to croſſe him which hath ſaid, that in this day the pots of the Temple ſhall be as the bowles of the Altar. The act or commoditie is offerings; whether outward, or inward. The outward fulfilled in thoſe large endowments of the Church, by our deuout and bountifull predeceſſors. What liberall reuenues, rich maintenances were then put into (mort-maine) the dead hand of the Church? Lawes were faine to reſtraine the bountie of thoſe contributions (the grounds whereof I examine not) in ſtead of MOSES his proclamation, Nequis facito deinceps opus ad oblationem Sanctuarij, ſatis enim eſt, adeoq; ſupereſt, Exod. 26. 6. Then mons Domini, mons pinguis: but now the Church may cry with the Prophet, My leanneſſe, my leanneſſe. For ſhame, why ſhould ſacrilege croud in with religion? why ſhould our better knowledge finde vs leſſe conſcionable? O iniurious zeale of thoſe men, which thinke the Church cannot be holy enough, vnleſſe ſhe begg. It hath beene ſaid of old, That Religion bred wealth, and the daughter eat vp the mother: I know not, if the daughter deuoured the mother; I am ſure theſe men would deuoure both daughter and mother: Men of vaſt gorges, and inſatiable. Our Sauiour cryed out againſt the Scribes and Phariſes, yet they deuoured but widowes houſes, poore low cottages: but theſe gulfes of men, whole Churches; and yet the ſepulchers of their throats are open for more. I can tell them of a mouth that is wider than theirs, and that is the Prophets, Os inferni: Therefore Hell hath inlarged it ſelfe, and hath opened his mouth, without meaſure: and their glory, and their pompe, and he that reioyceth in it, ſhall deſcend into it, Eſa. 5. 14. In the meane time, Oh that our SAMSON would pull this honie of the Church out of the iawes of theſe Lyons; or if the cunning conueyances of ſacrilege haue made that impoſſible, ſince it lies not now entire in the combes, but is let downe and digeſted by theſe raueners, let him whoſe glory it is not to be Pater Patriæ onely, but Pater Eccleſiæ, prouide that thoſe few pots we haue, may ſtill ſeeth, and that if nothing will be added, nothing can be recouered, yet nothing may be purloyned from the Altars of God. But theſe outward offerings were but the types of the inward: What cares God for the bloud or fleſh of bullocks, rams, goats? Non delectaris ſacrificio vt dem, holocauſtum non vis, ſaith Dauid: what then? The ſacrifice of God is a contrite ſpirit, a broken heart. Our humiliation is ſacrificium pœnitentiæ, our new obedience is ſacrificium iuſtitiæ, our thankfull commemorations are ſacrificium laudis. Theſe are the oblations which as they ſhall be frequent vnder the Goſpell, ſo moſt fragrant vnto God: and this is that laſt, and perhaps moſt proper ſenſe, wherein the fleſh-pots of the ſacrifices erant ſicut aromata, ſhall be as perfumes in the bowles of incenſe. A liuely ſacrifice is well matcht with holy and acceptable. When Noah ſacrificed to God after the Deluge, it is ſaid God ſmelt a ſauour of reſt, alluding to his name: but now the ſacrifices we offer are ὀσμὴ εὐωδίας, a ſauour of ſweetneſſe: ſo that the ſame ſauour that Chriſts oblation had, Epheſ. 5. 2. the ſame haue our offerings, Philip. 4. 18. Gods children, out of the conſcience of their owne weakneſſes, are eaſily diſcouraged in the valuation of their owne obedience. As therefore they can ſay of their perſons, with Mephiboſheth, What is thy ſeruant? ſo of their ſeruices, as Philip ſaid of the fiue loaues and two fiſhes, ἀλλὰ ταῦτα τί ἐστιν, Alas, what are theſe? But they and their offerings cannot be ſo baſe to themſelues, as they are precious to God. There is no ſenſe that giues ſo liuely a refreſhing to the ſpirits, as that of ſmelling: no ſmell can yeeld ſo true and feeling delight to the ſenſe, as the offerings of our penitence, obedience, praiſe, ſend vp into the noſtrils of the Almighty. Hence as the Church can ſay of Chriſt, He is as a bundle of myrrh lying betweene her breaſts;

breaſts; ſo he againe of her in that heauenly Epithalamion, Thy plants are as an Orchard of Pomegranates, with ſweet fruits, as cypres, ſpicknard, ſaffron, calamus, and cinamon, with all the trees of incenſe, myrrh, and aloes, with all the chiefe ſpices, Cant. 4. 13. Let this therefore comfort vs, againſt our imperfections; If we be pots of the Lords houſe, thoſe faint ſtreames that we ſend vp, ſhall be as ſweet, as the beſt incenſe of the bowles of the Altar, and God ſaies to vs, as to Cornelius, Thy praiers and thine almes are come vp, Act. 10. And how are they come vp? Like pillars of ſmoke perfumed with myrrh and incenſe, and with all the chiefe ſpices, Cant. 3. 6. I ſay if we bee pots of the Lords houſe; for if we be Ægyptian fleſh-pots, that reeke of the ſtrong-ſmelling onions and garlike of our owne corruptions; If we be Ezechiels bloudy pots, whoſe ſcumme or (as the vulgar) whoſe ruſt is in them, Ezec. 24. If we boile with luſt, if with reuenge, if with ambition; I can ſay no other of vs, than the ſonnes of the Prophets ſaid of theirs, Mors in olla, Death is in the pot; a double death, of body, and ſoule. It is a true ſpeech of Origen, Peccatum eſt vtili odoris: No carion is ſo noiſome. Alas, what ſauours are ſent vp to God from thoſe, that would ſeeme not onely pots of the Temple, but bowles of the Altar; How vnſauourie is the pride, prophaneneſſe, riotouſneſſe, oppreſſion, beaſtlineſſe of our times? It were happy if the Court were free: and as it receiues more ſweet influences of fauour, than all other places; ſo, that it returned backe more fragrant obedience: that as it is ſaid of Maries ſpicknard, wherewith ſhee anointed Chriſt, that the whole houſe was filled with the ſauour of the ointment, Ioh. 12. 3. ſo the whole world might be full of the pleaſant perfumes of vertuous example, that might ariſe from hence. But alas, the painted faces, and manniſhneſſe, and monſtrous diſguiſedneſſe of the one ſex, the factious hollowneſſe, prodigall gariſhneſſe, wanton pampering, exceſſe in our reſpect to our ſelues, defects in our reſpects to God in the other, argue too well, that too many of vs ſauour more like the golden ſockets of the holy lights, than the bowles of the Altar; God cannot abide theſe ill ſents. The fiue Cities of the plaines ſent vp ſuch poiſonous vapours to God, that he ſent them downe brimſtone againe with their fire. That which hell is deſcribed by, is ſent downe from Heauen, becauſe that ſuch helliſh exhalations aſcend from them, to heauen. How ſhould the ſinnes of Sodome not expect the iudgements of Sodome? Well might the Iewes feare, becauſe they would not be ſeruiceable caldrons vnto God, that therefore they ſhould be the fleſh, and their Citie the caldron, Ezec. 11. 3. Well may we feare it, who haue had ſo ſenſible proofes, as of the fauours, ſo of the iudgements of God: and happy ſhall it be for vs, if we can ſo feare, that our feare may preuent euils. Let theſe pots of ours therefore ſend vp ſweet fumes of contrition, righteouſneſſe, thankſgiuing, into the noſtrils of God; and the ſmoke of his diſpleaſure, wherewith coales of eternall fire are kindled againſt his enemies, ſhall not come forth of his noſtrils againſt vs: He ſhall ſmell a ſauour of reſt from vs; we a ſauour of peace and life from him: which God for his mercy ſake, and for his Sonne Chriſts ſake, vouchſafe to grant vs. To whom with the Father, and the holy Ghoſt, one glorious God, be giuen all praiſe, honour, and glory, now and for euer.

AMEN.

A FAREWELL SERMON,

PREACHT TO THE FAMILIE OF PRINCE HENRY,

VPON THE DAY OF THEIR DISSOLVTION AT S. IAMES.

By Ios. Hall.

Imprinted at London, 1627.

A FAREWELL SERMON.

REVEL. 21. 3.

And I heard a great voice from heauen, ſaying, Behold the Tabernacle of God is with men, and he will dwell with them, and they ſhall be his people, and God himſelfe ſhall bee their God with them.

And God ſhall wipe away all teares from their eyes, and there ſhall be no more death, neither ſorrow, nor crying, neither ſhall there be any more paine, for the firſt things are paſſed. And he that ſate vpon the throne ſaid; Behold, I make all things new.

IT is no wonder, if this place, as it is (for the preſent) the Well-head of ſorrow to all Chriſtendome, haue ſent forth abundance of waters of teares. And perhaps, you may expect, that as the trumpets of our late heauy funerall-ſolemnity, ſounded baſeſt and dolefulleſt at the laſt, ſo my ſpeech being the laſt publike breath of this ſad diſſoluing Family, ſhould bee moſt paſſionately ſorrowfull. And ſurely I could eaſily obtaine of my ſelfe, out of the bitterneſſe of my ſoule, to ſpend my ſelfe in lamentations, and to breake vp this aſſembly, in the violent expreſſions of that griefe, wherewith our hearts are already broken: but, I well conſider, that we ſhall carry ſorrow enough home with vs, in my ſilence; and that it is both more hard, and more neceſſary for vs, to be led forth to the waters of comfort. And becauſe our occaſions of griefe are ſuch, as no earthly tongue can releeue vs, nor no earthly obiect, A voice from heauen ſhall doe it, and a voyce leading vs from earth to heauen, And I heard a voice from heauen, &c.

This day is a day of note for three famous periods. Firſt, it is the day of the diſſipation of this Royall Family. Then, the laſt day of our publike and ioynt mourning. Laſtly, the day of the alteration and renewing of our ſtate, and courſe of life, with the New-yeere. All theſe meet in this Text with their cordialls, and diuine remedies; Our diſſipation and diſſolution in theſe words, Behold the Tabernacle of God is with men. Our mourning, God ſhall wipe away all teares, &c. Our change of eſtate, Behold, I will make all things new. I muſt craue leaue to glide thorow all of theſe with much ſpeed, and (for the better conueniencie of our diſcourſe) thorow the firſt, laſt.

My speech therefore shall as it were climbe vp these six staires of doctrine.

1. That here our eyes are full of teares: how else should they be wip't away? how all, vnlesse many?

2. That these teares are from sorrow; and this sorrow from death, and toyle, out of the connexion of all these.

3. That God will once free vs, both from teares which are the effect of sorrow, and from toile and death which are the causes of it.

4. That this our freedome, must bee vpon a change; for that the first things are passed.

5. That this change shall be in our Renouation. Behold I make all things new.

6. That this renouation and happy change shall be in our perpetuall fruition of the inseparable presence of God, whose Tabernacle shall be with men.

Psal. 84. Iudg. 2. 5. As those grounds that lie low are commonly mooriſh, this base part of the world wherein we liue, is the vale of teares, That true Bochim, as the Israelites called their mourning-place: We begin our life with teares, and therefore our Lawyers define life, by weeping; if a childe were heard cry, it is a lawfull proofe of his liuing: else if hee be dead, we say he is still-borne; and at our parting God findes teares in our eies, which he shall wipe off. So we finde it alwayes, not onely (לבכות עת) a time of weeping, but (מספד) of solemne mourning, as Salomon puts them together, Eccl. 3. 4. Except we be in that case that Dauid and his people were in, (and Ieremie sayes the same in his Lamentations, of the Iewes) that they wept till they could weepe no more: Here are teares at our deuotion; The Altar couered with teares, Mal. 2. Teares in the bed, Dauid watered his couch with teares, Psal. 6. Teares to wash with, as Maries. Teares to eat, Psal. 42. 3. Teares to drinke, Psal. 80. yea drunkennesse with teares, Esay 16. 9. This is our destiny as we are men, but more as we are Christians, To sow in Teares; and God loues these wet seed-times; they are seasonable for vs here below: Those men therefore are mistaken, that thinke to goe to heauen with drie eyes, and hope to leape immediately out of the pleasures of earth, into the Paradise of God; insulting ouer the drouping estate of Gods distressed ones. As Ierome, and Bede, say of Peter, that he could not weepe while he was in the High Priests walls, so these men cannot weepe where they haue offended. But let them know that they must haue a time of teares, and if they doe not begin with teares, they shall end with them; Woe be to them that laugh, for they shall weepe; and if they will not weepe, and shake their heads here, they shall weepe and waile, and gnash their teeth hereafter: Here must be teares, and that good store: All teares; as riuers are called the teares of the sea, (נבכי ים) Iob 38. so must our teares be the riuers of our eyes, Psal. 119. 136. and our eyes fountaines, Ier 9. 1. Here must be teares of penitence, teares of compassion, and will be teares of sorrow: Well are those two met therefore; teares and sorrow: for though some shed teares for spight, others for ioy, as Cyprians Martyrs, Gaudium pectoris lachrymis exprimentes; yet commonly teares are the iuyce of a minde pressed with griefe; And as well doe teares, and crying, and sorrow, accompany death, either in the supposition, or the deniall; For as worldly sorrow (euen in this sense) causeth death, by drying the bones, and consuming the body: so death euer lightly, is a iust cause of sorrow; sorrow to nature in our selues, sorrow to ours. And as death is the terriblest thing, so it is the saddest thing, that befals a man. Nature could say in the Poet, Quis matrem in funere nati Flere vetat? yea God himselfe allowed his holy Priests, to pollute themselues in mourning, for their neerest dead friends, except the High Priest; which was forbidden it in figure. And the Apostle while he forbids the Thessalonians to mourne, as without hope, doth in a sort command their teares, but barre their immoderation. It was not without a speciall reference to a iudgment, that God sayes to Ezechiel, Sonne of man, behold I will take from thee the pleasure of thy life with a plague, yet shalt thou neither mourne nor weepe, neither shall thy teares runne downe. So fit did the Iewes hold teares for Funerals, that they hired mourners, which with incomposed gestures ranne vp and downe the streets, Eccl. 12. who did also cut and lance themselues, that they might mourne in earnest, earneſt, Ier. 16. That good natur'd Patriarch Iſaac, mourned three yeeres for his mother, as the Chineſes doe at this day for their friends. Iacob mourned two and twenty yeares for Ioſeph: and there want not ſome, which haue thought Adam and Eue mourned an 100 yeares for Abel: but, who knowes not the wailings of Abel-mitzraim for Ioſeph; of the valley of Megiddon for Ioſiah? And if euer any corps deſerued to ſwim in teares, if euer any loſſe could command lamentation; then this of ours, yea of this whole ILAND, yea of the whole Church of God, yea of the whole world, iuſtly cals for it, and truly hath it.

O HENRY our ſweet Prince, our ſweet Prince HENRY, the ſecond glory of our Nation, ornament of mankinde, hope of poſterity, and life of our life, how doe all hearts bleed, and eies worthily guſh out, for thy loſſe! A loſſe, that we had neither grace to feare, nor haue capacity to conceiue. Shall I praiſe him to you, who are therefore now miſerable, becauſe you did know him ſo well? I forbeare it, though to my paine; if I did not ſpare you, I could not ſo ſwiftly paſſe ouer the name, and the vertues of that glorious Saint, our deare Maſter, or the aggrauation of that loſſe, whereof you are too ſenſible: my true commiſeration ſhall command me ſilence: yet I could not but touch our ſore (with this light hand) tho yet raw and bleeding: Death (eſpecially ſuch a death) muſt haue ſorrow and teares; All Nations, all ſucceſſion of times ſhall beare a part with vs in this lamentation: And if wee could but as heartily haue prayed for him before, as we haue heartily wept for him ſince; perhaps we had not had this cauſe of mourning. From ſorrow, let vs deſcend to paines (which is no ſmall cauſe of crying and teares) as I feare ſome of vs muſt: the word howſoeuer it is here tranſlated, is (πόνος) labour; I muſt confeſſe, labour and paine are neere one another; whence we ſay, that he which labours, takes paines; and contrarily, that a woman is in labour, or trauell, when ſhee is in the paine of child-birth; teares cannot be wip't away whiles toile remaines; That the Iſraelites may leaue crying, they muſt bee deliuered from the brick-kilnes of Ægypt. Indeed, God had in our creation allotted vs labour, without paine; but when once ſinne came into the ſoule, paine ſeized vpon the bones, and the minde was poſſeſſed with a wearineſſe, and irkſome loathing of what it muſt do: and euer ſince, ſorrow and labour haue beene inſeparable attendants vpon the life of man: Inſomuch as God, when he would deſcribe to vs the happy eſtate of the dead, does it in thoſe termes, They ſhall reſt from their labours: Looke into the field, there you ſhall ſee toiling at the plough and ſithe. Looke into the waters, there you ſee tugging at the oares and cabels. Looke into the City, there you ſee plodding in the ſtreets, ſweating in the ſhops. Looke into the ſtudies, there you ſee fixing of eyes, toſſing of bookes, ſcratching the head, paleneſſe, infirmitie. Looke into the Court, there you ſee tedious attendance, emulatory officiouſneſſe. All things are full of labour, and labour is full of ſorrow. If we doe nothing, idleneſſe is weariſome; if any thing, worke is weariſome; in one or both of theſe, the beſt of life is conſumed. Who now can bee in loue with a life that hath nothing in it but crying, and teares, in the entrance; death, in the concluſion; labour and paine in the continuance; and ſorrow in all theſe? What Gally-ſlaue but we would be in loue with our chaine? what priſoner would delight in his dungeon? How hath our infidelity beſotted vs, if we doe not long after that happy eſtate of our immortality, wherein all our teares ſhall be wip't away; and we at once free from labour, ſorrow, and death? Now, as it is vaine to hope for this till then; ſo then not to hope for it, is paganiſh and brutiſh. He that hath tasked vs with theſe penances, hath vndertaken to releaſe vs. God ſhall wipe away all teares.

While we ſtay here, he keepes all our teares in a bottle, ſo precious is the water that is diſtilled from penitent eies; and becauſe he will be ſure not to faile, he notes how many drops there be, in his regiſter. It was a precious ointment, wherewith the woman in the Phariſes houſe (it is thought Mary Magdalen) anointed the feet of Chriſt: but her teares wherewith ſhe waſht them, were more worth than her ſpiknard. But that which is here precious, is there vnſeaſonable; then he ſhall wipe away thoſe which here hee would ſaue. As death, ſo paſſions are the companions of infirmity; Whereupon ſome that haue beene too nice, haue called those which were incident into Christ, Propassions; not considering that he which was capable of death, might be as well of passions. These troublesome affections of griefe, feare, and such like, doe not fall into glorified soules. It is true, that they haue loue, desire, ioy in their greatest perfection: yea they could not haue perfection without them; but like as God loues, and hates, and reioyces truly, but in a manner of his owne, abstracted from all infirmity, and passion: so doe his glorified Saints in imitation of him. There therefore, as we cannot die, so wee cannot grieue, we cannot be afflicted. Here one sayes, My belly, my belly, with the Prophet; another, Mine head, mine head, with the Shunamites sonne; another, My sonne, my sonne, as Dauid; another, My father, my father, with Elisha. One cryes out of his sinnes, with Dauid; another of his hunger, with Esau; another of an ill wife, with Iob; another 2 Kings 4. of treacherous friends, with the Psalmist; One of a sore in body, with Ezechias; another of a troubled soule, with our Sauiour in the garden; euery one hath some complaint, or other, to make his cheeks wet, and his heart heauy. Stay but a while, and there shall be none of these: There shall be no crying, no complaining in the streets of the new Ierusalem: No axe, no hammer shall be heard within this heauenly Temple. Why are we not content to weepe here a while, on condition that we may weepe no more? Why are we not ambitious of this blessed ease? Certainly, we doe not smart enough with our euills, that we are not desirous of rest; These teares are not yet dry, yet they are ready to be ouertaken by others, for our particular afflictions. Miseries, as the Psalmist compares them, are like waues, which breake one vpon another, and tosse vs with a perpetuall vexation; and we vaine men, shall we not wish to be in our hauen? Are we sicke, and grieue to thinke of remedy? Are wee still dying, and are wee loth to thinke of life? Oh this miserable vnbeleefe, that tho we see a glorious heauen aboue vs, yet wee are vnwilling to goe to it: we see a wearisome world about vs, and yet are loth to thinke of leauing it: This gracious master of ours, whose dissolution is ours, while he was here amongst vs, his princely crowne could not keepe his head from paine, his golden rod could not driue away his feuers; now is he freed from all his aches, agues, stitches, conuulsions, cold sweats: now he triumphs in glory, amongst the Angels and Saints; now he walkes in white robes, and attends on the glorious bridegroome of the Church; and doe we thinke he would be content now, for all the Kingdomes of the world, to be as he was? We that professe it was our ioy and honour to follow him, whithersoeuer hee had gone; In his disports, in his warres, in his trauels; why are we not now ambitious of following him to his better crowne; yea of reigning together with him, (for heauen admits of this equality) in that glory, wherein he reignes with his Sauiour & ours? Why doe we not now heartily, with him that was rauished into the third heauen, say, Cupio dissolui & esse cum Christo, not barely to bee dissolued; a malecontent may doe so; but therefore to be dissolued, that we may be with Christ, possessed of his euerlasting glory, where we shall not onely not weepe, but reioyce and sing Hallelujahs for euer; not onely not die, but enioy a blessed and heauenly life. Euen so Lord Iesus come quickly. Now if any man shall aske the Disciples question: Master, when shall these things be; the celestiall voice tells him, it must bee vpon a change; For the first things are passed; It shall be in part, so soone as euer our first things, our life, the condition of our mortalitie are passed ouer; It shall be fully, when the first things of the world are passed; Passed not by abolition, but by immutation, as that Father said well; Not the frame of the world, but the corruption of that frame must passe. The Spirit of God is not curious, he calls those things first which were onely former; not in respect of the state which is, but that which shall be; For those things which were first of all, were like their Maker; good, not capable of destruction: Our sinnes tainted the whole creation, and brought shame vpon all the frame of heauen, and earth: That which we did, shall be disanulled, that which God did, shall stand for euer; and this dissolution shall be our glory: other dissolutions strike teares into our eyes; as this day is witnesse: it is our sorrow that the first things are passed, our offices, our pensions, our hopes, our fauours, and (which we esteemed most) our seruices are gone: Let this last dissolution comfort vs against the present.

preſent. Who can grieue to ſee a Familie diſſolued, that conſiders the world muſt bee diſſolued ? This little world of ours, firſt, whereof this day giues vs an image : for as our ſeruice, ſo our life muſt away ; and then that great one, whoſe diſſolution is repreſented in theſe. The difference is, that whereas this diſſolution brings teares to ſome eies, that wipes them away from all : For all our teares, and ſorrow, and toile, and crying, and death, are for our ſinnes ; take away corruption, and miſery goes away with it, and till then, it will neuer be remoued : No man puts new wine into old veſſels ; much leſſe will God put the new wine of glory, into the old veſſels of corruption : They are our ſinnes, which as in particular they haue rob'd vs of our Prince, changed our ſeaſons, ſwept away thouſands with varieties of deaths, ſo in generall, they haue deformed the face of heauen and earth, and made all the Creation ſigh and groane, and ſtill make vs incapable of the perfection of our bleſſedneſſe ; for while the firſt things continue, there muſt needs be teares, and ſorrow, and death. Let vs therefore looke vpon heauen and earth as goodly creatures ; but, as blemiſhed, as tranſitory, as thoſe which we ſhall once ſee more glorious. Let vs looke vpon our ſelues with indignation, which haue thus diſtained them ; and as thoſe which after ſome terme of their cottage expired, are aſſured they ſhall haue a marble palace built for them, doe long after the time prefixed them, and thinke the dayes and moneths pace ſlowly away, till then ; ſo let vs earneſtly deſire the day of the diſſolution of this great houſe of the world, that wee may haue our conſummation in the new heauen. For ſo ſoone as euer the old is paſt, Behold (ſaith God) I will make all things new. Yea, the paſſage of the one, is the renewing of the other : As the Snake is renewed, not by putting on any new coat, but by leauing his ſlough behind him : the gold is purified, by leauing his droſſe in the fire ; Therefore hee addes, not, I will, but, I doe make all new ; and becauſe this is a great worke, behold a great Agent ; He that ſate vpon the Throne ſaid, Behold I make all new.

A Throne ſignifies Maieſtie, and ſitting permanence or perpetuity : God ſayes, Heauen is my throne, in the Pſalme : but as Salomons throne of iuory and gold, was the beſt peece of his houſe ; So Gods throne is the moſt glorious heauen, the heauen of heauens ; for you ſee that tho heauen and earth paſſe away, yet Gods throne remain'd ſtill, and hee ſitting on it ; neither ſinne nor diſſolution, may reach to the Empyreall heauen, the ſeat of God.

Here is a ſtate worthy of the King of Kings ; All the thrones of earthly Monarchs, are but peeces of his foot-ſtoole. And as his throne is maieſticall and permanent, ſo is his reſidence in it ; Hee ſate in the throne. S. Stephen ſaw him ſtanding, as it were ready for his defence and protection : S. Iohn ſees him ſitting (as our Creed alſo runnes) in regard of his inalterable glory. How brittle the thrones of earthly Princes are, and how they doe rather ſtand than ſit in them, and how ſlippery they ſtand too, wee feele this day, and lament. O Lord, eſtabliſh the throne of thy ſeruant our King, and let his ſeed endure for euer. Let his throne be as the Sunne before thee for euermore ; and as the Moone a faithfull witneſſe in heauen. But howſoeuer it be with our earthly Gods, of his kingdome there is no end. Here is a maſter for Kings, whoſe glory it is, to riſe vp from their thrones, and throw downe their Crownes at his feet, and to worſhip before his foot-ſtoole.

Be wiſe therefore, O ye Kings ; be learned ye Rulers of the earth : ſerue this Lord in feare, and reioyce in him with trembling.

Yea behold here (ſince wee haue the honour to ſerue him, whom Kings ſerue) a royall Maſter for vs ; It was one of our ſinnes I feare, that we made our Maſter, our God ; I meane, that we made fleſh our arme ; and placed that confidence in him, for our earthly ſtay, which wee ſhould haue fixed in heauen : Our too much hope hath left vs comfortleſſe : Oh that we could now make God our Maſter, and truſt him ſo much the more, as we haue leſſe in earth to truſt to. There is no ſeruice to the King of heauen ; for both his throne is euerlaſting and vnchangeable, and his promotions certaine and honourable : He that ſits on the throne hath ſayd it ; To him that ouercomes will I giue to ſit with mee in my throne ; euen as I ouercame and ſit with my Father in his throne. Behold, yee ambitious ſpirits, how yee may truly riſe to more than euer the ſonnes of Zebedee deſired to aſpire to: ſeruing is the way to raigning; ſerue him that ſits vpon the Throne, and ye ſhall ſit your ſelues vpon the Throne with him.

This is the Agent; the act is fit for him, I make all things new. Euen the very Turks in their Alcoran, can ſubſcribe to that of Tertullian, Qui potuit facere, poteſt & reſcere: I feare to wrong the holy Maieſty with my rude compariſon; It is not ſo much to God, to make a world, as for vs, to ſpeake: He ſpake the word and it was done: There is no change which is not from him: He makes new Princes, new yeeres, new gouernments, and will make new heauens, new earth, new inhabitants; how eaſie then is it for him, to make new prouiſions for vs? If wee bee left deſtitute, yet where is our faith? Shall God make vs new bodies, when they are gone to duſt? ſhall he make new heauens, and new earth, and ſhall not he (whoſe the earth is, and the fulneſſe thereof) prouide ſome new meanes, and courſes of life for vs, while we are vpon earth? Is the maintenance of one poore worme more than the renewing of heauen and earth? Shall he be able to raiſe vs when we are not, and ſhall he not ſuſtaine vs while we are?

Away with theſe weake diffidences; and if wee bee Chriſtians, truſt God with his owne: Wait thou on the Lord, and keepe his wayes, and he ſhall exalt thee. He will make all things new: And ſhall all things be made new, and our hearts bee old? Shall nothing but our ſoules be out of the faſhion? Surely beloued, none but new hearts are for the new heauens: Except we be borne anew, we enter not into life. All other things ſhall in the very inſtant receiue their renouation; onely our hearts muſt bee made new before hand, or elſe they ſhall neuer be renewed to their glory. S. Peter, when he had told vs of looking for new heauens, and new earth; infers this vſe vpon it; Wherefore (beloued) ſeeing yee looke for ſuch things, be diligent, that ye may be found of him in peace, without ſpot, and blameleſſe. Behold, the new heauens require pure and ſpotleſſe inhabitants. As euer therefore we looke to haue our part in this bleſſed renouation, let vs caſt off all our euill and corrupt affections, put off the old man with his works, and now with the new yeere, put on the new: labour for a new heart, begin a new life. That which S. Iohn ſaies here, that God will ſay and doe in our entrance to glorification; Behold, I make all things new. Saint Paul ſaith he hath done it already, in our regeneration; Old things are paſſed away, all things are become new. What meanes this, but that our regeneration muſt make way for our glorification, and that our glory muſt but perfect our regeneration? and God ſuppoſes this is done, when there are meanes to doe it. Why doe we then ſtill (in ſpight of the Goſpell) retaine our old corruptions, and thinke to goe to the wedding feaſt in our old clothes? if ſome of vs do not rather (as the vulgar reads that, Iudg. 10, 6.) Addere noua veteribus, adde new ſinnes to our old; new oathes, new faſhions of pride, new complements of drunkenneſſe, new deuices of filthineſſe, new tricks of Machiauelliſme: theſe are our nouelties which fetch downe from God new iudgements vpon vs, to the tingling of the eares of all hearers, and for which Topheth was prepared of old. If God haue no bettter newes for vs, we ſhall neuer enioy the new heauen with him. For Gods ſake therefore, and for our ſoules ſake, let vs be wiſer, and renew our couenant with God; and ſeeing this is a day of gifts, let my New-yeeres-gift to you be this holy aduice from God, which may make you happy for euer: Let your New-yeeres-gift to God be your hearts, the beſt part of your ſelues, the center of your ſelues, to which all our actions are circumferences: and if they bee ſuch a preſent, as we haue reaſon to feare God will not accept, becauſe they are ſinfull; yet if they be humbled, if penitent, we know he will receiue them: A contrite and a broken heart, O God, thou wilt not deſpiſe. And if we cannot giue him our hearts, yet giue him our deſires, and he will take our vnworthy hearts from vs; I will take the ſtony hearts out of their bodies, Ezec. 11. 19. and he will gratiouſly returne an happy New-yeeres-gift to vs, I will put a new ſpirit within their bowels, and will giue them an heart of fleſh. He will create a cleane heart, and renew a right ſpirit within vs; ſo, as he will make a new heauen for vs, he will make vs new for this heauen; hee will make his Tabernacle in vs, that hee may make ours with him. Behold, the tabernacle of God is with men &c.

The ſuperſtitious Liſtrians cryed out amazed, that Gods were come downe to them in the likeneſſe of men: but we Chriſtians know, that it is no rare thing for God to come and dwell with men; Yee are the Temples of the liuing God, and I will dwell among them and walke there. The faithfull heart of man is the Tabernacle of God. But becauſe though God bee euer with vs, wee are not alwaies ſo with him, yea whiles wee are at home in the bodie, we are abſent from the Lord, as S. Paul complaines, therefore will God vouchſafe vs a neerer cohabitation that ſhall not be capable of any interpoſition, of any abſence. Behold, the Tabernacle of God is with men. But beſides this Tabernacle of fleſh, time was when God dwelt in a materiall viſible houſe with men: Hee had his Tabernacle firſt, which was a mouing Temple; and then his Temple, which was a fixed Tabernacle: both of them had one meaſure, both one name. But, as one ſaid vpon that, Eze. 42. Menſus eſt ſimilitudinem domus; that both the Tabernacle and Temple were ſimilitudes of Gods houſe, rather than the houſe it ſelfe: ſo ſay I, that they were intended for notable reſemblances both of the holy Church of God vpon earth, and of the glorious Sanctuarie of heauen. This is the true הֵיכָל of God, which word ſignifieth both a Temple, Ezra 4.1. and a Palace, Dan. 1.4. becauſe he dwels where he is worſhipped, and he is magnificent in both: It is the materiall Tabernacle which is alluded to, the immateriall which is promiſed; A Tabernacle that goes a thouſand times more beyond the glittering Temple of Salomon, than Salomons Temple went beyond the Tabernacle of Moſes: Neither let it trouble any man, that the name of a Tabernacle implies flitting and vncertaintie. For as the Temple, howſoeuer it were called (בֵּית עוֹלָמִים) a houſe of Ages; yet laſted not (either the firſt, I meane, or ſecond) vnto 500. yeeres: ſo this houſe, though God call it a Tabernacle, yet he makes it an euerlaſting habitation; for he tels vs, that both age and death are gone before it come downe to men. But why rather doth the Tabernacle of God deſcend to men, than men aſcend to it? Whether this be in reſpect of Johns viſion, to whom the new Ieruſalem ſeemed to deſcend from heauen; deſcendit (as one ſaith) innoteſcendo, and therefore it is reſembled by all the riches of this inferiour world, gold, precious ſtones, pearle; or whether heauen is therefore ſaid to deſcend to vs, becauſe it meets vs in the aire, when Chriſt Ieſus attended with innumerable Angels ſhall deſcend to fetch his elect; or whether this phraſe be vſed for a greater expreſſion of loue, and mercy, ſince it is more for a Prince to come to vs, than for vs to goe to his Court. Certainly, God meanes only in this to ſet forth that perpetuall and reciprocall conuerſation, which hee will haue with men: They ſhall dwell with God, God ſhall dwell with them. Our glory begins euer in grace: God doth dwell with all thoſe in grace, with whom hee will dwell in glory: Euery Chriſtian carries in his boſome a ſhrine of God; Know yee not that Chriſt Ieſus is in you, ſaith S. Paul. Whereſoeuer God dwels, there is his Temple: Wilt thou pray in the Temple, pray in thy ſelfe, ſaith Auſten.

Here is the Altar of a cleane heart, from which the ſweet incenſe of our praiers, as a pleaſant perfume, is ſent vp into the noſtrils of God: Here are the pure candles of our faith euer burning before God, night and day; neuer to be extinguiſhed: Here is the ſpirituall Shew-bread, the bread of life ſtanding euer ready vpon the Table of the ſoule: Here doth the Arke of the heart, in the inwardeſt of the breaſt, keepe the law of God, and that Manna that came downe from heauen: Here God dwels, and here he is worſhipped. Behold, what need wee care whither we goe, while we carry the God of heauen with vs? He is with vs, as our companion, as our guide, as our gueſt: No impotency of perſon, no croſſe of eſtate, no diſtance of place, no oppoſition of men, no gates of hell can ſeparate him from vs: Hee hath ſaid it, I will not leaue, nor forſake thee: We are all now parting one from another: and now is looſing a knot of the moſt louing, and entire fellowſhip, that euer met in the Court of any Prince: our ſweet Maſter (that was compounded of all louelineſſe) infuſed this gracious harmony into our hearts; now we are ſaluting our laſt, and euery one is with ſorrow enough, taking his owne way: how ſafe, how happy ſhall we be, if each of vs ſhall haue God to go with him! Certainly (my deare fellowes) we ſhall neuer complaine of the want of Maſters, of of friends, while we finde our ſelues ſure of him ; nothing can make vs miſerable while we are furniſhed with him. Shall wee thinke hee cannot fare ill that hath money in his purſe ; and ſhall we thinke he can miſcarry that hath God in his heart ? How ſhall not all comfort, all happineſſe accompany that God, whoſe preſence is the cauſe of all bleſſednesſe ? He ſhall counſell vs in our doubts, direct vs in our reſolutions, diſpoſe of vs in our eſtates, cheere vs in our diſtreſſes, proſper vs in our liues, and in our deaths crowne vs. And if ſuch felicitie follow vpon Gods dwelling with vs in theſe ſmokie cottages of our mortality, where we (through our vnquiet corruptions) will not ſuffer our ſelues to haue a full fruition of God ; what happineſſe ſhall there be in our dwelling with God, in thoſe eternall Tabernacles of reſt and glory ? Beloued, there is no loſſe, no miſerie, which the meditation of heauen cannot digeſt : we haue liued in the eye of a Prince, whoſe countenance was able to put life into any beholder : How oft hath that face ſhined vpon vs, and we haue found our heart warme with thoſe comfortable beames ? Behold, we ſhall liue with that God, in whoſe preſence is the fulneſſe of ioy : we haue liued in the ſociety of worthy men ; yet, but men; ſubiect to all paſſions, infirmities, ſelf-reſpects : which of vs all can haue eſcaped without ſome vnkindneſſes, detractions, emulations ? Earthly Courts can be no more without theſe, than theſe can be without corruption : there, we ſhall liue in the company of innumerable Angels, and the ſpirits of iuſt and perfect men ; neither can there be any iar in theſe Halleluiahs, which we ſhall all ſing to God. We haue liued to ſee the magnificence of earthly Princes, and to partake of it ; in their buildings, furnitures, feaſts, triumphs ; in their wealth, pompe, pleaſures : But open your eyes and ſee the new Ieruſalem, the Citie of the great King of Saints, and all theſe ſublunary vanities ſhall be contemned. Here you ſhall ſee a foure ſquare Citie ; the wals of Iaſper, the foundations garniſhed with all precious ſtones, Twelue gates of twelue pearles, The houſes and ſtreets of pure gold, like ſhining glaſſe : A Cryſtall riuer runs in the midſt of it ; and on the banks of it growes the tree of life ; euer greene, euer fruitfull ; this is for the eye. The eare ſhall be filled with the melody of Angels, euer ſinging Holy, holy, holy, Lord God Almighty. The taſte ſhall be ſatisfied with Manna, the food of Angels, with the fruit of the tree of life, with that new wine which our Sauiour hath promiſed to drinke with vs in his Kingdome ; Theſe are the dimme ſhadowes of our future bleſſednesſe. At thy right hand ô God are pleaſures for euermore ; and ſuch pleaſures, as if they could be expreſſed or conceiued, were not worthy of our longings, nor able to ſatisfie vs : Oh that we could ſo much the more long to enioy them, by how much leſſe we are able to comprehend them ! When S. Paul made his Farewell-Sermon to the Epheſians, he fetcht teares from the eyes of his auditors (ſo full of holy paſſion was his ſpeech) eſpecially with that one clauſe, And now behold I know, that henceforth you all, through whom I haue gone preaching the kingdome of God, ſhall ſee my face no more : A ſad clauſe indeed, You ſhall ſee my face no more. The minde of man cannot endure to take a finall leaue of any thing that offends it not ; but the face of a friend, of a companion, hath ſo much pleaſure in it, that we cannot without much ſorrow thinke of ſeeing it our laſt : But what if we ſhall meet here no more ? what if we ſhall no more ſee one anothers face ? Brethren, we ſhall once meet together aboue ; we ſhall once ſee the glorious face of God, and neuer looke off againe.

Reuel. 19. 3.

Act. 20. 25.

Let it not ouer-grieue vs to leaue theſe Tabernacles of ſtone, ſince we muſt ſhortly lay downe theſe tabernacles of clay, and enter into tabernacles not made with hands ; eternall in the heauens. Till then, farewell my deare brethren, farewell in the Lord : Goe in peace, and liue as thoſe that haue loſt ſuch a maſter, and as thoſe that ſerue a Maſter, whom they cannot loſe : And the God of peace goe with you, and proſper you in all your wayes ; and ſo fix this Tabernacle in you vpon earth, that you may be receiued into thoſe Tabernacles of the new Ieruſalem, and dwell with him for euer, in that glory which he hath prouided for all that loue him.

SERMON PREACHED

at Pauls Crosse vpon the anniuersarie Solemnitie of the happy Inauguration of our drad Soueraigne Lord, King Iames, March 24. 1613.

By Ios. Hall.

Imprinted at London, 1627.

TO THE RIGHT HONOVRABLE SIR IOHN SWINERTON

Knight, Lord Maior of the Citie of LONDON, all Grace and Happineſſe.

Right Honourable:

MY owne forwardneſſe (whereof it repenteth me not) hath ſent forth other of my labours vnbidden, but this your effectuall importunitie hath drawne forth into the common light. It is an holy deſire that the eye may ſecond the eare in any thing that may helpe the ſoule: and we, that are fiſhers of men, ſhould be wanting to our ſelues, if we had not baits for both thoſe ſenſes. I plead not the diſaduantage of a dead letter, in reſpect of that life which elocution puts into any diſcourſe. Such as it is, I make it both publike and yours. I haue cauſed my thoughts, ſo neere as I could, to goe backe to the very tearmes wherein I expreſſed them, as thinking it better to fetch thoſe words I haue let fall, than to follow thoſe I muſt take vp. That therefore which it pleaſed your Lo. to heare with ſuch patient attention, and with so good affection to desire, I not vnwillingly suffer abroad, that these papers may speake that permanently to the eyes of all our Countrymen, which in the passage found such fauour in the eares of your Citizens, and such roome in so many hearts. Besides your first and vehement motion for the Presse, your knowne loue to learning deserues a better acknowledgement, and no doubt findes it from more worthy hands. And if my gratulation would adde any thing, those should entie you which will not imitate you. For the rest, God giue your Lo. a wise, vnderstanding, and couragious heart, that you may prudently and strongly menage these wilde times, vpon which you are fallen: and by your holy example and powerfull endeuours, helpe to shorten these raines of licentiousnesse: That so this Citie, which is better taught than any vnder heauen, may teach all other places how to liue; and may honour that profession which hath made it renowmed, and all Gods Church ioyfull: The welfare and happinesse whereof, and your Lo. in it, is vnfainedly wished, by

Your Lordships humbly deuoted,

IOS. HALL.

AN HOLY PANEGYRICKE.

1 SAM. 12. 24, 25.

Therefore feare you the Lord, and ſerue him in truth with all your hearts, and conſider how great things he hath done for you. But if you doe wickedly, yee ſhall periſh, both yee and your King.

I Hold it no ſmall fauour of God (Right Honourable and beloued) that hee hath called mee to the ſeruice of this day, both in the name of ſuch a people, to praiſe him for his Anointed, and in his name to praiſe his anointed to his people. The ſame hand that giues the opportunitie, vouchſafe to giue ſucceſſe to this buſineſſe. That which the Iewes ſinned in but deſiring, it is our happineſſe to enioy. I need not call any other witneſſe than this day, wherein we celebrate the bleſſing of a King, and (which is more) of a King higher than other Princes by the head and ſhoulders. And if other yeeres had forgotten this tribute of their loyalty and thankfulneſſe, yet the example of thoſe ancient Romane Chriſtians (as Euſebius and Sozomen report) would haue taught vs, that the tenth compleat yeere of our Conſtantine deſerues to be ſolemne and Iubilar. And if our ill nature could be content to ſmother this mercy in ſilence, the very Lepers of Samaria ſhould riſe vp againſt vs and ſay, We doe not well; this is a day of good tidings, and we hold our peace. My diſcourſe yet ſhall not be altogether laudatorie; but as Samuels, led in with exhortation, and carried out with threatning. For this Text is a compoſition of duties, fauours, dangers: of duties which wee owe, of fauours receiued, of dangers threatned. The duties that God lookes for of vs, come before the mention of the fauours we haue receiued from him (though after their receit) to teach vs, that as his mercie, ſo our obedience ſhould be abſolute: and the danger followes both, to make vs more carefull to hold the fauours, and performe the duties. And mee thinkes there cannot be a more excellent mixture. If we ſhould heare only of the fauours of God, nothing of our duties, we ſhould fall into conceitedneſſe: if onely of our duties, without recognition of his fauours, we ſhould proue vncheerefull; and if both of theſe without mention of any danger, we ſhould preſume on our fauours, and be ſlacke in our duties. Prepare therefore your Chriſtian eares and hearts for this threefold cord of God, that (through his bleſſing) theſe duties may draw you to obedience, the dangers to a greater awe, and the fauours to a further thankfulneſſe.

Iuxta Homer. εἰς κοίρανος ἔστω &c.

The goodneſſe of theſe outward things is not ſuch as that it can priuilege euery deſire of them from ſinne. Monarchie is the beſt of gouernments, and likeſt to his rule that ſits in the aſſembly of Gods. One God, one King, was the acclamation of thoſe ancient Chriſtians: and yet it was miſ-deſired of the Iſraelites: We may not euer deſire that which is better in it ſelfe, but that which is better for vs; Neither muſt we follow our conceit in this iudgment, but the appointment of God; Now, though God had appointed in time, both a Scepter and a Law-giuer to IVDA, yet they ſinned in mending the paſe of God, and ſpurring on his decree. And if they had ſtaid his leaſure, ſo that they had deſired that which was beſt in it ſelfe, beſt for them, appointed by God, and now appointed; yet the manner and ground offended: For out of an humour of innouation, out of diſcontent, out of diſtruſt, out of an itch of conformitie to other Nations, to aske a King, it was not onely a ſinne, as they confeſſe, verſe. 29. but (ragnah rabbah) a great wickedneſſe, as Samuel tels them, verſe. 17. and (as oftentimes we may read Gods diſpleaſure in the face of heauen) he ſhowes it in the weather. God thunders and raines in the middeſt of wheat-harueſt. The thunder was fearfull; the raine in that hot climate and ſeaſon, ſtrangely vnſeaſonable: both to be in the inſtant of Samuels ſpeech, was iuſtly miraculous. The heathen Poets bring in their fained God thundring in applauſe; I neuer finde the true God did ſo. This voice of God brake theſe Cedars of Lebanon, and made theſe Hindes to calue; and now they cry Peccauimus, verſe. 19. If euer we will ſtoope, the iudgements of God will bring vs on our knees. Samuel takes vantage of their humiliation, and according to the golden ſentence of that Samian-wiſe-man, that bids vs lay weight vpon the loden, (how euer Hierom take it in another ſenſe) he lades them with theſe three duties; Feare, ſeruice, conſideration.

Pſal. 29.

Iuxta illud τὸ μεγέθος ἐπίθεσα Pythagoræ. Onerato ſuperponendum onus, id eſt, ad virtutẽ incedentibus augmentanda præcepta; Tradentes ſe otio relinquendos. Hier. ad Ageruch. Ruffin.

Feare and ſeruice goe ſtill together. Serue the Lord in feare, ſaith Dauid. Feare the Lord and ſerue him, ſaith Ioſhua; And, feare euer before ſeruice, for that vnleſſe our ſeruice proceed from feare, it is hollow and worthleſſe. One ſaies weil, that theſe inward diſpoſitions are as the kernell; outward acts are as the ſhell; he is but a deafe nut therefore, that hath outward ſeruice, without inward feare; Feare God (ſaith Salomon) firſt, & then, keepe his commandements. Behold, the ſame tongue that bade them not feare, verſ. 20. now bids them feare; and the ſame ſpirit that tells vs they feared exceedingly (ver. 18.) now inioynes them to feare more. What ſhall we make of this? Their other feare was at the beſt Initiall; for now they began to repent; and as one ſaies of this kinde of feare, that it hath two eyes fixed on two diuers obiects, ſo had this of theirs: One eye looked vpon the raine and thunder; the other looked vp to the God that ſent it. The one of theſe it borrowed of the ſlauiſh or hoſtile feare (as Baſil calls it,) the other of the filiall; for the ſlauiſh feare caſts both eyes vpon the puniſhment; the filiall lookes with both eyes on the partie offended. Now then Samuel would rectifie and perfect this affection, and would bring them from the feare of ſlaues through the feare of penitents, to the feare of ſonnes: and indeed one of theſe make way for another. It is true that perfect loue thruſts out feare: but it is as true, that feare brings in that perfect loue, which is ioyned with the reuerence of ſonnes. Like as the needle or briſtle (ſo one compares it) drawes in the thred after it, or as the potion brings health. The compunction of feare (ſaith Gregorie) fits the minde for the compunction of loue. We ſhall neuer reioyce truly in God, except it be with trembling: Except we haue quaked at his thunder, we ſhall neuer ioy in his ſunne-ſhine. How ſeaſonably therefore doth Samuel, when he ſaw them ſmitten with that guilty and ſeruile feare, call them to the reuerentiall feare of God; Therefore feare yee the Lord? It is good ſtriking, when God hath ſtriken; there is no fiſhing ſo good as in troubled waters. The conſcience of man is a nice and ſullen thing: and if it be not taken at fit times, there is no medling with it. Tell one of our gallants, in the midſt of all his iollitie and reuels, of deuotion, of pietie, of iudgements; he hath the Athenian queſtion ready, What will this babler ſay? Let that man alone till God haue toucht his ſoule with ſome terror, till he haue caſt his body on the bed of ſickneſſe, when his feather is turned to a kerchiefe, when his face is pale, his eyes ſunke, his hand hand shaking, his breath short, his flesh consumed, now he may be talkt with, now he hath learned of Eli to say, Speake Lord, for thy seruant heareth. The conuex or out bowed side of a vessell will hold nothing; it must be the hollow and depressed part that is capable of any liquor. Oh if we were so humbled with the varieties of Gods iudgements as we might, how sauory should his counsels be, how precious and welcome would his feare be to our trembling hearts? whereas now our stubborne senselesnesse frustrates (in respect of our successe, though not of his decree) all the threatnings and executions of God.

There are two maine affections, Loue and Feare; which as they take vp the soule where they are, and as they neuer goe asunder, (for euery loue hath in it a feare of offending and forgoing; and euery feare implies a loue of that, which we suspect may miscary) so each of them fulfills the whole Law of God. That loue is the abridgement of the Decalogue, both our Sauiour and his blessed Apostle haue taught vs: It is as plaine of Feare The title of Iob is, A iust man, and one that feared God; iustice is expressed by Feare. For what is iustice, but freedome from sin? And the feare of the Lord hates euil, saith Salomon. Hence Moses his יראה Thou shalt feare, is turned by our Sauiour (προσκυνήσεις) Thou shalt worship, or adore. And that which Esay saith, In vaine they feare mee, our Sauiour renders, In vaine they worship me; as if all worship consisted in Feare. Hence it is probable that God hath his name in two languages from (Οὖτ) Feare, and the same word in the Greeke signifies both Feare and Religion. And Salomon when he saies, The feare of the Lord is ראשית the beginning (as we turne it) of wisdome, saies more then we are aware of; for the word signifies as well Caput or Principatum, the head or top of wisdome; yea (saith Siracides) it is the crowne vpon the head; it is the root of the same wisdome, whereof it is the top-branch, saith the same Author. And surely this is the most proper disposition of men towards God; for though God stoope downe so low as to vouchsafe to be loued of men, yet that infinite inequalitie, which there is between him and vs, may seem not to allow so perfect a fitnesse of that affection, as of this other; which suits so well betwixt our vilenesse, and his glory, that the more disproportion there is betwixt vs, the more due and proper is our feare. Neither is it lesse necessary than proper, for we can be no Christians without it; whether it be (as Hemingius distinguishes it well) timor cultus, or culpæ, either our feare in worshiping, or our feare of offending; the one is a deuout feare, the other a carefull feare. The latter was the Corinthians feare, whose godly sorrow when the Apostle had mentioned, he addes, Yea what indignation, yea what feare, yea what desire? The former is that of the Angels, who hide their faces with their wings; yea of the Son of God, as man, who fell on his face to his Father. And this is due to God, as a Father, as a master, as a benefactor, as a God infinite in all that he is. Let me be bold to speake to you, with the Psalmist, Come yee children, harken to mee, and I will teach you the feare of the Lord. What is it therefore to feare God; but to acknowledge the glorious (tho inuisible) presence of God in all our wayes, with Moses his eyes ὁρῶν ἀόρατον: to be awfully affected at his preseance with Iacob (quàm tremendus?) to make an humble resignation of our selues to the holy will of God with Eli, It is the Lord; and to attend reuerently vpon his disposing with DAVID, Heere I am, let him doe to me as seemeth good in his eyes. This is the feare of the Lord. There is nothing more talkt of, nothing lesse felt. I appeale from the tongues of men to their hands; the wise Heathen taught mee to doe so, Verba rebus proba. The voice of wickednesse is actuall, saith the Psalmist, wickednesse saith there is no feare of God before his eyes. Behold whersoeuer is wickednesse, there can be no feare of God; these two cannot lodge vnder one roofe, for the feare of God driues out euill (saith Ecclesiasticus.) As therefore Abraham argues well from the cause to the effect; Because the feare of God is not in this place, therefore they will kill me: So Dauid argues backe from the effect to the cause, They imagine wickednesse on their bed, &c. therefore the feare of God is not before them. I would to God his argument were not too demonstratiue. Brethren, our liues shame vs. If we feared the Lord, durst we dally with his name, durst we teare it in peeces? Surely we contemn his person, whose name we contemn. The Iewes haue a conceit, that the the ſinne of that Iſraelite which was ſtoned for blaſphémy, was onely this, that hee named that ineffable name of foure letters Iehouah. Shall their feare keepe them from once mentioning the dreadfull name of God, and ſhall not our feare keepe vs from abuſing it? Durſt we ſo boldly ſinne God in the face, if we feared him? Durſt we mocke God with a formall flouriſh of that, which our heart tells vs we are not, if we feared him? Durſt we be Chriſtians at Church, Mammoniſts at home, if we feared him? Pardon me if in a day of gratulation, I hardly temper my tongue from reproofe: for as the Iewes had euer ſome malefactor brought forth to them in their great feaſt: ſo it ſhall be the happieſt peece of our triumph and ſolemnitie, if we can bring forth that wicked profaneneſſe, wherewith we haue diſhonoured God, and blemiſht his Goſpell, to be ſcourged, and diſmiſſed with all holy indignity. From this feare, let vs paſſe as briefly, through that which wee muſt dwell in all our liues; the ſeruice of God. This is the ſubiect of all Sermons, mine ſhall but touch at it. You ſhall ſee how I haſten to that diſcourſe which this day and your expectation calls me to.

Diuine Philoſophy teaches vs to referre, not onely our ſpeculations, but our affections to action. As therefore our ſeruice muſt be grounded vpon feare, ſo our feare muſt be reduced to ſeruice. What ſtrength can theſe maſculine diſpoſitions of the ſoule yeeld vs, if with the Iſraelites brood they be ſmothered in the birth? Indeed the worſt kinde of feare, is that we call ſeruile: but the beſt feare, is the feare of ſeruants: For there is no ſeruant of God, but feares filially. And againe, God hath no ſonne but hee ſerues. Euen the naturall ſonne of God, was ſo in the forme of a ſeruant, that he ſerued indeed; and ſo did he ſerue, that he endured all ſorrow, and fulfilled all righteouſneſſe. So euery Chriſtian is a ſon and heyre to the King of heauen, and his word muſt be, I ſerue. We all know what ſeruice meanes. For we all are, or were (I imagine) either ſeruants of maſters, or ſeruants of the publike, or maſters of ſeruants, or all theſe. We cannot therefore be ignorant eyther what we require of ours, or what our ſuperiours require of vs. If ſeruice conſiſted onely in wearing of liueries, in taking of wages, in making of curteſies, and kiſſing of hands, there were nothing more eaſie, or more common. All of vs weare the cognizance of our Chriſtianitie in our Baptiſme, all liue vpon Gods trencher in our maintenance, all giue him the complements of a faſhionable profeſſion. But, be not deceiued, the life of ſeruice is worke; the worke of a Chriſtian is obedience to the Law of God. The Centurion, when he would deſcribe his good ſeruant in the Goſpell, needed ſay no more but this; I bid him doe this, and he doth it. Seruice then briefly is nothing but a readineſſe to doe as we are bidden; and therefore both Salomon, and he that was greater than Salomon, deſcribes it by keeping the commandements: and the choſen veſſell giues an euerlaſting rule: His ſeruants ye are to whom yee obey. Now I might diſtinguiſh this ſeruice into habituall and actuall. Habituall; for as the ſeruant, while he eats or ſleepes, is in ſeruice ſtill; ſo are we to God. Actuall, whether vniuerſall in the whole carriage of our liues (which Zacharie tells vs is in holineſſe, and righteouſneſſe; holineſſe to God, righteouſneſſe to men) or particular, eyther in the duties which are proper to God, Inuocation and Attendance on his ordinance (which by an excellence is tearmed his ſeruice) or in thoſe which are proper to vs, as we are peeces of a Familie, Church, Common-wealth; the ſtations whereof God hath ſo diſpoſed, that we may ſerue him in ſeruing one another. And thus you ſee I might make way for an endleſſe diſcourſe; but it ſhall content me (paſſing ouer this world of matter) to glance onely at the generality of this infinite theme.

Rom. 6. 1.

Luke 1. 75.

As euery obedience ſerues God, ſo euery ſinne makes God ſerue vs: One ſaid wittily, that the angry man made himſelfe the Iudge, and God the executioner. There is no ſinne that doth not the like. The glutton makes God his cator, and himſelfe the gueſt, and his belly his God, eſpecially in the new-found feaſts of this Age, wherein profuſeneſſe and profaneneſſe ſtriue for the tables end. The laſciuious man makes himſelfe the louer, and (as Viues ſaies of Mahumet) God the Pander. The couetous man makes himſelfe the Vſurer, and God the broker. The ambitious makes God his ſtale, and Honor his God. Of euery ſinner doth God ſay iuſtly, Seruire me fecisti; Thou haſt haſt made me to ſerue with thy ſinnes. There cannot be a greater honor for vs than to ſerue ſuch a maſter, as commands heauen, earth, and hell: whom it is both diſhonor and baſeneſſe not to ſerue. The higheſt ſtile that King Dauid could deuiſe to giue himſelfe (not in the phraſe of a triuolous French complement, but in the plaine ſpeech of a true Iſraelite) was, Behold I am thy ſeruant; and he that is Lord of many ſeruants of the Deuill, delights to call himſelfe the ſeruant of the ſeruants of God. The Angels of Heauen reioyce to be our fellowes in this ſeruice. But there cannot be a greater ſhame than to ſee ſeruants ride on horſebacke, and Princes walking as ſeruants on the ground; I meane, to ſee the God of heauen made a lacquey to our vile affections, and in the liues of men, to ſee God attend vpon the world. Brethren, there is ſeruice enough in the world, but it is to a wrong maſter. In mea patria Deus venter (as Hierome ſaid;) Euery worldling is a Papiſt in this, that hee giues λατρειαν, ſeruice, to the creature, which is the loweſt reſpect that can be: Yea ſo much more humble than (latria) as it is more abſolute, and without reſpect of recompence. Yea, I would it were vncharitable to ſay, that many beſides the ſauages of Calecut, place Satan in the throne, and God on the footſtoole. For as Witches and Sorcerers conuerſe with euill ſpirits in plauſible and familiar formes, which in vgly ſhapes they would abhorre: ſo many a man ſerues Satan vnder the formes of gold and ſiluer, vnder the images of Saints and lightſome Angels, vnder glittering coats, or glorious titles, or beauteous faces, whom they would deſie as himſelfe. And as the free-borne Iſraelite might become a ſeruant, either by forfaiture vpon treſpaſſe, or by ſale, or by ſpoile in warre; ſo this accurſed ſeruitude is incurred the ſame waies, by them which ſhould be Chriſtians. By forfaiture: for though the debt and treſpaſſe be to God, yet (tradet lictori) he ſhall deliuer the debtor to the Iaylor. By ſale, as Ahab ſold himſelfe to worke wickedneſſe: ſold vnder ſinne, ſaith the Apoſtle. By ſpoyle: Beware leſt any man make a ſpoyle of you συλαγωγων ſaith Paul to his Coloſſians. Alas, what a miſerable change do theſe men make, to leaue the liuing God, which is ſo bountifull, that he rewards a cup of cold water with eternall glory, to ſerue him that hath nothing to giue but his bare wages; and what wages? The wages of ſinne is death; And what death? not the death of the body, in the ſeuering of the ſoule; but the death of the ſoule, in the ſeparation from God: there is not ſo much difference betwixt life and death, as there is betwixt the firſt death and the ſecond. Oh wofull wages of a deſperate worke! Well were theſe men, if they might goe vnpaid, and ſerue for nothing: but as the mercy of God will not let any of our poore ſeruices to him goe vnrewarded; ſo will not his iuſtice ſuffer the contrary ſeruice goe vnpaid; in flaming fire rendering vengeance to them that know not God, and thoſe that obey not the Goſpell of our Lord Ieſus. Beloued, as that worthy Biſhop ſaid on his death-bed, we are happy in this, that we ſerue a good Maſter: how happy ſhall it be for vs, if we ſhall do him good ſeruice, that in the day of our account we may heare, Euge ſerue bene, well done good ſeruant, enter into thy maſters ioy.

Now he that preſcribes the act (ſeruice,) muſt alſo preſcribe the manner (Truly, totally.) God cannot abide we ſhould ſerue him with a double heart (an heart & an heart) that is, hypocritically. Neither that wee ſhould ſerue him with a falſe heart, that is, niggardly and vnwillingly: but againſt doubling, be will be ſeru'd in truth; and againſt haluing, he will be ſerued with all the heart. To ſerue God and not in truth, is mockerie. To ſerue him truly, and not with the whole heart, is a baſe dodging with God. This ὀφθαλμοδουλεια eye-ſeruice is a fault with men: but let vs ſerue God, but while hee ſees vs, it is enough. Behold hee ſees vs euery where. If hee did not ſee our heart, it were enough to ſerue him in the face; and if the heart were not his, it were too much to giue him a part of it: but now that he made this whole heart of ours, it is reaſon hee ſhould be ſerued with it; and now that hee ſees the inſide of the heart, it is madneſſe not to ſerue him in truth. Thoſe ſerue God, not in truth, which as Seneca ſaies of ſome auditors, come to heare, not to learne: which bring their tablets to write words, not their hearts for the finger of God to write in. Whoſe eyare on their Bible, whiles their heart is on their Count-booke; which can play the Saints in the Church, Ruffians in the Tauerne, Tyrants in their houses, Cheators in their shops; those Dames which vnder a cloke of modestie and deuotion, hide nothing but pride and fiendishnesse. Those serue God, not with all their heart; whose bosome is like Rachel tent, that hath (Teraphim) Idols hid in the straw; or rather like a Philistims Temple, that hath the Arke and Dagon vnder one roofe; That come in euer with Naamans exceptiues, Onely in this: Those that haue let downe the world like the spies into the bottome of the well of their heart, and couer the mouth of it with wheat: I meane that hide great oppressions, with the show of small beneficences: Those which like Salomons false Curtizan, cry (Diuidatur) and are willing to share themselues betwixt God and the world. And certainly, this is a noble policie of the Deuill, because he knowes, he hath no right to the heart, he can be glad of any corner; but withall he knowes, that if he haue any, he hath all; for where he hath any part, God will haue none. This base-mindednesse is fit for that euill one. God will haue all, or nothing. It was an heroicall answer, that Theodoret reports of Valentinian, whom when the souldiers had chosen to be Emperor, they were consulting to haue another ioyned with him. No (my souldiers) said he, it was in your power to giue me the Empire, while I had it not: but now when I haue it, it is not in your power to giue me a partner. We our selues say, The bed and the throne can abide no riuals. May we not well say of the heart, as Lot of Zoar, Is it not a little one? Alas it is euen too little for God; what doe we thinke of taking an Inmate into this cottage? It is a fauour and happinesse, that the God of glory will vouchsafe to dwell in it alone. Euen so (O God) take thou vp these roomes for thy selfe; and enlarge them for the entertainment of thy Spirit: Haue thou vs wholly, and let vs haue thee. Let the world serue it selfe. O let vs serue thee, with all our hearts.

Theod. l. 4. c. 6.

God hath set the heart on worke to feare, the hands on worke to serue him: now (that nothing may be wanting) he sets the head on worke to consider; and that, not so much the iudgements of God, (yet those are of singular vse, and may not be forgotten) as his mercies, What great things he hath done for you, not against you. He that looked vpon his owne workes, and saw they were good, and delighted in them, delights that we should looke vpon them too, and applaud his wisdome, power, and mercy that shines in them. Euen the least of Gods workes are worthy of the obseruation of the greatest Angell in heauen: but (the magnalia Dei) the great things he hath done are more worthy of our wonder, of our astonishment. Great things indeed that he did for Israel; he meant to make that Nation a precedent of mercy; that all the world might see what he could doe for a people. Heauen and earth conspir'd to blesse them. What should I speake of the wonders of Ægypt? Surely I know not whether their preseruation in it, or deliuerance out of it, were more miraculous. Did they want a guide? Himselfe goes before them in fire. Did they want a shelter? His cloud is spred ouer them for a couering. Did they want way? The sea it selfe shall make it; and be at once a street, and a wall to them. Did they want bread? Heauen it selfe shall powre downe food of Angels. Did they want meat to their bread? The wind shall bring them whole drifts of Quailes into their Tents. Doe they want drinke to both? The very Rocks shall yeeld it them. Doe they want suits of apparell? Their very clothes shall not wax old on their backs. Doe they want aduice? God himselfe shall giue his vocall Oracle betweene the Cherubins. Doe they want a law? God shall come downe vpon Sinai, and deliuer it in fire, thundring, smoke, earth-quakes, and write it with his owne finger, in tables of stone. Doe they want habitations? God shall prouide them a land that flowes with milke and honie. Are they persecuted? God stands in fire betweene them and their harmes. Are they stung to death? The brazen serpent shall cure them. Are they resisted? The walles of Iericho shall fall downe alone; haileſtones braine their enemies. The Sunne shall stand still in heauen, to see Ioshuahs reuenge and victorie. Oh great and mighty things that God did for Israel!

And if any Nation vnder heauen could either parallel or second Israel in the fauours of of God, this poore little ILAND of ours is it. The cloud of his protection hath couered vs. The bloud-red sea of perſecution hath giuen way to vs, and we are paſſed it dry ſhod. The true Manna from heauen is rained downe abundantly about our eares. The water of life guſheth forth plenteouſly to vs: The better law of the Goſpell is giuen vs from heauen by the hands of his Sonne: the walls of the ſpirituall Iericho are fallen downe before vs, at the blaſt of the trumpets of God; and curſed be he that goes about to build them vp againe. Now therefore, that we may come more cloſe to the taske of this day; Let me ſay to you, as SAMVEL to his Iſraelites, Conſider with me what great things the Lord hath done for vs: and as one wiſht that the enuious had eyes in euery place; ſo could I ſeriouſly wish that all which haue ill will at our Sion had their eares with me but one houre, that if they belong not to God, they might burſt with Iudas, which repine with Iudas at this ſeaſonable coſt of the precious oyntment of our praiſes.

If I ſhould looke backe to the ancient mercies of God, and ſhew you that this Kingdome (though diuided from the world) was one of the firſt that receiued the Goſpell: That it yeelded the firſt Chriſtian Emperor that gaue peace and honour to the Church: The firſt and greateſt lights that ſhone forth in the darkeſt of Poperie, to all the world, and that it was the firſt kingdome that ſhooke Antichriſt fully out of the ſaddle; I might finde iuſt matter of praiſe and exultation: but I will turne ouer no other Chronicles but your memorie: This day alone hath matter enough of an eternall gratulation. For this is the communis terminus, wherein Gods fauours meet vpon our heads; which therefore repreſents to vs, both what we had, and what we haue; The one to our ſenſe, the other to our remembrance. This day was both Queene ELIZABETHS Initium gloriæ, and King IAMES his Initium regni. To her Natalitium ſalutis, as the paſſion dayes of the Martyrs were called of old; and Natalis Imperij to him. Theſe two names ſhew vs happineſſe enough to take vp our hearts for euer. And firſt, why ſhould it not be our perpetuall glory and reioycing, that we were her ſubiects? Oh bleſſed Queene, the mother of this Nation, the Nurſe of this Church, the glory of womanhood, the enuie and example of forraine Nations, the wonder of times, how ſweet and ſacred ſhall thy memorie be to all poſterities? How is thy name not Parables of the duſt, as the Iewes ſpeake; not written in the earth, as Ieremie ſpeakes, but in the liuing earth of all loyall hearts, neuer to be razed. And though the foule mouths of our Aduerſaries ſticke not to call her miſeram fœminam, as Pope Clement did; nor to ſay of her, as Euagrius ſayes vncharitably of Iuſtinian the great Law-giuer (ad ſupplicia iuſto Dei iudicio apud inferos luenda profecta eſt;) and thoſe that durſt bring her on the ſtage liuing, bring her now dead (as I haue heard by thoſe that haue ſeene it) into their proceſſions, like a tormented ghoſt attended with fiends and firebrands, to the terror of their ignorant beholders: Yet, as we ſaw ſhee neuer proſpered ſo well, as when ſhee was moſt curſed by their Pius 5; ſo now we hope ſhee is rather ſo much more glorious in heauen, by how much they are more malicious on earth. Theſe arrogant wretches, that can at their pleaſure fetch Salomon from heauen to hell, and Traian and Falconella from hell to heauen; Campian and Garnet from earth to heauen, Queene Elizabeth from earth to hell, ſhall finde one day that they haue miſtaken the keyes; and ſhall know what it is to iudge, by being iudged. In the meane time, in ſpight of the gates of Rome, Memoria iuſtæ in benedictionibus. To omit thoſe vertues which were proper to her ſex, by which ſhee deſerued to be the Queene of women, how excellent were her Maſculine graces of learning, valour, wiſdome, by which ſhee might iuſtly challenge to be the Queene of men! So learned was ſhee, that ſhee could giue preſent anſwers to Embaſſadors in their owne tongues: or if they liſted to borrow of their neighbours, ſhee paid them in that they borrowed. So valiant, that her name like Ziſcues drum, made the proudeſt Romaniſts to quake. So wiſe, that whatſoeuer fell out happily againſt the common Aduerſarie in FRANCE, NETHERLANDS, IRELAND; it was by themſelues aſcribed to her policie. What ſhould I ſpeake of her long and ſucceſſefull gouernment, of her miraculous preſeruations, of her famous victories, wherein the waters, waters, windes, fire, and earth fought for vs, as if they had beene in pay vnder Her? of Her excellent lawes, of Her carefull executions? Many daughters haue done worthily, but thou ſurmounteſt them all. Such was the ſweetneſſe of her gouernment, and ſuch the feare of miſerie in her loſſe, that many worthy Chriſtians deſired their eyes might be cloſed before Hers; and how many thouſands therefore welcomed their owne death, becauſe it preuented Hers. Euery one pointed to her white haires, & ſaid with that peaceable Leontius, When this ſnow melts, there will be a floud. Neuer day, except alwayes the fift of Nouember, was like to be ſo bloudy as this; not for any doubt of Title (which neuer any loyall heart could queſtion, nor any diſloyall euer did, beſides Dolman) but for that our Eſauites comforted themſelues againſt vs, and ſaid, The day of mourning for our mother will come ſhortly, then will we ſlay our brethren. What ſhould I ſay more? Lots were caſt vpon our Land; and that honeſt Politician (which wanted nothing but a gibbet to haue made him a Saint) Father Parſons, tooke paines to ſet downe an order, how all Engliſh affaires ſhould be marſhalled when they ſhould come to be theirs. Conſider now the great things that the Lord hath done for vs. Behold this day, which ſhould haue beene moſt diſmall to the whole Chriſtian world, he turned to the moſt happy day, that euer ſhone forth to this ILAND. That now we may iuſtly inſult with thoſe Chriſtians of Antioch (Theod. 3. 15. τῶ σῶ τὸ μαρτύριον μάζιμε μαρὰ) Where are your prophecies, O yee fond Papiſts? Our ſnow lyes here melted, where are thoſe flouds of bloud that you threatned? Yea, as that bleſſed ſoule of Hers gained by this change of an immortall crowne, for a corruptible; ſo (bleſſed be the name of our God) this Land of ours hath not loſt by that loſſe. Many thinke that this euening the world had his beginning. Surely a new and golden world began this day to vs, and (which it could not haue done by her loynes) promiſes continuance (if our ſinnes interrupt it not) to our poſterities. I would the flatterie of a Prince were treaſon; in effect it is ſo: (for the flatterer is (Euſeb. de vita Conſt. l. 4. c. 4. ἴυγξ σφάκτης) a kind murtherer. I would it were ſo in puniſhment. If I were to ſpeake before my ſoueraigne King and Maſter, I would praiſe God for him, not praiſe him to himſelfe. A Preacher in CONSTANTINES time, ſaith Euſebius, (auſus eſt Imperatorem in os beatum dicere) preſumed to call CONSTANTINE an happy Emperor to his face; but he went away with a check; ſuch ſpeed may any Paraſite haue, which ſhall ſpeake, as if he would make Princes proud, and not thankfull. A ſmall praiſe to the face may be adulation, (though it be within bounds:) a great praiſe in abſence may be but iuſtice. If we ſee not the worth of our King, how ſhall we be thankfull to God that gaue him? Giue me leaue therefore freely to bring forth the Lords Anointed before you, and to ſay with SAMVEL, See you him whom the Lord hath choſen. (1 Sam. 10. 24.)

As it was a great preſage of happineſſe to Mauritius the Emperor, that an (Euagr. l. 5. c. 21. ἔμπεσα) a familiar Deuill remouing him from place to place in his ſwathing bands, yet had no power to hurt him; So that thoſe early conſpiracies, wherwith Satan aſſaulted the very cradle of our deare Soueraigne, preuailed not, it was a iuſt bodement of his future greatneſſe and beneficiall vſe to the world. And hee that gaue him life and crowne together, and miraculouſly preſerued them both; gaue him graces fit for his Deputie on earth to weild that Crowne, and improue that life to the behoofe of Chriſtendome. Let me begin with that (which the Heathen man required to the happineſſe of any ſtate) his learning and knowledge: wherein I may ſafely ſay he exceedeth all his 105 predeceſſors. Our Conqueror King William (as our Chronicler reports Malmesbur.) by a blunt prouerbe that he was wont to vſe againſt vnlearned Princes, made his ſonne Henry a Beauclerc to thoſe times. But a candle in the darke will make more ſhew, than a bonefire by day. In theſe dayes ſo lightſome for knowledge, to excell (euen for a profeſſed ſtudent) is hard, and rare. Neuer had England more learned Biſhops and Doctors; which of them euer returned from his Maieſties diſcourſe without admiration? What King chriſtened hath written ſo learned volumes? To omit the reſt, his laſt (of this kind) wherein he hath ſo held vp Cardinall Bellarmine and his Maſter Pope Paulus, is ſuch, that Pleſſis and Monline (the two great lights of France)

France) profeſſe to receiue their light in this diſcourſe, from his beames; and the learned Ieſuite Salkeild, could not but be conuerted with the neceſſity of thoſe demonſtrations; and I may boldly ſay, Poperie (ſince it was) neuer receiued ſo deepe a wound from any worke, as from that of His. What King eu r moderated the ſolemne acts of an Vniuerſitie in all profeſſions, and had ſo many hands clapt in the applauſe of his acute, and learned determinations? Briefly, ſuch is his intire acquaintance with all ſciences, and with the Queene of all, Diuinity, that he might well diſpute with the infallible Pope Paulus Quintus for his triple Crowne; and I would all Chriſtian quarrels lay vpon this duell. His iuſtice in gouerning matcheth his knowledge how to gouerne; for as one that knowes the Common-wealth cannot bee vnhappy, wherein (according to the wiſe Heathens rule) law is a Queene, and will a ſubiect, He hath euer endeuoured to frame the proceedings of his gouernment to the lawes, not the lawes to them. Witneſſe that memorable example, whereof your eyes were witneſſes; I meane the vnpartiall execution of one of the ancienteſt Barons of thoſe parts, for the murder of a meane ſubiect. Wherein not the fauour of the blocke might bee yeelded, that the diſhonour of the death might bee no leſſe than the paine of the death. Yet who will not grant his Mercy to bee eminent amongſt his vertues, when Parſons himſelfe yeelds it? And if a vertue ſo continuing, could bee capable of exceſſe, this might ſeeme ſo in him. For that which was ſaid of Anaſtaſius the Emperor, that hee would attempt no exploit (though neuer ſo famous) if it might coſt the price of Chriſtian bloud; and that which was ſaid of Mauritius, that by his good will hee would not haue ſo much as a traitor die; and that of Veſpaſian, that he wept euen for iuſt executions; and laſtly that of Theodoſius, that hee wiſht hee could recall thoſe to life againe that had wronged him; may in ſome ſenſe be iuſtly verified of our mercifull Soueraigne. I pray God the meaſure of this vertue may neuer hurt himſelfe; I am ſure the want of it ſhall neuer giue cauſe of complaint to his aduerſaries. But among all his Heroicall Graces, which commend him as a Man, as a Chriſtian, as a King; Pietie and firmneſſe in Religion calls mee to it, and will not ſuffer mee to deferre the mention of it any longer. A priuate man vnſetled in opinion, is like a looſe tooth in the head, troubleſome and vſe-leſſe: but a publike perſon vnſtayed, is dangerous. Reſolution for the truth is ſo much better than knowledge, by how much the poſſeſſing of a treaſure, is better than knowing where it is. With what zeale did his Maieſtie flie vpon the blaſphemous nouelties of Vorſtius? How many ſolicitations, threats, promiſes, profers hath he trampled vnder his feet in former times, for but a promiſe of an indifferent conniuence at the Romiſh religion? Was it not an anſwer worthy of a King, worthy of marble and braſſe, that hee made vnto their agent for this purpoſe, in the times of the greateſt perill of reſiſtance, That all the Crownes and Kingdomes in this world ſhould not induce him to change any tot of his profeſſion? Hath hee not ſo ingaged himſelfe in this holy quarrell, that the world confeſſes Rome had neuer ſuch an Aduerſarie? and all Chriſtian Princes reioyce to follow him as their worthy leader in all the battles of God; and all Chriſtian Churches in their Prayers and exclamations, ſtile him, in a double right, Defender of the faith, more by deſert, than inheritance.

But becauſe as the Sunne beames, ſo praiſes are more kindly, when they are caſt oblique vpon their obiects, than when they fall directly; let me ſhew you him rather in the bleſſings we receiue from him, than in the graces which are in him. And not to inſiſt vpon his extinguiſhing of thoſe helliſh feuds in Scotland, and the reducing of thoſe barbarous borderers to ciuilitie and order, (two acts worthy of eternitie, and which no hand but his could doe) Conſider how great things the Lord hath done for vs by him in our Peace, in our freedome of the Goſpell, in our Deliuerance.

Continuance detracts from the value of any fauour. Little doe we know the price of peace. If we had beene in the coat of our forefathers, or our neighbours, wee ſhould haue knowne how to eſteeme this deare bleſſing of God. Oh, my deare brethren, wee neuer knew what it was to heare the murdering peeces about our eares; to ſee our Churches and houſes flaming ouer our heads; to heare the fearefull cracks of their falls mixed with the confused out-cries of men, killing, incouraging to kill, or resist, dying, and the shriekings of women and children; we neuer saw tender babes snatcht from the brests of their mothers, now bleeding vpon the stones, or sprawling vpon the pikes; and the distracted mother rauished, ere shee may haue leaue to die. Wee neuer saw men and horses lie wallowing in their mingled bloud, and the ghastly visages of death deformed with wounds. The impotent wife hanging with teares on her armed husband, as desirous to die with him, with whom she may not liue. The amazed runnings to and fro of those that would faine escape if they knew how, and the furious pace of a bloudy victor; The rifling of houses for spoile, and euery souldier running with his load, and ready to fight with other for our booty; The miserable captiue driuen manacled before the insulting enemie. Neuer did wee know how cruell an Aduersary is, and how burdensome an helper is in warre. Looke round about you. All your neighbours haue seene and tasted these calamities. All the rest of the world haue beene whirled about in these wofull tumults: onely this ILAND hath like the center stood vnmoueable. Onely this ISLE hath beene like Nilus, which when all other waters ouer-flow, keeps within the banks. That we are free from these and a thousand other miseries of warre, Whither should we ascribe it, but next vnder God, to his Anointed, as a King, as a King of Peace? For both Anarchie is the mother of diuision, as we see in the state of ITALIE: wherein, when they wanted their King, all ranne into ciuill broiles; The Venetians with them of Rauenna; Verona and Vincentia, with the Paduans, and Tarnisians; The Pisans and Florentines with them of Luca and Sienna. And besides, euery King is not a Peace-maker; Ours is made of Peace. There haue beene Princes, which as the Antiochians said of IVLIAN (taking occasion by the Bull which he stampt in his coyne) haue goared the world to death. The breasts of some Princes haue beene like a Thunder-cloud, whose vapours would neuer leaue working till they haue vented themselues with terror to the world: Ours, hath nothing in it, but a gracious raine to water the inheritance of God. Behold, Hee, euen He alone, like to NOAHS Doue, brought an Oliue of Peace to the tossed Arke of Christendome; Hee like another AVGVSTVS, before the second comming of CHRIST hath becalmed the world, and shut the iron gates of warre; and is the bond of that peace hee hath made. And if the Peace-maker both doth blesse, and is blessed; how should we blesse him, and blesse God for him, and hold our selues blessed in him?

Now what were peace without religion, but like a Nabals sheep-shearing; like the fatting of an Epicurean hogge; the very festiuall reuels of the Deuill. But for vs; wee haue Gloria in excelsis Deo, sung before our Pax in terris; in a word, we haue Peace with the Gospell. Machiauel himselfe could say in his discourses, that two continued successions of vertuous Princes (fanno grandi effetti) cannot but doe great matters. Wee proue it so this day; wherein religion is not only warmed, but locked in her seat so fast, that the gates of hell shall neuer preuaile against it. There haue beene Princes, and that in this land, which (as the heathen Politician compared his Tyrant) haue beene like to ill Physitians, that haue purged away the good humours and left the bad behinde them; with whom any thing hath been lawful, but to be religious. Some of your gray haires can be my witnesses. Behold the euils we haue escaped, shew vs our blessings. Here hath been no dragging out of houses, no hiding of Bibles, no creeping into woods, no Bonnering or Butchering of Gods Saints, no rotting in dungeons, no casting of infants out of the mothers belly into the mothers flames; nothing but Gods truth abundantly preached, cheerefully professed, incouraged, rewarded. What nation vnder heauen yeelds so many learned Diuines? What times euer yeelded so many preaching Bishops? When was this City (the City of our ioy) euer so happy this way, as in these late successions? Whither can we ascribe this health of the Church, and life of the Gospell, but, next to God, to His example, His countenance, His endeuours: Wherein I may not omit how right he hath trod in the steps of that blessed Constantine, in all his religious proceedings. Let vs in one word parallel them. Constantine caused fifty Volumes of the Scriptures to be be faire written out in parchment, for the vſe of the Church. King Iames hath cauſed the Bookes of Scriptures to be accurately tranſlated and publiſhed by thouſands. Conſtantine made a zealous edict againſt Nouatians, Valentinians, Marcionites. King Iames beſides his powerfull proclamations and ſoueraigne lawes hath effectually written againſt Popery, and Vorſtianiſme. Conſtantine tooke away the liberties of the meetings of Heretickes: King Iames hath by wholſome lawes inhibited the aſſemblies of Papiſts and ſchiſmatickes. Conſtantine ſate in the middeſt of Biſhops, as if he had beene one of them. King Iames beſides his ſolemne conferences, vouchſafes (not ſeldome) to ſpend his meales in diſcourſe with his Biſhops, and other worthy Diuines. Conſtantine charged his ſonnes (vt planè & ſine fuco Chriſtiani eſſent) that they ſhould be Chriſtians in earneſt. King Iames hath done the like in learned and diuine precepts, which ſhall liue till time be no more. Yea, in their very coynes is a reſemblance: Conſtantine had his picture ſtampt vpon his metals praying. King Iames hath his picture with prayer about it; O Lord, protect the kingdomes which thou haſt united. Laſtly, Conſtantine built Churches; one in Ieruſalem, another in Nicomedia. King Iames hath founded one Colledge, which ſhall helpe to build and confirme the whole Church of God vpon earth. Yee wealthy Cirizens that loue Ieruſalem, caſt in your ſtore after this royall example, into the Sanctuary of God: and whiles you make the Church of God happy, make your ſelues ſo. Brethren, if wee haue any reliſh of Chriſt, any ſenſe of heauen, let vs bleſſe God for the life of our ſoule, the Goſpell; and for the ſpirit of this life, his Anointed.

But where had beene our peace, or this freedome of the Goſpell, without our deliuerance? and where had our deliuerance beene without him? As it was reported of the Oake of Mamre, that all religions rendred their yeerely worſhip there: The Iewes becauſe of Abraham their Patriarch; the Gentile becauſe of the Angels that appeared there to Abraham; The Chriſtians becauſe of Chriſt that was there ſeene of Abraham with the Angels: So was there to King Iames in his firſt beginnings, a confluence of all ſects, with papers in their hands, and (as it was beſt for them) with a Rogamus Domine, non pugnamus, like the ſubiects of Theodoſius. But our cozens of Samaria, when they ſaw that Salomons yoke would not be lightned, ſoone flew off in a rage, What portion haue we in Dauid? And now thoſe, which had ſo oft looſt vp to Heauen in vaine, reſolue to dig downe to Hell for aid. Satan himſelfe met them, and offered (for ſauing of their labour) to bring Hell vp to them. What a world of ſulphur had hee prouided againſt that day? What a brewing of death was tunned vp in thoſe veſſells? The murderous pioners laught at the cloſe felicitie of their proiect; and now before-hand ſeemed in conceit to haue heard the cracke of this helliſh thunder, and to ſee the mangled carkaſſes of the Hereticks flying vp ſo ſuddenly, that their ſoules muſt needs goe vpward towards their perdition; their ſtreets ſtrewed with legges and armes; and the ſtones braining as many in their fall, as they blew vp in their riſe. Remember the Children of Edom, O Lord, in the day of Ieruſalem, which ſaid, Downe with it, downe with it, euen to the ground. O daughter of Babel, worthy to be deſtroyed, bleſſed ſhall he be that ſerueth thee, as thou wouldeſt haue ſerued vs. But hee that ſits in Heauen laught as faſt at them; to ſee ther preſumption that would bee ſending vp bodies to heauen before the reſurrection, and preferring companions to Elias in a fierie Chariot; and ſaid (vt quid fremuerunt?) Conſider now how great things the Lord hath done for vs; The ſnare is broken, and we are deliuered. But how? As that learned Biſhop well applied Salomon to this purpoſe, Diuinatio in labijs Regis. If there had not beene a diuination in the lips of the King, wee had beene all in iawes of death. Vnder his ſhadow wee are preſerued aliue, as Ieremie ſpeaketh. It is true, God could haue done it by other meanes; but he would doe it by this, that wee might owe the being of our liues to him, of whom we held our well-being before. Oh praiſed be the God of heauen for our deliuerance! Praiſed bee God for his anointed, by whom wee are deliuered. Yea how ſhould wee call to our fellow creatures? the Angels, Saints, heauens, elements, meteors, mountaines, beaſts, trees, to helpe vs praiſe the Lord for this mercy. And (as the oath of the Romane ſouldiers ranne) how deare and precious ſhould the life of Cæſar bee to vs, aboue all earthly things? how ſhould wee hate the baſe vnthankfulneſſe of thoſe men, which can ſay of him, as one ſaid of his Saint Martin, Martinus bonus in auxilio, charus in negotio; who whiles they owe him all, grudge him any thing. Away with the mention of outward things: all the bloud in our bodies is due to him: all the prayers and well-wiſhes of our ſoules are due to him. How ſolemnly feſtiuall ſhould this day be to vs and to our poſterities for euer? How cheerefully for our peace, our religion, our deliuerance, ſhould wee take vp that acclamation with the people of Rome vſed in the Coronation of Charles the great, Carolo Iacobo à Deo coronato, magno & pacifico Britannorum Imperatori, vita & victoria. To Charles Iames crowned of God, the great and peaceable Emperor of Britaine, Life and victorie, and let God and his people ſay, Amen.

Theſe were great things indeed, that God did for Iſrael; great that he hath done for vs; great for the preſent, not certaine for the future. They had not, no more haue we, the bleſſings of God by entaile, or by leaſe. Only at the good will of the Lord; and that is, during our good behauiour. Sin is a forfeiture of all fauours. If you doe wickedly, you ſhall periſh. It was not for nothing, that the ſame word in the originall ſignifies both ſin and puniſhment. Theſe two are inſeparable. There is nothing but a little priority in time betweene them. The Angels did wickedly, they periſht by their fall from heauen. The old world did wickedly, they periſht by waters from heauen. The Sodomites did wickedly, they periſht by fire from heauen. Corah and his company did wickedly, they periſht by the earth. The Ægyptians did wickedly, they periſht by the Sea. The Canaanites did wickedly, they periſht by the ſword of Iſrael. The Iſraelites did wickedly, they periſht by peſtilence, ſerpents, Philiſtims. What, ſhould I run my ſelfe out of breath in this endleſſe courſe of examples? There was neuer ſin, but it had a puniſhment, either in the Actor, or in the Redeemer. There was neuer puniſhment, but was for ſinne. Heauen ſhould haue no quarell againſt vs, Hell could haue no power ouer vs, but for our ſinnes. Thoſe are they that haue plagued vs: Thoſe are they that threaten vs.

But what ſhall be the iudgment? Periſhing. To whom? To you and your King. He doth not ſay, If your King doe wickedly, you ſhall periſh, as ſometimes he hath done: nor, If your King doe wickedly, he ſhall periſh, although Kings are neither priuileged from ſinnes, nor from iudgments: nor if you doe wickedly, you only ſhall periſh; but, If ye doe wickedly, ye and your King ſhall periſh. So neere a relation is there betwixt the King and Subiect; the ſin of the one reacheth to the iudgment of the other; and the iudgment of the one is the ſmart of both. The King is the Head, the Commons the ſtomacke: if the head be ſicke, the ſtomacke is affected. Dauid ſins, the people die. If the ſtomacke be ſicke, the head complaines. For the tranſgreſſion of the people are many Princes. What could haue ſnatcht from our head that ſweet Prince, of freſh and bleeding memory, (that might iuſtly haue challenged Othoes name, Mirabilia mundi) now in the prime of all the worlds expectation, but our traiterous wickedneſſes? His Chriſtian modeſty vpon his death-bed could charge himſelfe, (no, no, I haue ſins enow of my own to doe this.) But this very accuſation did cleare him, & burden vs. O glorious Prince, they are our ſins that are guilty of thy death & our loſſe. We haue done wickedly, thou periſhedſt. A harſh word for thy glorified condition. But ſuch a periſhing as is incident to Saints; (for there is a Perire de medio, as well as a Perire à facie) a periſhing from the earth, as wel as a periſhing frõ God. It was a ioyful periſhing to thee: our ſins haue aduantaged thy ſoule, which is partly therfore happy, becauſe we were vnworthy of thee; but they haue robbed vs of our happines in thee. Oh our treacherous ſins, that haue offered this violence to that ſweet hopefull ſacred perſon! And doe they not yet ſtill conſpire againſt him, that is yet dearer to vs, the root of theſe godly branches, the breath of our noſtrils, the anointed of God? Brethren let me ſpeake it cõfidently: As euery ſin is a traitor to a mans owne ſoule, ſo euery wicked man is a traitor to his King: yea, euery of his crying ſins is a falſe-hearted rebel, that hides powder & pocket dags for the precious life of his Soueraign. Any ſtates-man may learne this euen of Machiauel himſelfe: which I confeſſe when I read, I thought of the Deuill confeſſing confeſſing Chriſt. That the giuing of God his due, is the cauſe of the greatneſſe of any State; and contrarily, the neglect of his ſeruice, the cauſe of ruine: and if any prophane Zoſimus ſhall doubt of this point, I would but turne him to Euagrius his diſcourſe to this purpoſe, where he ſhall finde inſtances of enow particulars. What-euer politicke Philoſophers haue diſtinguiſhed, betwixt bonus vir, and ciuis, I ſay, that as a good man cannot be an ill ſubiect, ſo a lewd man can no more be a good ſubiect, than euill can be good. Let him ſooth, and ſweare what he will, his ſinnes are ſo many treaſons againſt the Prince and State: for, Ruine is from iniquitie, ſaith Ezechiel. Alas, what ſafetie can we be in, when ſuch miſcreants lurke in our houſes, iet in our ſtreets; when the Country, City, Court, is ſo full of theſe ſpirituall conſpiracies? Ye that are Magiſtrates, not for Gods ſake only, but for your Kings ſake, whoſe Deputies ye are, as he is Gods; not for religion only, but for very policie, as you tender the deare life of our gracious Soueraigne; as you regard the ſweet peace of this State, and Kingdome; the welfare of this Church; yea, as you loue your owne life, peace, welfare; rouze vp your ſpirits, awaken your Chriſtian courage, and ſet your ſelues heartily againſt the traitorly ſinnes of theſe times, which threaten the bane of all theſe. Cleanſe ye theſe Augean ſtables of our drunken Tauernes, of our prophane Stages, and of thoſe blinde Vaults of profeſſed filthineſſe, Whoſe ſteps goe downe to the chambers of death, yea, to the deepe of hell. And ye, my holy brethren, the meſſengers of God, if there be any ſonnes of Thunder amongſt you, if euer you ratled from heauen the terrible iudgements of God againſt ſinners, now doe it; for (contrary to the naturall) the deepe winter of iniquitie is moſt ſeaſonable for this ſpirituall thunder. Be heard aboue, bee ſeene beneath. Out-face ſin, out-preach it, out-liue it. We are ſtarres in the right hand of God: let vs be like any ſtarres ſaue the Moone, that hath blots in her face; or the ſtarre worme-wood, whoſe fall made bitter waters; or Saint Iudes planets, that wander in irregularities. Let the light of our liues ſhine in the faces of the world, and dazle them whom it ſhall not guide. Then ſhall we with authoritie ſpeake what we doe, when we doe that which we ſpeake. We can neuer better teſtifie our thankfull and loyall reſpects to ſo good a King, in whoſe fauour is our life, and by whoſe grace we are vpheld againſt the vnworthy affronts of this ſacrilegious Age, than by crying downe, by liuing downe thoſe ſinnes which threaten our happineſſe in him. And ye, beloued Chriſtians, whoſe faces ſeeme worthily to congratulate the ioy of this day, if ye would approue your ſelues good ſubiects to our King, labour to be good ſubiects to His King, the King of Heauen. Away with thoſe rebellious wickedneſſes which may be preiudiciall to our peace. In vain ſhall we teſtifie our loyalty by theſe outward ceremonies of reioycing, if we be faulty in the ſubſtance. To what purpoſe ſhall we ring our bels, if in the meane time we hold faſt Salomons (funes peccatorum) cords of ſin; yea, the Prophets cart-ropes of iniquity; and thereby pull downe iudgement vpon our heads? To what purpoſe ſhall we kindle Bonefires in our ſtreets, if we kindle the flame of Gods diſpleaſure againſt vs by our ſinnes? To what purpoſe ſhall ye feaſt one another in your houſes, if you ſhall feaſt the fiends of hell with your wilfull ſinnes? Dæmonum cibus ebrietas; Hierome ſaith well, Drunkennes, luxurie, fornication, and euery ſinne is the very diet and dainties of the deuill. For Gods ſake therefore, for your Kings ſake, for your owne ſoules ſake, be good, that you may be loyall. Oh my brethren, let vs not with old Toby ſuffer our eyes to bee blinded with the ſwallowes dung of this world. Let vs not dare to make a willing ſhipwracke of conſcience, for the venture of a little ballaſt of gaine. Away with our pride, vſury, oppreſſion, falſe weights, falſe oathes, falſe faces; Doe no more wickedly, that we periſh not.

They are our ſins, which as they threaten to loſe vs our beſt friend aboue, (the God of our ſaluation) ſo they hearten our aduerſaries againſt vs on earth. Their hopes, their deſignes, their wickedneſſe to vs, hath beene profeſt to bee built vpon ours to God. If they did not ſee we did euill, they durſt not hope we could periſh. Authority hath wiſely and ſeaſonably taken order for diſarming of wilfull Recuſants. What ſhould weapons doe in the hand of diſloyalty? Oh that it could take order to ſtrip vs of our ſinnes, which will elſe arme God and his creatures againſt vs! The gates of Rome, the gates of hell, hell, could not hurt vs, if we did not hurt our selues. Oh that we could so loue our selues, as to part with all our plausible and gainfull sinnes; that we would this day renue our holy couenants with God, and keepe them for euer? How would he feed vs with the finest of the wheat? How would he, that (as this day) when we feared a tempest, gaue vs an happy calme, preuent a tempest in our calme when we feare not? How safely should our children play, and we feast in our streets? How memorable a patterne of mercy should this Iland be to all posterities? What famous Trophees of victorie would he erect ouer all Antichristianisme amongst vs? How freely and loud should the Gospell of God ring euery where in the eare of the generations yet vnborne? How sure should we be, long and long to enioy so gracious and deare a Soueraigne, so comfortable a peace, so happy a gouernment? euen till this Eue of the Annuntiation of the first comming of Christ, ouertake the day of the Annuntiation of the second comming, for our redemption. A SERMON PREACHED BEFORE HIS MAIESTIE AT his Court at THEBALDS, on Sunday the 15. of SEPTEMBER 1622.

IOHN 7. 24.

Iudge not according to the appearance, but iudge righteous iudgement.

AS in the ciuill body, ſo in the naturall; the head as it is the higheſt, ſo the chiefe part: according to the place is the dignitie: Of the head, the higheſt Region is chiefeſt, ſeruing only for the vſe of intellectuall powers; whereas the lower part of it is only imployed for bodily nutrition: Now, as the reaſonable part of the Soule is Vertex animæ, being contradiſtinguiſhed to the ſenſitiue; So, if yee diſtinguiſh the reaſonable into Iudgement and Deliberation, Naturale Iudicatorium dicetur eſſe vertex, ſaith Aquinas; Iudgement is the top of our Soule, and therefore cals for the top of our care; If the higheſt Wheele goe right, the inferiour hardly erre. Heare then the golden rule of the Author, of the Iudge of our iudgment, Iudge not according to the appearance, but iudge righteous iudgement. The negatiue part is firſt, Iudge not; then, Iudge: Where the minde is free and cleare, it is good to beginne with the poſitiue documents of right, which is the rule to it ſelfe and the wrong; but where the heart is foreſtalled with miſ-opinion, ablatiue directions are firſt needfull to vnteach error, ere wee can learne truth. Iudge not therefore according to the appearance: κατ' ὄψιν is (as the Vulgar rightly) ſecundùm faciem, according to the face, becauſe the face onely appeares, the reſt is hid: Euery thing, not man only, hath both a face and an heart; a face which is peruious to euery eye, an heart to which none eye can pierce but the wiſe. This face, as of man, ſo of things, is a falſe rule of iudgement; Frons, oculi, &c. The forehead, eyes, countenance tell many a lye. Iudge not therefore according to appearance: it is no meaſuring by a crooked line: There is nothing more vncertaine than appearance; ſome things appeare that are not, and ſome things are that appeare not; and that (beſides naturall occurrences) in morally both good and euill: Some things appeare good that are not, and therefore miſ-lead the heart both to an vniuſt proſecution, and to a falſe applauſe; ſome things appeare euill that are not, and therefore miſ-lead vs to an iniurious cenſure, and vndeſerued abomination: Againe, ſome things are

are good that appeare not, and therefore loſe both our allowance and purſuit; ſome things are euill that appeare not, and therefore inſinuate themſelues into our acquaintance and loue, to our coſt: Many a Snake lies hid vnder the Strawberry leaues, and ſtings vs ere we be aware. Vitia virtutes mentiuntur, ſaith Gregorie, Vice too oft makes a maske of the skin of Vertue, and lookes louely: Vertue as often comes forth (like a Martyr in the Inquiſition) with a San-benit vpon her back, and a cap painted with Deuils vpon her head, to make her vgly to the beholders; Iudge not therefore according to the appearance.

The appearance or face, is of things, as of men: We ſee it at once with one caſt of the eye, yet there are angles, & hills & dales, which vpon more earneſt view the eye ſees cauſe to dwell in: ſo it is with this appearance or face of things, which how-euer it ſeemes wholly to appeare to vs at the firſt glance, yet vpon further ſearch will deſcry much matter of our inquiry: For euery thing from the skin incluſiuely to the heart, is the face; euery thing beſides true being, is appearance. All the falſe φαντάσματα that vſe to beguile the iudgment of man, hide themſelues vnder this appearance: Theſe reduce themſelues to three heads; Preſumptions, falſe Formes, Euents: Preſumptions muſt be diſtinguiſhed, for wheras there are three degrees of them, firſt (leuia Probabilia) light Probabilities, then faire Probabilities, & thirdly ſtrong Probabilities, which are called, Indicia iuris, the two firſt are allowed by very Inquiſitors, but as ſufficient to cauſe ſuſpition, to take information, to attache the ſuſpected, not enough whereon to ground the Libell or the torture, much leſſe a finall iudgment: Thus Elie ſees Annaes lips goe, therefore ſhe is drunke: The Phariſes ſee Chriſt ſit with ſinners, he is a friend to their ſins.

Falſe formes are preſented either to the eie or to the eare. In the former, beſides ſupernatural deluſions, there is a deceit of the ſight, whether through the indiſpoſition of the Organ, or the diſtance of the Obiect, or the miſ-diſpoſition of the medium: So as if we ſhould iudge according to appearance, the Sunne ſhould double it ſelfe by the firſt, through the croſneſſe of the eye, it ſhould diminiſh it ſelfe by the ſecond, and ſeeme as big as a large Siue, or no large Cart-wheele at the moſt; It ſhould dance in the riſing, & moue irregularly by the third. To the eare are miſ-reports, & falſe ſuggeſtions, whether concerning the perſon or the cauſe. In the former the calumniating tongue of the Detractor is the Iugler that makes any mans honeſty or worth appeare ſuch as his malice liſteth: In the latter, the ſmooth tongue of the ſubtile Rhetorician is the Impoſtor which makes cauſes appeare to the vnſetled iudgment, ſuch as his wit or fauour pleaſeth: Euents, which are oft-times as much againſt the intention, & aboue the remedie of the Agent, as beſides the nature of the Act: There is ſometimes a good euent of euill, as Iaſons aduerſary cured him in ſtabbing him; the Iſraelites thriue by oppreſſion, the Field of the Church yeelds moſt when it is manured with bloud: There is ſometimes an ill euent of good; Abimelec giues Dauid the Shew-bread, and the Sword, he and his family dies for it: Sapientis eſt præſtare culpam; It is enough for a wiſe man to weild the Act, the iſſue he cannot; Wiſdome makes demonſtratiue Syllogiſmes, à priori, from the cauſes; folly Paralogiſmes, à poſteriori, from the ſucceſſe. Careat ſucceſſibus opto quiſquis ab euentu, &c. was of old the word of the Heathen Poet. If therefore either vpon ſleight probabilities, or falſe formes, or ſubſequent euents we paſſe our verdict, we doe what is here forbidden, Iudge according to appearance.

Had the charge beene onely Iudge not, and gone no further, it had beene very vſefull, and no other than our Sauiour gaue in the Mount: we are all on our way; Euery man makes himſelfe a Iuſtice Itinerant, & paſſeth ſentence of all that comes before him, yea (beyond all commiſſion) of all aboue him; and that many times, not without groſſe miſ-conſtruction, as in the caſe of our late directions: Our very Iudges are at our bar; Secrets of Court, of Counſell, of State eſcape vs not, yea not thoſe of the moſt reſerued Cabinet of Heauen: Quis te conſtituit Iudicem? Who made thee a Iudge? as the Iſraelite (vniuſtly) to Moſes: Theſe are ſawcy vſurpers of forbidden Chaires; & therefore it is iuſt with God, that (according to the Pſalmiſt) ſuch Iudges ſhould be caſt down in ſtony places, yea, as it is in the Originall נשמטו בדי סלע that they ſhould be left in the the hands of the rocke (allidantur Petræ) that they should be dasht against the rockes, that will be falling without Card or compasse in the vast Ocean of Gods Counsels, or his Anointeds.

But now here our Sauiour seales our Commission, sets vs vpon the Bench; allowes vs the act, but takes order for the manner; we may iudge, we may not iudge according to the appearance; wee may bee Iudges (whether κρίνοι, or δικασταί) the one to condemne, the other to absolue; we may not bee κρίται διαλογισμῶν πονηρῶν Iudges of euill thoughts; and we shall be euill-thoughted Iudges, if we shall iudge according to appearance. Not only Fortune and Loue, but euen Iustice also is wont to bee painted blindfold; to import that it may not regard faces. God sayes to euery Iudge as hee did to Samuel, concerning Eliab, Looke not on his countenance, nor the height of his stature. Is an outragious rape committed? Is bloud shed? Looke not whether it be a Courtiers or a Peasants, whether by a Courtier or a Peasant; either of them cries equally loud to heauen; Iustice cannot bee too Lyncean to the being of things, nor too blind to the appearance.

The best things appeare not, the worst appeare most; God, the Angels, soules both glorified and encaged in our bosomes, grace, supernaturall truths, these are most-what the obiects of our faith, and faith is the euidence of things not seene; Like as in bodily obiects, the more pure and simple ought is (as aire and ethereall fire) the more it flyeth the sight; the more grosse and compacted (as water and earth) the more it fils the eye, Iudge not therefore according to appearance.

It is an vsefull and excellent rule for the auoiding of errour in our iudgement of all matters whether Naturall, Ciuill, or Diuine.

Naturall; what is the appearance of a person, but the colour, shape, stature? The colour is oft times bought or borrowed, the shape forced by Art, the stature raised (to contradict Christ) a cubit high; Iudge not therefore according to appearance. What are the collusions of Iuglers and Mountebanks, the weepings and motions of Images, the noyses of miraculous cures and dispossessions, but appearances? Fit aliquando in Ecclesiâ maximâ deceptio populi in miraculis fictis à sacerdotibus; There is much cozenage of the poore people by cogged miracles, saith Cardinall Lyranus; these holy frauds could not gull men if they did not iudge according to appearance. Should appearance bee the rule, our harueſt had beene rich; there was not more shew of plenty in our fields, than now of scarcity in our streets. This dearth (to say truth) is not in the graine, but in the heart; If the hearts of men were not more blasted with couetousnesse and cruell selfe-loue, than their graine with distemper of aire, this needed not; The Barnes and Granaries are full, the Markets empty; Authority knowes how to remedy this euill, how to preuent a dearth in abundance, that men may not affamish whom God hath fed; and that when God hath giuen vs the staffe of bread, it may not bee either hid, or broken; shortly, that our store may not be iudged by the appearance.

Ciuill; Wisemen and statesmen especially may not alwaies looke the same way they would goe; like skilfull Sea-men, they sometimes lauere, and (as the wind may stand) fetch compasses of lawfull policies to their wished point. That of Tiberius was fearefull; of whom Xiphiline ὃν ἔλεγε δεῖν βάλλειν That he sayled euer against the wind of his words: But sometimes a good Constantius, or Anastasius, will wisely pretend what he intends not: As our Sauiour made as if hee went further, when hee meant to turne into Emaus: The hearts of Kings are as deepe waters; wee may not thinke to draine them in the hollow of our hand: Secret things to them of whom God hath said, Dixi dij estis; things reuealed to vs and our children. Euen wee meane ones would be loth to haue alwaies our hearts read in our faces; Iudge not therefore according to appearance.

Diuine; In these our speech must dwell; If wee should iudge according to the appearance, we should thinke basely of the Sauiour of the world; Who that had seene him sprawling and wringing in the Cratch, flitting to Ægypt, chopping of chips at Nazareth, Nazareth, famishing in the Desart, transported by Satan, attended by Fishermen, persecuted by his Kindred, betrayed by one Seruant, abiured by another, forsaken of all, apprehended, arraigned, condemned, buffeted, spat vpon, scourged to bloud, sceptred with the reede, crowned with thornes, nailed to the Crosse, hanging naked betwix two Theeues, scorned of the beholders, sealed vp in a borrowed graue, could say other, than, Hee hath no forme nor beauty, when wee shall see him there is nothing that wee should desire him? Who that should haue seene his skinne all dewed with pearles of bloudy sweat, his backe bleeding, his face blubbered and besmeared, his forehead harrowed, his hands and feet pierced, his side gushing out, his head bowed downe in death, and should withall haue heard his dying lips say, My God, my God, why hast thou forsaken me? would not haue said, He is despised and reiected of men, yea (in appearance) of God himselfe. Yet euen this while to the cutting of the sinewss of those stiff-necked Iewes, the Angels owned him for their Lord, the Sages adored him, the Starre designed him, the Prophets fore-shewed him, the Deuills confest him, his Miracles euinced him, the earth shooke, the Rocks rent, the Dead lookt out, the Sunne lookt in, astonished at the sufferings of the God of nature; Euen whiles hee was despised of men, hee commanded the Deuils to their chaines: whiles base men shot out their tongues at him, Principalities and Powers bowed their knees to him; whiles he hanged despicably vpon the tree of shame, the powers of hell were dragged captiue after the triumphant chariot of his Crosse; the appearance was not so contemptible, as the truth of his estate glorious. Iudge not therefore according to appearance.

Should appearance be the rule, how scornfully would the carnall eye ouer-looke the poore ordinances of God? What would it finde here but foolishnesse of preaching, homelinesse of Sacraments, an inky Letter, a Priests lips, a sauorlesse message, a morsell of Bread, a mouth full of Wine, an hand full of Water, a slander-beaten Crosse, a crucified Sauiour, a militant Church, a despised profession. When yet this foolishnesse of preaching is the power of God to saluation; these mute Letters the liuely Oracles of God; these vile Lips the Cabinets of heauen to preserue knowledge; this vnplausible Message, Magnalia Dei; this Water, the Water of Life in the midst of the Paradise of God: (ἄειστον ὕδωρ) this Bread the Manna of Angels, this Wine heauenly Nectar, this Church the Kings Daughter, all glorious within, this dying Sacrifice the Lord of life, this Crosse the Banner of Victory, this profession Heauen vpon earth. Iudge not therefore according to appearance.

Should appearance be the rule, woe were Gods children, happy were his enemies. Who that had seene Cain standing masterly ouer the bleeding carkasse of Abel, Ioseph in his bonds, his Mistresse in her dresse, Moses in the Flags, Pharaoh in the Palace, Dauid sculking in the Wildernesse, Saul commanding in the Court, Elias fainting vnder his Iuniper tree, Iezebel painting in her closet, Michaiah in the prison, Zidkijah in the presence, Ieremie in the dungeon, Zedekiah in the throne, Daniel trembling among the Lions, the Median Princes feasting in their Bowers, Iohns head bleeding in the Platter, Herods smiling at the Reuels, Christ at the Barre, Pilate on the Bench, the Disciples scourged, the Scribes and Elders insulting, would not haue said; O happy Caine, Potiphars wife, Pharaoh, Saul, Iezebel, Zidkijah, Zedekiah, Median Princes, Pilate, Herod, Elders; miserable Abel, Ioseph, Moses, Dauid, Eliah, Michaiah, Ieremie, Daniel, Iohn, Christ, the Disciples: Yet wee know Caines victorie was as wofull, as Abels martyrdome glorious; Iosephs irons were more precious, than the golden tires of his Mistresse; Moses Reeds were more sure than Pharaohs Cedars; Dauids Caue in the Desart more safe than the Towers of Saul; Eliahs Rauen a more comfortable purueyor than all the Officers of Iezebel; Michaiahs prison was the guard-chamber of Angels, when Ahabs presence was the counsell-chamber of euill spirits; Ieremies Dungeon had more true light of comfort than the shining state of Zedekiah; Daniel was better garded with the Lions, than Darius and the Median Princes with their Ianisaries; Iohns head was more rich with the Crowne of his martyrdome, than Herods with the Diadem of his Tetrarchate; Christ at the Barre gaue life and being to Pilate on the Bench, Bench, gaue motion to thoſe hands that ſtrucke him, to that tongue that condemned him, and in the meane while, gaue ſentence on his Iudge; The Diſciples were better pleaſed with their ſtripes and wales than the Iewiſh Elders with their proud Phylacteries. After this, who that had ſeene the primitiue Chriſtians, ſome broyled on Gridirons, others boyled in Lead, ſome roſted, others frozen to death, ſome fleaed, others torne with horſes, ſome craſhed in peeces by the teeth of Lions, others caſt downe from the rocks to the ſtakes, ſome ſmiling on the wheele, others in the flame, all wearying their tormentors and ſhaming their Tyrants with their patience, would not haue ſaid; Of all things I would not be a Chriſtian; Yet, euen this while were theſe poore torturing-ſtocks higher (as Marcus Arethuſius bragged) than their perſecutors; dying Victors, yea Victors of death; neuer ſo glorious as when they began not to be; in gaſping crowned, in yeelding the ghoſt more than Conquerours; Iudge not therefore according to appearance.

When thou lookeſt about, and ſeeſt on the one hand, a poore conſcionable Chriſtian drouping vnder the remorſe for his ſinne, auſterely checking his wanton appetite and curbing his rebellious deſires, wearing out his daies in a rough penitentiall ſeuerity, cooling his infrequent pleaſures with ſighs, and ſawcing them with teares; on the other hand ruffling Gallants made all of pleaſure and louiall delights, bathing themſelues in a ſea of all ſenſuall ſatieties, denying their pampered nature nothing vnder heauen, not wine in bowles, not ſtrange fleſh, and beaſtly dalliance, not vnnaturall titillations, not violent filthineſſe; that feaſt without feare, and drinke without meaſure, and ſweare without feeling, and liue without God; their bodies are vigorous, their coffers full, their ſtate proſperous, their hearts chearefull: O how thou bleſſeſt ſuch men: lo theſe (thou ſaiſt) theſe are the darlings of heauen and earth; Sic ô ſic iuvat viuere: Whiles thoſe other ſullen mopiſh creatures are the (περικαθάρματα) offcouring and recrements of the world; Thou foole, giue me thy hand, let mee lead thee with Dauid into the ſanctuary of God: Now what ſeeſt thou? The end, the end of theſe men is not peace. Surely ô God thou haſt ſet them in ſlippery places, and caſteſt them downe into deſolation: how ſuddenly are they periſhed, and horribly conſumed! Woe is mee, they doe but dance a Galliard ouer the mouth of hell, that ſeemes now couered ouer with the greene ſods of pleaſure; The higher they leape, the more deſperate is their lighting: Oh wofull, wofull condition of thoſe godleſſe men, yea thoſe epicurean Porkets, whoſe belly is their God, whoſe heauen is their pleaſure, whoſe curſed iollity is but a feeding vp to an eternall ſlaughter: the day is comming, wherein euery minute of their ſinfull vnſatisfying ioyes ſhall be anſwered with a thouſand thouſand millions of yeers frying in that vnquenchable fire; And when thoſe damned Ghoſts ſhall forth of their inceſſant flames ſee the glorious remuneration of the penitent and penſiue ſoules which they haue deſpiſed, they ſhall then gnaſh and yell out that late recantation; Wee fooles thought their life madneſſe, and their end without honour; now they are counted among the children of God, and their portion is among the Saints, ours amongſt Deuils: Iudge not therefore according to appearance.

Should we iudge according to appearance, all would be Gold that gliſtereth, all droſſe that gliſtereth not: Hypocrites haue neuer ſhewed more faire than ſome Saints foule. Saul weepes, Ahab walkes ſoftly: Tobias and Sanballat will bee building Gods walls; Herod heares Iohn gladly; Balaam propheſies Chriſt, Iudas preaches him, Satan confeſſes him; When euen an Abraham diſſembles, a Dauid clokes adultery with murder, a Salomon giues (at leaſt) a toleration to idolatry; a Peter forſweares his Maſter; briefly, the prime diſciple is a Satan; Satan an Angell of light. For you: How gladly are we deceiued in thinking you all ſuch as you ſeeme; None but the Court of Heauen hath a fairer face. Prayers, Sermons, Sacraments, geniculation, ſilence, attention, reuerence, applauſe, knees, eyes, eares, mouthes full of God; Oh that ye were thus alwaies! Oh that this were your worſt ſide! But if wee follow you from the Church, and finde curſing and bitterneſſe vnder your tongues; licentious diſorder in your liues, bribery and oppreſſion in your hands; If God looke into the windowes of your hearts, and finde there be (intus rapina) we cannot iudge you by the appearance; or, if we could, What comfort were it to you to haue deceiued our charity with the appearance of Saints, when the righteous Iudge ſhall giue you your portion with Hypocrites; What euer wee doe, he will be ſure not to iudge according to the appearance.

If appearance ſhould be the rule, falſe religion ſhould be true, true falſe. Quædam falſa probabiliora quibuſdam veris, is the old word; Some falſhoods are more likely than ſome truths: Natiue beauty ſcornes Art: Truth is as a matron; Error a curtizan: The matron cares onely to concile loue by a graue and gracefull modeſty, the curtizan with philtres and farding. Wee haue no hierarchy mounted aboue Kings, no pompous oſtentation of magnificence, no gariſh proceſſions, no gaudy altars, no fine images clad with Taffates in ſummer, with veluets in winter, no flouriſhes of vniuerſality, no rumors of miracles, no ſumptuous canonizations, we haue nothing but (γάλα ἄδολον) the ſincerity of Scriptures, ſimplicity of Sacraments, decency of rare ceremonies, Chriſt crucified. We are gone if yee goe by appearance: Gone? alas, who can but bluſh and weepe, and bleed to ſee that Chriſtian ſoules ſhould (after ſuch beames of knowledge) ſuffer themſelues to bee thus palpably cozened with the gilded ſlips of error, that after ſo many yeeres pious gouernment of ſuch an incomparable ſucceſſion of religious Princes, authority ſhould haue cauſe to complaine of our defection?

Deare Chriſtians (I muſt be ſharpe) are we children or fooles, that wee ſhould bee better pleaſed with the glittering tinſell of a painted baby from a Pedlers ſhop, than with the ſecretly-rich and inualuable Iewell of diuine Truth? Haue we thus learned Chriſt? Is this the fruit of ſo cleere a Goſpell? of ſo bleſſed ſcepters? For Gods ſake be wiſe and honeſt, and yee cannot be Apoſtates.

Shortly, for it were eaſie to bee endleſſe: If appearance might bee the rule, good ſhould bee euill, euill good; there is no vertue that cannot bee counterfetted, no vice that cannot bee blanched: we ſhould haue no ſuch friend as our enemy, a flatterer; no ſuch enemie as our friend that reproues vs. It were a wonder if yee great ones ſhould not haue ſome ſuch burs, hanging vpon your ſleeues; As ſoone ſhall corne grow without chaffe, as greatneſſe ſhall bee free from adulation: Theſe ſeruile ſpirits ſhall ſooth vp all your purpoſes, and magnifie all your actions, and applaud your words, and adore your perſons: Sin what yee will, they will not checke you; Proiect what you will, they will not thwart you; ſay what ye will, they will not faile to ſecond you; bee what yee will, they will not faile to admire you; Oh how theſe men are all for you, all yours, all you; They loue you as the Rauens doe your eyes. How deare was Siſera to Iael, when ſhe ſmoothed him vp, and gaue him milke in a lordly diſh, Samſon to Dalilah, when ſhe lulled him in her lap; Chriſt to Iudas, when he kiſſed him; See how he loued him would ſome foole haue ſaid, that had iudged by appearance.

In the meane time an honeſt plaine dealing friend is like thoſe ſauces which a man praiſes with tears in his eyes: like a cheſnut, which pricks the fingers, but pleaſes our taſte; or like ſome wholeſome medicinall potion, that diſtaſtes and purges vs (perhaps makes vs ſicke) that it may heale vs. Oh let the righteous ſmite mee, for that is a benefit, let him reproue mee, and it ſhall bee a precious oyle that ſhall nor breake my head; Breake it? no, it ſhall heale it, when it is mortally wounded by mine owne ſinne, by others aſſentation: Oh how happy were it, if we could loue them that loue our ſoules, and hate them that loue our ſinnes. They are theſe rough hands that muſt bring vs ſauory diſhes, and carry away a bleſſing; truth is for them now, thankes ſhall be for them hereafter, but in the meane time they may not be iudged by the appearance.

Laſtly, if we ſhall iudge friendſhip by complement, ſalubrity by ſweetneſſe, ſeruice by the eye, fidelity by oathes, valour by brags, a Saint by his face, a deuill by his feet, we ſhall be ſure to be deceiued: Iudge not therefore according to appearance.

But (that yee miſtake not) though we may not iudge onely by the appearance, yet appearance may not bee neglected in our iudgement. Some things according to the Philoſopher (ὄντα μὲν, ὡς δοκεῖ) ſeeme and are, are as they ſeeme: Semblances are are not alwaies seuered from truth ; Our senses are safe guides to our vnderstandings. Wee iustly laugh at that Scepticke in Laertius, who because his seruant robbed his Cup-bord, doubted whether hee left his victuails there : What doe wee with eyes if wee may not beleeue their intelligence ? That world is past, wherein the gloſſe Clericus amplectens fœminam præſumitur benedicendi cauſa feciſſe ; The wanton imbracements of another mans wife muſt paſſe with a Clarke for a ghoſtly benediction; Men are now more wiſe, leſſe charitable : Words and probable ſhewes are appearances, actions are not ; and yet euen our words alſo ſhall iudge vs ; if they bee filthy, if blaſphemous, if but idle, wee ſhall account for them, we ſhall be iudged by them : Ex ore tuo; a foule tongue ſhewes euer a rotten heart ; By their fruits yee ſhall know them, is our Sauiours rule ; I may ſafely ſay, No body deſires to borrow colours of euill : if you doe ill, thinke not that we will make dantie to thinke you ſo; When the God of loue can ſay by the Diſciple of loue, Qui facit peccatum, ex diabolo eſt ; Hee that committeth ſinne, is of the deuill : Euen the righteous Iudge of the world iudgeth (ſecundum opera) according to our works ; we cannot erre while we tread in his ſteps. If we doe euill, ſinne lies at the doore ; but it is on the ſtreet ſide ; Euery Paſſenger ſees it, cenſures it; How much more he that ſees in ſecret ? Tribulation & anguiſh vpon euery ſoule that doth euill: Euery ſoule; here is no exemption by greatneſſe, no buying off with bribes, no bleering of the eies with pretences, no ſhrouding our ſelues in the night of ſecrecy; but if it be a ſoule that doth euill, Tribulation & anguiſh is for it; Contrarily, If we doe well, ſhall we not be accepted ? If we be charitable in our almes, iuſt in our awards, faithfull in our performances, ſober in our carriages, deuout in our religious ſeruices, conſcionable in our actions; Glory, and honour, and peace to euery man that worketh good; we ſhal haue peace with our ſelues, honour with men, glory with God & his Angels: Yea that peace of God which paſſeth all vnderſtanding; ſuch honour as haue all his Saints, the incomprehenſible glory of the God of peace, the God of Saints and Angels, to the participation whereof, that good God that hath ordained vs, as mercifully bring vs for the ſake of his deare Sonne Ieſus Chriſt the iuſt : To whom with thee O Father, and thy good Spirit, one infinite God, our God, bee giuen all praiſe, honour and glory now and for euer. Amen.

THE GREAT IMPOSTOR,

LAID OPEN, OVT OF IER. 17. 9.

The heart is deceitfull aboue all things.

I Know where I am; in one of the famous Phrontisteries of Law, and Iustice: wherefore serues Law and Iustice, but for the preuention or punishment of fraud and wickednesse? Giue me leaue therefore to bring before you, Students, Masters, Fathers, Oracles of Law and Iustice, the greatest Cheator and Malefactor in the world, our owne Heart. It is a great word that I haue said, in promising to bring him before you; for this is one of the greatest aduantages, of his fraud, that hee cannot bee seene: That as that old Iugler Apollonius Thyanæus, when he was brought before the Iudge, vanished out of sight; so this great Impostor, in his very presenting before you, dispeareth and is gone; yea so cunningly, that he doth it with our owne consent, and we would be loth that he could be seene: Therefore as an Epiphonema to this iust complaint of deceitfulnesse, is added Who can know it? It is easie to know that it is deceitfull, and in what it deceiues, though the deceits themselues cannot be knowne, till too late; As we may see the ship, and the sea, and the ship going on the sea, yet the way of a ship in the sea (as Salomon obserues) we know not: God askes, and God shall answer; What he askes by Ieremie, he shall answer by S. Paul, Who knowes the heart of man? Euen the spirit of man that is in him. If then the heart haue but eyes enow to see it selfe by the reflection of thoughts, it is enough: Ye shall easily see & heare enough (out of the analogie and resemblance of hearts) to make you both astonished and ashamed. 1 Cor. 2. 11.

The heart of man lies in a narrow roome, yet all the world cannot fill it; but that which may be said of the heart, would more than fill a world: Here is a double stile giuen it; of deceitfulnesse; of wickednesse; either of which knowes no end, whether of being, or of discourse. I spend my houre, and might doe my life, in treating of the first.

See then, I beseech you, the Impostor, and the Imposture; The Impostor himselfe, The heart of man; The Imposture, Deceitfull aboue all things.

As

As deceitfull persons are wont euer to goe vnder many names, and ambiguous, and must be exprest with an [alias] so doth the heart of man; Neither man himselfe, nor any part of man hath so many names, as the heart alone; For euery faculty that it hath, and euery action it doth, it hath a seuerall name: Neither is there more multiplicity, than doubt in this name; Not so many termes are vsed to signifie the heart, as the heart signifies many things.

When ye heare of the heart, ye thinke straight of that fleshie part in the center of the bodie which liues first, and dies last; and whose beatings you finde to keepe time all the body ouer; That is not it which is so cunning; Alas, that is a poore harmelesse peece meerly passiue; and if it doe any thing, as the subministration of Vitall spirits, to the maintenance of the whole frame, it is but good; no, it is the spirituall part that lurkes in this flesh, which is guiltie of such deceit. We must learne of witty Idolatry to distinguish betwixt the stocke and the inuisible powers that dwell in it. It is not for me to bee a stickler betwixt the Hebrewes, and the Greeke Philosophers, and Physitians, in a question of naturall learning, concerning the seat of the soule; nor to insist vpon the reasons why the spirit of God rather places all the spirituall powers in the heart, than in the braine; Doubtlesse in respect of the affections there resident, whereby all those speculatiue abilities are drawne to practise; It shall suffice vs to take things as we finde them, and to hold it for granted, that this Monosyllable (for so it is in many languages) comprises all that intellectiue and affectiue world which concerneth man; and in plaine termes to say, that when God saies The heart is deceitfull, he meanes, the vnderstanding, will, affections are deceitfull.

The vnderstanding is doubly deceitfull; It makes vs beleeue it knowes those things which it doth not; and that it knowes not those things which it doth: As some foolish Mountebanke, that holds it a great glory to seeme to know all things; or some presuming Physitian, that thinkes it a shame not to professe skill in any state, of the body or disease; so doth our vaine vnderstanding; therein framing it selfe according to the spirits it meets withall; if they be proud and curious, it perswades them, they know euery thing; if careleſse, that they know enough.

In the first kinde; What hath not the fond heart of man dared to arrogate to it selfe? It knowes all the starres by their names; Tush, that is nothing; It knowes what the stars meane by their very lookes, what the birds meane by their chirping, as Apollonius did; What the heart meanes, by the features of the face; it knowes the euents of life by the lines of the hand: the secrets of Art, the secrets of Nature, the secrets of State, the secrets of others hearts, yea the secrets of God in the closet of heauen; Yea, not onely what God hath done, but what he will doe: This is (sapiens stultitia) a wise folly, as Irenæus said of his Valentinians; All Figure-casters, Palmesters, Physiognomers, Fortune-tellers, Alchymists, fantasticke proiectors, and all the rabble of professors of those θεώρους, not so much curious as idle Arts, haue their word giuen them by the Apostle, Deceiuing and deceiued; neither can these men make any worse fooles, than their hearts haue made themselues; and well may that Alexandrian tax bee set vpon them in both names, whether of actiue, or passiue folly: And (as it commonly falls out, that superfluous things rob the heart of necessary) in the meane while, those things which the heart may, and should know, it lightly mis-knowes: As our senses are deceiued by distance, or interpositions, to thinke the stars beamie and sparkling; the Moone horned, the Planets equally remote, the Sunne sometimes red, pale other some: so doth also our vnderstanding erre, in mis-opinion of diuine things; It thinkes it knowes God, when it is but an Idoll of fancie, as Sauls messengers, when they came into the roome, thought they had the true Dauid, when it was but a Wispe; it knowes the will of God, when it is nothing but grosse mis-construction: so as the common knowledge of men, though they thinke it a Torch, is but an Ignis Fatuus to lead them to a ditch: How many thousand Assyrians thinke they are in the way to the Prophet, when they are in the midst of Samaria? How many millions thinke they walke fairely on to heauen, when indeed they are in the broad way that leads to destruction? Oh poore blinde

Pagans,

Pagans, halfe-sighted Turkes, bleare-eied Iewes, blind-folded Papists, Squint-eied Schismaticks, purblind ignorants, how well doe they finde themselues pleased with their deuotion, and thinke God should bee so too; when it is nothing but a mixture of mespriſon; superstition, conceitednesse; and according to the seldome-reuerently-vsed prouerbe) whiles they thinke they haue God by the finger, they hold a deuill by the toe; and all this, because their heart deceiues them. If careleſſe, and loth to be at the paines of knowing more, it perswades them they know enough; that they cry out of more, as he did on the ointment, (Vt quid perditio hæc?) What needs all this waste? and makes them as conscionable for knowledge, as Esau was for cattle, I haue enough, my brother, keepe that thou hast to thy selfe; or as contentedly-resolute, as the Epicure in the Gospell: Soule take thy ease, thou hast knowledge enough laid vp for many yeeres.

From whence it is, that too many rest simply (yea wilfully) in their owne measure, not so much as wishing more skill in Soule-matters; applauding their owne safe mediocritie; like the credulous blinde man that thought he now saw a shimmering of the Sunne-beames, when indeed his backe was towards it: Hence it is that they scoffe at the foolishnesse or preaching, scorn the forward bookishnesse of others, fearing nothing but a surfet of Manna, and hating to know more than their neighbours, than their forefathers; and thus are led on muffled vp in an vnfelt ignorance, to their graue, yea, (without the mercy of God) to their hell.

And as in these things there is a presumption of knowing what we doe not; so contrarily, a dissimulation and concealement of the knowledge of what we doe vnderstand: The heart of man is a great lier to it selfe this way; Saint Paul saies that of Pagans, which I may boldly say of Christians, they haue the effect of the law written in their hearts; yet many of them will not bee acknowne of one letter ingrauen there by the finger of God: Certaine common principles there are (together with this law) interlinearily written in the Tables of the heart, as that we must doe as we would be done to; That there is a God; That this God is infinite in iustice and truth, and must bee serued like himselfe; these they either blot out, or lay their finger on, that they may not bee seene, purposely, that they may sinne freely; and faine would perswade themselues they neuer had any such euidence from God: so putting off the checks of conscience with bold denials; like the harlot of Iericho, (but worse than she) that hath hid the Spies, and now out-faces their entertainment: Wherein the heart doth to it selfe, that which Nahash the Ammonite would haue done to Israel, put out his owne right eie, that it may not see that law whereby it might be conuinced, and finde it selfe miserable. Thus the vnderstanding of man is euery way deceitfull in ouer-knowing, mis-knowing, dissembling; in all which it is like an euill and vnfaithfull eye, that either will be seeing by a false glasse, or a false light, or with distortion; or else wilfully closes the lids that it may not see at all; and in all this deceiues vs.

The will is no lesse cunning; which though it make faire pretences of a generall inclination to good, yet (hîc & nunc) in particulars, hangs towards a pleasing euill; Yea though the Vnderstanding haue sufficiently informed it of the worthinesse of good, and the turpitude of euill, yet being ouercome with the false delectableness of sinne, it yeelds to a misse-assent; Reason being (as Aquinas speakes) either swallowed vp by some passion, or held downe by some vicious habit: It is true, still the Will followes the Reason, neither can doe otherwise; but therefore, if Reason mis-led be contrary to Reason, and a schisme arise in the soule, it must follow that the Will must needs bee contrary to Will and Reason; Wherein it is like a Planet, which though it be carried about perpetually by the first mouer, yet slily creepes on his owne way, contrary to that strong circumuolution: And though the minde be sufficiently conuinced of the necessitie, or profit of a good act, yet for the tediousnesse annexed to it, in a dangerous spirituall acedie, it insensibly slips away from it, and is content to let it fall; As some idle, or fearfull Merchant, that could be glad to haue gold, if it would come with ease, but will not either take the paines, or hazard the aduenture to fetch it: Thus commonly the

Will

Will (in both respects) Water-man-like lookes forward, and rowes backward; and vnder good pretences doth nothing but deceiue.

The affections are as deceitfull as either; whether in misse-placing, measure, or manner.

Mis-placing: They are fiery where they should be coole; and where they should burne, freeze; Our heart makes vs beleeue it loues God, and giues him pledges of affection; whiles it secretly doats vpon the world; like some false strumpet, that entertaines her husband with her eyes, and in the meane time treads vpon the toe of an Adulterer vnder the boord: That it loues iustice, when it is but reuenge; That it grieues for the missing of Christ, when indeed it is but for the loaues and fishes; That it feares God, when indeed it is but afraid of our owne torment; That it hates the sin, when it is the person; That it hates the world, when it thrusts God out of doores to lodge it.

Measure: That we loue God enough, and the world but enough, when as indeed the one loue is but as the cold fit of an ague, the other an hot; we chill in the one, no lesse than we glow in the other; when wee make God onely a stale to draw on the world; That we doe enough hate our corruptions, when (at our sharpest) we doe but gently sneape them, as Hely did his sonnes; or as some indulgent parent doth an vnthriftie darling; whom he chides, and yet feeds with the fewell of his excesse; That we haue grieued enough for our sinnes, when they haue not cost vs so much as one teare, nothing but a little fashionable winde, that neuer came further than the roots of our tongue; That we doe enough compassionate the afflictions of Ioseph, when we drinke wine in bowles; That we feare God more than men, when we are ashamed to doe that in presence of a childe, which we care not to doe in the face of God.

Manner. That our heart loues, and hates, and feares, and ioyes, and grieues truly, when it is an hypocrite in all; That it delights constantly in God, and holy things, when it is but an Ephraims morning dew; That our anger is zealous, when it is but a flash of personall malice, or a superstitious furie; That we feare as sonnes, when it is as cowards, or slaues; That we grieue as Gods patients, when we fret, and repine, and struggle like franticks against the hand of our Maker. Thus (to summe vp all) the heart of man is wholly set vpon cozenage; the vnderstanding ouer-knowing, mis-knowing, dissembling; The will pretending, and inclining contrarily; The affections mocking vs in the obiect, measure, manner; and in all of them the heart of man is deceitfull.

Ye haue seene the face of this Cheator; looke now at his hand; and now ye see who this Deceiuer is, see also the sleights of his deceit; and therein the fashion, the subiect, the sequell of it; from whence we will descend to our Demeanour towards so dangerous an Impostor.

The fashion of his deceit is the same with our ordinary Iuglers; either cunning conueyance, or false resemblance. Cunning conueyance, whether into vs, in vs, from vs.

The heart admits sinne, as Paradise did the Serpent; There it is, but by what chinks or cranies it entered, we know not; so as we may say of sinne as the Master of the feast in the Gospell said to his slouenly guest, Quomodo intrasti? How camest thou in hither? Corruption doth not eat into the heart as our first Parents did into the apple, so as the print of their teeth might be seene, but as the worme eats into the core, insensibly; Neither is there lesse closeneſſe when it is entred; I would it were as vntrue a word, as it is an harsh one, that many a professedly-Christian heart, lodges a deuill in the blinde roomes of it, and either knowes it not, or will not bee acknowne of it; euery one that harbours a willing sinne in his breast, doth so: The malicious man hath a furious deuill; the wanton an vncleane deuill, a Beelpheger, or a Tammuz; the proud man a Lucifer, the couetous a Mammon; Certainly, these foule spirits are not more truly in hell, than in a wicked heart; there they are, but so closely, that I know not if the heart it selfe know it; it being verified of this citadell of the heart, which was said of that vast Ninive, that the enemie had taken some parts of it, long ere the other knew it: What should I speake of the most common, and yet most dangerous guest, that lodges in this Inne of the heart, Infidelity? Call at the doore, and aske if such a one host not there; They within make strange of it, deny it, forsweare it; Call the officers, make priuie search, you shall hardly finde him: Like some Iesuite in a Popish dames chamber, hee is so closely contriued into false floores, and double walls, that his presence is not more easily knowne, than hardly conuinced, confessed. How easie is it to say, that if infidelity did not lurke in the hearts of men, they durst not doe as they doe; they could not doe but what they doe not? Durst they sinne if they were perswaded of an hell? durst they buy a minute of pleasure with euerlasting torments? Could they so sleight heauen if they beleeued it? Could they bee so loth to possesse it? Could they thinke much of a little painfull goodnesse to purchase an eternity of happinesse? No, no, men, fathers, and brethren; if the heart were not Infidell, whiles the face is Christian, this could not bee. Neither doth the heart of man more cunningly conuey sinne into, and in it selfe, than from it; The sinne that ye saw euen now openly in the hands, is so swiftly past vnder the boord, that it is now vanished; Looke for it in his fore-head, there it is not; looke for it vnder his tongue, there is none; looke for it in his conscience, yee finde nothing; and all this by the legier-de-maine of the heart: Thus Achan hath hid his wedge, and now hee dares stand out to a lot; Thus Salomons Harlot hath wip't her mouth, and it was not shee: Thus Saul will lie-out his sacrilege, vntill the very beasts out-bleat, and out-bellow him; Thus the swearer sweares, and when hee hath done, sweares that hee swore not; Thus the vncleane fornicator bribes off his sinne, and his shame, and now makes challenges to the world of his honesty. It cannot be spoken how peeuishly witty the heart of man is this way; neither doubt I but this wilinesse is some of the poyson that the subtile serpent infected vs with in that fatall morsell: They were three cunning shifts which the Scripture recordeth of three women (as that sex hath beene euer noted for more sudden pregnancie of wit) Rachel, Rahab, and the good wife of Bahurim; The first hiding the Teraphim with a modest seat, the second, the spies with flaxe-stalkes, and the third Dauids scouts with corne spred ouer the Well; but these are nothing to the deuices that nature hath wont to vse for the cloaking of sinne; God made man vpright, saith Salomon, but he sought many inuentions: Is Adam challenged for sinne? Behold all on the sudden it is passed from his hand, to Gods; The woman that thou gauest me: Is Saul challenged for a couetous and disobedient remissenesse? the sinne is straight passed from the field to the Altar; I saued the fattest for a Sacrifice to the Lord thy God; So the one begins his sinne in God, and the other ends it in him: Is Dauid bewitched with lust to abuse the Wife? the Husband must be sent home drunke to hide it, or if not that, to his long home, in a pretended fauour of his valour: Is a griping Vsurer disposed to put his money together to breed a monster? hee hath a thousand quirks to cozen both law and conscience: Is a Simoniacall Patron disposed to make a good match of his peoples soules? it shall be no bargaine, but a gift: hee hath a liuing to giue, but an horse to sell. And sure I thinke in this wise age of the world, Vsurers and Simonists striue who shall finde the wittiest way to hell: What should I speake of the secret frauds in contracts, booties in matches, subornation of instruments, hiring of oathes, seeing of officers, equiuocations of answers, and ten thousand other tricks that the heart of man hath deuised for the conueyances of sin; in all which it too well approues it selfe incomparably deceitfull.

The false semblance of the heart is yet worse; for the former is most-what for the smothering of euill; this is for the iustifying of euill, or the disgrace of good; In these two doth this act of falshood chiefly consist; in making euill good, or good euill. For the first; The naturall man knowes well how filthy all his brood is, and therefore will not let them come forth, but disguised with the colours and dresses of good; so as now euery one of natures birds is a Swan; Pride is handsomnesse, desperate fury, valour; lauishnesse is noble munificence, drunkennesse ciuility, flattery complement, murderous reuenge, iustice; the Curtizan is bona fœmina, the Sorcerer a wise man, the oppressor a good husband; Absolom will goe pay his vowes; Herod will worship the Babe.

For the second; such is the enuy of nature, that where shee sees a better face than her owne, shee is ready to scratch it, or cast dirt in it; and therefore knowing that all vertue hath a natiue beauty in it, she labours to reforme it by the foulest imputations. Would the Israelites be deuout? they are idle; Doth Dauid daunce for ioy before the Arke? he is a foole in a Morris: Doth Saint Paul discourse of his heauenly Vision? too much learning hath made him mad. Doe the Disciples miraculously speake all the tongues of Babel? They are full of new wine: Doe they preach Christs Kingdome? they are seditious; The resurrection? they are ablers. Is a man conscionable? he is an Hypocrite: Is he conformable? he is vnconscionable: Is he plaine dealing? he is rudely vnciuill: Is he wisely insinuatiue? he is a flatterer: In short, such is the wicked craft of the heart, that it would let vs see nothing in it owne forme; but faine would shew vs euill faire, that we might be inamored of it, and vertue vgly, that we might abhorre it; and as it doth for the way, so doth it for the end; hiding from vs the glory of heauen, that is laid vp for ouer-commers, and shewing vs nothing but the pleasant closure of wickednesse; making vs beleeue that hell is a palace, and heauen a dungeon, that so we might be in loue with death; and thus both in cunning conueyance, and false semblance, The heart of man is deceitfull aboue all things.

Ye haue seene the fashion of this deceit; cast now your eies vpon the subiect: And whom doth it then deceiue? It doth deceiue others, it can deceiue it selfe, it would deceiue Satan, yea God himselfe. Others, first: How many doe we take for honest and sound Christians, who yet are but errant hypocrites? These Apes of Satan haue learned to transforme themselues into Angels of light; The heart bids the eyes looke vpward to heauen, when they are full of Adultery; It bids the hands to raise vp themselues towards their Maker, when they are full of bloud; It bids the tongue wagge holily, when there is nothing in the bosome but Atheous prophanenesse; It bids the knee to bow like a Camell, when the heart is stiffe as an Elephant; yea if need bee it can bid a teare fall from the eie, or an almes or iust action fall from the hand, and all to gull the world with a good opinion; In all which, false chapmen and horse-coursers doe not more ordinarily deceiue their buyers in shops and faires, than wee doe one another in our conuersation: Yea, so crafty is the heart, that it can deceiue it selfe; By ouer-weening his owne powers, as the proud man; by vnder-valuing his graces, as the modest; by mis-taking his estate, as the ignorant; How many hearts doe thus grossely beguile themselues? The first thinkes hee is rich, and fine, when hee is beggerly and naked; so did the Angell of Laodicea: The second is poore in his owne spirit, when hee is rich of Gods spirit: The third thinkes that hee is a great fauourite of heauen, when he is rather branded for an out-cast; that he is truly noble, when hee is a slaue to that, which is baser than the worst of Gods creatures, sinne: Let the proud and ignorant worldling therefore know, that though others may mocke him with applauses, yet that all the world cannot make him so much a foole as his owne heart.

Yea, so cunning is the heart, that it thinkes to goe beyond the deuill himselfe: I can (thinks it) swallow his bait, and yet auoid his hooke; I can sinne, and liue; I can repent of sinning, and defeat my punishment by repenting; I can runne vpon the score, and take vp the sweet and rich commodities of sinfull pleasure; and when I haue done, I can put my selfe vnder the protection of a Sauiour, and escape the arrest; Oh the world of soules that perish by this fraud, fondly beguiling themselues, whiles they would beguile the Tempter.

Yet higher: Lastly, as Satan went about to deceiue the Sonne of God; so this foolish consort and client of his goes about to deceiue God himselfe: The first paire of hearts that euer was, were thus credulous, to thinke they should now meet with a meanes of knowledge and Deifying, which God either knew not of, or grudged them, and therefore they would bee stealing it out of the side of the apple, without God, yea against him: Tush, none eye shall see vs; Is there knowledge in the most high, saith the sottish Atheist? Lord haue not wee heard thee preach in our streets? haue not we cast out Deuils in thy name? sayes the smoothing hypocrite; as if hee could fetch God ouer for an admission into heauen. Thou hast not lied to man, but to God, saith S. Peter to Ananias. And pettish Ionas, after he had beene cooled in the belly of the Whale,& the Sea, yet will be bearing God downe in an argument to the iustifying of his idle choler, I doe well to be angry to the death. But as the greatest Politicians are oft ouertaken with the grossest follies (God owes proud wits a shame) the heart of man could not possibly deuise how so much to befoole it selfe, as by this wicked presumption: Oh yee fooles, when will ye vnderstand? He that formed the eye, shall he not see? Hee that teacheth man knowledge, shall not hee vnderstand? The Lord knoweth the thoughts of man, that they are vanitie. A rod for the backe of fooles, yea a rod of iron for such presumptuous fooles, to crush them in peeces like a Potters vessell. Psal. 94. 10, 11.

Ye haue seene the fashion and the subiect of this deceit: the sequell,or effect followes; euery way lamentable; For hence it comes to passe that many a one hath had his heart in keeping forty, fifty, threescore yeeres, and more, and yet is not acquainted with it; and all because this craft hath kept it at the Priscillianists locke, Tu omnes, te nemo; It affects to be a searcher of all men, no man is allowed to come aboard of it; And if a man whether out of curiositie, or conscience, be desirous to inquire into it (as it is a shame for a man to be a stranger at home; Know yee not your owne heart, saith the Apostle;) it casts it selfe, Proteus-like, into so many formes, that it is very hard to apprehend it. One while the man hath no heart, (לא לב) saith Salomon; Then hee hath (לבבלב) an heart, and an heart, saith Dauid; and one of his hearts contradicts another; and then how knowes he whether to beleeue? And what certainty, what safety can it bee for a man to liue vnacquainted with himselfe? Of this vnacquaintance, secondly, arises a dangerous mesprison of a mans selfe, in the nature and quantity of his sinne, in the quality of his repentance, in his peace and intirenesse with God, in his right to heauen, and (in a word) in his whole spirituall estate. Of this mes-prison, thirdly, arises a fearefull disappointment of all his hopes, and a plunging into vnauoidable torments: Wherein it is miserable to see, how cunningly the traiterous hearts of many men beare them in hand all their liues long; soothing them in all their courses, promising them successe in all their waies, securing them from feare of euils, assuring them of the fauour of God & possession of heauen (as some fond Bigot would bragge of his Bull, or Medall, or Agnus Dei; or as those Priests that *Gerson taxes, who made the people beleeue that the Masse was good for the eye-sight, for the mawe, for bodily health, and preseruation) till they come to their death-beds; But then when they come to call forth the comforts they must trust to, they finde them like to some vnfaithfull Captaine, that hath all the while in Garrison filled his purse with dead payes, and made vp the number of his companies with borrowed men; and in time of ease shewed faire; but when hee is called forth by a sudden alarum, bewraies his shame and weakenesse, and failes his Generall when hee hath most need of him; right thus doe the perfidious hearts of many, after all the glorious bragges of their security, on the bed of their last reckoning, finde nothing but a cold despaire, and a wofull horror of conscience; and therefore too iustly may their hearts say to them, as the heart of Appollodorus the Tyrant seemed to say vnto him; who dreamed one night that he was fleaed by the Scythians, and boyled in a Caldron; and that his heart spake to him out of the kettle (ἐγώ σοι τοῦτο αἴτιος) It is I that haue drawne thee to all this. Certainly neuer man was, or shall be frying in hell, but cries out of his owne heart, and accuses that deceitfull peece as guilty of all his torment: For let Satan be neuer so malicious, and all the world neuer so parasiticall, yet if his owne heart had beene true to him, none of these could haue hurt him. Let the rest of our enemies doe their worst, onely from the euill of our owne hearts, good Lord deliuer vs. Pſal. 12.

It were now time for our thoughts to dwell a little vpon the meditation, and deploration of our owne danger and misery, who are euery way so inuironed with subtilty. If we looke at Satan, his old title is, that old Serpent; who must needs therefore now, by so long time and experience, bee both more old and more Serpent. If we looke at sinne, it is as crafty as he; Lest any of you be hardened through the deceitfulnesse of sinne: If at our owne hearts, wee heare (that which wee may feele) that the heart is deceitfull aboue all things. Oh wretched men that we are, how are wee beset with Impostors on all hands; If it were more seasonable for vs to bewaile our estate, than to seeke the redresse of it; But since it is not so much worth our labour to know how deepe the pit is, into which we are fallen, as how to come out of it, heare rather (I beseech you) for a conclusion, how wee may auoid the danger of the deceit of our false heart; euen iust so as wee would preuent the nimble feats of some cheating Iugler; Search him, watch him, Trust him not.

* Qui publicè volunt dogmatizare seu prædicare populo, quod si quis audit missam in illo die non erit cæcus, nec morietur morte subitanea, nec carebit sufficienti sustentatione, &c.

Looke well into his hands, pockets, boxes, sleeues; yea, vnder his very tongue it selfe; There is no fraud so secret, but may be descried; were our hearts as crafty as the deuill himselfe, they may be found out; Wee are not ignorant (saith Saint Paul) of Satans deuices; much more then may we know our owne; Were the hearts of men (as Salomon speakes of Kings) like vnto deepe waters, they haue a bottome, and may bee fathomed; Were they as darke as hell it selfe, and neuer so full of windings, and blinde waies, and obscure turnings, doe but take the lanthorne of Gods law in your hand, and you shall easily finde all the false and foule corners of them; As Dauid saith of the Sun, nothing is hid from the light thereof; Proue your selues, saith the Apostle; It is hard if falshood be so constant to it selfe that by many questions it be not tripped; Where this duty is slackned, it is no wonder if the heart bee ouer-run with spirituall fraud; Often priuy searches scarre away vagrant and disorderly persons; where no inquiry is made, is a fit harbour for them; If yee would not haue your hearts, therefore, become the lawlesse Ordinaries of vncleane spirits, search them oft; Leaue not a straw vnshaken to finde out these Labanish Teraphim that are stollen, and hid within vs: And, when we haue searched our best, if we feare there are yet some vnknowne euils lurking within vs (as the man after Gods owne heart prayes against secret sinnes) let vs call him in that cannot be deceiued; and say to God with the Psalmist, Search thou me, ô Lord, and trie mee; Oh let vs yeeld our selues ouer to bee ransackt by that all-seeing eye, and effectuall hand of the Almighty. All our daubing, and cogging, and packing, and shuffling lies open before him, and he onely can make the heart ashamed of it selfe.

And when our hearts are once stript naked, and carefully searcht, let our eyes be euer fixedly bent vpon their conueyances, and inclinations; If we search and watch not, we may be safe for the present, long we cannot; for our eye is no sooner off, than the heart is busie in some practise of falshood; It is well if it forbeare whiles we looke on, for The thoughts of mans heart are only euill continually; and many a heart is like some bold and cunning theefe, that lookes a man in the face, and cuts his purse: But surely, if there be any guardian of the soule, it is the eye; The wise mans eye (saith Salomon) is in his head; doubtlesse, on purpose to looke into his heart: My sonne, aboue all keepings keepe thy heart, saith he; If we doe not dogge our hearts then in all our wayes, but suffer our selues to lose the sight of them, they run wilde, and we shall not recouer them till after many slippery tricks on their parts, and much repentance on ours. Alas, how little is this regarded in the world? wherein the most take no keepe of their soules, but suffer themselues to run after the wayes of their owne hearts, without obseruation, without controlement; What should I say of these men, but that they would faine be deceiued, and perish? For after this loose licentiousnesse (without the great mercy of God) they neuer set eye more vpon their hearts, till they see them either fearefully intoyled in the present iudgments of God, or fast chained in the pit of hell, in the torments of finall condemnation.

Thirdly, if our searches and watches should faile vs, we are sure our distrust cannot; It is not possible our heart should deceiue vs, if we trust it not; Wee carry a remedie within vs of others fraud; and why not of our owne? The Italians not vnwisely pray God (in their knowne prouerbe) to deliuer them from whom they trust; for we are obnoxious to those we relie vpon, but nothing can leese that which it had not; Distrust therefore can neuer be disappointed: If our hearts then shall promise vs ought (as it hath hath learned to profer largely, of him that said, All these will I giue thee) although with vowes and oathes, aske for his assurances; if he cannot fetch them from the euidences of God, trust him not: If he shall report ought to vs, aske for his wittnesses; if hee cannot produce them from the records of God, trust him not: If he shall aduise vs ought, aske for his warrant; if he cannot fetch it from the Oracles of God, trust him not; and in all things so beare our selues to our heart, as those that thinke they liue amongst theeues and cozeners; euer iealously and suspiciously; taking nothing of their word, scarce daring to trust our owne senses; making sure worke in all matters of their transactions. I know I speake to wise men, whose counsell is wont to be asked, and followed, in matter of the assurances of estates; whose wisdome is frequently imployed in the triall, euiction, dooming of malefactors: Alas, what shall it auaile you that you can aduise for the preuention of others trauell, if in the meane time you suffer your selues to be cozened at home? What comfort can you finde in publike seruice to the state against offenders, if you should carry a fraudulent and wicked heart in your owne bosomes? There is one aboue whom we may trust, whose word is more firme than heauen; When heauen shall passe, that shall stand; It is no trusting ought besides, any further than he giues his word for it. Mans Epithet is Homo mendax, and his best part, the hearts, deceitfull. Alas, what shall we thinke, or say of the condition of those men, which neuer follow any other aduice than what they take of their owne heart? Such are the most; that make not Gods Law of their counsell; As Esay said of Israel, Abijt vagus in vias cordis sui: Surely they are not more sure they haue an heart, than that they shall be deceiued with it, and betraied vnto death; Of them may I say, as Salomon doth of the wanton foole, that followes an harlot; Thus with her great craft she caused him to yeeld, and with her flattering lips she inticed him: And he followed her straight waies, as an oxe that goes to the slaughter, or as a foole to the stocks for correction. Oh then, deare Christians, as euer yee desire to auoid that direfull slaughter-house of hell, those wailings, and gnashings, and gnawings, and euerlasting burnings, looke carefully to your owne hearts; and what euer suggestions they shall make vnto you, trust them not, till you haue tried them by that vnfaileable rule of righteousnesse, the royall law of your Maker, which can no more deceiue you than your hearts can free you from deceit.

Esa. 57. 17.

Pro. 7. 21.

Lastly, that wee may auoid not onely the euents, but the very enterprises of this deceit, let vs countermine the subtill workings of the heart. Our Sauiour hath bidden vs be wise as Serpents; What should be wise but the heart? And can the heart be wiser than it selfe? Can the wisedome of the heart remedie the craft of the heart? Certainly it may. There are two men in euery regenerate breast, the old and the new; And of these (as they are euer plotting against each other) wee must take the better side, and labour that the new man, by being more wise in God, may out-strip the old: And how shall that be done? If we would dispossesse the strong man that keepes the house, our Sauiour bids vs bring in a stronger than hee; and if we would ouer-reach the subtiltie of the old man, yea, the old Serpent, bring in a wiser than he, euen the Spirit of God, the God of wisdome; If we would haue Achitophels wicked counsels crossed, set vp an Hushai within vs: The foolishnesse of God is wiser than the wisdome of men. Could we but settle God within vs, our craftie hearts would be out of countenance, and durst not offer to play any of their deluding tricks before him from whom nothing is hid; and if they could be so impudently presumptuous, yet they should be so soone controlled in their first motions, that there would be more danger of their confusion, than of our deceit. As ye loue your selues therefore, and your owne safetie, and would be free from the perill of this secret broaker of Satan, your owne hearts, render them obediently into the hands of God; giue him the keyes of these closets, of his owne making; beseech him that he will vouchsafe to dwell and reigne in them; so shall we be sure that neither Satan shall deceiue them, nor they deceiue vs; but both we and they shall be kept safe and inuiolable, and presented glorious to the appearance of our Lord Iesus Christ: To whom with the Father, and the holy Ghost, be all honour and glory, for euer and euer. Amen.

A

SERMON PREACHED TO THE COVRT AT THEOBALDS, on Sunday, Sept. 21. 1623.

By Ios. Hall.

Imprinted at London, 1627.

Imprimatur. Jo. Wilkins, R. C. Cant. Capellanus, Decembr. 14. 1647.

TO THE RIGHT HONOVRABLE WILLIAM EARLE OF PEMBROKE, LORD high Chamberlaine; CHANCELLOR of the Vniuersity of Oxford; One of his MAIESTIES most Honourable Priuie Counsell.

RIGHT HONOVRABLE,

LEt it please you to receiue from the Presse what you vouchsafed to require from my pen: Vnworthy I confesse either of the publike light, or the beames of your Honours iudicious eies; yet such as (besides the motiue of common importunity) I easily apprehended, might bee not a little vsefull for the times; which, if euer, require quickning: Neither is it to no purpose that the world should see in what stile we speake to the Court, not without acceptation. This, and what euer seruice I may be capable of, are iustly deuoted to your Lordship, whom all good hearts follow with true Honour, as the great Patron of learning, the sincere friend of Religion, and rich purchaser of Truth. The God of Heauen adde to the number of such Peeres, and to the measure of your Lo: graces and happinesse.

Your Honours in all humble and faithfull obseruance,

IOS. HALL.

The Best Bargaine.

Pro. 23. 23. Buy the Truth, and ſell it not.

THe ſubiect of my Text is a Bargaine, and Sale. A Bargaine enioyned, a ſale forbidden: and the ſubiect of both bargaine and ſale, is Truth; A bargaine able to make vs all rich; a ſale able to make any of vs miſerable; Buy the Truth, and ſell it not; A ſentence of ſhort ſound, but large extent; the words are but ſeuen ſyllables, an eaſie load for our memories; the matter is a world of worke; a long taske for our liues. And firſt, let me call you to this Mart, which holds both now, and euer; If yee loue your ſelues, be ye cuſtomers at this ſhop of heauen; Buy the Truth.

In euery bargaine there is merx, and mercatura; the commoditie, and the match; The commoditie to be bought is the Truth; The match made for this commodity, is Buying, Buy the Truth. An ill Iudge may put a good Interrogatory; yet it was a queſtion too good for the mouth of a Pilate, What is Truth? The ſchooles haue wearied themſelues in the ſolution; To what purpoſe ſhould I reade a Metaphyſicall Lecture to Courtiers? Truth is as Time, one in all; yet, as Time, though but one, is diſtinguiſhed into paſt, preſent, future, and euery thing hath a Time of it owne; ſo is Truth variouſly diſtinguiſhed, according to the ſubiects wherein it is; This is Anſelmes, cited by Aquinas; I had rather ſay, Truth is as light: (Send forth thy Truth, and thy light, ſaith the Pſalmiſt) which (though but one in all) yet there is one light of the Sunne, another of the Moone, another of the Starres, another of this lower aire: There is an eſſentiall, and cauſall Truth in the Diuine vnderſtanding, which the Schooles call Primo-primam; This will not be ſold, cannot be bought; God will not part with it, the world is not worth it; This Truth is as the Light in the body of the Sunne. There is an intrinſecall or formall truth in things truly exiſting; For, Being and True are conuertible; and Saint Auſten rightly defines, Verum eſt illud quod eſt; All this created Truth in things, is deriued exemplarily, and cauſally, from that increated Truth of God; this the ſchooles call Secundo-primam; and it is as the light of the Sun-beames, caſt vpon the Moone, and Starres. There is an extrinſecall, or ſecondary truth of propoſitions following vpon, and conformable to the truth of the things expreſſed: thus, Verum is no other than Eſſe declaratiuum, as Hilarie; And this Truth, being the thing it ſelfe ſubiectiuely, in words expreſſiuely, in the minde of man terminatiuely, preſuppoſeth a double conformitie or adequation; Both of the vnderſtanding to the matter conceiued; and of the words to the vnderſtanding; ſo as Truth is when we ſpeake as we thinke, and thinke as it is; And this Truth is as the light diffuſed from thoſe heauenly bodies, to the Region of this lower aire; This is the Truth we are called to Buy: But this derinatiue and relatiue Truth, whether in the minde, or in the mouth, hath much multiplicitie, according to the matter either conceiued, or vttered; There is a Theologicall Truth, there is a naturall, there is a morall, there is a ciuill; all theſe muſt bee deare bought; but the beſt at the higheſt rate, which is Theologicall, or diuine; whether in the principles, or neceſſary concluſions; The principles of diuine Truth are Scriptura veritatis, Dan. 10. The Law of Truth, Mal. 2. The Word of Truth, 2 Cor. 6. The neceſſary concluſions are they, which vpon irrefragable inferences are deduced from thoſe holy grounds: Shortly then, euery parcell of Diuine Truth, whether laid downe in Scripture, or drawne neceſſarily from Scripture, is this Mercimonium ſacrum, which we are bidden to Buy; Buy the Truth.

This is the commodity; The match is, Buy; that is, Beat the price, and pay it. Buy it; Of whom? For what? Of whom, but of the owner, of the Maker?

The

The owner; It is Veritas Domini, Gods Truth, Pſ.117. His ſtile is the Lord God of Truth, Pſal.31. The maker; The works of his hands are truth, and iudgment, Pſal.111. And if any vſurping ſpirit of error ſhall haue made a free-bootie of Truth, and ſhall with-hold it in vnrighteouſneſſe, we muſt redeeme it out of his hands with the higheſt ranſome.

What is the price? That is the maine thing in buying; For, Buying is no other than pacto pretij: Elſe-where God proclaimes; Hoe, euery one that thirſteth, come, buy wine and milke without mony, and without price, Eſay 55. This is a Donation in forme of ſale: But, here muſt be a price in the hand; God will giue mercy, and not ſell it; He will ſell Truth, and not giue it: For what will he ſell it? Firſt, for Labour; The Heathen Poet could ſay, his gods ſold learning for ſweat; The originall word here vſed is (קְנֵה) Compara; Get it any way, either labore, or pretio; yea labore vt pretio. This great foreman of Gods ſhop tels vs we cannot haue it vnder, Pro.24. We muſt ſeeke for her as ſiluer, and ſearch for her, as for hid Treaſures; The veine of Truth lies low, it muſt bee digged and delued for to the very center. If Truth could be bought with eaſe and pleaſure, many a lazie Chriſtian would bid faire for it, who now reſolue rather vpon want, than toile. The ſlothfull worldling will rather take vp a falſhood for Truth, than beat his braine to diſcerne Truth from falſhood; an error of free-coſt is better than an high-rated Veritie; Labour for Truth is turn'd ouer for the taske of Church-men; no life fauours to theſe flegmaticke Spirits, but that of the Lilies, Neque laborant, neque nent; They neither labour nor ſpin; This dull reſolution is vnworthy of a Chriſtian, yea of a reaſonable ſoule; and if we ſhould take vp no other for the body, wee ſhould be fed with hunger, and cloathed with nakedneſſe; the earth ſhould be our feather-bed, and the skie our Canopie; wee ſhould abound with want, liue ſauagely, and die miſerably. It was the iuſt Canon of the Apoſtle, He that labours not, let him not eat; Certainly, hee can neuer eat of the heauenly Manna of Truth, that will not ſtep forth to gather it: Heare this ye delicate Courtiers, that would heare a Sermon if yee could riſe out of your beds; that would lend God an houre, if yee could ſpare it from your pleaſures; the God of heauen ſcornes to haue his precious Truth ſo baſely vnder-valued; if yee bid God leſſe than labour for Truth, I can giue you no comfort, but that ye may goe to hell with eaſe.

The markets of Truth, as of all other commodities, varie: It is the rule of Caſuiſts; Iuſtitia pretij non conſiſtit in indiuiduo; The Iuſtice of the price doth not pitch euer vpon a point; Sometimes the price of Truth hath riſen, it would not be bought but for danger; ſometimes, not vnder loſſe, not vnder diſgrace, not vnder impriſonment, not vnder exile; ſometimes yet dearer, not vnder paine; yea ſometimes it hath not gone for leſſe than bloud. It did coſt Elias danger, Michaiah diſgrace, Ieremie impriſonment, the Diſciples loſſe, Iohn and Athanaſius exile, the holy Confeſſors paine, the holy Martyrs death; Euen the higheſt of theſe is pretium legitimum, if God call for it, how euer nature may tax it as rigorous, yea ſuch as the franke hearts of faithfull Chriſtians haue bidden at the firſt word for Truth; What doe ye weeping, and breaking my heart; For I am ready not to be bound only, but to die for the name of the Lord Ieſus, ſaith S. Paul, Act.21. Skin for skin, yea all that a man hath will he giue for his life, ſaith Satan, but skin, and life, and all, muſt a man giue for Truth, and not thinke it an hard penni-worth; Neither count I my life deare vnto me that I may finiſh my courſe with ioy; ſaith the choſen veſſell, to his Epheſians. Oh the heroicall ſpirits of our bleſſed fore-fathers, that ſtucke not to giue their deareſt heart-bloud for but ſome corollaries of ſacred Truth; whoſe burning zeale to Truth conſumed them before thoſe fires of Martyrdome, and ſent vp their pure and glorious ſoules, like Manoahs Angell, to heauen, in the flame. Bleſſed be God; Bleſſed bee his Anointed, vnder whoſe gracious Scepter we haue enioyed dayes as much more happy than theirs, as their hearts were more feruent than ours: We may now buy Truth at a better hand; ſtake but our labour, wee carry it with thanks; I feare there want not thoſe that would be glad to marre the market; It can bee onely knowne to heauen what treacheries the malice of hell may be a brewing. Had but that Powder once taken, nothing had beene abated of the higheſt price of our predeceſſors; we had paid for euery dram of Truth, as many ounces of bloud, as euer it coſt the frankeſt Martyr; ſhould

the Deuill haue beene suffered to doe his worst, wee might not haue grudged at this price of Truth, Non est delicata in Deum, & secura confessio; qui in me credit, debet suum sanguinem fundere, saith Ierome. Christian profession is no secure or delicate matter, hee that beleeues must be no niggard of his bloud. But why thus deare? Not without good reason: Monopolies vse to enhance the price: Yee can buy Truth at no shop but one, In cœlo præparata est Veritas tua, Psal.89.2. Thy truth is prepared in heauen. And it is a iust Rule of Law, Quisque in rebus suis est moderator, & arbiter: Euery man may rate his owne: Neither is this only the sole commodity of God, but besides, deare to the owner. Dilexisti veritatem; Thou hast loued Truth, saith the Psalmist. And it is a true rule in the Cases of Commerce, Affectus æstimari potest, Our loue may be valued in the price. Yea, O God, thy loue to Truth cannot be valued; It is thy selfe, thou that art Truth it selfe hast said so, I am the Way, the Truth, and the Life; Wee cannot therefore know how much thou loueſt thy Truth, because as thy selfe is infinite, so is thy loue to thy selfe: What should wee hunt for comparisons? If all the earth were gold, what were it? when euen very heauen it selfe is trash to thee in respect of Truth: No maruell if thou set it at an high rate; it is not more precious to thee, than beneficiall to vs. It frees vs, Iohn 8.32. It renues vs, Iames 1. 18. It confirmes vs, Prou. 12.19. It sanctifies vs, Iohn 17. 17. It defends vs, Psal. 91.4. Shortly, it doth all for vs that God doth; for God works by his Almighty word, and his Word is Truth, Iohn 17. Therefore buy the Truth. And if truth be thus precious, thus beneficiall; how comes it to passe that it is neglected, contemned? Some passe by it, and doe not so much as cheapen it; Others cheapen it, but bid nothing; Others bid something, but vnder-foot; Others bid well, but stake it not; Others lastly stake downe, but reuoke it. The first that passe by and cheapen it not, are careleſse vnbeleeuers; The next that cheapen it, and bid nothing, are formall Christians; The third that bid something but not enough, are worldly semi-Christians; The fourth that bid well and stake it not, are glorious hypocrites; The last that stake downe and reuoke it, are damnable Apostates. Take all these out of the society of men; and how many customers hath God that care to buy the Truth? If Truth were some rich chattell, it would be bought; If Truth were some goodly Lordship, or the reuersion of some good Office, it would be bought; If Truth were some Benefice, or spiritual promotion (Oh time!) it would be bought; Yea, how deare are we content to pay for our filthy lusts; wee will needs purchase them (too oft) with shame, beggery, disease, damnation; only the sauing Truth of God will not off hand. What is the reason of this? First of all; It is but bare, simple, plaine, honest, homely Truth, without welt, without guard; It will abide none but natiue colours, it scorneth to wooe fauour with farding, and licking, and counterfeisance; it hates either bought, or borrowed beauty; and therefore like some natiue face among the painted, lookes course, and rusty. There are two shops that get away all the custome from Truth, The shop of Vanity, the shop of Error; The one sels knacks and gew-gawes, the other false wares, and adulterate; both of their commodities are so gilded, and gaudy, and glittering, that all fooles throng thither, and complaine to want elbow-roome, and striue who shall bee first serued; Whereas the secret worke of artleſse and vnpolisht Truth can winne no eie to view it, no tongue to aske so much, as, What will it cost me? Oh yee sonnes of men, how long will yee loue vanity, and seeke after lies?

Secondly, though Truth in it selfe bee alwaies excellent, yet the issue of it is not seldome distastefull; Veritas odium: There is one Michaiah whom I hate: Am I become your enemie, because I tell you the truth? And this is the cause that Frier Menot alleages, why Truth in his Time was so vnwelcome to the court. But if truth be the mother of Hatred, shee is the daughter of Time, and Truth hath learn't this of Time, to deuoure her owne brood; So that in Time, Truth shall consume hatred; and at the last, a galling Truth shall haue more thanks, than a smoothing supparisitation. In the meane time, Veritas nihil erubescit præterquam abscondi; Truth blusheth at nothing but secrecy, as Tertul.

How euer then fond, or false hearts value the Truth, let vs, that should be wise Christians, esteeme it as the pearle hid in the field, which the man sold all that euer hee had to purchase. Would it not set any heart on fire with an holy anger, to see what the enemies of Truth bid, and giue for falshood, for faction? Their liberty, their country, the life of their Soueraigne, the eternall state of their soules hath not seemed too deare to cast away vpon an ill bargaine of mis-religion; and shall not we bid so much as our zealous well-wishes, our effectuall endeuours, our carefull obseruances for the vndoubted truth of our Maker and Redeemer? What shall I say to the miserable and stupid carelessnesse of these thriftlesse and godlesse times; wherein euery thing is appriſed, euery thing is bought, saue that which is most precious, most beneficiall, Truth. Yee great ones are made for precedents to the inferiour world; your example is able to bring either good or euill into fashion; For Gods sake, for your soules sake, what euer transactions yee make for the world, lay your plots for the blessed purchase of Truth; Oh let not your fickle honours, your vnsatisfying pleasures, your worthlesse profits, yea your momentany liues seeme deare to you in comparison of heauenly Truth. It is no shame in other parts for great Peeres to be Merchants; Mercatores tui erant principes, saith the Angell concerning Babylon, Reuel. 18. Thy Merchants were the Princes of the earth; And why should not yee great ones be the Merchants of Truth? Blessed be the God of Truth, ye are so. It is no proud word to say, that no Court vnder heauen hath so rich a stocke of Truth, as this of Great Britaine, yet let me tell you, the very Angels knew not so much, but they desired to know more, Ephes. 3. 10. And if yee had already that vespertine knowledge of the Saints which ye shall once haue in heauen, yet know that this Bargaine stands not more in the iudgement, than in the affections. What euer our speculations may be, if our hearts be not set vpon Truth, we may be Brokers, we are not Merchants; Brokers for others, not Merchants for our selues. As our Sauiour then, when hee bids vs sell all, forsake all, holds it done, when in preparation of minde we are ready to abdicate all for his name, though wee doe it not, so doth God hold vs to buy Truth, when we bestow our best thoughts, our deerest well-wishes vpon it, though we haue it already. Oh stirre vp your languishing zeale, ye noble Courtiers, rouze vp your drouping loue to diuine Truth; Giue your hearts to it, yee cannot but giue all for it; And if yee doe not finde the sweet gaine of this Bargaine, in this lower Region of error, and confusion, ye shall once finde it in those eternall and empireall habitations of Truth, where the God of Truth shall make vp the Truth of his promises, with the euerlasting truth of his glorious performances; where Mercy and Truth shall so meet, and embrace one another, that both of them shall embrace the faithfull soule, for euer and euer.

This for the Bargaine of Truth; The forbidden sale followeth; sell it not. Commonly what we buy, we may sell. Alexander, not the Great, but the good, sold Miters, Keyes, Altars; the verse giues the reason; Emerat ille prius, He bought them. So Saint Austen of Simon Magus, Volebat emere spiritum Sanctum, quia vendere volebat spiritum Sanctum; Hee would buy the Holy Ghost, because he meant to sell it. Giue me a man that buyes a Seat of Iudicature; I dare not trust him for not selling of Iustice; he that sits in the chaire of Symony, will not giue Orders, will not sticke to sell soules. Some things we may buy to sell, as Ioseph did the Egyptian corne; some things we must sell, if we buy, as an Israelites inheritance, Leu. 25. But here we are charged to buy what it is a sin to sell; Buy the Truth and sell it not; There is many a good thing ill sold; Esau sels his birthright for pottage, Hamor and Shechem sell their Country for loue, Dalilah sels her louer for a bribe; The Patriarchs sell their Brother for twenty siluer rings; Haman sels the Iewes for nought. The Gentiles sell the Iewish girles for wine, Ioel. 3.3. Israel sels the righteous for siluer, and the poore for shooes, Amos 2.6. Their Iudges sell sins or innocency for rewards, Esay 5.23. Ahab sels himselfe to wickednesse; Iudas sels his master; Demas sels the Truth; All these make an ill market; And in all it is a sure rule, the better the commodity is, the more pernicious is the sale. The indefiniteneſſe of the charge implies a generality. Buy it at any price; At no price sell it. It is the fauour of God, that it may be bought for any rate; It is the Iustice of God, that vpon any rate it should not be sold: As buying and selling are opposites in relation; So that for which we must not sell Truth is opposite to that for which we may buy it. Wee must buy it with labour, therefore we may not sell it for ease; If need be we must muſt buy it with loſſe, therefore wee may not ſell it for gaine; we muſt buy it with diſgrace, we may not ſell it for honour; we muſt buy it with exile or impriſonment, we may not ſell it for liberty; we muſt buy it with paine, we may not ſell it for pleaſure; We muſt buy it with death, we may not ſell it for life; Not for any, not for all of theſe may we ſell Truth; this were damnoſa mercatio, as Chryſ. In euery bargaine & ſale there muſt be a proportion; now eaſe, gaine, honour, liberty, pleaſure, life, yea worlds of all theſe are no way counteruailable to Truth; For what ſhall it profit a man to win the whole world and leeſe his owne ſoule? And he cannot ſell Truth, but his ſoule is loſt: And if any thing in the world may ſeeme a due price of Truth, it is Peace. Oh ſweet and deare name of Peace, the good newes of Angels, the ioy of good men! who can but affect thee, who can but magnifie thee? The God of heauen before whom I ſtand, from whom I ſpeake, knows how oft, how deeply I haue mourned for the diuiſions of his Church, how earneſtly I haue ſet my hand on worke vpon ſuch poore thoughts of re-vnion, as my meanneſſe could reach; but when all is done, I ſtill found we may not offer to ſell Truth for Peace. It is true that there be ſome Scholaſticall and immateriall Truths (the infinite ſubdiuiſion whereof haue rather troubled than informed Chriſtendome) which for the purchaſe of peace might be kept in, and returned into ſuch ſafe generalities as minds not vnreaſonable might reſt in; but ſold out they may not be; If ſome Truths may be contracted into a narrower roome, none may be contracted for; Qui diuinis innutriti ſunt eloquijs, as that Father ſaid; Thoſe that are trained vp in diuine truths may not change a ſyllable for a world. Tene quod habes, Hold that thou haſt, is a good rule in all things; which if in temporalities it were well obſerued, we ſhould not haue ſo many gallants ſquander away their inheritances to liue Cameleon-like vpon the aire of fauour; But how euer this bee too well obſerued in theſe earthly things by frugall hands, which take as if they were quicke, hold as if they were dead: yet in ſpiritual graces it can neuer be obſerued enough; we get Truth, we buy it as Iacob did his birth-right, to keepe, to enioy, not to ſell againe: If therefore the world, if Satan ſhall offer to greaſe vs in the fiſt for truth, let vs anſwer him as Simon Peter did Simon the Sorcerer, Thy mony periſh with thee, becauſe thou haſt thought the Truth of God may be purchaſed with mony.

What ſhall wee ſay then to thoſe pedling petty-chapmen which wee meet withall in euery market, that will be bartring away the truth of God for trifles? Surely the forme of our ſpirituall market is contrary to the ciuill; In our ciuill markets there are more buyers than ſellers; there would be but poore takings, if many did not buy of one; but in the ſpirituall, there are more Sellers of Truth than Buyers.

Many a one ſels that he neuer had, that he ſhould haue had, the Truth of God; Here one chops away the Truth for Feare or ambition; There another lets it go for the old ſhooes of a Gebeonitiſh pretence of Antiquity; Here one parts with it for a painted, gilded hobby-horſe of an outwardly pompous magnificence of the Church; there another for the bables of childiſh ſuperſtition; One for the fancies of hope, another for the breath of a colloguing Impoſtor; Amongſt them all, Diminutæ ſunt veritates à filijs hominum, Pſ. 12. Truth is failed from the children of men; Yea as Eſay complained in his time, Corruit in platea veritas, Eſa. 59. 14. Truth is fallen in the ſtreets. What a ſhame it is to ſee, that in this cleare and glorious Sun-ſhine of the Goſpell, vnder the pious gouernment of the true Defender of the Faith, there ſhould not want ſome ſoules that ſhould trucke for the truth of God, as if it were ſome Cheap-ſide, or ſome Smithfield-Commoditie? Commutauerunt veritatem Dei; They haue changed the Truth of God into a lie, Rom. 1. 25. And all their care is, that they may be deceiued good cheap. Whoſe heart cannot bleed to ſee ſo many well rigg'd and hopefull Barkes of our young Gentry, laden with the moſt precious merchandizes of Nature and Grace, hal'd in euery day to theſe deceitfull Ports of Error, the owners partly cheated, partly robbed of Truth, deſpoiled of their rich fraight, and at laſt turn'd ouer-boord into a ſea of Deſperation? Oh fooliſh Galatians, who hath bewitched you, that ye ſhould not obey, that ye ſhould not hold faſt the Truth; Where ſhall I lay the fault of this miſcariage? Me thinkes I could aske the Diſciples queſtion, Nunquid ego Domine, Is it we Lord? Are there of vs that preach our ſelues and not Chriſt? Are there that preach Christ, and liue him not? Woe to the world because of offences. It must needs be that offences should come, but woe to the man by whom the offence commeth: God forbid that we should be so bad that the seuen hils should not iustifie vs; But what euer we be, the Truth is still, and euer it selfe, neither the better for our innocence, nor worse for our guilt. If men be faulty, what hath Truth offended? Except the sacred word of the Euer-liuing God can mis-guide you, we haue set you right. We are but Dust and Ashes, yet, O God, giue vs thine humble vassuls leaue in an awfull confidence so far to contest with thee, the Lord of heauen and earth, as to say, If we be deceiued, thou hast deceiued vs. It is thou that hast spoken by vs to thy people; Let God be true, and euery man a Lier; Whither should we goe from thee? Thou hast the words of eternall life. Deare Christians, our fore-fathers transmitted to vs the intire inheritance of the glorious Gospel of Iesus Christ, repurchased by the bloud of their martyrdome; Oh let not our ill husbandry impaire it; Let not posteritie once say, they might haue beene happy, but for the vnthriftinesse of vs their progenitors; Let it not be said, that the coldnesse of vs the Teachers, and professors of Truth, hath dealt with Religion as Rehoboham did with his shields, which he found of Gold, but left of Brasse. If Truth had no friends, wee should plead for it; but now that we haue before our eyes so powerfull an Champion of Christian faith, that with his very pen hath so laid error vpon the backe, that all the world cannot raise it; what a shame were it to be wanting to him, to Truth, to our selues? But perhaps now I know some of your thoughts; you would buy Truth (ye thinke) you would hold it, if ye could be sure to know it; There are many slips amongst the true coyne; Either of the mothers pleaded the liuing childe to be hers, with equall protestations, oaths, teares. True, yet a Salomons sword can diuide Truth from falshood; and there is a test, and fire that can discerne true metals from adulterate; In spight of all counterfeiting there are certaine infallible marks, to know Truth from Error; Take but a few of many; whether in the originals, in the natures, in the ends of both. In the first, Truth is diuine, Error is humane; what is grounded vpon the diuine word must needs be irrefragably true; that which vpon humane Traditions, either must, or may be erroneous. In the second, Truth is one conforme euer to it selfe, ἀληθεία ξυμφωνεῖ ἑαυτῇ, as one said; Omne verum omni vero consonat, All Truth accords with euery Truth, as Gerson; and as it is pure, so peaceable; Error is full of dissonance, of cruelty: No particulars of ours dissent from the written verity of God; We teach no man to equiuocate; Our practise is not bloudy with treasons & massacres. In the third, Truth, as it came from God, so is referd to him; neither hath any other end than the glory of the God of Truth; Error hath euer some selfe-respects; either αἰσχροκερδίαν, or κενοδοξίαν, filthy lucre, or vaine-glory; profit, or pride; We doe not pranke vp nature; we aime not, either to fill the cofers, or feed the ambition of men; Let your Wisdomes apply and inferre, and now (if ye can) shut your eyes, that you should not see the Truth; and, if ye care not for your soules, when ye see it, sell it: Let no false tongue perswade you there is no danger in this sale: How charitably soeuer we thinke of poore blinded soules, that liue in the forced, & inuincible darknesse of error, certainly Apostasie is deadly; How euer those speed that are robbed of Truth, you cannot sell Truth, and be saued. Haue mercy therefore on your owne soules, for their sakes, for the sake of him that bought them, with the deare ransome of his precious bloud; And as God hath blessed you with the inualuable treasure of Truth, so hoard it vp in your hearts, and menage it in your liues; Oh let vs be Gens iusta custodiens veritatem, Esa. 26. A iust nation keeping fast the Truth; So whiles ye keepe the Truth, the Truth shall keepe you, both in Life, in Death, in Iudgment; In life vnto death, in death and iudgment vnto the consummation of that endlesse and incomprehensible glory which the God of Truth hath prepared for them that ouercome.

To the happy possession whereof he that hath ordained, in his good time as mercifully bring vs; and that for the sake of the Son of his Loue, Iesus Christ the Righteous; To whom with thee, O Father, and thy blessed Spirit, one infinite God, be giuen all praise, honour, and glory, now and for euer. Amen.

A SERMON PREACHED AT THE RECONCILEMENT OF THE HAPPILY-RESTORED, *and reedified Chapell of the Right Honou-*rable, the Earle of EXCETER, in his House of S. IOHNS

ON SAINT STEPHENS DAY. 1623.

By Ios. HALL.

LONDON,
Printed for RICHARD HAWKINS. 1627.

TO THE RIGHT HONOVRABLE, MY SINGVLAR GOOD Lady, the Lady ELIZABETH Countesse of Exceter.

RIght Honourable: this poore Sermon both preached and penned at your motion (that is to me your command) now presents it selfe to your hand, and craueth a place (though vnworthy) in your Cabinet, yea, in your heart. That holy zeale which desired it, will also improue it. The God, whom your Ladiship hath thus honoured in the care and cost of his House, will not faile to honour you in yours.

For me, your Honour may iustly challenge mee on both sides; both by the Druryes, in the right of the first Patronage; and by the Cecils, in the right of my succeeding deuotions. In either, and both, that little I haue, or am, is sincerely at your Ladiships seruice, as whom you haue merited to be

Your Honours in all true

obseruance and duty,

IOS. HALL.

A SERMON PREACHED AT THE REEDIFIED CHAPEL OF THE RIGHT HONOVRA-ble Earle of Exceter, in his Houſe of Saint Johns.

HAGGAI 2. 9.

The glory of the latter houſe ſhall be greater than of the former, ſaith the Lord of Hoſts; and in this place will I giue peace, ſaith the Lord of Hoſts.

AS we haue Houſes of our owne, ſo God hath his; yea, as great men haue more houſes than one, ſo hath the great God of Heauen much more; more, both in ſucceſſion (as here, the latter houſe, and the firſt) and in varietie: Hee hath an houſe of fleſh, (Ye are the Temples of the liuing God;) An houſe of ſtone; (Salomon ſhall build me an houſe;) An houſe immateriall in the Heauens, 2 Cor. 5. 1. Wherefore then hath God an houſe? Wherefore haue we ours; but to dwell in? But doth not he himſelfe tell Dauid, and ſo doth Stephen the Proto-martyr (vpon whoſe day we are fallen) tell the Iewes, that He dwels not in Temples made with hands? True, he dwels not in his Houſe, as we in ours, by way of comprehenſion; he dwels in it by teſtification of preſence. So doe we dwell in our houſes, that our houſes containe vs, that we are only within them, and they without vs. So doth he dwell in his; that yet he is elſwhere, yea euery where, that his houſe is within him. Shortly, God dwels where he witneſſes his gracious preſence, that, becauſe he doth both in the Empyreall heauen, amongſt his Angels and Saints, and in his Church vpon earth; therefore his dwelling is both in the higheſt Heauen in perfect glory; and on Earth, in the hearts and aſſemblie of his children. As of the former, our Sauiour ſaith, In domo Patris mei, In my Fathers houſe are many Manſions: So alſo may we ſay of the latter, There is much varietie and choice in it; There was the Church of the Iewes, the Church of the Gentiles; There is a materiall, and a ſpirituall houſe. In the one, Salomons, Zorobabels, ſuch piles as this: In the other; ſo much multiplicity, as there are Nations, yea, Congregations that profeſſe the Name of Chriſt. One of theſe was a figure of the other; the Materiall; vnder the Law, of the Spirituall, vnder the Goſpell. Yee ſee now the firſt houſe, and the latter, the ſubiect of our Text and diſcourſe. The latter, commended to vs comparatiuely, poſitiuely. Comparatiuely with the former, Maior gloria. Poſitiuely, tiuely, in it ſelfe, In this place will I giue peace. Both, ſet out by the ſtile of the promiſer, and avower; ſaith the Lord of Hoſts. All which challenge your Chriſtian attention.

As the firſt houſe (which was materiall) was a figure of the ſecond, which is ſpirituall: ſo the glory of that materiall, was a figure of the glory of this ſpirituall. Now becauſe all the life and glory of the ſpirituall, ſtands in Chriſt the Meſſias, the Prophet lookes through the type of the materiall, at him which ſhall beautifie, yea glorifie, the ſpirituall, of whoſe exhibition the Prophet ſpeakes, Adhuc modicum, yet a little while, and I will ſhake the Heauens. This Modicum was but ſome 500. and odde yeeres; much to men, but a modicum to the Ancient of dayes, with whom 1000. yeres are but one day. It is in and by him, that this latter houſe vnder the Goſpell, ſhall in glory ſurpaſſe that firſt vnder the law. The Prophets had ſpoken glorioufly of the temple that ſhould be; and now, leſt when the people ſhould ſee the homely and cottage-like reedification of Zerubbabel, they ſhould bee diſ-heartned and offended, the Prophet deſires to draw their eyes from the ſtone and timber, to the ſpirituall inſide of the Euangelicall Church, ſhewing the glory of this latter Houſe, to exceed the former.

Some groſſe Interpreters haue lookt with Iewiſh eyes vpon the outward fabricke, which was threefold: Salomons, Zorobabels, Herods. Salomons, ſumptuous and magnificent: Zorobabels, meane and homely; Herods, rich and maieſticall, immodico ſumptu, incredibili ſplendore, as one ſayes. Salomons was before defaced. Now becauſe Zorobabel was ſo farre from making his Word good, that the people wept, when they ſaw the difference (which Caluin well obſerues, was not without a ſpeciall prouidence of the alwiſe God; elſe the Iewes would ſo haue fixed their eyes vpon the outward ſplendor, that they would neuer haue looked for the ſpirituall and inward Grace of the Houſe of God:) therefore they haue taken it of Herods temple; the walls and lining whereof were indeed anſwerable to this Propheſie, more glorious. But this conceit, as it is too carnall, ſo is quite diſſonant from the context, both in regard of the precedents, and ſubſequents. Of the precedents: For, how did the deſire of all nations come to that Pile of Herods? Of the ſubſequents: For, what peace was vnder the Herodian Temple? Firſt, the builder of it, was the chiefe oppreſſor of the Iewiſh liberty: and then, ſecondly, it gaue occaſion to the perpetuall miſerie of that people. Pilate would expilate the Treaſures of it for aquæ ductæ, which denied, coſt the Iewes much bloud. Vnder Claudius, twenty thouſand ſlaine in a Feaſt of vnleauened bread. Ionathas the Prieſt ſlaine by theeues ſuborned by Fælix, in the very Temple; and euer after, it was the harbour and ſpoile of Villaines. What hills of Carcaſſes? What ſtreames of bloud was in't at the laſt vaſtation? Enough to amaze any Reader: ſo as in that 79. yeares wherein it ſtood (longer it did not,) it was no better than a ſtage of Tragedies, a ſhambles of cruelty. Of that therefore God could not ſay, Dabo pacem; it was Templum adulterinum, as one cals it iuſtly, and had neither command nor promiſe: It was the Spirituall Temple, the Euangelicall Church, whoſe glory ſhall be greater than the Iewiſh, which ſhall be bleſſed with the deſire of the Nations, with the aſſurance of Peace. But why then doth the Holy Ghoſt ſpeake of Gold and Siluer, the coſtly materials of an outward ſtructure? Euen theſe very metals are figuratiue, not that God cares ſo much for them, but becauſe wee doe; becauſe our eies vſe to be dazled with this beſt parcell of Earth; Therefore when hee would deſcribe a glorious Church, hee borrowes the reſemblance of Gold, Siluer, precious ſtones, Eſay 60. and euen by theſe doth he ſet forth his new and Heauenly Ieruſalem, Reuelat. 21. Wherein then is the glory of Gods Euangelicall Houſe greater, than of the Legall? Yea, wherein is it not greater? Whether yee looke to the efficient, the matter, the duration, the extent, the ſeruice. The efficient, that was built by man, though directed by God: In this, God himſelfe is the Architect, not onely giuing the modell, but the frame. The matter, whether of ſtructure, or ornament. The ſtructure of the one was of ſtone and wood: of the other is of liuing ſtones. The ornament of the one was Gold and Siluer: of the other, diuine Graces of Faith, Charity, Hope, Sanctity, Truth, Piety, and all other vertues, to which, Gold it ſelfe were but traſh.

The

The duration of the one (euen that longſt-liued Temple of Salomon, though called (Beth עולם) domus ſeculi) was but 430. yeares. Of the other, beyond time to eternitie. The extent of the one to be meaſured by a few poles, yea, (though ye take in the Courts, and all) by a few Acres: Of the other, vniuerſall, ſo far as the King of Heauen hath any Land. The ſeruice in the one performed by a few men, mortall, ſinfull, the bloud of beaſts ſhed vpon the Altar: In the other, performed by our eternall High-Prieſt, after that higher order of Melchiſedech; offering vp his owne moſt precious bloud for our redemption. In that, Chriſt Ieſus was obſcurely figured: In this, really exhibited, borne, liuing, dying, riſing, aſcending, preached, beleeued, liued; Euery way therefore both in efficient, matter, duration, extent, ſeruice, Maior gloria.

Let no man tell me now of that iuſt wonder of the world, the Iewiſh Temple; white Marble without, lined with Gold within, Brazen pillars, Golden veſſels, coſtly vailes, an High-Prieſthood ſet forth with precious Stones, rich Robes, exquiſite Perfumes, curious Muſicke, and what-euer that ancient goodly inſtitution had rare and admirable; I ſay, the Clay of the Goſpell, is more worth than the Marble of the Law; Euangelicall Braſſe, more worth than legall Gold; the ragges of the Euangelicall Prieſthood, more excellent than the robes of the Leuiticall. In ſhort; the beſt of the Law is not comparable to the baſeſt of the Goſpell.

Iohn Baptiſt was the Ianus of both Teſtaments; he was to the Churches, as Noah was to the Worlds; he ſaw both the firſt, and the latter. It is a great word that our Sauiour ſaith of him, that amongſt thoſe which were borne, or rather (as ours reade it better) begotten of women, there did not a greater than he ariſe: but it is a greater word that he ſpeakes of the Children of the new Teſtament, that the leaſt in the Kingdome of Heauen is greater than he. I ſtand not vpon examining the compariſon, whether it be ratione ſanctitatis, or officij; it makes either way for my purpoſe, therefore was Iohn ſo great, becauſe he was the laſt of the Law, and the firſt of the Goſpell: and the old rule is minimum maximi maius eſt maximo minimi; therefore is the leaſt in this Kingdome of Grace greater than he, becauſe he is all, what Iohn was halfe; wholly vnder that Euangelium Regni, which is able to aduance him to a greater perfection, than that Harbinger of Chriſt. What a fauour then is it (Right Honourable and beloued) that God hath reſerued vs to theſe better dayes of his Goſpell, wherein the helpes of ſaluation are more cleare, obuious, effectuall; wherein, as the glory of the latter Houſe exceeded the former; ſo the meanes of that incomprehenſible glory of the houſe not made with hands, eternall in the Heauens, lie more open vnto vs? What ſhould we doe, but both vti, and frui, gladly vſe, and ſweetly enioy this vnſpeakable bleſſing, which God hath kept in ſtore for vs, and walke worthy of ſo incomparable a mercy. The old Iewes liued in the dawning of the day, wherein they had but a glimmering of that Sunne, which would riſe. We liue after the high noone of that happy day. If we walke not anſwerable to ſo great a light, what can we looke for, but vtter darkneſſe?

The leaſt of the greateſt is more, than the greateſt of the leaſt. Goſpell of the Kingdome.

Ye ſhall now giue me leaue (Right Honourable) to carry theſe words in a meet analogie to the preſent occaſion. The Temples vnder the Law, were both a figure, and a patterne of the Churches vnder the Goſpell. Within this roofe vnder which we now ſtand here, was both the former, and the latter houſe; and euen in theſe walls doth God make his Word good, That the glory of this latter Houſe ſhall be greater, than of the former. The firſt foundation of it was, no doubt, both pious and rich. I ſhall not need to fetch the Pedegrees of it from Saint Iohn Baptiſt in Ieruſalem, nor to diſcourſe of either the deuotion, or wealth of that religiouſly-military Order, for whom theſe ſtones were firſt laid. Imagine the Altar neuer ſo gay, the Imagery neuer ſo curious, the Veſtments neuer ſo rich, the Pillars, Walls, Windowes, Pauement, neuer ſo exquiſite; yet I dare boldly ſay, this preſent glory of this Houſe in this comely whiteneſſe, and well-contriued coarctation, is greater than the former. What care I? Nay, What doth God care for the worke of a Lapidary, or Painter, or Maſon? One zealous Prayer, one Orthodox Sermon is a more glorious furniture, than all the precious rarities of Mechanique excellencies. I doe moſt willingly (as what good heart heart doth not?) honour the vertuous actions, and godly intentions of our worthy forefathers, which (no doubt) it hath pleased God in mercy to accept and crowne, but withall it must be yeelded, that they liued vnder the tyrannous iniury and vsurpation of those Pharises, who kept the keyes of knowledge at their owne girdles, and would neither draw for them, nor suffer them to draw for themselues. Blessed be God for better conditions; the Well of life lies open to vs, neither are we only allowed, but inuited to those heauenly liquors, Inebriamini O Charissimi, Drinke, yea, drinke abundantly, O beloued, Cant. 5.1. This happy libertie of the sauing Gospell of Iesus Christ, daily and sincerely preached to vs (Noble and beloued Christians) is worthy to be more worth vnto vs, than all the treasures, ornaments, priuileges, of this transitory World; and this, since through the inestimable goodnesse of God, yee doe, and may finde in this latter House; well hath God verified this word in your eyes and eares; The glory of the latter House shall be greater, than of the former.

Conſecrated by Heraclius, Patriarch of Ieruſalem.

Hitherto the comparatiue praise of the latter House; the positiue followes in the promise of a gracious effect; In this place will I giue peace: wherein I know not whether the blessing doth more grace the place, or the place the blessing; both grace each other, and both blesse Gods people; In this place will I giue peace. If yee looke at the blessing it selfe, it is incomparable, Peace; that whereby the Hebrewes had wont to expresse all welfare in their salutations, and wel-wishes; the Apostolicall benediction dichotomizes all good things into Grace and Peace; wherein, at the narrowest, by Grace, all spirituall fauours were signified; temporall by Peace. The sweet Singer of Israel could not wish better to Gods Church, than Peace be within her walls: and behold, this is it which God will giue, Dabo pacem: yea, our eyes should stoope too low, if they should fix here. The sweet Quiristers of Heauen, when they sung that diuine Caroll, to the honour of the first Christmas, next to Gloria in excelsis Deo, said, In terris pax: Yet higher; the great Sauiour of the World, when he would leaue the most precious Legacie to his deare ones on earth, that they were capable of, he sayes, My peace I giue you. And what he there giues, he here promises, Dabo pacem, I will giue it. But where? Whence? In this place. Not any where; not euery where; but in his owne House, in his latter House, his Euangelicall House; as if this blessing were confined to his holy walls, he saith, In this place will I giue peace. This flower is not for euery soile; it growes not wilde, but is only to be found in the Garden of Sion. It is very pregnant which the Psalmist hath, Psal. 128.5. and 134.3. The Lord that made Heauen and Earth, blesse thee out of Sion. He doth not say, The Lord that made the earth, blesse thee out of heauen; nor, The Lord that made Heauen, blesse thee out of heauen; but, blesse thee out of Sion. As if he would teach vs, that all blessings come, as immediatly and primarily from heauen, so mediatly and secondarily from Sion, where this Temple stood. Some Philosophers haue held the Moone to be the receptacle of all the influences of the heauenly bodies, and the conueyances of them to this inferiour world, so as all the vertue of the vpper Orbes and Starres are deriued by her, to this elementary Spheare. Such doth both Dauid and Haggai repute the house of God; whither, as to Iosephs Store-house, doth God conuey the blessings of peace, that they may be thence transmitted to the sonnes of men. How, and why then doth God giue peace in this his House? Because here (as Bernard well) Deus & audit, & auditur, God heares, and is heard here: audit orantes, erudit audientes; he heares his suppliants, and teacheth his hearers. As this place hath two vses, it is both Oratorium, and Auditorium: so in respect of both, doth it blesse vs with peace: our mouth procures it in the one, our eare in the other; God workes in our hearts by both. In the first, God sayes, as our Sauiour cites it, Domus mea domus orationis: My House shall be called the House of prayer. And what blessing is it, euen the best of Peace, that our prayers cannot inseoffe vs in? Salomon when he would consecrate the Church he had built, solemnly sues to God, that he would inuest it with this priuilege of an vniuersall-gracious audience; and numbring the occasions of distressed Suppliants, makes it euer the foot of his request; (Then hearken to the prayer that thy seruant shall make towards this place; Heare thou in heauen, thy dwelling place; and when thou hearest, haue mercy.) If euer therefore

I will giue peace.

Glory to God in the highest heauens; in earth, peace, &c.

we would haue peace outward, inward, priuate, publike, ſecular, ſpirituall: If we would haue peace in our eſtate, peace in our Land, peace in our Church, peace in our ſoules, pray for it. And if euer we will pray for it, pray here, in Gods houſe, for in this place will I giue peace. In vaine ſhall we looke for it elſe where, if we aske it not here. It is true, we are bidden euery where to lift vp pure hands to God: but they cannot bee pure, that are profane; and they cannot bee but profane, that contemne the holy ordinances of God. He ſaid well, In templo vis orare, in te ora; for (Know you not, that your bodies are the Temples of the liuing God?) but let me as truly returne it; In te vis orare, in templo ora? Wouldeſt thou pray with effect at home? Pray at Church: elſe thy deuotion is but the ſacrifice of fooles; for he hath ſaid it, who hath good reaſon to appoint the circumſtances of his owne beneficence, In this place will I giue peace.

Will yee then ſee the reaſon why there is ſo much empty Caske in the Celler of God? Therefore are men void of grace, becauſe they are void of deuotion. They ſeeke not God where he may be found; and therefore it is iuſt with God not to be found of them, where they pretend to ſeeke him: for In hoc loco, In this place will I giue peace.

Gerſon diſtinguiſhes well in his Sermon de Angelis, that there is Duplex Cœlum, A double Heauen; Gloriæ, & Eccleſiæ; of Glory aboue, of the Church below; the Church is the Heauen on earth; where God is ſeene, heard, ſpoken vnto: where are his Saints (whoſe Aſſemblies are here;) where are his Angels: (Let the woman haue power on her head, becauſe of the Angels, 1 Cor. 11.) As the Iewes then, whileſt the Church of God was Nationall, were wont (according to command) to looke towards the Temple, if they could not come to it, in their deuotions: So now that the Church is Catholicke, or vniuerſall, and euery of our Churches is equally Gods houſe, (ἀμεσως) we ſhall gladly with Peter and Iohn, goe vp to this Temple to pray; How can we looke for a better incouragement, than God giues vs here, In this place will I giue Peace.

In the latter, as it is Auditorium, ſo, I create the fruit of the lips to bee peace (ſaith God.) Naturally wee are all euen thoſe that applaud themſelues in the beſt opinion of their harmleſſe, and faire diſpoſition) enemies to God: enemies both actiuely and paſſiuely. Actiuely, θεόμισες, God-haters, Rom. 1. Paſſiuely, Filij iræ, The ſons of diſpleaſure. We fell out in Adam through our owne wilfull apoſtaſie and diſobedience; and we ſtill ſtand out in the maintenance of our inward corruption. There is no way to peace but by reconciliation; there is no way to reconciliation, but by the Goſpell of Ieſus Chriſt, which is Euangelium pacis; there is no proper element for the Goſpell of God, but the Houſe of God; Locus iſte, In this place will I giue peace. It is not (I know) for euery heart to apprehend, either the want of this peace, or the miſery of this want. This is one of thoſe happineſſes which is moſt bragg'd of, where it is leaſt had. The ſenſuall Securitan pleaſes himſelfe in the conceit of his owne peace. All is well at home; he quarrels not with himſelfe, for he denies himſelfe nothing: God quarrels not with him, here are no checks of a chiding conſcience; no frownes of an angry Iudge; nothing but Pulchritudo Pacis (as the Prophet ſpeakes.) Alas, my beloued, call not this peace, call it ſtupiditie; euen Hell it ſelfe is not a Kingdome diuided in it ſelfe. There is no bleſſing, which is not alſo counterfeited, Pacem veram dabo, is the ſtile of the Prophets, Ier. 14. 13. This were a needleſſe Epithet, if there were not a falſe peace; ſuch is this of carnall hearts. That Word of eternall Truth muſt ſtand: There is no peace, ſaith my God, to the wicked. Haue you ſeene a ſore ſuddenly filled vp with vnſound fleſh, and fairely skinned ouer, without all offence to the eie, which ere long will breake out againe, and bewray a ſecret and ſo much-more-hardly-cured corruption? ſuch is a wicked mans peace. Haue you ſeene a ſlaue ſit quietly in the Gally, not ſtruggling with his chaine, not repining at his Oare (neceſſitas fortiter, conſuetudo facile?) Haue you heard a dying man profeſſe, that he felt no paine? Such is a wicked mans peace, of which hee ſhall once ſay, though now all ſeeme ſmooth, and plauſible; In pace amaritudo mea amariſſima; In peace I had great bitterneſſe, Eſay 38. 17. Neither is the want of this peace leſſe perceiued, than the miſery of this want. Men ſee no difference in the face of Heauen, whatſoeuer they doe; their blaſphemies and prayers finde the ſame entertainment: therefore the careleſſe careleſſe man reſolues, I ſhall haue peace, though I follow the wayes of mine owne heart. Oh the miſerable ſottiſhneſſe of wilfull ſinners! Sinne lyes (like a ſleeping Bandog) at the doore of their heart; they looke vpon him, as if hee would neuer wake; or, as if though hee ſhould, yet he were ſo clogged, and chained, and muzled, that there can be no danger of his hurt. Let God but rowze him vp a little, he ſhall bay them to deſpaire; he ſhall flie vpon them, and pull out their throats: Then ſhall their troubled heart preſent terrible things, and they ſhall feele what it is to liue in the anger of a God. They ſhall ſee the Almighty putting himſelfe into the feareſull formes of vengeance; Who can ſtand before his indignation? And who can abide in the fierceneſſe of his anger? His fury is powred out like fire, and the rocks are throwne downe before him, Nahum 1. 6. And if his very loue haue drawne bloud of his deare ones: (Terrores Domini militant contra me, ſaith holy Iob: The terrors of the Lord are ſet in aray againſt me, Iob 6. 4:) and he that bore the chaſtiſements of our peace, the Sonne of his loue, could ſay (My God, my God, why haſt thou forſaken me?) Oh what ſhall bee the Iudgments of his wrath? If this be the rod of children, Oh, what ſhall be the Scorpions for his enemies? They ſhall ſee that gulfe of fire ready to receiue them into euerlaſting burnings. They ſhall ſee the Deuils their inceſſant tormentors ready to ſeize vpon their guilty ſoules. Then, O then, ſhall they know, too late, what an happineſſe it is, that God here promiſes, Dabo pacem. Would wee then auoyd the vnſpeakable horror of this wofull condition? Would we finde the bed of our ſickneſſe and death, comforted with the ſweet teſtimony of an heauenly peace betwixt God and our ſoules? See whence we muſt fetch it; In this place will I giue peace. If euer we haue it, we muſt haue it from the bleſſed ordinances of God, his word and Sacraments, which this place can afford vs. In vaine ſhall yee ſeeke for this (deare Chriſtians) in a licentious Tauerne, in a rich Counting-houſe, in Chambers of dalliance, in full Tables, in Pompous Courts; no, not in thrones of earthly Maieſty. Alas, many of theſe are the make-bates betwixt Heauen and vs, moſt of them can marre, none of them can make our peace. It is onely the deſpiſed Miniſtery of the Goſpell; the Word of reconciliation, (as it is called, 2 Cor. 5. 19.) which ſounds in Gods Houſe, that can doe it. As yee loue your ſoules therefore, as you would finde peace at the laſt, and would looke with a comfortable aſſurance in the face of death and iudgment; as yee would ſee a gracious Mercy-ſeat in the dreadfull Tribunall of God at the day of our laſt appearance, frequent the Houſe of God: attend reuerently and conſcionably vpon the ſacred Inſtitutions of God, yeeld your ſelues ouer to be wrought vpon by the powerfull Goſpell of Ieſus Chriſt. Oh be not you wanting vnto God, he will not be wanting vnto you, but will make good this promiſe of his vnfailable grace, In this place will I giue peace.

It is a great word that is heere ſpoken, Dabo pacem; and therefore it is vndertaken by an omnipotent Agent, I will giue peace. If all the Angels of Heauen ſhould haue ſaid ſo, we ſhould ſoone haue replied, as Korah and his company did to Moſes and Aaron; Yee tooke too much vpon you, Numbers 16. 3. This worke is not for any finite power; the ſtile of peace, is the peace of God; the ſtile of God, the Mediator betwixt God and man, is, The Prince of Peace. He is the true Salomon, the other was but typicall. It is hee onely, that when the Diſciples were toſſed with contrary winds and threatning billowes, could command the windes and waues to a calme. It is hee onely, that when his Church is toſſed with the winds and waues of raging and impetuous enmitie, can giue outward peace. It is he onely, that when the diſtreſſed ſoule is toſſed with the winds and waues of ſtrong temptation, of weake diffidence, can giue inward peace. Iuſtly therefore doth he challenge this act as his owne, I will giue peace. We vſe to ſay, It is beſt treating of peace with a Sword in our hand. Thoſe who haue the aduantage of the warre, may command peace: vnderlings muſt ſtoope to ſuch conditions, as the victor will yeeld. To ſhew vs therefore how eaſily he can giue peace, God ſtiles himſelfe the God of Hoſts; a title wherein he takes no ſmall delight, referring not to the being of the creature, but to their marſhalling; not to their naturall eſtate, but their militarie; neither would God be lookt at in it, as a Creator, but but as a Generall. In but two of the Prophets, Esay and Ieremie, no lesse than an hundred and thirtie times hath hee this stile giuen him. Euery thing, as it hath an existence from the Maker, so an order from the Gouernour; and that order is no other than warlike, wherein it doth (militare Deo) serue vnder the colours of the Almighty. All creatures are both mustred, and trained, and placed in Garrison, and brought forth into the field, in the seruice of their Creator; they are all exercitus pugnatorum. If yee looke into Heauen, there is a company of heauenly Souldiers, Luke 2. Neither was there onely the construction of Idolaters, vniuersa militia cæli, to which they burnt incense; but of Moses himselfe; Thus the Heauen and the Earth were finished, and all the Host of them, Gen. 2. 1. If yee looke to the Earth, not men onely, whom reason hath fitted for such designes, but euen the brute, yea, the basest and indocilest of the brute creatures are ranged into arrayes: euen the very Locusts, though they haue no Leader, yet Egrediuntur per turmas, They goe foorth by bands, Prou. 30. 27. And if ye looke into Egypt (where for the time was Sedes belli,) you shall finde a band of Frogs, that were appointed to march into the very bed chamber, the bed, the ouens, the dishes of Pharaoh; you shall finde an host of Lice, of Flies, of Caterpillers, sent against those Egyptian Tyrants. Else-where, ye shall finde troupes of Palmerwormes, of Locusts, of Canckerwormes, of Caterpillers, to set vpon Israel, Ioel 1. 4. Shortly, where he meanes to preserue, the fiery Chariots and Horsemen of Heauen shall compasse Dothan. Where he meanes to destroy, the most despicable of his creatures shall be armed, to the ruine of the proudest. Doth Goliah stalke forth to the defiance of the God of Israel? A pibble out of the brook shall strew him on the ground. Doth an Herod heare his flatterers gladly say, Nec vox hominem sonat? Stay but a while, God sets his vermine vpon him; all the Kings guard cannot master those Lice. He hath Hornets for the Hiuites and Canaanites, Exod. 23. Mice for the Philistims, 1 Sam. 6. Rats for the Couetous Prelate: A Flie for Pope Adrian: A world of creatures for either defensiue or offensiue seruices. Quare fremuerunt gentes? Why doe the Heathen rage, and the people imagine a vaine thing? The Kings of the Earth set themselues, and the Rulers take counsell together against the Lord, and against his Anointed. Presumptuous dust and ashes, that dare rise vp against the God of hosts! If a silly Ant out of a Mole-hill should march forth, and proffer to wrestle a fall with a Gyant, there were some proportion in this challenge; there is none of a finite power to an infinite. Should all the powers of Hell band themselues with those on earth, Quis restitit? What power haue they of being, of motion, but from him whom they oppose? How easily can he blow vpon their enterprises? How easily can he command these to the dust, those to their Chaines? Bee confounded therefore, O vaine men, whose breath is in your nostrils (and that not your owne neither) when ye thinke of the power and Maiesty of the God of Hosts. Who hath resisted his will?

And why are we dismaid with the rumours, or feares of the strongest oppositions? Gebal and Ammon, and Amelec, the Philistims, with them that dwell at Tyre? Ashur also is ioyned to the incestuous children of Lot: (ὀλιγόπιστε) O thou of little faith, why fearest thou? The Lord of hosts is with vs, the God of Iacob is our refuge, Psa. 46. Come, all ye Bands of wickednesse, and conspire against the Scepter of the Kingdome (that is, the Gospell) of Iesus Christ. He hath his Armageddon, He hath a feast for the fowles of the aire, and the beasts of the field, whom he hath inuited to the flesh of Captaines, and the flesh of Kings, Reuel. 19. 8. I will not be afraid of ten thousands of people that haue set themselues against me round about; Dominus susceuit; The Lord hath sustained me, and he is the Lord of Hosts.

Yea, why are wee apalled, when we see the measures of the sonnes of Anak; the spirituall wickednesses in heauenly places? If wee looke at their number, they are Legions. If to their strength, they are Principalities and Powers. If to their nature, they are spirits that rule in the aire. We are men, flesh and bloud, single, weake, sinfull. What euer we are, our God is in heauen, and doth whatsoeuer he will; he is the Lord of Hosts, tho Cowards in our selues, yet in him we are more than Conquerors; he who is more than all power, than all Truth, hath said it; The Gates of Hell shall not preuaile againſt his Church. Thanks be to God, which giueth vs victory, through our Lord Ieſus Chriſt.

Laſtly, he is the Lord of hoſts; his vndertakings are infallible: Hath he ſaid, that the glory of the Euangelicall Church ſhall exceed the Legall? Hath he ſaid, that, In this place he will giue peace? How can the Church faile of glory, or the ſoule of peace? His word can be no more defectiue, than himſelfe impotent. Truſt God with his owne cauſes; truſt him with thy ſelfe; doe that he bids; expect what he promiſes; haunt this Houſe of his, wait on his ordinances. The Lord of Hoſts ſhall giue thee that peace, which paſſeth all vnderſtanding; and with peace, glory, in that vpper Houſe of his not made with hands, eternall in the Heauens.

To the poſſeſſion whereof, that God, who hath ordained vs, in his good time mercifully bring vs.

And now, O Lord God of Hoſts, make good thy promiſes to this Houſe of thine. Whenſoeuer any Suppliant ſhall in this place offer vp his praiers vnto thee, heare thou in Heauen, thy dwelling place; and when thou heareſt, haue mercy. What Word ſoeuer of thine ſhall ſound out of this place, let it be the ſauour of life vnto life to euery hearer. What Sacrament ſoeuer of thine in this place ſhall be adminiſtred, let it be effectuall to the ſaluation of euery receiuer.

Thou that art the God of glory, and peace, giue peace and glory to thy Seruants, for thy mercies ſake, for thy Sonnes ſake, euen the Sonne of thy loue, Ieſus Chriſt the iuſt. To whom with thee, and the holy Ghoſt, one infinite God, be giuen all praiſe, honour, and thankſgiuing now and for euer.

TO THE WORSHIPFVLL AND REVEREND, Mr. Dr. HALL, DEANE OF WORCESTER, my worthie and much respected Friend, all happinesse, with my loue in CHRIST IESVS.

REuerend Sir; this Sermon, I know, is at the Presse before you expected: But I thought (as this glorious Chapell occasioned it, so) it might minister occasion of perpetuall remembrance of the Chapell, by remaining its first Monument. And although both these were confined to the priuate; the Chapel for the Family of my Right Honourable Lord the Earle of Exceter, who hath giuen the materiall thereof sufficient luster: and the Copy of the Sermon to the Cabinet of my truly Noble, and vertuous Lady, his Countesse; yet both these are much and oft required to the publike, the Sermon to be an instruction, and so it is; the Chapell to be an example, and so it may be. The Sermon to teach all, to be all glorious in their soules. The Chapell to teach some, who build houses for their owne habitation, to set vp another for Gods Religion. The Sermon was craued at the hands of my Honourable Ladie, that it might come to the Presse; who, of her owne pious disposition, gaue forth the Copy, and for her Noble esteeme of your selfe, and of the worth of your Sermon, was willing and desirous to giue it way to the Printer. And this I thought good to impart vnto you, and to the courteous Reader, that you may be satisfied of the meanes how, and the cause why it comes in publike. And so praying for you, and desiring your prayers for me, I remaine

Your truly louing Friend,

H. BAGVLEY.

Opus Iuſtitiæ pax.

The worke of Juſtice (or righteouſneſſe ) ſhall be peace.

MY Text (you heare) is of Iuſtice and Peace, two royall graces; and ſuch as flow from ſoueraigne Maieſtie: There is a double Iuſtice, Diuine & humane; there is a double peace, outward in the ſtate, inward in the ſoule: Accordingly, there is a double ſenſe of my Text; a ſpirituall, a ciuill ſenſe: The ſpirituall concerning Theologicall Iuſtice, and inward peace; The ciuill concerning humane iuſtice and outward peace. The ſpirituall thus; The Meſſias ſhall cauſe the fruit of his perfect iuſtice to bee our inward peace with God, and our ſelues. The ciuill thus; The Magiſtrate ſhall cauſe the worke of ciuill Iuſtice in his adminiſtration, to be our outward peace with one another: In both, or either (as Muſculus well) there is an alluſion in the Hebrew word to a field; the ſoile is the heart or the State, the ſeed is Iuſtice, the fruit peace: That which was waſte ground is now a Carmell, a fruitfull field; and the fruit of this field of Iuſtice is peace. As there is good reaſon, wee will begin with the ſpirituall Iuſtice and Peace.

The great King of Heauen will diſforeſt that peace of the world, which hee calls his Church, and put it to tillage; it ſhall be ſowne with righteouſneſſe, and ſhall yeeld a ſweet crop of peace: in this onely, not in the barren heaths of the prophane world, ſhall true peace grow.

At firſt, God and man were good friends: How ſhould there bee other than good termes betwixt Heauen and Paradiſe? God made man iuſt; and iuſt man (whiles he was ſo) could not chuſe but loue the iuſt God that made him; ſin ſet them at odds; in one act and inſtant did man leeſe both his iuſtice and peace; now the world is changed; now the ſtile of God is Fortis vltor, God the auenger, Ier. 51. 56. and the ſtile of men, Filij iræ, ſons of wrath, Epheſ. 2. 3. There is no poſſible peace to be made betwixt God & man, but by the perfect iuſtice of him that was both God & man: I would there were a peace in the Church about this Iuſtice; It is pitie & ſhame there is not; but there muſt be hereſies: As there are two parts of Diuinity, the Law and the Goſpell; ſo each of theſe haue their their Iuſtice; there is a Iuſtice of the Law, and an Euangelicall Iuſtice. The Iuſtice of the Law when a meere morall man is iuſtified (out of his owne powers) by the works of the Law; very Papiſts will giue ſo much way to S. Paul, ſo much affront to Pelagius, as to renounce this; freely anathematizing that man who by the ſtrength of humane nature, or the doctrine of the Law, ſhal challenge iuſtification; Vnleſſe perhaps ſome Andradius haue priuilege to teach, that this Ethica iuſtitia, was enough to iuſtifie and ſaue the old Philoſophers.

Morall righteouſneſſe.

The Euangelicall Iuſtice is not without the interuention of a Sauiour; To which claime is laid in two kinds, either as imputatiue, or as inherent; The inherent wrought in vs: the imputed wrought for vs. How eaſie were it to lead you through a thicket of diſtinctions into a large field of controuerſie, concerning the nature, meanes, manner of our Iuſtification? No head in all Diuinity yeelds either more, or more important Problemes; In ſo much as Cardinall De monte, Vice-Preſident for the time of the Councell of Trent, in an Oration made by him in the eleuenth ſeſſion, profeſſes, that when they meant to diſpatch their Decree concerning Iuſtification in fifteene daies, it coſt them ſeuen moneths to finiſh, without one daies intermiſſion; and when all is done, they haue left the world, which was before (as Pighius ingenuouſly) intricated by the thorny queſtions of Schoolemen, rather more vnſatisfied and perplexed than they found it. It is the maine care of our liues, and deaths, what ſhall giue vs peace and acceptation before the dreadfull Tribunall of God: What, but righteouſneſſe? What righteouſneſſe, or whoſe? Ours, or Chriſts? Ours, in the inherent graces wrought in vs, in the holy works wrought by vs; or Chriſts, in his moſt perfect obedience, and meritorious ſatisfaction wrought for vs, applied to vs? The Tridentine faction is for the former; we are for the latter; God is as direct on our ſide as his word can make him; Euery where blazoning the defects of our owne righteouſneſſe, the imperfect ons of our beſt Graces, the deadly nature of our leaſt ſinnes; the radicall ſinfulneſſe of our habituall concupiſcence, the poilution of our beſt works: Euery where extolling the perfect obedience of our Redeemer, the gratious application of that obedience, the ſweet comfort of that application, the aſſurance and vntailableneſſe of that comfort: and laſtly, our happy reſt in that aſſurance. I inſtance not; open the Booke, ſee where your eies can looke beſide theſe. Satis apertè (ſaith their Caſſander) The Scripture is cleare ours; So is all antiquity, if they beleeue that learned Arbiter; So are their more ingenuous Doctors of the laſt age; So would they all be, if they had grace to know God, themſelues, grace, ſinne, heauen, hell; God perfectly iuſt, themſelues miſerably weake, Grace ſenſibly imperfect, ſinne vnmeaſurably ſinfull; Laſtly, if they knew that heauen is for none but the pure, that hell is for the preſumptuous. O Sauiour, no man is iuſt through thee, but he that is ſanctified by thee; What is our inherent juſtice, but ſanctity? That we aſpire towards, we attaine not to; Woe were vs if we were not more iuſt in thee, than ſanctified in our ſelues; wee are ſanctified, in part, according to the weakneſſe of our receit; we are iuſtified thorowly, according to the perfection of thine acceptation; were we fully ſanctified here, we ſhould be more than men; were we not thorowly iuſtified, we ſhould be no more than ſinners before thee; whiles we ſtand before thee as ſinners, we can haue no peace; Let others truſt in the Charets and Horſes of their owne ſtrength, wee will remember the Name of the Lord our God; The worke of thy Iuſtice ſhall be our peace.

Peace is a ſweet word; Euery body would be glad of it; eſpecially Peace at the laſt, as the Pſalmiſt ſpeakes: How haue the politickly religious held out twigs for the drowning ſoule to catch at? Due ſatisfactions, vndue ſupererogations, patronages of Saints, bargaines of Indulgences, woolward pilgrimages, and at laſt (after whips and haire-clothes) leaue the dying ſoule to a feare of Hell, doubt of Heauen, aſſurance of Purgatory flames; How truly may it now ſay to theſe Doctors, as Iob to his friends, Miſerable comforters are yee all; Hearken, O yee deare Chriſtians, to a better voice that ſounds from heauen; Come to mee all yee that labour, and are heauy laden, and I will giue you reſt. Mat. 11. 28.

Is there any of you whoſe vnquiet breſt boiles continually with the conſcience of any foule foule sin? whose heart is daily tyr'd vpon by the vultur of his secret guiltinesse? whose bosome is gnawed before-hand with that hellish Worme, which can no more giue ouer than die? It boots not to aske thee if thou wouldest haue peace. Peace? Rather than life; Oh wherewithall shall I come before the Lord, and bow my selfe before the most high God? Shall I come before him with burnt offerings? Wil the Lord be pleased with thousands of Rams, or with ten thousand Riuers of Oyle? Shall I giue my first borne for my transgression, the fruit of my body for the sinne of my soule? Heare, O thou distracted heart; what talkest thou of giuing to the owner? The world is his: thou art not thine owne; Yea, were these things thine, and not his, yet know, it is not giuing, but taking that must procure thy peace: An infinite Iustice is offended; an infinite Iustice hath satisfied, an infinite mercy hath applied it; Tak thou hold by the hand of faith on that infinite mercy, and justice of thy Sauiour; The worke of his Iustice shall be thy peace. Micah. 6.

Fly about whither thou wilt, O thou weary Doue, thorow all the wide Regions of the heauen, and waters, thou shalt no where finde rest for the soles of thy feet, but in this Arke of Christs perfect righteousnesse: In vaine shalt thou seeke it in schooles of morality, in learned Libraries, in spatious fields and forrests, in pleasant gardens, in sullen retirednesse, in witty conuersation, in wanton Theaters, in drunken cellers, in tables of gluttony, in beds of lust, chests of Mammon, whiffes and draughts of intoxication, songs of ribaldry, sports of recreation; No, no, the more thou seekest it in most of these, the further it flies from thee, the further thou art from finding it; and if these things may giue some poore truce to thy thoughts, it shall soone end in a more direfull warre. There is no peace, saith my God, to the wicked: Stray whither thou wilt, O thou wounded heart, thorow the Lawnds and Woods; alas, the shaft sticks still in thee, or if that be shaken out, the head: None but the soueraigne Dittany of thy Sauiours righteousnesse can driue it out; and till it be out, thou canst haue no peace. In plaine termes; wouldst thou haue peace? None but Christ can giue it thee; He will giue it to none but the penitent, none but the faithfull; Oh spend thy selfe into the sighes and teares of true repentance; and then raise thy humbled soule to a liuely confidence in thine all-sufficient Redeemer; Set thy Lord Iesus betwixt God and thy sins; God cannot see thy debt, but through thine acquittance; By his stripes we are healed, by his wounds we are stanched, by his death we are quickned, by his righteousnesse we are discharged; The worke of his righteousnesse is our peace. Oh safe and blessed condition of beleeuers; Let sin, Satan, world, death, hell, doe their worst; Who shall lay any thing to the charge of Gods elect? It is God that iustifieth, who shall condemne? It is Christ that died, yea rather, that is risen againe; who is also at the right hand of God, and maketh intercession for vs: Our enemy is now our Father, our Iudge is our Sauiour, the offended our surety, that precious bloud our ransome, that perfect righteousnesse our euerlasting peace.

Thus much of our spirituall Iustice, and Peace. The Ciuill followes: I know these two are wide tearmes; Iustice compriſes all vertue, as Peace all blessings; For that is iust in all kinds, which hath a meet adequation to the rule; All vertue therefore conforming vs to the Law of God, which is the rule of perfection, challengeth iustly to it selfe a stile of iustice.

Narrower bounds will serue our turne: We speake of Iustice first as a single vertue. Habits are distinguished by their acts; acts by their obiects. The obiect of all morall vertue is good, as of all intellectuall, is True. The obiect of this vertue of Iustice is the good of men in relation to each other; Other vertues order a man in regard to himselfe; Iustice, in regard to another. This good being either common, or priuate; common of al, priuate of some, the acts and vertue of iustice must be sutable; either, as man stands in an habitude to the whole body, or as he stands to speciall Limbs of the body: The former of these is that which Philosophers & Casuists call a legall and vniuersal Iustice. The latter is that particular Iustice, which we vse to distinguish by Distributiõ, & Commutation; the one consisting in matter of Commerce, the other in Reward, or Punishment: both of them according to a meet, though different, equality: An Arithmetical equality in Commutation; a Geometricall in distribution; the former regarding the value, or worth of the thing;

the latter, regarding the proportionable difference of the person. The worke of all these three Iustices, is Peace.

First, the legall Iustice is the apparant mother and nurse of publike Peace: When Gouernors and subiects are carefull to giue each other their owne; when both conspire to command and obey for the common good; when men frame their liues to the wholsome lawes of their Soueraigns, not more out of feare than conscience; when respect to the community caries men from partiall reflections vpon themselues; As contrarily distractions, and priuate ends are the bane of any state. When the head and members vnite their thoughts and endeuours in the center of the common good: the head to deuise and command, the eies to see, the eare to heare, the palate to taste, the heart to moue, the bellowes of the lungs to blow, the liuer to sanguifie, the stomach to digest, the guts to export, the hands to execute, the tongue to talke for the good of this naturall Common wealth of the body, all goes well and happily; but if any of these parts will bee gathering to themselues, and obstructions grow within; and mutinous distempers arise in the humours, ruine is threatned to the whole: If either the Superiors miscommand or the inferiors disobey, it is an affront to Peace. I need not tell you that good lawes are the wals of the City, the sinewes of the Politicke body, the rule of our life, the life of our state, without which men would turne brute, yea monstrous; the world were a Chaos, yea an hell. It is wisdome that makes lawes, it is Iustice that keeps them; Oh let this Iustice still blesse vs with a perpetuall peace; as those that doe not thinke the world made for vs, but our selues made for the world. let vs driue at an vniuersall good; let there be euer that sweet correspondence betwixt Soueraignty and subiection, that the one may be happy in the other, both in peace.

Secondly, the distributiue Iustice is not lesse fruitfull of peace; when rewards of honors, and gracious respects are suited to the well-deseruing; when malefactors smart according to their crimes; This Iustice hath stocks for the vagrant, whips for harlots, brands for petty larzons, ropes for felons, weights for the contumaciously silent, stakes for blasphemous hereticks, gibbets for murtherers, the hurdle, and the knife, and the pole for traitors; and vpon all these engines of Iustice hangs the garland of peace. It was not for nothing that Maximilian the First, passing by the gallowes, saluted it with Salue Iustitia. Ye neuer see Iustice painted without a sword; when that sword glitters with vse, it is well with the publique; woe be to the Nation where it rusts. There can be no more acceptable sacrifice than the bloud of the flagitious. Immediately after Garnets execution, Father David at Ypre, in a publike Sermon declared the miracles showne thereat; Amongst the rest, that a spring of oyle brake forth suddenly in the place where that Saint was martyred; In stead of a lie, let it be a parable; The bloud of Traitors shed by the sword of Iustice, is a well of oyle to fatten, and refresh the Commonwealth.

I know well how mercy befits the mouths of Gods Ministers: The soft tongue of a Diuine is no meet whetstone for the edge of seuerity; but withall, I dare say, that Iustice is a noble worke of mercy; neither need we wish to bee more charitable, than the God of mercy that saies, Thine eie shall not spare the murtherer, Numb. 35. 31. The Tempter to idolatry, Deut. 13. 6. The very sonnes of Leui were appointed to win an euerlasting blessing, by consecrating their hands to God in Israelitish bloud: The vniust fauour, and plausibility of Romish Doctors, towards capitall offenders, hath made their Sanctuaries (euen literally) a denne of theeues, an harbour of villany. It is memorable of Lewis of France, (stiled the Saint) that he reuersed a pardon wrought from him to a malefactor, vpon reading that verse in the Psalme, Beati qui faciunt iustitiam in omni tempore, Blessed are they that doe iustice at all times: No maruell if one of those foure things which Isabel of Spaine was wont to say, she loued to see, were, A theefe vpon the Ladder; Euen through his halter might shee see the prospect of peace. Woe bee to them that either for gaine or priuate interest ingage themselues in the suit of fauour to maliciously bloudy hands; that, by the dam of their bribes labour to stop the due course of punitiue Iustice;

Psal. 106. 3.

Iuſtice; theſe, theſe are the enemies of peace; theſe ſtaine the land with that Crimſon die, that cannot bee waſhed out but by many wofull lauers of reuenge: Farre, farre be it from any of you, generous Chriſtians, to endeuour either to corrupt, or interrupt the wayes of iudgement, or for a priuate benefit to croſſe the publike Peace: Woe be to thoſe partiall Iudges, that iuſtifie the wicked, and condemne the innocent; the girdle of whoſe equity ſags downe on that ſide where the purſe hangs: Laſtly, woe to thoſe vnworthy ones that raiſe themſelues by fraud, bribes, ſymonie, ſacriledge; therefore are theſe enemies to the State, becauſe to Peace; and therefore enemies to Peace, becauſe violaters of iuſtice, And the worke of iuſtice is Peace.

Thirdly, that commutatiue Iuſtice workes Peace, needs no other prooſe than that all the reall brables and ſuits amongſt men, ariſe from either true or pretended iniuſtice of contracts. Let me leade you in a Terme morning to the ſpacious Hall of Iuſtice: What is the cauſe of all that concourſe? that Hiue-like murmure? that noiſe at the Bar, but iniurious bargaines, fraudulent conueyances, falſe titles, diſappointment of truſts, wrongfull detentions of money, goods, lands, coozenages, oppreſſions, extortions? Could the honeſty and priuate iuſtice of men preuent theſe enormities, ſilence and ſolitude would dwell in that wide Palace of Iuſtice; neither would there be more Pleas than Cob-webs vnder that vaſt roofe. Euery way therefore it is cleare, that the worke of Iuſtice is Peace; In ſo much as the Guardians of Peace are called Iuſticers.

This for the Common-wealth; If it pleaſe you to caſt your eyes vpon her Siſter the Church, you ſhall finde that the outward Peace thereof alſo muſt ariſe from Iuſtice. Alas; thence is our hopeleſneſſe: Neuer may they proſper that loue not, that wiſh not peace within thoſe ſacred wals; but what poſſibility of Peace in the peremptorie repulſes of Iuſtice? What poſſibility of Iuſtice in the long vſurped tyranny of the ſucceſſor of Romulus? Could we hope to ſee Iuſtice once ſhine from thoſe ſeuen hills, we would make account of Peace; but, oh, the miſerable iniuſtice of that imperious Sea; Iniuſtice of claime, iniuſtice of practice. Of claime, ouer Kings, Church, Scriptures, Conſcience: Ouer Kings; there is S. Pauls ſuper-exalted (ὑπεραίρων;) His vſuall title is Orbis Dominus; Dominus vniuerſorum in the mouths and pens of his flatterers: And leſt Princes ſhould ſeeme exempted; he is Rex Regum, as Paulus 4. ſaies of himſelfe; he is ſuper Imperatores & reges, ſaith their Antoninus, Triumphus, Capiſtranus, and who not? How much? you know the calculation of the magnitude of the two great lights: How ouer them? As the maſter ouer the ſeruant; they are the words of their Pope Nicholas; The Imperiall throne is vnde niſi à nobis, ſaith Pope Adrian: What ſhould I tell you of his bridle, ſtirrup, toe, cup, canopy? Let the booke of holy Ceremonies ſay the reſt; Theſe things are ſtale, The world hath long ſeene and bluſhed, whence but from vs?

Lord of the world.

Ouer Emperors and Kings.

Ouer the Church; There is challenged a proper head-ſhip, from whom all influences of life, ſenſe, motion come; as their Bozius; why ſaid I ouer? He is vnder the Church: For he is the foundation of the Church, ſaith Bellarmine; Ouer as the head, vnder as the foundation? What can Chriſt be more? Thence, where are generall councels but vnder him, as the ſtreame of Ieſuites; Who but he is, regula fidei, as their Andradius: hee alone hath infallibility and indefectibilitie, whether in decretis fidei, or in præceptis morum, as Bellarmine. He hath power to make new Creeds, and to obtrude them to the Church; the deniall whereof was one of thoſe Articles which Leo the tenth condemned in Luther.

In decrees of faith or precepts of mauners.

Ouer Scriptures. There is claimed a power to authorize them for ſuch; A power to interpret them, ſententialiter & Obligatoriè, being ſuch; A power to diſpenſe with them, ex cauſâ, though ſuch. Ouer the conſciences of men; In diſpenſing with their oathes, in allowance of their ſins. It is one head of their Canon Law, A Iuramento fidelitatis abſoluit, Decret. p. 2. Cauſ. 15. qu. 6. And in euery oath is vnderſtood a reſeruation and exception of the Popes power, ſay his Paraſites.

Hee abſolues from the oath of Allegeance.

I am aſhamed to tell, and you would bluſh to heare the diſpenſation reported to be granted by Sixtus 4. to the family of the Cardinall of S. Lucie; and by Alexander 6. to Peter Mendoza Cardinall of Valentia.

And as there is horrible iniuſtice in theſe claimes; ſo is there no leſſe in practiſe. Take a taſte of all: What can be more vniuſt than to caſt out of the lap of the Church thoſe that oppoſe their nouelties, to condemne them to the ſtake, to hell for Heretickes? What more vniuſt than to falſifie the writings of ancient or moderne Authors, by ſecret expurgations, by wilfull miſ-editions? what more vniuſt than the withholding the remedy of generall Councels, and tranſacting all the affaires of the Church by a packt conclaue? What more vniuſt than the ſuppreſſion of the Scriptures, and mutilation of the Sacrament to the Laity? What more vniuſt than allowance of equiuocation, than vpholding a faction by willing falſhood of rumors, than plotting the ſubuerſion of King and State, by vnnaturall conſpiracies? Well may wee call heauen and earth to record againſt the vniuſtice of theſe claimes, of theſe practiſes. What then? Is it to hope for Peace, notwithſtanding the continuance of all theſe? So the worke of Iniuſtice ſhall be Peace: And an vniuſt and vnſound Peace muſt it needs be that ariſes from iniuſtice; Is it to hope they will abandon theſe things for Peace? Oh that the Church of God might once be ſo happy: That there were but any life in that poſſibility; In the meane time, let God and his holy Angels witneſſe betwixt vs, that on their part the Peace faileth; we are guiltleſſe: What haue we done? What haue we attempted? What haue we innouated? Only we haue ſtood vpon a iuſt and modeſt negatiue, and haue vniuſtly ſuffered. Oh that all the innocent bloud we haue ſhed could waſh their hands from Iniuſtice, from enmity to Peace.

That from them we may returne to our ſelues; For the publike, wee enioy an happy Peace; Bleſſed be God for Iuſtice: and if in this common harmony of Peace, there be found ſome priuate iarres of diſcord, whence is it but from our owne Iniuſtice? The world is of another minde; whoſe wont is to cenſure him that puniſhes the fault, not him that makes it; Seuerity, not guiltineſſe in common opinion, breakes the Peace: Let the queſtion be who is the great make-bate of the world; begin with the family: Who troubles the houſe? Not vnruly, headſtrong, debaucht, children, that are ready to throw the houſe out of the windowes, but the auſtere father, that reproues, that corrects them; would he winke at their diſorders, all would be quiet. Not careleſſe, ſlothfull, falſe, lime-fingred ſeruants, but the ſtrict maſter, that obſerues and rates, and chaſtiſes them; would he hold his hands, and tongue, there would be peace.

The like diſcourſe to this ye ſhall finde in Contra. Schluſſelburgius in his preface to his thirteenth booke Catal. Hæret.

Not the peeuiſh and turbulent wife, who forgetting the rib, vſurps vpon the head, but the reſolute husband, that hates to leeſe his authority in his loue; remembring that though the rib be neere the heart, yet the head is aboue the ſhoulders; Would hee fall from the termes of his honour, there would be peace.

In the Country, not the oppreſſing Gentleman, that tyrannizes ouer his cottagers, incroches vpon his neighbours inheritance, incloſes commons, depopulates villages, ſcruzes his Tenants to death, but the poore ſoules that when they are cruſhed, yeeld the iuyce of teares, exhibit bils of complaint, throw open the new thornes, maintaine the old mounds, would theſe men be content to be quietly racked and ſpoiled, there would be peace.

In the City; not the impure Sodomitiſh brothels, that ſell themſelues to worke wickedneſſe; not the abominable Pandars, not the iugling Cheater, not the Counterfeit Vagrant, but the Marſhall that drawes theſe to correction; Not the deceitfull Merchant that ſophiſticates his commodities, inhanceth prices, ſels euery inch of (what he cannot warrant) Time; Not the vnconſcionable and fraudulent Artiſan, but the Promoter and the Bench.

In the common-wealth; not the cruell robber by ſea or land, that lies in the way, like a ſpider in a window, for a booty, for bloud: Not the bold night-walker that keepes ſauage houres fit for the guilty intentions of his burglaries, but the watch that takes him; Not the ranke adulterer that neighs after his neighbours wife, and thirſts after onely ſtolne waters, but the ſworne men that preſent him. Not the traiterous Coyner, that in euery ſtampe reades his owne conuiction, whiles he ſtill renews that face againſt which he offends, but the Sheriffe that attaches him.

Not the vnreformable drunkard, that makes a God of his liquour, a beaſt of himſelfe, and and raues, and ſwaggers in his cups, but the Conſtable that puniſhes him; would theſe Officers conniue at all theſe villanies, there would be peace.

In the Church, not the chaffering Patron, or periured Chaplaine; not the ſeducing hereticke, or ſeditious ſchiſmaticke; not the ſcandalous Leuite, not the careleſſe Queſtman, not the corrupt Officiall, but the clamorous Preacher, or the rigorous High-Commiſſion. In the world; laſtly, Not the ambitious incrochers vpon others dominions, not violaters of leagues, not vſurpers of miſ-gotten titles and dignities, not ſuborners, or abettors of conſpiracies, and traitors, but the vnkinde patients that will not recipere ferrum: I wis the great potentates of the world might ſee a ready way to peace.

Thus in family, countrey, city, common-wealth, church, world, the greateſt part ſeeke a licencious peace in a diſordered lawleſneſſe; condemning true iuſtice of cruelty, ſtripping her of the honour of peace, branding her with the cenſure of troubleſome. Fooliſh men ſpeake fooliſh things: O noble and incomparable bleſſing of peace, how iniuriouſly art thou aſcribed to vniuſt neglect? Oh diuine vertue of iuſtice, how deſeruedly haue the Ancients giuen thee wings, and ſent thee vp to heauen in a deteſtation of theſe earthly indignities; whence thou comſt not downe at all, vnleſſe it pleaſe that eſſentiall and infinite Iuſtice to communicate thee to ſome choiſe fauorites. It is but a iuſt word, that this Iland hath beene long approued the darling of heauen; We haue enioyed peace, to the admiration, to the enuy of neighbour-hood: Would we continue it? would we traduce it to ours? Iuſtice muſt doe it for vs. Both Iuſtice and Peace, are from the throne; Peace is the Kings Peace; and iuſtly deſcends from Soueraignty by cõmiſſion: let me haue leaue to ſay with the princely Prophet (a word that was too good for the frequent text of a Pope) Diligite iuſtitiam qui iudicatis terram. Still, ô God, giue thy iudgement to the King, & thy Iuſtice to the Kings ſon. And if any ſhall offer wrong to the Lords anointed in his perſon, in his ſeed, the worke of that iniuſtice ſhall be war; yea Bellum Domini, the Lords war; (2 Sam. 25. 28.) Then let him who is both the Lord of Hoſts, and the God of Peace, riſe vp mightily for his anointed, the true King of peace; that he who hath graciouſly ſaid all this while, Da pacem, Domine, Giue peace in our time, O Lord; may ſuperſcribe at the laſt his iuſt Trophees, with, Bleſſed be the Lord which teacheth my hands to warre, and my fingers to fight.

Ye haue heard of the ſpirituall Iuſtice and Peace; Ye haue heard of the Ciuill; may it pleaſe you to mix both of them together: My text alone doth it; if you doe but with our moſt accurate Tranſlation, read Righteouſneſſe for Iuſtice; So ſhall you ſee the ſpirituall diſpoſition of Righteouſneſſe produce the ciuill effect of Peace. What is righteouſneſſe, but the ſincere vprightneſſe of the heart to God in all our wayes? He is perfect with God, that would be ſo.

Not to be guilty of ill.

What need I tell you that this is the way to true inward Peace, Nil conſcire, A cleare heart will be a quiet one. There is no feaſt to a good conſcience; this is meat, muſicke, wellcome; It ſeemes harder that true ſpirituall honeſty ſhould procure euen outward peace: Heare wiſe Salomon; By the bleſſing of the vpright, the city is exalted, Prou. 11. 11. When a mans wayes pleaſe the Lord, he maketh euen his enemies to be at peace with him, Pr. 16. 7. Righteouſnes exalteth a nation, but ſin is a reproach to any people, Pro. 14. 24. It followes then as a iuſt corollary, That the honeſteſt, and conſcionableſt man is the beſt ſubiect: He may perhaps be plaine, perhaps poore, perhaps weake, but the ſtate is more beholden to his integrity, than to the ableſt purſe, than to the ſtrongeſt arme; Whereas the graceleſſe, & vicious perſon, let him be neuer ſo plauſible a talker, neuer ſo carefull an officer, neuer ſo valiant a Leader, neuer ſo officious a Courtier, neuer ſo deep in ſubſidies, neuer ſo forward in actions, is no other than an enemy to the ſtate, which he profeſſes to adore.

An ill man a good ſubiect.

Let no Philoſopher tell me of, malus vir bonus ciuis; I ſay from better authority, that a lewd man can no more be a good ſubiect, than an ill ſubiect can be a good man: Heare this then (whereſoeuer ye are) ye ſecret oppreſſors, ye profane ſcoffers, ye foule mouth'd ſwearers, ye cloſe adulterers, ye kind drunkards, and who euer come within this blacke liſt of wickedneſſe, how can yee be loyall, whiles you lodge traitors in your boſomes? Proteſt what ye will; your ſinnes breake the peace, and conſpire againſt the ſacred

Crowne and dignity of your Soueraigne; What care we that you draw your ſword, and vow your bloud, and drinke your healths to your Gouernours, when in the meane while you prouoke God to anger, and ſet quarrels betwixt your Country and Heauen?

That I may winde vp this clew; It were folly to commend to you the worth of peace; we know that the excellency of Princes is expreſſed by ſerenity; what good hath the earth which God doth not couch vnder the name of Peace? Bleſſed be God, and his Annointed, we haue long and comfortably taſted the ſweetneſſe of his bleſſing; the Lilies and Lions of our Salomon haue beene iuſtly worded with Beati pacifici: Would we haue this happineſſe perpetuated to vs, to poſterity? Oh let Prince and people meet in the ambition to be Gens iuſta, a righteous nation, righteous euery way; Firſt, let God haue his owne; His owne dayes, his owne ſeruices; his feare, his loue, his all: Let Religion leade all our proiects, not follow them; let our liues be led in a conſcionable obedience to all the Lawes of our Maker: Farre be all Blaſphemies, curſes, and obſcenities from our tongues, all outrages and violences from our hands; all preſumptuous and rebellious thoughts from our hearts. Let our hearts, hands, tongues, liues, bodies and ſoules be ſincerely deuoted to him. Then, for men: let vs giue Cæſar his owne: Tribute, feare, ſubiection, loyalty, and (if he need) our liues; Let the Nobility haue honour, obeiſance, obſeruation; Let the Clergie haue their dues, and our reuerence; Let the commons haue truth, loue, fidelity in all their tranſactions: Let there bee trutinæ iuſtæ, ponderа iuſta: Let there be no grinding of faces, no trampling on the poore (Amos 5. 11.) no ſwallowing of widowes houſes, no force, no fraud, no periury, no perfidiouſneſſe.

Leu. 19. 36. Iuſt balances, iuſt weights.

Finally, for our ſelues; let euery man poſſeſſe his veſſell in holineſſe and honour; framing himſelfe to all Chriſtian and heauenly temper, in all wiſdome, ſobrietie, chaſtity, meekneſſe, conſtancie, moderation, patience, and ſweet contentation: ſo ſhall the worke of our righteouſneſſe be peace of heart, peace of ſtate; priuate and publike peace; Peace with our ſelues, peace with the world, peace with God; temporall peace here, eternall peace and glory aboue; vnto the fruition whereof, he who hath ordained vs, mercifully bring vs, for the ſake of him, who is the Prince of Peace, Ieſus Chriſt the righteous.

TO THE RIGHT HONOVRABLE, MY SINGVLAR GOOD LORD, EDWARD Lord DENNY, Baron of WALTHAM, all health and Happineſſe.

RIGHT HONOVRABLE,

I Might well perceiue by the Author that this Sermon was neuer intended to bee publiſhed, in any other Language than that wherein it was firſt ſpoken: being in reſpect of the matter, in a ſort appropriate to that Auditory wherein it was deliuered; But beſides the common deſire of many, finding the tranſlation attempted by diuers, and performed by ſome in ſuch a manner as did not altogether ſatisfie; It pleaſed my Father herein to improue my leiſure; wherein, howſoeuer I may haue ſomewhat failed of the firſt elegancy, yet I haue not bin far ſhort of the ſenſe. I haue preſumed to dedicate the ſame to your Lordſhip, in reſpect of your many fauours, and my obligations, for which (beſides this officious, though vnequall requitall) I ſhal ſtil vow my prayers for your Lordſhip, and remaine,

Your Lordſhips moſt

humbly deuoted,

RO. HALL.

NOAH'S DOVE.

YEe are here met (which I humbly wish, may proue euery way prosperous, and happy to the Church of God) most Reuerend Father in God, Reuerend Bishops, venerable Deanes, Archdeacons, Brethren of the Clergie, by the prouidence of our good God, and the command of our gracious Soueraigne, to hold an holy Conuocation this day.

Blessed Paul, in whose name this ancient pile doth not a little pride it selfe, salutes you by my vnworthy tongue, and as if hee were present, addresses himselfe to you, and exhorts you

In his former Epistle to the Corinthians, the 12 Chapter, verse 4.

There are diuersities of gifts, but the same spirit; there are diuersities of ministeries, but the same Lord, and there are diuersities of operations, but the same God, &c.

SEe I beseech you, the meet correspondence of all things. Yee are met in one, and here is vnity; Yee are many of you met from the vtmost parts of this large Prouince, and here is manifold diuersity; yee are met the floure of our English Clergie, learned and exquisite Diuines, and here are diuersities of gifts; Yee are met, the Lords and Commons of our sacred function, and here are diuersities of ministeries; Yee are met for the holy affaires of the Church, and here are operations; Yee are met (as I verily hope, and wish) in vnity of Spirit, and here is one Spirit; Ye are lastly met to consecrate your selues, your gifts, Ministeries, Operations, to the seruice of our Lord God; and here is that Lord, that God whom we professe to serue.

Now that same God, that same Lord Iesus Christ, that same holy Spirit, be present with vs all this day; and by his blessed influences guide and gouerne this sacred meeting, and happily direct all our councels and endeuours to the glory of his owne great name, the saluation of our soules, and the assured edification of his Church, through Iesus Christ.

See here then, Honoured Prelates, and beloued Brethren, the loope or combination of both worlds; Both the worlds of our Diuinity; The greater world, God; the lesser leſſer world, Man ; What is there that can ſo much concerne vs to know, to behold ? Will ye looke vp to God ? He is one in eſſence (ὁ αὐτὸς) Three in Perſon, The Father, Lord, Spirit. He is three in one, and one in three ; The Father, Lord, Spirit, one and the ſame God.

Will yee caſt your eye to Man ? yee ſhall ſee him not ſingle, but branched into infinite diuerſitie; not bare and naked, but furniſhed with gifts; not ſuperfluous, but deſtin'd to due ſeruices ; not idle, but buſie in meet operations : Neither are theſe operations, ſeruices, gifts, all of one kinde, but diuerſly diſtinguiſhed, and varied : And whence are theſe ſo manifold graces, ſo diuers imployments, but from one God, the Father, Lord, Spirit ? And wherefore are all theſe, but that theſe operations, miniſteries, gifts, proceeding from one God, Lord, Spirit, may be directed to one, and may end as they began, in a perfect vnity ?

O maruellous coniunction of diuine and humane things ; O vnutterable communion of heauen and earth ; Wherein is laid forth vnto vs the intire reſpects and vnion of God to himſelfe by conſubſtantialitie, of God to man by munificence, of man to God by the bond of thankfulneſſe, of men to each other by the bond of charity, of gifts to miniſteries, of miniſteries to operations, of all to all.

I ſhall not now need, neither indeed would it befit me, in ſo awfull an aſſembly of Diuines to dwell vpon Catecheticall points, concerning the myſterie of the ſacred Trinitie ; Although this labour is well worthy of you elſwhere, my brethren, and ſuch as (if I may perſwade you) you ſhall carefully beſtow at home ; This familiar kinde of teaching the word of the beginnings of Chriſt is growne out of faſhion ; Like ambitious Orators, wee ouerlooke this popular ſtraine, and are carried to an affectation of perfection. Yee ſee how the Heron can ſoare high, yet liues, for the moſt part, in the loweſt valley ; builds in the talleſt trees, yet feeds in the humble mariſhes ; So doe yee, my deare fellow-labourers, not ſo much caring to ſhew your ſelues learned, as to make your people ſo.

This by the way. Such as God is, ſuch he expreſſes himſelfe to vs ; and ſuch as hee expreſſes himſelfe to vs, ſuch he formes vs to himſelfe : As the Sunne looking vpon a cloud fitly diſpoſed, for that purpoſe, imprints in that moiſt glaſſe a certaine bright image of himſelfe ; ſo doth God to his Church ; From that Celeſtiall and diuine Trinity, therefore, is here apparently deduced another Trinity, ſublunarie and humane ; Of gifts, miniſteries, operations ; From the ſpirit are deriued gifts ; miniſteries from the Sonne, operations from the Father ; There are diuerſities of gifts, but the ſame ſpirit ; of miniſteries, but the ſame Lord ; of operation, but the ſame God.

Away with all niceties of Pythagorean calculations; All numbers are alike to me, ſaue thoſe which God himſelfe hath chalked out vnto vs ; as here hee hath manifeſtly done. In one word ; An Vnitie and a Trinity make vp this golden ſentence. There is a Trinity in this Vnity ; There is an Vnity in this Trinitie ; Firſt, here is a perfect (that is, a Triple) Trinitie ; A Trinity of diuerſities, a Trinitie of faculties, a Trinitie of giuers ; For there are ſo many diuerſities as faculties, and ſo many faculties, as giuers ; The faculties are three ; gifts, miniſteries, operations ; The giuers three, The Father, the Sonne, the Spirit, which all are included in one Vnity (τῇ ἑνότητι) the ſame God ; And yet euen that Vnity hath his diſtinction, whiles gifts are (as it were) by a ſpecialty aſcribed to the Spirit, miniſteries to the Sonne, to the Father operations.

That our diſcourſe may not ſeeme too perplexed, wee will follow the foot-ſteps of our Apoſtle, and with all poſſible perſpicuity, will apply the diuerſities to the faculties, the faculties to the giuers ; Theſe Trinities to their Vnity, and (this done) draw to a briefe concluſion.

A threefold Diuerſity argues multiplicitie ; What meant the Ancients to dreame but of three Graces ? there are a thouſand graces, gifts infinite ; Looke vpon all the grandchildren of Adam, that euer were ; amongſt ſo many thouſand millions of faces, ye ſhall eaſily obſerue ſome varietie of fauours ; It is a wonder to ſee what diuerſitie of formes there is, in that which we call beauty ; No twins are ſo like as not to bewray ſome diſ-

similitude; Certainly there is not so great variety of faces, as of mindes; As features are to the countenance, so are gifts to the minde; Each one hath some, all haue many, none haue all; There are diuersities of gifts.

Salmeron, with Caietan, vnderstands here those gifts which wee call Gratias gratis datas, Graces freely giuen; wherein he saies true, but not enough; For as the old word is, Fauours, must be enlarged; and those gifts which make vs gracious are best worthy of this name; It is not amisse that Hugo reckons vp three sorts of Gods gifts to man; Gifts of nature, of grace, of glory: By the gifts of nature we are men, by the gifts of grace we are holy, by the gifts of glory, we shall be blessed. The gifts of nature are memory, reason, will, wherein we excell the brute creatures; The gifts of grace are faith, hope, charity, wherein we goe beyond the Deuills; The gifts of glory, eternall and true blessednesse; blessed and eternall truth, true and blessed eternitie, wherein wee are equall to the Angels; Amongst the gifts of nature the same Author reckons some to be of the lowest ranke, some of the meane, some of the highest; In the lowest, he accounts beauty and health of body; In the meane hee accounts the faculties of the minde; In the highest, the vertues of the soule; Thus there are diuersities of gifts.

There are some gifts of Regeneration; there are some gifts of our calling; by the former, we are borne againe for our owne good; with the latter, wee are furnished, for the good of others; These latter are peculiarly bestowed vpon seuerall men, the former are by a certaine common propriety bestowed vpon all the Saints of God; For, as in the most wise disposition of this vniuerse, the best things, and those which are necessary for the sustentation of life, as aire, light, fire, water, are abundantly giuen to all, but those things which serue only for ornament and pleasure, as Gold, Pearle, Precious stones, are more sparingly bestowed vpon some few; so euery sauing grace is abundantly dispensed to all Saints, by the liberall hand of God; Whereas tongues, prophecie, power of miracles, as also eloquence, skill, honour, and the rest of this kinde, are reserued onely for some few receiuers; And in all these, what strange diuersity there is? They differ in respect of themselues, being in nature diuers from each other; They differ in respect of the Subiect, as being diuersly giuen to one, and other; for as the blinde Bard saw truly, God doth not giue all to all; They differ in respect of degree, as they are more giuen to one, than to other. Thus euery way there are diuersities of gifts.

It is the common voice of nature, that the same remaining the same cannot produce but the same; but, when we speake of the God of Nature; that word of Bonauenture is more true; Ab vnißimo Deo manant multiforma, ab æterno temporalia; From that most one God flowes multiformity of effects, and from that eternall God, temporall effects. Hugo said well, In te variatur qui in se non mutatur; he is varied in thee, who is not changed in himselfe: If the diuine power had made onely one creature, that alonely worke of his had beene worthy of a God, and such as could proceed from no lesse than an omnipotent hand; But now he hath created many things, yea innumerable; If God had made these many creatures altogether vniforme and like themselues; onely distinguished in number, not in forme; the worke had beene more excellent and admirable, than the frame of any one creature alone; but now, that hee hath made these many, these innumerable creatures, no lesse different from themselues, and so, as that the difference of their formes striues with the praise of their number; O the depth of diuine wisdome! O the stupendious workmanship of omnipotencie! And yet there is no Subiect wherein the power and prouidence of the Almighty doth so much magnifie it selfe, as in the diuers Oeconomie of man; In so much as in this little world, there is a world of diuersities; Maruell at your selues, brethren, and be astonished at your owne prospects; Whether we looke at the fashion of the face, or the proportion of parts, or the colour of the skin, or the stature of the body, or the indowments of the minde, the degrees of faculties, the disposition of nature, the measure of graces, the opportunities of stations, or lastly the outward condition of our life; O good God what wondrous diuersity is here; how impossible is it for the eye to meet twise with with the like obiect, whithersoeuer it roueth? Thus there are diuersities of gifts.

Away now from hence, with all haughtinesse of pride, all mutinies of enuie; These two dangers will bee sure to haunt the most iust inequality; the needy is enuious, the rich is proud.

Poore I am contemned, others are set vp; others shine in scarlet, and purple, whiles I am patching of nasty ragges; Others wallow in their wealth and excesse, I famish for hunger; others Lord it in lofty seats, I am trod vnder their foot-stooles; Others are eloquent, I am a stammerer: Others excell in the skill of Arts and Tongues, I am a silly ignorant; And why should not I? Oh foole, these that thou talkest of, are gifts, and therefore freely bestowed where it pleases the giuer; What doth he owe to thee, that hath giuen these things to others? Withall, know, there are diuersities of gifts; God hath perhaps denied thee heapes of red and white earth, but hee hath giuen thee strength of body; At how high a rate would the great ones of the world buy that blessing of thine? He hath denied thee eloquence, hee hath yet giuen thee sharpnesse of wit; he hath denied thee honour, but he hath giuen thee sweet rest, quiet security; hee hath denied thee preferment, he hath not denied thee health. Goe then, and enuie the great mans weake stomach, sleeplesse nights, racks of cares; enuie, to him, if thou canst, the slipperie staires of the Court, and the common enuie of the most; He wants something which thou enioyest, and something he hath which is denied thee; He had rather make choice of thy condition, thou of his; Each of you hath his owne, neither of you shall haue all; neither shall haue both; There are diuersities of gifts.

Yea, and we new-blowne bladders, how easily are we puft vp with euery blast of gifts; I am not like other men; How base are the vulgar of men? I sit gloriously impurpled, other fellowes may be glad to licke the dust of my footstoole; I am inriched with all liberall sciences, this people which know not the Law, are accursed; I haue skill of tongues, others are rude Idiots; I leade the amazed hearers by the eares whither I list, through the power of my oratory, others freeze and languish in their Pulpits. Heare, O thou proud man; These things whereof thou braggest, are not thine owne; what hast thou that thou hast not receiued? All these are gifts; And art thou thus happy alone? Vaine boaster, thou knowest not others, thou knowest not thy selfe; There are diuersities of gifts which thy thoughts reach not vnto: Sit thou aloft, and cheare thy selfe with the bowed knees of thy suppliants, they are happier men than thy selfe that are glad to lie close, and affect a quiet and safe obscurity: Be thou more learned than another, that other perhaps is wiser than thou; be thou more eloquent than another man, that other is perhaps more iudicious; If thy tongue be richer than anothers, his minde is richer than thine.

It is reported, that in the house of worthy M. Luther was found written; Res & verba Philippus, Res sine verbis Lutherus, Verba sine re Erasmus; Melancton was words and matter; Luther, matter without words; Erasmus, words without matter; Euery one hath his owne share; Neither art thou furnished with all gifts; nor that other with none; Let not him enuie thee; neither doe thou contemne him; Rather both, apply your selues to cast in the shot of your contributions to the publique good: For to what end hath our bountifull God showred downe these diuers kinds of gifts from heauen vpon man, but that he might hereby prouide for the common profit and welfare of mankinde?

Why hath the blinde man legges, and the lame man eyes, but that the one may exchange with the other, for the benefit of both? Thinkest thou that God meant to heape his gifts vpon thee for thine owne sake onely? Fie on this shamefull selfe-loue; Surely he that made thee, made thee for a conduit-pipe to conuay, not a Cisterne to hold the water of his graces. God hath clothed you, (as ye well know, Reuerend Prelates) with this sacred purple, that you should shine before others as conspicuous Guides of that strait and hard way of life; and that by your well-bestowed honors you should credit his Church, and be the seruants of many.

Ye perceiue now, I imagine, how vnexpectedly my speech is glided from Gifts to Ministeries; The Author of these Gifts, the Spirit of God, leads me by S. Pauls hand; who who presently vpon the mention of gifts, subioynes ministeries, and vpon the mention of ministeries, addes operations. This most munificent Spirit (τὸ πνεῦμα) (that with Athanasius we may note the force of the Article) hath enabled the most of you, Fathers and brethren, with an eminent measure of gifts: With what powers of the minde, what singular learning, what powerfull eloquence, with how great wisdome, with what grauitie, with what titles of honour, with what large dignities? It is a great word that I shall speake, and yet I must, and will say it, without all, either arrogance or flattery; Stupor mundi Clerus Britannicus; The wonder of the world is the Clergie of Britaine. So many learned Diuines, so many eloquent Preachers shall in vaine bee sought elsewhere this day, in what euer region vnder the cope of heauen; What should I reckon vp those great lights of our Church, not long since set; Iuels, Humfreys, Foxes, Whitgifts, Fulkes, Whitakers, Raynolds, Bilsons, Greenams, Babingtons, Eedeses, Hollands, Playsers, Abbotses, Perkinses, Fields, Hookers, Oueralls, Willets, Whites, Masons? There are now of you vnder this very roofe, that heare me this day, in whose iust praises I could be content to spend not an houre, but a life, were it not that mutuall modestie inioynes me silence: How great soeuer yee are, yee are not your owne; All these gifts end in seruices. Oh let it please you to stir vp this grace of God in you; and faithfully to imploy all these your gifts to the happy aduancement of your ministeries; in the practise of your life, (as in the course of my speech) Let the Diuersities of gifts bee taken vp with the Diuersities of ministeries.

There are then as differences of gifts, so of ministeries; And which be they? Differences in offices, and in degrees; There were Apostles, Prophets, Euangelists; There are, were, shall be Bishops, Presbyters, Deacons; These are more than one ranke of Ministers; It was part of the exploded heresie of Ærius that tooke away these three steps of the Clergie, as the Synod of Carthage calls them. Yea, and somewhere, Ierome himselfe smarts with the lash of this censure, as if perhaps hee did more fauour of Ærius, than of Tully; Not without open wrong in both; but I may not now stay vpon needlesse Apologies; There is none of you, I hope, can bee so witlesse as to question these diuersities of Ministeries; Did they euer reade Histories, that doubt of this point? Sure, they haue neuer so much as seene them: Turne ouer all the monuments of Times, and places, so farre as euer Christendome hath spred it selfe, you shall finde nothing more euident; I will not here stand to abridge the Annalls of all Ages, and Regions; Looke vpon the Councells; and first of all, the first and chiefe of those which are stiled Generall, the great Councell of Nice; You shall there see three hundred and eighteene Bishops, so many as Abraham had souldiers in the victory ouer the Kings, as Ambrose wittily alludeth. But perhaps they were then but newly instituted, newly receiued in the Church; No such matter; Those Fathers professe it to be (ἀρχαία ἐθη) the ancient guise, that the Bishop of Alexandria should be ouer Egypt, Libya, Pentapolis, as the Bishop of Rome was ouer his Suburbicarie Churches: Doe but heare Polycrates Bishop of Ephesus, an old man of aboue threescore, solemnly protesting that he succeeded his Grand-fathers, and great-grand-fathers, for seuen successiue generations, in the same Episcopall chaire. Heare but Irenæus, Tertullian, Clement, Dorotheus, Eusebius, describing and recording the Bishops of Antioch, Alexandria, Hierusalem, Rome, in the vndoubted order of their successions, not onely by their numbers, but by their names also. Certainly, neuer day lookt forth since the age of the Apostles, wherein the Spouse of Christ wanted the attendance of these Bride-men: But what doe I vrge this? The Sun is in the heauen, and shines there: Euen Ierome himselfe, though but a Presbyter, and a stout Champion of his owne order, yet deduceth this difference of degrees from the cradle of the first Schisme, from the common decree of the first Church, from tradition Apostolicall; yea, when Saint Paul wrote this to his Corinthians, that iarring word had sounded in the Church, I am Pauls, I am Apolloes, I am Cephaes, and therefore euen then had these differences beene.

Differences perhaps in Order, you will say, not in Degree; Yes, both in Order, and in Power, too; There were those whom Saint Paul calls (προϊσταμένους καὶ ἡγουμένους) Presidents and

and Rulers; I whom Ignatius calls (κεφαλὰς) Gouernours; Dionysius, Hierarchs; Cyprian, Ouerseers; to whom Saint Paul attributes Power of reformation and correction; to whom the Canons of the Apostles giue the power of sentence or constitution; Ignatius, chiefety and authority; Eusebius, out of Egesippus, the throne of Episcopalitie; Cyprian, the vigor and authority of the chaire; Origen, the highest pitch of the Church; Ierome, a peereless and eminent power; The Councell of Sardis, the height of gouernment; and lastly, Epiphanius an order generatiue of Fathers. But what doe I gleaning after the harueſt of ſo great Authors as haue diſcuſſed this point?

Oh how oft, and with what deepe ſighes hath this moſt flouriſhing and happy Church of England wiſht, that ſhe might with ſome of her owne bloud haue purchaſed vnto her deareſt Siſters abroad, the retention of this moſt ancient, and euery way beſt forme of gouernment; Which might happily alſo haue taken place, if they had met with ſuch a Monarchicall reformation, as (through the bleſſing of God) was deſigned vnto vs; Now they are faine to vndergoe that adminiſtration, Prouiſionally onely (if we may beleeue wiſe and learned Fregeuil) which the neceſſity of their condition doth for the time caſt vpon them: The God of heauen raiſe them vp Queenes for their nurſes, and Kings for their nurſing-fathers, that they may once enioy with vs this happy bleſſing of the ſequence and ſubordination of degrees; in the meane time I dare with Ignatius profeſſe to put my ſoule (ἀντίψυχον &c.) in pawne for the ſafe obſeruation of this excellent order; Which, if it haue euer not happily ſucceeded to any region, or Church, it is the fault of the perſon, not of the inſtitution it ſelfe, which cannot iuſtly be deemed other, than wholſome, holy, diuine.

But remember, I beſeech you, in the meane while, (Reuerend Fathers) that theſe are (διακονίας) miniſteries; a word raked out of the very duſt, leſt it ſhould not imply humility enough; Yee are graced with Honours by the pious munificence of Princes; But our Lord Ieſus Chriſt (ye know) vſes to meaſure your honours by your ſeruices; Ye are Fathers of the Church, but Sons of the Bride-chamber; Peeres of the ſtate, but ſeruants of the Church; Generals of this warfare, but with S. Paul, fellow-ſouldiers; Rulers in Gods houſe, but withall, fellow-ſeruants; Intreat your Clergie kindly, vſe them familiarly, as knowing your ſelues to be Fathers in dignity, brethren in ſeruice; Ye know the counſell of Saint Ambroſe; Let thoſe of the Clergie, within your charge, be as limmes of your owne body: God hath called you Starres and Angels; Imitate ye the Starres, which the higher they are, the leſſer they are wont to appeare; Imitate ye the Angels, who though Peeres of heauen, yet are wont to approue themſelues miniſtring ſpirits for the pooreſt of Gods Saints; No ſpectacle can be more odious than a proud Prelate.

But heare mee alſo, O yee Laicks, take heed of contemning this ſacred function: Theſe are miniſteries indeed, but glorious and honourable: To ſerue God, is to rule and command; And what is it euen to ſerue you? Surely thoſe heauenly Spirits, thoſe principalities and powers doe the very ſame to vs continually; whom yet their loue and ſeruice, hath neuer drawne into contempt; We beſeech you Brethren, that you know them which labour amongſt you, and are ouer you in the Lord, and admoniſh you, and hold them deare for their works ſake.

We haue diſpatched the Diuerſities of Miniſteries: now followes that of Operations; God hath not ordained to himſelfe idle ſeruices, but buſie and painfull; One gouerns, another teaches, a third doth both teach and gouerne, worthy therefore of double honour, for his rule, for his labour. And he that gouernes, ſometimes muſt ſtrike with the rod, ſometimes with the ſword; One while hee muſt kindly allure, another while he muſt ſharply puniſh; hee muſt vphold the falling, retaine the wauering, reduce the wandering; And for him that teaches, it is not onely the charge of doctrine that lies vpon him, but of reproofe, of correction, of inſtruction in righteouſneſſe. One while he directs with counſels, then he erects with promiſes; then againe he deiects with threatnings, he wounds the whole, ſalues the wounded, workes alwaies: The office of a Biſhop is (καλὸν ἔργον) a worthy worke; Whoſoeuer playes in this holy Chaire, Chaire, ſhall once waile in hell: Saint Bernard ſaid well in that famous Epiſtle of his, to Henricus Senonenſis; Many would not ſo eagerly run to honours, if they could thinke them burdens; Certainly they would feare to bee cruſhed with this weight, neither would with ſo much paine and perill gape for euery promotion; Thus he. But will it pleaſe you withall, to heare what that pious Cenſor caſts in the teeth of his owne times; Sola attenditur gloria, & non pœna; Curritur in clero papim, &c. The dignity only is cared for, not the duty; Men of all Ages, and ranks in the Clergy, learned and vnlearned, run to ſpirituall Cures, as if they might liue for euer, Sine cura, when once they haue gotten Cures of ſoules; Doe you marke well this Prophetie (for ſuch it might ſeeme) of the Oracle of Clareuall? Would to God this were not the very diſeaſe of our times. There be ſome delicate peeces that thruſt themſelues into fat benefices, onely that they may make much of one; and giue themſelues ouer to their pleaſure, and eaſe; Euen of thoſe mouthes which are ſacred to God, there want not ſome, which out of a wanton cuſtome ſauour of nothing but Indian ſoot; and take more pleaſure to put forth a cloud of ſmoake, than the thundrings and lightnings of the Law: Some negligent paſtorlings there are, which haue more heed to their owne hides, than to the ſoules of their people. I ſpeake plaine truth, in a plaine faſhion, nuda nudè, as that faithfull monitor profeſſes.

Howſoeuer, I beſeech you, brethren, ſuffer your ſelues to be ſtirred with this poore ſpeech of mine: Euen ſleeping lions are wont to be awakened with the ſting of a gnat. Are theſe the Operations, the diuerſities whereof call God their Father? God indeed, but Deum ventrem; that beaſtly deity, the belly; I tremble to adde the reſt, but I muſt; whoſe glory is their ſhame, whoſe end is damnation. Is it now time for vs to play, and keepe holy-day? Behold two cruell enemies are vpon vs, Impiety and ſuperſtition, and doe we either ſit ſtill with our hands folded, or riſe, and in a willfull careleſneſſe open the gates to our enemie? That ſoueraigne Maſter of ours the great Houſholder of the world, when he was to goe forth into a farre Countrey, yea rather, when he was to returne to his owne euerlaſting countrey and Ours, committed to euery one of vs one talent at the leaſt, to ſome more; and bade vs, Negotiamini dum venio; Traffique till I come; Loe he bade vs Negotiari, not nepotari; To trade, not to trifle, to labour, not to deboſhe. And is this the traffique which he requires, to ſeeke our owne, to take our eaſe, to ſay nothing, to doe worſe? No, theſe are thoſe vncleane napkins rather, wherein we haue ſlothfully hid the Talents, which we ſhould haue improued to the gaine of our Maſter, by putting them into the hands of the Exchangers. That awfull Iudge of heauen and earth will be ſure vpon his returne to call vs to an account; which if we muſt giue for our idle words, why not alſo for our idle ſilence, as Ambroſe wittily? What ſhall wee wretched creatures then anſwer for our ſelues? Where ſhall we appeare? It is a fearefull word, O euill ſeruant, but more fearefull, that which followes, Bring him hither, and kill him before me; Oh then, let me intreat you, let me adiure you brethren, by the deare reſpect to your own ſoules, by the bowels, yea by the wounds, and precious bloud of Ieſus Chriſt, by that dreadfull Tribunall, before which we muſt al, one day, ſtand, that you carefully endeuour to ſet forth and accompliſh your miniſteries with all holy operations; Preach the Word, be inſtant, in ſeaſon, out of ſeaſon, reproue, exhort with all long-ſuffering and doctrine. Let euery of vs ſtudy to approue himſelfe vnto God, a labourer that ſhall not be aſhamed, and a right diuider of the Word of Truth; Oh ſweet Word, and ſuch as in compariſon whereof the very harmony of heauen ſounds harſhly, Well done good ſeruant; thou haſt beene faithfull in a little, enter into thy maſters ioy. Oh let it be our onely ambition, deare brethren, that we may once heare this Word; Let vs worke that which God hath commanded, and God ſhall bee ſure to crowne that which we haue wrought.

Yea and ye (Honored Fathers) who are this day met to conſult of the weighty affaires both of Church and Common-wealth, Worke now; If euer ye haue wrought heretofore, if euer ye will worke heareafter, Now worke; A large doore and effectuall is opened vnto you, and many aduerſaries; ye ſee how audacious Will-worſhip hath of late set vpon vs; how proudly the Tridentine faith hath aduanced her creſt, and hath dared to flie fiercely in the very face of the Goſpell: The Romiſh forces put themſelues openly into aray, and haue dared to ſound not an alarme onely, but (which no wiſe man knowes whether he ſhould more ſtampe at or ſcorne) a victorie: They preſume to erect here amongſt vs an Hierarchy emulous to yours, and in the time of your life, and health, and vigor, appoint what heires ſhall ſucceed in your Seas: What wiſe ſpectator can thinke this indignity to be endured? Is this to bee ſmoothered in ſilence? Is this to be any longer winked at? Rouſe vp your ſelues, O yee holy Fathers, if there be any ardor of Piety in your breſts, and deſtroy this Tyberine Monſter, (Popery, I meane) with the breath of your mouthes: and what euer grace and authority yee haue with our Gratious King, with the Peeres, and commons of this Realme, improue it all with your beſt prayers and counſells, to the vtter extermination of Idolatry, to the happy victory, and aduancement of the ſincere Truth of God.

And thus ye ſee with how ſwift a pace I haue run ouer theſe Operations, Miniſteries, Gifts, and the diuerſities of them all; One thing onely remaines to bee duly conſidered of vs; and that is, That all theſe Miniſteries, Gifts, Operations, doe flow from one and the ſame, Spirit, Lord, and God; This Trinity from an Vnity; Wherein yee eaſily diſcouer the Emphaſis to lie not ſo much in the Author, as in the Identity; (τῷ αὐτῷ) I ſhall not therefore in the remainder of my diſcourſe proſecute, either the wonderfull wiſdome, of abſolute perfection, or the bountifull liberality of God, but rather driue my ſpeech to the conſideration of the Vnity of this gracious giuer of all theſe.

Wee ſilly men, in the height of our bounty, beſtow ſome one fauour vpon ſome one Subiect; But this one God hath beſtowed all vpon all, and vpon euery one, ſome: Neither may we conceiue of any other, whether fountaine, or Ocean of good; And why hath our Apoſtle ſo carefully beaten vpon this point; vrging not ſo much the beneficence, as the vnity of the Giuer? Surely, as Salmeron gueſſes well, vt ſchiſmatum radices euelleret, that he might pull vp the roots of ſchiſmes: For if there were diuers giuers, there might be ſome reaſon for euery ſect to ſtand for the author of his owne gift, of his owne miniſterie; But now, that one and the ſame Spirit hath giuen to euery one theſe diuers gifts, that one and the ſame Lord hath appointed to euery one theſe diuers miniſteries, that one and the ſame God hath diſtributed to euery one theſe diuers operations; Why ſhould not all theſe gifts, miniſteries, operations vnanimouſly conſpire to the glory of that one giuer and founder of them all?

Certainly, euery thing here ſounds of vnity: The Church is an intire body (as our Apoſtle ſpeakes ſoone after) we are members of it: One man is an eye, another, an eare, a third is a tongue; One is a palate, another an hand, another a foot; yea one is a Thumbe, another a little finger or (if lower yet) a ioint of that ſmall limme; Wee muſt all concurre in our deſires and endeuours to the conſtitution, and maintenance of this one bodie; Whoſoeuer he be that doth otherwiſe, hee is iuſtly found guilty, not onely of the violation of the publike weale, but of Diuine Vnity; And now, O ye Reuerend Fathers, I finde my ſelfe entred into a pleaſing and ample common place; and ſuch a one, as wherein I could wiſh with Peter to fix the Tabernacle of my abode: Would to God your leiſure could allow you to walke along with me a while thorow theſe ſweet, and flowrie Meades of Vnity, and happy conſpiration of thoughts; And yet I ſhall not ſo much bend the reſidue of my ſpeech to the praiſe of vnity, (to what purpoſe were that waſte?) as to the neceſſary vindication of it from the vniuſt challenges of the enemies of peace.

It is an heauy crime, and, of all other, the moſt hainous, wherewith we are charged by the Romaniſts, That we are fallen off from the Catholick Church, that we haue rent the ſeameleſſe coat of Chriſt, yea broken his bones, and torne his very body in peeces, whereof if we were indeed guilty, how vnworthy were we to breath in this aire, how moſt worthy of the loweſt Hell? But we call heauen and earth to record, how vniuſtly this calumny is caſt vpon vs, yea, we proteſt before God and men, that the enuie of this ſo foule a crimination lights moſt iuſtly vpon the heads of the accuſers. May it

pleaſe you, to heare a ſhort Apologue; A certaine man inuited to a feaſt one or two of his friends, entertained them bountifully; They ſate together louingly, they ate together, and were merry one with another; In the ſecond courſe (as the cuſtome is) the Maſter offereth them wine, ſets before them an apple: now a worme had ſomewhat eaten the apple, and a ſpider by chance had fallen into the cup; The gueſt ſees and balks it; The Maſter vrgeth him; Why doe you not eat, quoth he, why drinke you not? I dare not, ſaith the other, t'is not ſafe to doe either; ſeeſt thou not this vermine in the cup, and that in the apple? Tuſh, ſaith the Maſter, what ſo great matter is this? It was I that ſet this before thee; It was I that began to thee in the other; Drinke it, eat it, at leaſt for my ſake. But, ſuffer me firſt (replies the gueſt) to take out this ſpider, to cut out this worme; the wine, the apple likes me well enough; the ſpider, the worme I cannot away with; Away with ſuch ouer-nice and curious companions) quoth he againe) Fy vpon thee, thou vngratefull fellow, that doſt ſo little regard my friendſhip, ſo contemne my cheere; and with that in a rage, throwes the platters and pots in the very face of his gueſt, and thruſts him out of doores all wounded. Tell me now, I beſeech you, worthy Auditors, whether of theſe violates the lawes of hoſpitality? I dare ſay, you haue eaſily applied it before me; There was a time when we ſate together in a familiar manner with theſe Romaniſts, and fared well; The ſpider in the cup, The worme in the apple, what elſe be they, but ſuperſtition in their worſhip, rotten and vnwholſome traditions in their faith? without theſe, the Religion pleaſeth vs well: But they will needs importunately thruſt theſe vpon vs, and we refuſing, are therefore ſcorned, ſpit vpon, beaten, and caſt out; Had they but giuen vs leaue to take out this ſpider, this worme, we had ſtill eaten, and dranke together moſt gladly: They obſtinately reſiſted, and prefer'd their owne headſtrong will to our good and ſafety; nay, they repell vs with reproches, ſtrike vs with their thundering Anathemaes, condemne vs to the ſtakes; what ſhould we doe in this caſe? Heare, oh heauens, and hearken oh earth, and thou almighty God, the Maker and Gouernor of them both, ſuffer thy ſelfe, and thy glorious ſpirits to be called to the teſtimony of our innocencie; We are compelled, we are driuen away from the Communion of the Church of Rome; They forced vs to goe from them, who departed firſt from themſelues.

We haue willingly departed from the communion of their errors, from the Communion of the Church we haue not departed; Let them renounce their erroneous doctrine, we embrace their Church; Let them but caſt away their ſoule-ſlaying Traditions, we will communicate with them in the right of one and the ſame Church, and remaine ſo for euer.

But, alas, I muſt be forced to complaine, and that not without extreme griefe of heart, how that it cannot be determined, whether thoſe that boaſt themſelues for Catholikes, be greater enemies to Truth, or to Charity. To Truth, in that they haue of late forged new errors, and forced them vpon the Church; To Charity, in that they haue not ſtuck to condemne the aduerſe part, and to brand them with the black marke of Hereſie. I will ſpeake (if you pleaſe) more plainly; Three manner of waies doe theſe Romaniſts offend againſt Charity. Firſt, that they will not remit any thing either of their moſt conuicted opinion or vicious practice, no not for peace ſake. Secondly, that for Articles of Chriſtian faith, they put vpon the Church certaine opinions of their owne, falſe, doubtfull, and vncertaine, peculiar onely to the Schooles, which doe no whit touch the foundation of Religion. And laſtly, that if they meet with any faithfull and ſound monitors, which doe neuer ſo little gainſay theſe new Articles, they cruelly caſt them out of the boſome of the Church, and throw them headlong into Hel: Away with theſe Schiſmaticks, Hereticks, Atheiſts; Iwis the Proteſtants haue no Church, no faith, no ſaluation. Good Lord, what fury, what frenzy diſtempers Chriſtians; that they ſhould be ſo impotently malicious againſt thoſe, who profeſſe themſelues to be redeemed by the ranſome of the ſame moſt precious bloud? At length, At length, O yee Chriſtians, be wiſe, and acknowledge thoſe, whom the God and Father of mercies holds worthy of his armes, yea of his bowels. Let frantick error bawle

what it list, we are Christians, we are Catholicks, the vndiuided members of one holy, Catholick and Apostolick Church; Let vs meet at this barre, if you please; Let who will maintaine the plea; What is it which maketh a Church? What is it which maketh that Church; One, holy, Catholick, Apostolick? Is it not one holy Catholicke Apostolick faith? But which is that? Is it not the same which was deliuered by Christ, and the Apostles, to the whole world, and was alwaies and euery where approued through all Ages, euen vnto our times? Wherefore are the Scriptures, wherefore the Creeds, wherefore were the primitiue Councells, but that there might be certaine markes, whereby Catholicks might be vndoubtedly discerned from Hereticks? You know the Epilogue of the Athanasian Creed, This is the Catholick Faith. If we may beleeue Leo, the heads of all heresies are quite cut off with this one sword of the Creed; How much more then, with that two-edged sword of the Scriptures, and of the Fathers their Interpreters? What then? Those that then were Catholicks, can they in any age be condemned for Hereticks? No: Faith is alwaies constant to it selfe, and so is the Church that is built vpon that Faith. Did we euer deny or make doubt of any Article, or clause of that Ancient Diuinity? Either then Christ himselfe, the Apostles, Councells, Fathers, erred from the Catholick truth; or wee yet remaine Catholicks. What euer other opinions we meet withall, concerning Religion, neither make nor marre it; Say they be false, say they be vicious, they are but hay and stubble, which nothing appertaine to the foundation of this euerlasting frame. The Church may bee either more sound, or more corrupt for them; It cannot be more or lesse a Church; The beauty or deformity of a Church may consist in them; the strength, the welfare of it doth not: Surely, whosoeuer willingly subscribes to the Word of God signed in the euerlasting monuments of Scripture, to the ancient Creeds, to the foure Generall Councells, to the common consent of the Fathers, for six hundred yeares after Christ, which we of the reformed Church religiously professe to doe; if hee may erre in small points, yet hee cannot be an Hereticke. Some particular Church may easily offend by imputing heresie to an vndeserued opinion, whether perhaps true, or lightly erroneous; but neither soule, nor Church can greatly erre, while it treads in the steps of the most ancient and vniuersall: Must hee therefore, of necessity, die a Romanist, that would die a Catholicke? This is an idle fancie, and worthy of no lesse than Bedlam.

Giue me leaue (ye Reuerend Fathers) The blessed Ghost of the most holy, and latest Bishop of this See, interrupts my speech, and charges me not to suffer his ashes so shamefully to be wronged. I can neither bee silent for indignation, nor speake for anger: It was not onely rumour'd, but bookes were cast abroad ouer the world, concerning the reuolt of this worthy and excellent Prelate, reporting, that at his death, hee reconciled himselfe to the Church of Rome, and with many sighes, renounced the Heresies of the Church of England: and at last being absolued by a Popish Priest, sweetly slept in the faith of the Church of Rome; Neither did his departed soule want, somewhere (as is reported) suffrages and oblations of Massmongers in this behalfe; Oh immortall God! what blasphemie is here? Can impudencie it selfe, so cast off all shame, as to raise so slanderous a lie, thus boldly, against the credit of so many witnesses, against the soelmne detestation of their owne Priest, against the religious oathes of his neerest friends, and domesticke seruants? against the Sermon, and publique writings of his Learned Sonne? a sonne well worthy of such a Father? Other lies haue some colour to p'ead for their credit; This (besides boldnesse) hath none at all. How many of vs sate by that faithfull Pastor of ours then breathing toward his last, and receiued from his dying lips, words of most constant piety: And some of you (reuerend Fathers) deuoutly receiued with him, that sacred Viaticum, the last bread that euer he tasted, euen the bread of the Lord; and were witnesses of the last motions of his soule, then ready to depart, and breathing toward his heauen. Ours he liued, Ours he died, and now, as ours, is crowned in heauen. Goe on now, yea mis-zealous spirits; goe on to lie stoutly; somewhat will alwaies sticke fast to the accusers; but in the meane time, It cannot bee truth, that needs the props of lies. Onely this by the way.

Let

Let the boldeſt Sophiſter of the Romiſh Schoole, come forth now, and if hee can, for ſhame, let him vndertake to proue that thoſe moſt noted additions of the Tridentine Faith, which only we reiect, were receiued of all the Church, in all Ages, for neceſſary heads of Religion: or let him confeſſe (as he needs muſt) that we haue ſtill conſtantly perſiſted in the Communion of One, Holy, Catholick Church and faith; Hee ſhall eaſily bewray his owne nouelty, but neuer ſhall euince any Hereſie of ours. It is a golden ſaying of Cardinall Contarenus; Hearken I beſeech you, if any ingenuous ſpirit of you all, be a friend to Rome, Non opus eſt concilio, non ſyllogiſmis ad ſedandas haſce Lutheranorũ turbas, &c. There needs no Councell, (ſaith he) no Syllogiſmes to allay theſe broyles of the Lutherans, but onely charity, humility, and a ſincere minde, that being void of all ſelfe-loue, we may be perſwaded to correct, and reforme thoſe things wherein we haue manifeſtly tranſgreſſed. Thus he. I'me ſure wee indeed (O Contarenus) would to God thy fellowes were ſo alſo. But we (forſooth) are the diſobedient and rebellious children of our mother the Church, whoſe commands while we diſdaine to receiue, and obey and reuerence her decrees, we are enwrapped in a ſhameſull ſchiſme, and ſtricken with the curſes of an angry Mother. Surely this were an odious contumely. But for vs; wee haue not acknowledg'd her a Mother, a Sister wee haue: But grant we were Sons, yet we are no ſlaues. To forge a new faith, and imperiouſly thruſt it vpon her owne, is not the part of an indulgent parent, but of a Tyrant; This lawleſſe liberty (we confeſſe) we could neuer endure, and therefore are wee openly thunder-ſtricken with more than one Anathema. Neither haue they otherwiſe dealt with vs, than that fooliſh fellow in Gerſon, who being very buſie to driue away a flie from his neighbours forehead, braind the man.

But lament ye with me (my brethren) the wofull caſe of that Church, that hath learned to fit her faith to the Times, and is more impatient of a remedy, than of the diſeaſe. Whilſt they ſo eagerly perſecute vs, let vs heartily pity them: And let vs ſtill wiſh to them, (that which they enuie and denie to vs) Saluation; Father forgiue them, for they know not what they doe.

Our prayers, our teares, our admonitions muſt not bee wanting: Returne to your ſelues now at laſt (oh ye Chriſtian ſoules) Returne, from whence you haue ſenſibly declined; Recouer your firſt loue, your firſt works. Suffer not your ſelues any longer to be mocked with the glorious title of a Church. Frame your ſelues to that holy Vnity which hitherto you haue ſo ſtifly reſiſted, which if once we might liue to ſee effected, you ſhould well finde (as it runs in the law of the twelue Tables) that the recouered ſhould with vs haue the ſame priuileges with the healthfull. Behold we are ready (as our gracious and peaceable King Iames piouſly vndertooke) to meet you halfe way.

But if they ſhall ſtill obſtinately caſt off all hope of Vnity, and being ſet on fire with the hatred of peace, ſhall goe on to delight themſelues onely, in the alarum of their ſacred Trumpet (as they call it) why ſhould not wee, religiouſly, and entirely keepe peace among our ſelues? I ſpeake to all the Sonnes of the purer Church whereſoeuer diſperſed, we profeſſe this Church of ours by Gods grace reformed: Reformed (I ſay) not new made, as ſome emulous ſpirits ſpightfully ſlander vs. For me; I am ready to ſinke to the very ground, when I heare that hedge-row reproach, Where was your Religion before Luther? Where was your Church? Heare, oh ye ignorant, Heare, oh ye enuious Cauillers, we deſired the reformation of an old Religion, not the formation of a new. The Church accordingly was reform'd, not new wrought. It remaines therefore the ſame Church it was before, but onely purged from ſome ſuperfluous and pernicious additaments of error. Is it a new face that was lately waſhed? a new garment that is but mended? a new houſe that is repaired? Bluſh, if yee haue any ſhame, who thus ignorantly, and maliciouſly caſt this in our teeth.

Goe to now (my brethren) we are by Gods grace reformed, Let vs take heed leſt we be deformed againe by mutuall diſſentions; This is that which weakens, and lames vs, and which laies vs open to the inſulting triumphs of our Aduerſaries. Yet (leſt wee ſhould ſeeme to giue too much way to a ſpightfull ſlander) theſe iarres of ours are not ſo great, as our enemies either deſire, or clamour. Certainly, what diſcords ſoeuer hitherto haue troubled vs, wee are beholding to none other for them, but to theſe our kinde enemies, who vpbraid vs with them: For if they had but reacht forth vnto vs an helping hand in due time, and ioyntly conferd their endeuours (which then behooued them) for the reforming of the Church, all had runne ſquarely on; There had beene no iarres, no grudgings, no parts takings: But they ſtifly refuſed, and by their frowardneſſe, and pertinacie, cauſed this ſo weighty a taske to be caſt vpon ſome few: and thoſe both weak, vnable, and altogether vnfit for ſuch a charge. It could not therefore be otherwiſe, but that the opinions of ſome ſingle men, not conferd together, in ſuch a buſineſſe, muſt needs ſomewhat differ. But thanks be to thee, O bleſſed God, the Author of peace, that haſt vouchſafed by thy ſpirit ſo to bridle the diſtemperate affections of men, that their buſie ſpirits being ſtirred vp haue not boyled forth into more fearefull diuiſions.

ſhould

But what are theſe ſo great diſſentions, and blowes of bloudy warre, which our aduerſaries ſo cry out vpon? Forſooth, rather than want, they can faine names of ſects to themſelues; And where they can finde the leaſt difference in the paper of any obſcure Author of ours, preſently they cry out, New ſchiſmes, new ſects; What malice is this? what eager deſire of multiplying quarrels? If it had been ſo of old, ſo ſmall hides had not ſerued to containe the volumes of Auguſtine, Epiphanius, Philaſtrius: there had not beene fewer ſects, than teachers ſince the publiſhing of the Goſpell. But let vs paſſe ouer the number, and come to the weight. Let the malicious prattle what they will; With ſome of ours, the controuerſie is not about any ſolid lims of Chriſtian Faith, but onely of the very skin; with ſome others, not about the skin, but the garment rather, nor about the garment it ſelfe neither, but of the very hemme. There are certaine ſcholaſticall opinions of a middle ranke, meere Theologicall Corollaries, or perhaps ſome outward ceremonies, wherein we diſſent: Principles of Chriſtian Religion there are not. And withall theſe controuerſies are but ſuch, as that when the heat whether of zeale, or anger, ſhall abate, and either part ſhall well vnderſtand each other, they will eaſily admit of a Reconciliation. Neither haue theſe very Romaniſts leſſer quarrells amongſt themſelues; They can more hide their enmities, not exerciſe them leſſe. If they bee more wiſe, they are not more accordant. Neither is there (I dare ſay) any head of Religion, wherein they doe at once differ from vs, and agree all with one another. Finally, our differences are no greater, than were thoſe of old, among the holy Fathers of the Church, whoſe quarrells notwithſtanding are not ſo odiouſly blazoned by poſterity. I let paſſe the priuate ſcoldings of the Ancients not without ſome vnpleaſing (I had almoſt ſaid miſbeſeeming) tartneſſe. I had rather ſet before your eyes (for good lucke ſake) thoſe publique altercations of the Churches and Fathers, which afterward ſhut vp in a bleſſed concord. What quarrels aroſe at the Councell of Epheſus, betweene Cyril of Alexandria, and Iohn of Antioch? The Churches vnder both, ſtucke not to counterthunder Anathemaes one againſt another; Thereupon Theodoret thruſt in his ſickle into this harueſt; againſt whom Cyrillus (by Euoptius inſtigation) makes as ſtrong oppoſition: Theodoret accuſeth Cyril of Apollinariſme; Cyril accuſes Theodoret of Neſtorianiſme; The flame of their rage brake out more and more, and almoſt drew the Chriſtian world to parties; ſo that afterwards when Theodoret would haue entred the Councell of Chalcedon, the Egyptian, and other reuerend Biſhops cryed out, Wee muſt caſt out Cyril, if we take in Theodoret: The very Canons caſt him forth: God abhors him. The like was done afterwards in the eighth Action; The Biſhops openly proclaiming, He is an Hereticke, a Neſtorian; Away with the Hereticke. But when the matter was well ſcand, and it was found that he willingly ſubſcrib'd to the Orthodox Creeds, and the Epiſtles of Leo; The whole Synod with one accord cryed out, Theodoret is well worthy of a See in the Church, Let the Church receiue her Orthodox Paſtor.

It is worthy of immortality, that which Gregory Nazianzen recordeth of holy Athanaſius: The Romans ſeem'd to the Eaſterne Churches to follow the hereſies of Sabellius, in denying three Hypoſtaſes; The Eaſterne likewiſe ſeemed to the Romans, to ſa-uour too much of Arrius, in denying three Perſons; the quarrell grew hot; Then came that great diſpenſer of ſoules, and hauing meekly and mildly calld forth both ſides before him, he ſo handled the buſineſſe, that granting them the free vſe of their termes, he tied them cloſe to the matter, and ſhewed them a light, whereby they might behold one another: vpon this, without more adoe, finding themſelues, both, in the right, they fall to mutuall embracements. Neither would it ſpeed otherwiſe with vs, Brethren, (as I doe verily beleeue) if ſome Athanaſius from Heauen would but ioyne our hands together.

Oh if once the gates of inteſtine and horrid warres were ſhut vp, and the religious Princes, which are the Nurſing-fathers of the reformed Churches, would command by vertue of their authority a Synod to be aſſembled (as generall as it might) wherein both parts freely and modeſtly might lay forth their opinions, and ſuch common termes might be agreed vpon, as wherein both parts might freely reſt, without preiudice to either: How eaſily then, how happily might theſe grieuous ſtirs bee quietly pacified? Let vs pray for this (my Brethren) let vs pray deuoutly. In the mean while let vs all ſweetly incline our hearts to peace, and vnity. Let there be amongſt vs (as S. Auguſtine to Jerome) pure brotherhood; Neither let vs ſuffer our ſelues, vpon euery ſlight quirke of opinion, to be diſtracted, or torne aſunder. Let vs forget that there were euer any ſuch (in reſpect of the deuotion of a Sect) as Luther, Melancton, Caluin, Zuinglius, Arminius, or if any other mortall name, for what haue we to doe with man? Let vs breathe nothing, let vs affect nothing, but Ieſus Chriſt.

We Diuines are Pleyades, (as Gregory ſaith wittily) Let vs therefore ſhine ſtill together, though not without ſome difference of place. In a Pomegranate are many graines vnder one rinde; You know the myſtery. Let vs ioyne theſe pomegranates to our Bels; Let vs be loud, but conſorted. Let vs deuote for euer, with one heart, all our operations, miniſteries, gifts, to one God, the Father, Sonne, and holy Ghoſt; to one Head, Chriſt; one body, the Church; that being waſhed with one Baptiſme, ranſomed with one price, profeſſing one Faith, and holding the vnity of the ſpirit in the bond of Peace, wee may at laſt happily enioy one, and the ſame Heauen, through Ieſus Chriſt our Lord: To whom with the Father, and the holy Spirit, be aſcribed all honour and glory for euermore. Amen.

TO OVR GRATIOVS AND BLESSED MOTHER, THE Church of England;

THE MEANEST OF HER CHILDREN DEDICATES THIS HER APOLOGIE, AND WISHETH ALL PEACE AND HAPPINESSE.

NO lesse than a yeare and a halfe is past (Reuerend, Deare, and Holy Mother) since I wrote a louing monitory Letter to * two of thine vnworthy Sons; which (I heard) were fled from thee in person, in affection, and somewhat in opinion: Supposing them yet thine in the maine substance, though in some circumstances their owne. Since which, one of them hath washt off thy Font-water as vncleane, and hath written desperately both against Thee and his owne fellowes: From the other, I receiued (not two monethes since) a stomack-full Pamphlet; besides the priuate iniuries to the Monitor, casting vpon thine honourable Name blasphemous imputations of Apostasie, Antichristianisme, Whoredome, Rebellion: Mine owne wrongs I could haue contemned in silence; but, For Sions sake, I cannot hold my peace: If I remember not thee, O Ierusalem, let my tongue cleaue to the roofe of my mouth. It were a shame and sinne for me, that my zeale should be lesse hot for thine innocencie, than theirs to thy false disgrace. How haue I hastened therefore to let the World see thy sincere Truth, and their peruerse slanders! Vnto thy sacred Name then (whereto I haue in all piety deuoted my selfe) I humbly present this my speedie and dutifull labour: whereby I hope thy weake Sonnes may bee confirmed, the strong encouraged, the rebellious shamed: And if any shall still obstinatly accurse thee, I refer their reuenge vnto thy Glorious Head, who hath espoused thee to himselfe, in Truth and righteousnesse: Let him whose thou art, right thee: In the meane time, we thy true sonnes shall not only defend, but magnifie thee: Thou maist be blacke, but thou art comely: the Daughters haue seene thee, and counted thee blessed; euen the Queene, and the Concubines, and they haue praised thee: thou art thy Welbeloueds, and his desire is towards thee. So let it be, and so let thine be towards him for euer; and mine towards you both, who am the least of all thy little Ones.

SECTION I.

IF TRVTH and PEACE (Zacharies two Companions) had met in our loue, this Controuerſie had neuer bin; the ſeuering of theſe two hath cauſed this ſeparation: for while ſome vnquiet minds haue ſought Truth without Peace, they haue at once loſt Truth, Peace, Loue, vs and themſelues. God knowes how vnwillingly I put my hand to this vnkinde quarrell: Nothing ſo much abates the courage of a Chriſtian, as to call his Brother Aduerſarie: We muſt doe it; woe be the men by whom this offence commeth: Yet by how much the inſultation of a brotherly enemie is more intolerable; and the griefe of our bleſſed Mother greater, for the wrong of her owne; So much more cauſe I ſee to breake this ſilence: If they will haue the laſt words, they may not haue all. For our carriage to them: They ſay, when Fire, the god of the Chaldees had deuoured all the other woodden Deities, that Canopis ſet vpon him a Caldron full of water, whoſe bottome was deuiſed with holes ſtopt with wax; which no ſooner felt the flame, but gaue way to the quenching of that furious Idoll. If the fire of inordinate zeale, conceit, contention, haue conſumed all other parts in the ſeparation, and caſt forth (more than Nebuchadnezzars Furnace) from their Amſterdam hither; it were well if the waters of our moderation and reaſon could vanquiſh, yea abate it: This little Hin of mine ſhall be ſpent that way: we may try and wiſh, but not hope it: The ſpirits of theſe men are too well knowne, to admit any expectation of yeeldance. Since yet both for preuention and neceſſary defence, this taske muſt be vndertaken, I craue nothing of my Reader but patience and iuſtice: of God, victory to the Truth: as for fauour, I wiſh no more than an enemie would giue againſt himſelfe: With this confidence I enter into theſe liſts, and turne my pen to an Aduerſary, God knowes whether more proud or weake.

SEP.

IT is an hard thing euen for ſober-minded men in caſes of controuerſie, to vſe ſoberly the aduantages of the times: vpon which whileſt men are mounted on high, they vſe to behold behold such as they oppose too ouerlie, and not without contempt; and so are oft-times emboldned to roule vpon them as from aloft very weake and weightlesse discourses, thinking any sleight and slender opposition sufficient to oppresse those vnderlings, whom they haue (as they suppose) at so great an aduantage. Vpon this very presumption it commeth to passe, that this Author vndertaketh thus solemnely and seuerely to censure a cause, whereof (as appeareth in the sequele of the discourse) he is vtterly ignorant: which had he been but halfe so carefull to haue vnderstood, as he hath been forward to censure, he would either haue beene (I doubt not) more equall towards it, or more weighty against it.

As this Epistle is come to mine hands, so I wish the answer of it may come to the hands of him that occasioned it: Intreating the Christian Reader, in the name of the Lord, vnpartially to behold without either preiudice of cause, or respect of person, what is written on both sides, and so from the Court of a sound Conscience to giue iust iudgement.

Section II.

The answerers Preamble, retorted, confuted.

IT is an hard thing euen for those that would seeme sober-minded men, in cases of Controuersie, to vse soberly the frownes and disaduantages of causes and times: whereby whilst men are dejected and troden downe, they vse to behold their opposites mounted on high, too repiningly, and not without desperate enuie: and so are oft-times moued to shoot vp at them, as from below, the bitter arrows of spightful and spleenish discourses; thinking any hatefull opposition sufficiently charitable, to oppugne those aduersaries, which haue them (as they feele) at so great an aduantage: vpon this impotent maliciousnesse, it commeth to passe, that this Answerer vndertaketh thus seuerely and peremptorily, to censure that charitable censure, of ignorance, which (as shall appeare in the sequell) he either simply or willingly vnderstood not: and to brand a deare Church of Christ with Apostasie, Rebellion, Antichristianisme: What can be more easie than to returne accusations?

Your Preamble (with a graue bitternesse) charges me with, First, Presumption vpon aduantages; Secondly, Weake and weightlesse discourse; Thirdly, Ignorance of the cause censured: It had beene madnesse in me to write, if I had not presumed vpon aduantages; but of the cause of the truth, not of the times: Though (blessed bee God) the times fauour the truth, and vs: if you scorne them and their fauours, complaine not to be an vnderling: thinke that the times are wiser than to bestow their fauours vpon wilfull aduersaries; but in spight of times, you are not more vnder vs in estate, than in conceit aboue vs: so wee say The Sunne is vnder a Cloud, wee know it is aboue it. Would God ouerlinesse and contempt were not yours, euen to them which are mounted highest vpon best desert; and now you that haue not learned sobriety in iust disaduantages, tax vs, not to vse soberly the aduantages of time: there was no gall in my pen, no insultation, I wrote to you as brethren, and wisht you companions: there was more danger of flatterie in my stile, than bitternesse: wherein vsed I not my aduantages soberly? Not in that I said too much, but not enough; Not in that I was too sharpe, but not weighty enough; My opposition was not too vehement, but too slight and slender: So, strong Champions blame their aduersarie for striking too easily: you might haue forborne this fault, it was my fauour that I did not my worst: you are worthy of more weight, that complaine of ease. The discourse that I roll'd downe vpon you, was weake and weightlesse: you shall well finde, this was my lenitie, not my impotence. The fault hereof is partly in your expectation not in my letter: I meant but a short Epistle, you look't belike for a volume, or nothiug; I meant onely a generall monition; you look't for a solide prosecution of particulars: It is not for you to giue taskes to others pens. By what Law, must we write nothing but large Scholasticall Discourses? Such Tomes as yours: May wee not touch your sore, vnlesse we will launce and search it? I was not enough your enemie; forgiue me this error, and you shall smart more: But not onely my omissions were of ignorance, but my censures, though seuere and solemne: An easie imputation from so great a controuler: I pardon you, and take this as the common lot of enemies. I neuer yet could see any Scribler so

If D. Whitaker, M. Perkins, M. Gyfford, and that Oracle of our present times, D. Andrewes, went away content with this liuery from yours; how can I repine? If I haue censured what cause I knew not, let me be censured for more than ignorance, impudencie: but if you know not what I censured (let all my trust lye on this issue) take both ignorance, boldnesse, and malice to your selfe: Is your cause so mysticall, that you can feare any mans ignorance? What Cobler or Spinster hath not heard of the maine holds of Brownisme? Am I onely a stranger in Hierusalem? If I know not all your opinions, pardon me: your owne haue not receiued this illumination; I speake boldly, not your selfe; Euery day brings new conceits, and not one day teaches, but corrects another: you must be more constant to your selues, ere you can vpbraid ignorance or auoid it. But whether I knew your prime fancies, appeares sufficiently by a particular discourse; which aboue a yeere since was in the hands of some of your Clyents, and I wonder if not in yours: Shortly; am I ignorant? If I were obstinate too, you might hope (with the next gale) for me, your more equall aduersarie, at Amsterdam. As I am; my want of care and skill, shall (I hope) lose nothing of the truth by you, nor suffer any of your foule aspersions vpon the face of Gods Church and ours.

The crime here obiected is separation, a thing very odious in the eyes of all them from whom it is made: as euermore casting vpon them the imputation of euill, whereof all men are impatient: And hence it commeth to passe, that the Church of England can better brooke the vilest persons continuing communion with it, than any whomsoeuer separating from it, though vpon neuer so iust and well grounded reasons.

Section III.

I Wrote not to you alone: what is become of your partner, yea, your Guide? Woe is me, he hath renounced our Christendome with our Church: and hath washt off his former water, with new: and now condemnes you all, for not separating further, no lesse then we condemne you for separating so farre. As if you could not bee enough out of Babylon, vnlesse you be out of your selues. Alas, miserable Countreymen, whither runne you? Religion hath but his height, beyond which is error and madnesse: hee tells you true, your station is vnsafe; either you must forward to him, or backe to vs.

euill of good: So wise Generals punish mutinous persons, worse than Robbers or Adulterers: So Corah and his company (a Story cunningly turned vpon vs by your Martyr) for their opposition to Moses, were more fearfully plagued, than the Idolatrous Israelites. These sinnes are more directly against common society, the other more personall: and if both haue like iniquity; yet the former haue both more offence, and more danger: And if not so, yet who cannot rather brooke a lewd seruant, than an vndutifull sonne, though pretending faire colours for his disobedience? At least, you thinke the Church of England thinks her selfe Gods Church, as well as your Saints of Amsterdam. You that so accurse Apostasie in others, could you expect, shee should brooke it in you?

But your reasons are iust and well grounded: euery way of a man is right in his owne eyes; Said we not well, that thou art a Samaritane, and hast a Deuill, say the Iewes? And yet separation from the World, and so from the men of the World, and so from the Prince of the world that reigneth in them, and so from whatsoeuer is contrary to God, is the first step to our communion with God, and Angels, and good men; as the first step to a ladder is to leaue the earth.

Section IIII.

The kinds of the Separation, and which is iust. ἐκκλησία.

YEt there is a commendable and happy separation from the World, from the Prince and men of the World, and whatsoeuer is contrary to God: who doubts it? There were no Heauen for vs without this, no Church; which hath her name giuen by her Father and Husband, of calling out from other. Out of the Ægypt of the World doth God call his sonnes: But this separation is into the visible Church from the World; not (as yours) out of the Church, because of some particular mixtures with the World: or (if you had rather take it of profession) out of the World of Pagans and Infidels, into the visible Church; not out of the World of true (though faulty) Christians, into a purer Church. That I may here at once for all giue light to this point of separation: we finde in Scripture a separation either to good, or from euill: To good; so the Leuites were separated from among the children of Israel, to beare the Arke, and to minister: so the first borne, first fruits, and Cities of refuge: So Paul was (ἀφωρισμένον) separated, which some would haue allude to his Pharisaisme, but hath plaine reference to Gods owne words (Acts 13. 2.) Separate mee Barnabas and Saul: Though this is rather a destination to some worthy purpose, than a properly called separation.

Num. 18. 14. Num. 16. 9. Deut. 10. 1. Exod. 13. 12. Leuit. 15. 21. Deut. 4. 41. Rom. 1. 1. ἀφωρίσατέ δή μοι Σαυλον.

From euill, whether sinne or sinners: From sinne; so euery soule must eschew euill, whether of doctrine or manners, and disclaime all fellowship with the vnfruitfull works of darkenesse, whether in himselfe or others. So S. Paul charges vs to hold that which is good, and abstaine from all appearance of euill: so Ieremie is charged to separate the precious (doctrine or practice) from the vile. From sinners, not onely practised by God himselfe (to omit his eternall and secret Decree, whereby the Elect are separated from the Reprobate) both in his gracious vocation, sequestring them from nature and sinne, as also in his execution of iudgment, whether particular, as of the Israelites from the Tabernacles of Corah; or vniuersall, and finall, of the Sheepe from the Goats; But also enioyned from God to men, in respect either of our affection, or of our yoke, and familiar society, whereof Saint PAVL: Bee not vnequally yoked with Infidels, Come out from among them, and separate your selues. In all this wee agree: In the latitude of this last onely wee differ: I finde you call for a double separation. A first separation in the gathering of the Church: A second in the menaging of it: The first at our entrance into the Church, the second in our continuance: The first of the Church, from Pagans and Worldlings, an initiatory profession; The second of lewd men from the Church by iust censures; You speake confusedly of your owne separation; one while of both, another while of either single. For the first, either confesse it done by our Baptisme, or else you shal be forced to hold, we must rebaptize: But of this Constitutiue separation anon: For the second of sinners, whether in iudgement, or life, some are more grosse, hainous, incorrigible: others lesse notorious, and more tractable: those other must be separated by iust censures; not these. Which censures if they be neglected, the Church is foule, and (in your Pastors word) faulty, and therefore cals for our teares, not for our flight. Now of Churches faulty and corrupted, some raze the foundation, others on the true foundation build timber, hay, stubble: From those we must separate, from these we may not. PETERS rule is eternall, Whither shall wee goe from thee? thou hast the words of eternall life: where these words are found, woe be to vs, if we be not found. Amongst many good separations then, yours cannot be separated from euill, for that we should so farre separate from the euill, that therefore we should separate from Gods children in the communion of the holy things of God, that for some (after your worst done) not fundamentall corruptions, we should separate from that Church, in whose wombe we were conceiued, and from betwixt whose knees we fell to God: in a word, (as one of yours once said) to separate not only from visible euill, but from visible good, as all Antichristian: who but yours can thinke lesse than absurd and impious? Grant, we should be cleane separated from the World; yet if we be not, must you be separated from vs? Doe but stay till God haue separated vs from himselfe: will the wise Husbandman cast away his Corne-heap for the chaffe and dust? Shall the Fisher cast away a good draught, because his Drag-Net hath Weeds? Doth God separate from the faithfull soule, because it hath some corruptions her Inmates, though not her commanders? Certainly, if you could thorowly separate the World from you, you would neuer thus separate your selues from vs: Begin at home, separate all selfe-loue, and selfe-will, and vncharitablenesse from your hearts, and you cannot but ioyne with that Church, from which you haue separated: Your Doctor would perswade vs, you separate from nothing but our corruptions: you are honester, and grant it from our Church: it were happie for you, if he lyed not; who in the next page confutes himselfe, shewing that you separate from vs, as Christ from the Samaritans, namely from the Church, not the corruptions only; and not as he did from the Iewes, namely from their corruptions, not from their Church: His memory saues our labour, and marres his discourse.

The separation we haue made in respect of our knowledge, and obedience, is indeed late, and new: yet is it in the nature and causes thereof as ancient as the Gospell, which was first founded in the enmitie which God himselfe put betwixt the seed of the Woman, and the seed of the Serpent, Gen.3.15. which enmitie hath not only beene successiuely continued, but also visibly manifested by the actuall separation of all true Churches, from the World in their collection and constitution, before the Law, vnder the Law, and vnder the Gospell, Gen.4.13,14.16. & 6.1,2. & 7.1.7. with 1 Pet.3.20. 12. & 12.2. YET, if not equitie, it were well you could plead age: This your separation in the nature and causes of it (you say) is no lesse ancient than the first institution of enmitie betwixt the two seeds: you might haue gone a little higher, and haue said, than our first Parents running from God in the Garden, or their separation from God by their sinne: But we take your time, and easily beleeue that this your late separation was founded vpon that ancient enmitie of the seed of the Serpent with the Womans. That subtill Deuil, when he saw the Church breath from the persecutions of Tyrants, vexed her no lesse with her owne diuisions; seeking that by fraud, which by violence he could not effect. Hence all the fearefull Schismes of the Church, whereof yours is part. This enmitie hath not onely beene successiuely continued, but also too visibly manifested by the actuall (but wilfull) separation of Heretiques and Sectaries from the Church in all ages: But I mistake you; yours is as ancient as the Gospell: What? that Euangelium æternum of the Friers? whose name they accursedly borrowed from Reuel. 14.6. Or that Euangelium Regni of the Familists? Or that Euangelium aliud, whereof Saint PAVL taxeth his Galatians? None of all these, you say; but as that Gospell of Peace, of Truth, of Glory; so ancient, and neuer knowne till Bolton, Barrow, and Browne? Could it escape all the holy Prophets, Apostles, Doctors of the old, middle, and later world, and light only vpon these your three Patriarchs? Perhaps, Nouatus or Donatus (those Saints with their Schooles) had some little glimpse of it; but this perfection of knowledge is but late and new: So many rich Mines haue lien long vnknowne, and great parts of the World haue beene discouered by late Venturers. If this course haue come late to your knowledge and obedience, not so to others: For loe, it was practised successiuely in the constitution and collection of all true Churches, through all times, before the Law, vnder the Law, after it: We haue acknowledged many separations: but as soone shall you finde the time past in the present, as your late separation, in the ancient and approued. You quote Scriptures, though (to your praise) more daintie indeed than your fellowes. Who cannot doe so? Who hath not? Euen Satan himselfe cites the word against him which was the word of his Father. Let vs not number, but weigh your texts: The rather, for that I find these as your Master-proofes, set as Challengers in euery of your defences: In Gen. 4. 13. CAIN a bloudy Fratricide is excommunicated: In Gen. 6. 1, 2. The sonnes of God maried the daughters of men: In Gen. 7. 1. & 7. NOAH is approued as righteous, and enters the Arke: In 1 Pet. 3.20,21. The rest in NOAHS time were disobedient, and perished: What of all this? Alas, what mockage is this of the Reader, and Scriptures? Surely, you euen ioyne Scriptures, as you separate your selues: This is right as your Pastor, to proue all members of the visible Church, elect and precious stones, cites, 1 King. 7.9. where is speech only of Salomons house in the Forrest of Lebanon, his Porch for his Throne, his Hall, his Palace for Pharaohs daughter, and when he comes to describe the office of his imaginary Doctor, thwacks fourteene Scriptures into the margent, whereof not any one hath any iust colour of inference to his purpose: and in this discourse of the power of the Church (that he might seem to honour his margent with shew of texts) hath repeated six places twice ouer in the space of six lines. For these of yours: you might obiect the first to the Cainites, not to vs: Cain was cast out worthily. Doe we either deny, or vtterly forbeare this censure? Take heed you follow him not, in your voluntary exile, to the land of Nod. The second you might obiect to those mungrell Christians that match with Turkes and Pagans. There are sonnes of God, that is, members of the visible Church; and daughters of men, which are without the bounds, meere Infidels; it is sinne for those sonnes to yoke themselues with those daughters. What is this to vs? Noah was righteous, the multitude disobedient: Who denies it? yet Noah separated not from the corrupted Church, till the floud separated him from the earth, but continued an ancient Preacher of righteousnesse, euen to that peruerse & rebellious Generation. But it sufficeth you, that Cain and the Giants were separated from the rest: We yeeld it: what will follow hence, saue onely that notorious Malefactors must be cast out, and professed Heathen not let into the Church? We hold, and wish no lesse: your places euince no more. These, before the Law: In Leuit. 20.24.26. God chose out Israel from other people: This was Gods act, not theirs: a sequestring of his Israelites from the Gentiles, not of Israel from it selfe: yours is your owne, and from men, in all maine points, of your owne profession: But therefore Israel must be holy: If any man deny holinesse to be required of euery Christian, let him feele your Maranatha. The Israelites separated themselues from the strangers, which were Infidels: whether in their marriage, or deuotion: Neither Gods seruice, nor an Israelites bed was for Heathens. Which separation the Church of England neither hath made, nor doth make, but stands actually one with all that part of the World within the Kingdome, without separation: for which cause, amongst others, we haue chosen by the grace of God, rather to separate our selues to the Lord from it, than with it from him, in the visible constitution of it.

SECTION VI.

BVT all these examples, perhaps are not so much to warrant what you haue done, as to condemne the Church of England for what shee hath not done: for such a separation shee neither hath made nor doth make, but stands actually one with all that part of the World within the Kingdome without separation. Loe, here the maine ground of this Schisme, which your Proto-Martyr BARROW hammers vpon in euery page; an ill constitution: Thus he comments vpon your words: For where such prophane confuse multitudes, without any exception, separation or choice, were all of them from publike Idolatrie, at one instant receiued or rather compelled to be members of the Church, in some parish or other, where they inhabited, without any due calling to the faith, by the preaching of the Gospell going before, or orderly ioyning together in the faith, there being no voluntary or particular confession of their owne faith and duties made or required of any, and lastly, no holy walking in the faith amongst them; who can say that these Churches consisting of this people, were euer rightly gathered or built according to the rule of Christs Testament? In his words and yours I finde both a miscollection, and a wrong charge. For the former: the want of noting one poore distinction, breeds all this confusion of Doctrine, and separation of men: for there is one case of a new Church to be called from Heathenisme to Christianity, another of a former Church to be reformed from errors, to more sincere Christianitie. In the first of these is required indeed a solemne initiation by Baptisme; and before that, a voluntary and particular confession of faith, and therefore a cleare separation, and exception of the Christian, from the infidell: In the latter, neither is new Baptisme lawfull (though some of you belike of old were in hand with a rebaptization: which not then speeding, succeedeth now to your shame) nor a new voluntarie and particular confession of Faith, besides that in Baptisme (though very commendable) will euer be proued simply necessary to the being of a Church; so long as the erring parties doe actually renounce their doctrines, and in open profession embrace the truth; and (as generally in the publike confession) so particularly vpon good occasion giue iust testimonies of their repentance: This is our case, we did not make a new Church, but mended an old: your CLIFTON is driuen to this hold by necessitie of Argument; Otherwise he sees there is no auoiding of Anabaptisme: Mended, saith your your Doctor, and yet admitted the misceline rabble of the prophane? Say now, that such separation were not made: Let some few be holy, and the more part prophane: Shall the lewdnesse of some disanull Gods Couenant with others? This is your mercy; Gods is more: who still held Israel for his, when but few held his pure seruice: Let that Diuine Psalmist teach you how full the Tents of Israel were of mutinous Rebels in the Desart; yet the Pillar by day and night forsooke them not; and Moses was so farre from reiecting them, that he would not endure God should reiect them to his owne aduantage: Looke into the blacke censures, and bitter complaints of all the Prophets, and wonder that they separated not: Looke into the increased masse of corruptions, in that declined Church; whereof the blessed eyes of our Sauiour were witnesses, and maruell at his silent and sociable incuriousnesse: yea, his charge of not separating; Ye know not of what spirit you are: Now you flie to constitution, as if notorious euils were more tolerable in continuance, than in the collection of Assemblies: Sardi had but a few names that had not defiled their garments; God praises these, bids them not separate from the rest. Thyatira suffers a false propheteſse: the rest that haue not this learning, yet are bidden but to hold their owne; not to separate from the Angell, which hath not separated IEZABEL from the Church.

What separation the Church of England hath made. Bar. p. 22. & 55. F. Iohns. against M. H. Act. & Mon. passim.

YOVR charge is no lesse iniurious; that the Church of England hath made no separation: Concerning which you haue learned of your Martyr, and ouerseers so to speake, as if before her late disclamation of popery, in Queene ELIZABETHS time, shee had not beene. Her monuments could haue taught you better, and haue lead you to her ancient Pedigree not much below the Apostolike dayes, and in many descents haue shewed you not a few worthy witnesses and patrons of Truth; all which, with their holy and constant off-spring, it might haue pleased you to haue separated from this imputation of not separating: Will you know therefore how the Church of England hath separated? In her first conuersion shee separated her selfe from Pagans: in her continuance she separated her selfe from grosse heretiques, and sealed her separation with bloud: in her reformation she separated her selfe from wilfull Papists, by her publike profession of Truth, and proclaimed hatred of error; and shee daily doth separate the notoriously euill, by suspensions, by excommunications, though not so many as yours; Besides the particular separations of many from the acknowledged corruptions, in iudgement, profession, practise. All these will be auowed in spight of all contradiction: with what forehead then can you say; The whole Church of England hath not at all separated?

Troubl. & excom. pag. 191. M. Spr. pag. 1.

After all your shifts and idle tales of constitution, you haue separated from this Church against the Lord; not with the Lord, from it: If there be Christ with vs, if the Spirit of God in vs, if Assemblies, if calling by the word: whatsoeuer is, or is not else in the Constitution, there is whatsoeuer is required to the essence of a Church. No corruption either in gathering or continuance can destroy the truth of being, but the grace of being well: If Christ haue taken away his Word and Spirit, you haue iustly subduced; else you haue gone from him in vs.

Fr. Iun. lib. de Eccles.

And when you haue all done, the Separatists Idoll, visible Constitution, will proue but an appendance of an externall forme, no part of the essence of a true Church: and therefore your separation no lesse vaine than the ground, than the Authors. Lastly, if our bounty should (which it cannot) grant, that our collection was at first deeply faultie: cannot the Ratihabition (as the Lawyers speake) be drawne backe? may not an after-allowance rectifie and confirme it? In contracts (your owne similitude) a following consent iustifies an act done before consent: and why not in the contract betwixt God, and his visible Church? Loe, he hath confirmed it by his gratious benedictions, and as much as may be in silence giuen vs abundant proofes of his acceptation: That after-act, which makes your Baptisme lawfull, why can it not make our Church?

Section VIII.

BVt for as much as Constitution is the very state of Brownisme, Let vs (I beseech you) inquire a little into the complexion of your Constitution: Whether Physicke, or Law, or Architecture haue lent you it: sure I am, it is in this vse, Apocryphall: Neuer man vsed it thus scrupulously till your times: Though, what need you the helpe of Fathers or Schooles: new words must expresse new Paradoxes. It is no treason to coine termes: What then is Constitution? Your Doctor can best tell vs: As the Constitution of a Common-wealth, or of a City, is a gathering or vniting of a people together into a ciuill Politie: So (saith he) the Constitution of the Common-wealth of Israel, and of the City of God, the new Ierusalem, is a gathering and vniting of people into a diuine Politie. The forme of which Polity, is Order: which order is requisite in all actions, and Administrations of the Church, as the Apostle sheweth, and specially in the Constitution therof: so that next vnto faith in God, it is to be esteemed most necessary for all holy societies. Hence Paul reioyced in the Colossians Order and Faith: To this Constitution therefore, belong a people, as the matter; secondly, a calling, or gathering together, as the forme, whereof the Church consisteth. The Constitution of the Church of England is false in both: Why so? Haue we not a people? Are not those people called together? To preuent this, you say our Constitution is false, not none: Why false? Because those people haue neither Faith, nor Order. For Faith first: Who are you that dare thus boldly breake into the closets of God, the hearts of men? and condemne them to want that, which cannot be seene by any but diuine eyes? How dare you intrude thus into the Throne of your Maker? Consider, and conferre seriously: What faith is it, that is thus necessarily required to each member in this Constitution? Your owne Doctor shall define it: Faith required to the receiuing in of members, is the knowledge of the Doctrine of saluation by Christ, 1 Cor. 12.9. Gal. 3.2. Now I beseech you in the feare of God, lay by a while all vnchristian preiudice, and peremptory verdicts of those soules, which cost Christ as much bloud as your owne: and tell me ingenuously, whether you dare say, that not only your Christian brethren with whom you lately conuersed, but euen your fore-fathers which liued vnder Queene Elizabeths first confused Reformation, knew not the Doctrine of saluation by Christ: if you say they did not, your rash iudgement shall be punished fearfully, by him whose office you vsurpe. As you looke to answer before him that would not breake the bruised Reed, nor quench the smoaking Flax; presume not thus, aboue men and Angels. If they did, then had they sufficient claime both to true Constitution and Church: But this faith must be testified by obedience; so it was. If you thinke not so, yours is not testified by loue: both were weake, both were true: Weakenesse in any grace or worke, takes not away truth: Their sinnes of ignorance could no more disanull Gods Couenant with them, than multiplicitie of wiues with the Patriarchs.

WHat wanted they then? Nothing but Order; and not all Order, but yours: Order, a thing requisite and excellent; but let the world iudge whether essentiall. Consider now, I beseech you in the bowels of Christ Iesus, whether this be a matter for which heauen and earth should be mixed: whether for want of your Order, all the world must be put out of all order, and the Church out of life & being. Nothing (say we) can be more disorderly, than the confusion of your Democracy, or popular state (if not Anarchie): Where all (in a sort) ordaine and excommunicate; We condemne you not for no true members of the Church: what can be more orderlesse (by your owne confessions) than the Trine-vne Church at Amsterdam? which yet you grant but faulty. If there be disproportion and dislocation of some parts, is it no true humane bodie? Will you rise from the feast, vnlesse the dishes be set on in your owne fashion?

Is it no Citie, if there be mud-walles halfe broken, low Cottages vnequally built, no State-house? But your order hath more essence than you can expresse; and is the same which Politicians in their trade call (πόλιν τῆς πολεως) an incorporating into one common ciuill body, by a voluntary vnion, and that vnder a lawfull gouernment: Our Church wants both: wherein there is both constraint, and false office. Take your owne resemblance and your owne asking: Say that some Tyrant (as Basilius of Russia) shall forcibly compell a certaine number of Subiects into Mosco, and shall hold them in by an awfull Garrison, forcing them to new lawes and Magistrates, perhaps hard and bloudy: They yeeld; and making the best of all, liue together in a cheerefull communion, with due commerce, louing conuersation, submissiue execution of the enioyned lawes: In such case, Whether is Mosco a true Citie, or not? Since your Doctor cites Aristotle, let it not like him to learne of that Philosopher, who can teach him, that when Calisthenes had driuen out the Tyrant from Athens, and set vp a new Gouernment, and receiued many strangers, and bondmen into the Tribes, it was doubted, not which of them were Citizens, but whether they were made Citizens vniustly. If you should finde a company of true Christians in vtmost India, would you stand vpon termes, and inquire how they became so? Whiles they haue what is necessary for that heauenly profession; what need your curiositie trouble it selfe with the meanes?

Section X.

YOu see then what an idle plea constraint is in the constitution of a Citie, the ground of all your exception: But it is otherwise in Gods city, the Church; why then doth his Doctorship parallel these two? And why may not euen cõstraint it selfe haue place in the lawfull constitution or reformation of a Church? Did not Manasses after his comming home to God, charge and command Iuda to serue the Lord God of Israel? Did not worthy Iosiah, when he had made a couenant before the Lord, cause all that were found in Ierusalem, and Beniamin, to stand to it, and compelled all that were found in Israel, to serue the Lord their God? What haue Queene Elizabeth, or King Iames done more? Or what other? Did not Asa vpon Obeds propheſie, gather both Iuda and Beniamin, and all the strangers from Ephraim, Manasses, and Simeon, and enact with them, that whosoeuer would not seeke the Lord God, should be slaine? What meanes this peruersenesse? You that teach we may not stay Princes leisure to reforme, will you not allow Princes to vrge others to reforme? What crime is this, that men were not suffered to be open Idolaters, that they were forced to yeeld submission to Gods ordinances? Euen your owne teach, that Magistrates may compell Infidels to heare the doctrine of the Church; and Papists, you say elsewhere (though too roughly) are Infidels: But you say, not to be members of the Church: Gods people are of the willing sort: True, Neither did they compell them to this: They were before entred into the visible Church by true Baptisme, though miserably corrupted: They were not now initiated, but purged: Your subtill Doctor can tell vs from Bernard, that faith is to be perswaded, not to be compelled: yet let him remember that the guests must be compelled to come in, though not to eat when they are come. Compelled, not by perswasions; for these were the first inuitations; therefore by further meanes; Though this conceit hath no place with vs, where men are vrged not to receiue a new faith, but to performe the old; to abandon that wicked Idolatry which had defiled them, and to entertaine but that truth, which the very power of their Baptisme challenged at their hand: but this was the old song of the Donatists; Farre be it from our conscience, to compell any man to the faith. If God did not draw vs, and by a sweet violence bend our wills to his, when should we follow him? Either you haue not read, or not cared for the practise of the ancient Church, and Augustines resolution concerning the sharp penalties imposed vpon the Donatists (would God none of your kindred) in his time; with his excellent defences of these proceedings.

BVt tell vs then, what ſhould haue beene done? The Goſpell ſhould haue beene euery where preached; All conuerts ſhould haue beene ſingled out, and haue giuen a voluntary and particular confeſſion of their Faith, and Repentance: I anſwer you: The Goſpell was long and worthily preached in the dayes of King Edward; enough to yeeld both Martyrs to the ſtake, and Profeſſors to the ſucceeding times. Were their holy Sermons, their learned writings, and their precious bloud (which was no leſſe vocall) of no force? Afterwards, in the beginning of Famous Queene Elizabeths reparation, what confluence was there of zealous Confeſſors returning now from their late exile? How painfully and diuinely did they labour in this Vineyard of God? How did they (with their many holy Partners, which had ſhrowded themſelues during that ſtorme of perſecution, in a dangerous ſecrecie) ſpread themſelues ouer this Land, and each-where drew flockes of hearers to them, and with them? Is all this nothing to their ingratefull Poſteritie? If you murmure that there were no more, take heed leſt you forget there were ſo many: for vs, we doe ſeriouſly bleſſe God for theſe, and triumph in them.

Conſtitution of the Church of England. Barrow and Greenw. paſſim.

All this premiſed; now comes a Chriſtian Edict from the State, that euery man ſhall yeeld obedience to this Truth, wherein they had beene thus inſtructed: It was performed by the moſt; whoſe ſubmiſſion, what was it but an actuall profeſſion of their faith, and repentance? And ſince ſuch was their face, who dares iudge of their hearts? More than this, if euer can be ſhewed abſolutely neceſſary in ſuch a State of the Church to the very conſtitution, and repaired being thereof, I doe here vow neuer to take the Church of England for my Mother.

We know, and grieue to ſee how ſcornfully your whole Sect, and amongſt the reſt your reſolute Doctor turnes ouer theſe gracious entrances and proceedings of theſe two Royall and bleſſed Reformers; and whom ſhould he finde to raiſe his ſcoffes vpon, but that Saint-like Hiſtorian M. Fox? Now (ſayes Mr. Fox) a new face of things began to appeare, as it were in a Stage, new Players comming in, the old thruſt out: Now (ſaith your Doctors Comment) new Biſhops came in, as Players vpon the old ſtage of the Popiſh Church, as if the Church were no whit altered, but the men: Shall we ſay, this is too much malice, or too little wit, and conſcience? Euen in the Lord Protectors daies, that holy man reports, that after the Scriptures reſtored, and Maſſes aboliſhed, greater things followed theſe ſofter beginnings, in the reformation of the Churches: Learned and godly Diuines were called for from forren parts, a ſeparation was made (though not ſo much willing, as wilfull) of open and manifeſt Aduerſaries from Profeſſors, whether true or diſſembled: Commiſſioners were appointed to viſit euery ſeuerall Dioceſſe. Euery Bench of them had ſeuerall godly and learned Preachers to inſtruct the people in the truth, and to diſſwade them from Idolatrie and Superſtition. The Popes Supremacy not thruſt, but taught downe: All wil-worſhip whatſoeuer, oppugned by publike Sermons: Images deſtroyed, Pilgrimages forbidden, the Sacramẽts inioyned to be reuerently and holily miniſtred, Eccleſiaſticall perſons reformed in life, in Doctrine: Proceſſions laid downe, Preſence and attendance vpon Gods word commanded, the holy expending of Sabbath daies appointed, due preparation to Gods table called for, ſet times of teaching inioyned to Biſhops and other Miniſters, all Shrines and Monuments of Idolatry required to bee vtterly taken from publike and priuate houſes: All this, before his Parliament: By that, all bloudy lawes againſt Gods truth were repealed, zealous Preachers encouraged, ſo as (ſaith that worthy Hiſtorian) God was much glorified, and the people in many places greatly edified. What need I goe further than this firſt yeere? Heare this and be aſhamed, and aſſure your ſelues, that no man can euer reade thoſe holy Monuments of the Church, but muſt needs ſpet at your ſeparation. After that ſweet and hopefull Prince, what his Renowned Siſter Queene ELIZABETH did, the preſent times doe ſpeake, and the future ſhall ſpeake, when all theſe these Murmurers shall sleepe in the dust. The publike Disputations, zealous preachings, restaurations of banished Religion and men, Extirpations of Idolatry, Christian Lawes, wise and holy proceedings, and renewed couenants with God, are still fresh in the memories of some, and in the eares of all; so as all the World will iustly say, you haue lost shame with Truth, in denying it: Yea, to fetch the matter yet further, If the Reader shall looke back to the dayes of their puissant Father King HENRY the Eighth, he cannot but acknowledge (especially during the time of Queene ANNE, and before those six bloudy Articles) a true face of a Church (though ouer-spred with some Morphue of corruptions) and some commendable forwardnesse of Reformation: for both the Popes Supremacie was abrogated, the true Doctrine of Iustification commonly taught, cõfidence in Saints vntaught, the vanity of Pardons declared, worship of Images and Pilgrimages forbidden, learned and godly Ministers required, their absences and mis-demeanors inhibited, the Scriptures translated, publikely and priuately enioyned to be read and receiued, the Word of God commanded to be sincerely and carefully preached: and to all this, Holy Master Fox addeth for my conclusion, such a vigilant care was then in the King and his Councell, how by all wayes and meanes to redresse Religion, to reforme errours, to correct corrupt customes, to helpe ignorance, and to reduce the mis-leading of Christs Flocke, drowned in blind Popery, Superstitious Customes, and Idolatry, to some better forme of Reformation, whereunto he prouided not only these Articles, Precepts, Iniunctions aboue specified, to informe the rude people, but also procured the Bishops to helpe forward the same cause of decayed Doctrine, with their diligent preaching, and teaching of the people. Goe now and say, that suddenly in one day, by Queene ELIZABETHS Trumpet, or by the sound of a Bell, in the name of Antichrist, all were called to the Church: Goe, say with your Patriarch, that we erect Religions by Proclamations, and Parliaments.

Vpon these premises I dare conclude, and doubt not to maintaine against all Separatists in the World, that England (to goe no higher) had in the dayes of King HENRY the Eighth, a true visible Church of God: and so by consequent their succeeding seed was by true Baptisme iustly admitted into the bosome thereof; and therefore that euen of them, without any further profession, Gods Church was truly constituted. If you shall say, that the following idolatry of some of them in Queene MARIES dayes excluded them: Consider, how hard it will be to proue, that Gods Couenant with any people, is presently disanulled by the sinnes of the most, whether of ignorance, or weaknesse; and if they had herein renounced God, yet that God also mutually renounced them. To shut vp your Constitution then: There is no remedy: Either you must goe forward to Anabaptisme, or come backe to vs. All your Rabbines cannot answer that charge of your rebaptized brother: If we be a true Church, you must returne; if we be not (as a false Church is no Church of God) you must rebaptize: If our Baptisme be good, then is our constitution good. Thus your owne Principles teach. The outward part of a true visible Church is a Vow, Promise, Oath, or Couenant betwixt God and the Saints: Now I aske, Is this made by vs in Baptisme, or no? If it be, then wee haue, by your confession (for so much as is outwardly required) a true visible Church: so your separation is vniust: If it be not, then you must rebaptize; for the first Baptisme is a nullity: and (if ours be not) you were neuer thereby as yet entred into any visible Church.

To the title of a Ring-leader, wherewith it pleaseth this Pistler to stile me, I answer that if the thing I haue done be good, it is good and commendable to haue beene forward in it; if it be euill, let it be reproued by the light of Gods Word, and that God, to whom I haue done that I haue done, will (I doubt not) giue me both to see, and to heale mine errour by speedie repentance: if I haue fled away on foot, I shall returne on Horse-backe: But as I durst neuer set foot into this way, but vpon a most sound and vnresistable conuiction of Conscience by the Word of God: (as I was perswaded) so must my retiring be wrought by more solid reasons from the same word, word, than are to be found in a thousand such prettie Pamphlets, and formall flourishes as this is.

AS for the title of Ring-leader, wherewith I stiled this Pamphleter; if I haue giuen him too much honour in his Sect, I am sorry: Perhaps I should haue put him (pardon an homely, but in this sense, not vnusuall word) in the taile of this Traine: Perhaps, I shou'd haue endorsed my Letter to Mr. Smith, and his shadow; So I perceiue he was: Whatsoeuer, whether he lead or follow, God meets with him. If either, or both, or neither, If he will goe alone; Wo vnto the foolish Prophets (saith the Lord) which follow their owne spirits, and haue seene nothing. Howsoeuer, your euill shall be reproued by the light of Gods word: Your coniunction I cannot promise, your reproofe I dare; If thereupon you finde grace to see and heale your errours, we should with all brotherly humblenesse attend on foot vpon your returne on Horse-backe; but if the sway of your mis-resolued conscience be headie and vnresistible, and your retiring hopelesse; these not solide reasons, these pretty Pamphlets, these formall flourishes shall one day be teareſull and materiall euidences against you before that awefull Iudge, which hath already said, That iudgements are prepared for the Scorners, and stripes for the backe of Fooles.

Your pitying of vs and sorrowing for vs, especially for the wrong done by vs, were in you commendable affections, if by vs iustly occasioned; but if your Church be deepely drencht in Apostasie, and you cry, Peace, Peace, when sodaine and certaine desolation is at hand, it is you that doe wrong, though you make the complaint: and so being cruell towards your selues, and your owne, whom you flatter, you cannot be truly pitifull towards others whom you bewaile. But I will not discourage you in this affection, lest we finde few in the same fault: the most in stead of pity and compassion, affording vs nothing but fury and indignation.

SECTION XIII.

I Professed to bestow pity and sorrow vpon you and your wrong: You entertaine both harshly, and with a churlish repulse: What should a man doe with such dispositions? Let him stroke them on the backe, they snarle at him, and shew their teeth: Let him shew them a Cudgell, they fly in his face: you allow not our actions, and returne our wrong; Ours is both the iniury and complaint: How can this be? You are the Agents, we sit still, and suffer in this rent: Yet (since the cause makes the Schisme) let vs inquire, not whose the action is, but whose the desert: Our Church is deepe drencht in Apostasie; and we cry Peace, Peace: No lesse than a whole Church at once, and that not sprinkled, or wetshod, but drencht in Apostasie; What, did we fall off from you, or you from vs? Tell me, were we euer the true Church of God? and were we then yours? We cannot fall, vnlesse we once stood: Was your Church before this Apostasie? Shew vs your Ancestors in opinion: Name me but one that euer taught as you doe, and I vow to separate: Was it not? Then we fell not from you: Euery Apostasie of the Church must needs be from the true Church. A true Church, & not yours? And yet can there be but one true; See now whether in branding vs with Apostasie, you haue not proued yours to be no true Church: Still I am ignorant: Queene Maries dayes (you say) had a true Church, which separated from Popery, chose them Ministers, serued God holily, from thence was our Apostasie: But, were not the same also (for the most part) Christians in King Edwards dayes? Hooper, and the rest, parts of that Church, or no? Was there any other ordination of Ministers than from them? Reiect these, and all the world will hisse at you; Receiue them, and where is our Apostasie? What Antichristianisme haue we, wherof these were freed? But you leape backe (if I vrge you farre) from hence to the Apostles times, to fetch our once true Church from farre, that it might be deare: you shall not carue for vs: we like not these bold ouer-leapes of so many Centuries: I speake boldly, you dare not stand to the triall of any Church, since theirs: Now, I heare your Doctor say, this Challenge sauours of Rome: Antiquity is with you, a Popish plea: we haue willingly taken vp our Aduersaries, at this (by pretence, their owne) weapon: You debar it in the conscience of your own nouell singularity: Yet your Pastor can be content to make vse of Tertullian alone against all Fathers; That such things are iustly to be charged with vanity, as are done without any precept, either of the Lord, or of the Apostles: And the Apostles did faithfully deliuer to the Nations the Discipline they receiued of Christ, which we must beleeue to be the tumultuary Discipline of the refined housefull at Amsterdam: What? all in all Ages, and places till now Apostates? Say if you can, that those famous Churches, wherein Cyprian, Athanasius, Ambrose, Hierome, Austen, Chrysostome, and the rest of those blessed Lights liued, were lesse deepe in this Apostasie than ours? O Apostaticall Fathers, that separated not! yea, say if you dare, that other reformed Churches are not ouer the Ankles with vs in this Apostasie: What hard news is this to vs, when as your Oracle dare say not much lesse, of the reformed Churches of Netherlands, with whom you liue? Thus he writes: For not hearing of them in other Congregations in these Countries; this I answer, That seeing by the mercy of God, we haue seen and forsaken the corruptions, yet remaining in the publike ministration, and condition of these Churches, (if they be all like to these of this City) we cannot therefore partake with them, in such case, without declining, and Apostasie from the truth, which we haue our selues already receiued and professed. See here, to partake with them in Gods seruice is Apostasie; If so in the accessories, Alas, what crime is in the principall? It were but apostasie to heare an English sermon; a Dutch is no lesse: Wo is you that you dwell still in Meshech: Good men; it were not more happy for you than the Church, that you were well in Heauen. No lesse than Apostasie? Let no Reader be appalled at so fearfull a word; this is one of the termes of Art, familiar to this way: Finde but any one page of a Dutch printed Volume without Apostasie, Excommunication, Cõmingling, Constitution, and suspect it not theirs: Heresie is not more frequent at Rome, than Apostasie at Amsterdam; nor Indulgences more ordinary there, than here Excommunications. Common vse makes terrible things easie: Their owne Mr. S. for holding with the Dutch Baptisme, and Read-prayers, is acknowledged to be cast out for an Apostate: yea, their Doctor Master Answorth is noted with this marke from themselues: There is much latitude (as happie is) in their Apostasie: For when Stanshal, Mercer, and Iacob Iohnson were to be chosen Officers in their Church, and exception was taken by some at their Apostasie, answer was made, It was not such Apostasie as debarred them from Office, it was but a slip. Iohn Marke (whether, as Isichius and Theophylact thinke, the blessed Euangelist, or some other holy Minister) is by the whole Parlour at Amsterdam, branded with this lame Apostasie; who departed indeed, but from Paul in his iourney, not from Christ in his faith, and therefore his (ἀποστὰς) is expounded by (μὴ συνελθὼν) Act. 15. 38. why doe we thinke much to drinke of an Euangelists Cup? Yet let this ignorant Epistler teach his censorious Answerer one point of his owne (that is the Separatists) skill: and tell him that he obiects two crimes to one poore Church, which are incompatible; want of Constitution, and Apostasie. Thus writes your Master of vs: If it were admitted, (which can neuer be proued) that they sometimes had beene true established Churches. Loe here, we neuer had true Constitution, therefore we are not capable of Apostasie: If we once had it, and so were true Churches, heare what your Pastor saith: As Christ giueth to all true Churches their being, so we must leaue it vnto him to take it away, when, and as he pleaseth. And therefore since he hath not remoued his Candlesticke, nor taken away his Kingdome, in spight of all obiected Apostasies, wee still ſtill continue ſo: and by conſequent your ſeparation vpon this ground is moſt vniuſt. An Apoſtate had wont to be the fearfull ſurname of damned Iulian: Tortus was an eaſie accuſer, to whom yet, we may ſay with Elihu, Num dicis Regi, Apoſtata? Behold, now ſo many Apoſtataes as men: Holy Cyprian deſcribes him by forſaking Chriſts colours, and taking vp Armes for Gentiliſme in life, or hereſie in iudgement: And Auſten tells vs, there cannot be a greater ſinne than Apoſtaſie; making elſe-where this ſinner, worſe than the Infidell. And the old vulgar can giue no worſe terme to (בליעל) where hee findes it, yea to (המורדים) Rebels themſelues. What doth this brand to a Church, not Chriſtian only, (though you deny it) but famous: Of whom is truly verified (after all your ſpleene) that which the Spirit writes to the Angell of Epheſus: Laboraſti & non Defeciſti: Say if you can, what Article of the Chriſtian and Apoſtolike faith haue we renounced? What Hereſie maintaine we? Wherein haue we run from the Tents of Chriſt? What hold we that may not ſtand with life in Chriſt, and ſaluation? Wee challenge all men and Deuils in this point, for our innocence: Diſtinguiſh for ſtarke ſhame, of ſo foule a word; or (which is better) eat it whole; and let not this blemiſh be left vpon your ſoule and name in the Records of God, and the world; that you once ſaid of a Church, too good for yours, Drencht in Apoſtaſie. If we crie Peace, whiles you crie Apoſtaſie; ſurely we flatter, whiles you raile: betwixt theſe two dangerous extremes, we know an wholſome meane, ſo to approue, that we foſter not ſecuritie: ſo to cenſure, that we neither reuile, nor ſeparate: and in one word, to doe that which your Paſtor could exhort the Separators from your Separation (for euen this Schiſme hath Schiſmes) If we ſhould miſlike, yet to reſt in our differences of iudgement, and notwithſtanding peaceably to continue with the Church: Had you taken this courſe, you ſhould neither haue needed to expect our pitie, nor to complaine of our crueltie. Surely, whether our loue be cruell, or not, your hatred is: whereof, take heed leſt you heare from old IACOB, Curſed be their wrath, for it was fierce, and their rage, for it was cruell.

How can you expect compaſſion, when you breath fire, and write gall? Neuer mention the fury of others indignation, till the venomous and deſperate writings of Barrow and Greenwood be either worne out with time, or by the Thunderbolts of your (not rare) cenſures be ſtruke downe to Hell, whence their maliciouſneſſe came. I forbeare to recapitulate: how much rather had I helpe to bury, than to reuiue ſuch vnchriſtian exprobrations?

The firſt action laid againſt vs, is of vnnaturalneſſe and ingratitude towards our Mother the Church of England, for our cauſeleſſe ſeparation from her: to which vniuſt accuſation, and triuiall querimony, our moſt iuſt defence hath beene, and is, that to our knowledge we haue done her no wrong: we doe freely, and with all thankfulneſſe acknowledge euery good thing ſhee hath, and which our ſelues haue there receiued.

SECTION XIV.

INGRATITVDE and vnnaturalneſſe to your Mother is obiected, in that you flie from her, yea now (woe is me) that you ſpet in her face, and marke her for an Harlot: Would God the accuſation were as far from being iuſt, as from being triuiall: Yet perhaps you intend it not in the lightneſſe of this charge, but the commonneſſe: you haue cauſed me to ſmart for my charity, yet I forbeare it not: What is your defence? That you haue done her no wrong, to your knowledge. Modeſtly ſpoken, but doubtfully: we know your wrong, but we know not your knowledge: it is well, if your wrong be not wilfull: an ignorant wrong is both in more hope of amends, and of mercie: But is not this caution added, rather for that you thinke no hard meaſure can poſſibly possibly be a wrong to so vile a Church? I aske, and would be denied: No, you doe freely, and with all thankfulnesse acknowledge euery good thing she hath: Whatsoeuer you doe to vs, I will not any more in fauour of you, wilfully wrong my selfe: you haue bidden me now to take you as a compleat Separatist: and I speake this for your selfe and yours, Let the Reader now iudge, whether the wrong of your Sect be willfull; and acknowledgement of our good, free and thankfull. Your first falsely named Martyr shall giue the first witnesse of the titles of our Church: Who (saith he) that were not drunke and intoxicate with the Whores Cup, could affirme this confuse Babel, these cages of vncleane Birds, these Prisons of foule and hatefull spirits, to be the Spouse of Christ? And else-where, he cals the people of our Church, Goats and Swine. Is this any wrong to your knowledge? The same Author: They haue not (saith he) in their Churches any one thing in their practise and proceedings, not one pin, naile, or hooke according to the true patterne: Doe you not now freely and thankfully acknowledge our Churches good things? What is more ordinary with him, and his brother in euill, Iohn Greenwood, than to call our Ministers Baals Priests, Cainites, the marked seruants of Antichrist, Sellers of the Whores wares, Worshippers of the Beast? Is this yet any wrong to your knowledge? Pastor Iohnson stickes not to say, that the Ministery and Worship of the Church of England were taken out of the Whores Cup; and plainly stiles our Church (as which of you doe not?) Daughter of the great Babylon, that mother of Whoredomes and abominations of the earth: yet more; That Hierarchie, Worship, Constitution, and Gouernment, which they professe and practise, being directly Antichristian, doe vtterly destroy true Christianity, so as their people and Churches cannot in that estate be iudged true Christians: Doe you not now freely and thankfully acknowledge our good things? What can any Deuill of Hell say worse against vs than this, That we are no Christians? Or what good can there be in vs, if no true Christianity? If we denied euery Article of the Christian Creed: if we were Mahumetans (as your good Pastor stickes not to compare vs) if the most damned Heretikes vnder Heauen, what could he say, but no Christians? Your Teacher and Pastor (which is a wonder) agree: For your Doctor Ainsworth makes this one head of his poysonous Counterpoyson, that Christ is not the Head, Mediator, Prophet, Priest, King of the Church of England: You, their Disciple, are not yet promoted to this height of immodestie; yet what are your good things? Euen to you, we are Apostates, Traytors, Rebels, Babylonish: this is well for a Learner: Hereafter (if you will heare me) keepe our good things to your selfe, and report our euill.

Yea, that your vncharitablenesse may be, aboue all examples, monstrous; You do not only deny vs any interest in the Church of Christ, but exclude vs (what you may) from all hope and possibility of attaining the honour of Christendome: For when a godly Minister protested to Master Barrow, the truth of his Ministery; vpon the approbation also of his people, he receiued this answer from him: Though you had such allowance, it could nothing auaile, but rather ouerthrow your Ministery, they being as yet vngathered to Christ, and therefore neither may not in this estate chuse them a Minister, nor any exercise a Ministery vnto them, without hainous sacrilege. O desperate iudgement; we neither are Christians, nor can be! No Christianity without Faith, no Faith without the Ministery of the Word, no Word to vs without Sacrilege: What are we, that the very offer of bringing vs to God should be criminall? These are your acknowledgements of our good; who haue learned of your Pastor to kisse and kill all at once; to blesse and curse with one breath: your mercies are cruell.

BVT who can wonder at your vnnaturalnesse to the Church, that heares what measure you mete to your owne? Error is commonly ioyned with cruelty: The outragious demeanors of the Circumcelliones in Augustines time, and more than barbarous tyranny of the Arrians before him, are well knowne by all Histories, and not enough by any: God forbid, that I should compare you to these. Heare rather of Nouatus natus, the Father of a not vnlike Sect, of whom Cyprian reports, that hee would neither beſtow bread on his father aliue, nor buriall on him dead, but ſuffered him both to ſtarue and ſtinke in the ſtreet: and for his wife (leſt he ſhould be merciſull to any) he ſpurned her with his heele: and ſlew his owne childe in her body: What need I ſeeke ſo farre? I grieue to thinke and report, that your owne Paſtor hath paralleld this cruelty: His owne brother (which is no leſſe ſauage) though one of your Sect, is the publike accuſer and condemner of him in this crime to all the World: who after a pitifull relation of his eight yeeres quarrells with him, and foure yeeres Excommunication, in his Epiſtle before a large Volume to this purpoſe, writes thus:

After all theſe, hath not our kinde, carefull, and old Father come a long iourney to make Peace? Hath he not laboured with you, the Elders and the Church, to bring you to peace? Hath he not vſed the helpe and counſell of the Reformed Churches herein? Yet will you not be reclaimed; but adding that ſinne aboue all, haue alſo monſtrouſly excommunicated your Father the Peace-ſeeker, &c. And ſtraight; How oft deſired hee you, (as if he had beene the ſonne, and you the father) euen with teares, that you would repent? In a word, how came He and I to your doore, ſhewing you that it might be (vpon his departing) you ſhould ſee his face no more? &c. Yet you forced him by your ill dealing, ſtill to leaue vpon you his Curſe, and all the Curſes written in Gods Booke againſt vnthankfull and diſobedient children. Thus farre a brother concerning a brother, againſt father and brother. Other ſtrangely-vnkinde vſages of both, I had rather leaue to the diſcouery of Maſter White, and this miſerable Plaintife, who haue written enough to make an enemie aſhamed. But whereupon was all this fearfull broyle in a pure Church? For nothing but a little lace, and Whale bone in his wiues ſleeue. The Troiane warre could not be ſlandered with ſo weighty a beginning. As for your Elder, Daniel Studly (whom your Paſtor ſo much extolleth) if Maſter Whites Apoſtaſie may be your ſhift againſt his Relation; let him ſpeake who ſhould haue beene a Fellow-Elder with him, baniſhed for your truth, though ejected by your cenſure: Marke (ſaith G. Iohnſ. of this Studly) how the Lord hath iudged him with vnnaturalneſſe to his owne children, ſuffering them to lye at other mens feet, and hang on other mens hands, whiles he, his wife, and her daughter fared daintily, and went prankingly in apparell, euen in this place of baniſhment. It is no ioy to me to blazon theſe, or your other ſins; would God they were fewer, and leſſe in vs all. Onely it was fit the World ſhould know, as how vndutifull you are to your common Parent, ſo that Father, Brother, Children beare part with your Mother in theſe your cruelties.

IF then ſuch be the good things of our Church; What good can you acknowledge to haue receiued from her? Nothing giues what it hath not: A Baptiſme perhaps; Alas, but no true Sacrament, you ſay: yea, the ſeale of graceleſneſſe and miſchiefe; As little are you beholden to the Church for that, as the Church to you, for your good acceptation: Why are you not baptized? You that cannot abide a falſe Church, why doe you content your ſelues with a falſe Sacrament? eſpecially, ſince our Church, being not yet gathered to Chriſt, is no Church, and therefore her baptiſme a nullity.

What elſe doe you owe to the liberality of this Step-dame? You are cloſe; your Paſtor is lauiſh for you both; who thus ſpeaks of himſelfe, and you, and vs: I confeſſe that whiles I was Minister in your Church of England, I stood in an Antichristian estate; yet doubt I not, but euen then, being of the Elect of God, I was partaker through faith, of the mercy of God in Christ to saluation: but as for you (Mr. Iacob and his fellow-Christians) whiles you thus remaine, you cannot in that estate approue your selues to haue the promise of saluation. Behold here, the Church of England gaue you but an Antichristian estate; if God giue secret mercy, what is that to her?

Gods superaboundant grace doth neither abate ought of her Antichristianisme, nor moue you to follow him in couering, and passing by the manifold enormities in our Church, wherewith those good things are inseparably commingled: Your owne mouth shall condemne you: Doth God passe ouer our enormities, and doe you sticke, yea, separate? Doth his grace couer them, and doe you display them? Haue you learned to be more iust than your Maker? Or if you be not aboue his iustice, why are you against his mercy? God hath not disclaimed vs, by your owne confession; you haue preuented him. If Princes leasures may not be stayed in reforming, yet shall not Gods in reiecting? Your ignorance enwrapped you in your errours: his infinite wisdome sees them, and yet his infinite mercy forbeares them: so might you at once haue seene, disliked, stayed; If you did not herein goe contrary to the courses of our common God, how happy should both sides haue beene? yea, how should there be no sides? How should we be more inseparably commingled, than our good and euill?

But should you haue continued still in sinne that grace might haue abounded? God forbid: you might haue continued here without sinne (saue your owne) and then grace would no lesse haue abounded to you, than now your sin abounds in not continuing: What need you to surfet of another mans Trencher? Other sinnes need no more to infect you, than your graces can sanctifie them. As for your further light, suspect it not of God: suspect it to be meere darkenesse: and if the light in you bee darkenesse, how great is that darkenesse? What? so true and glorious a light of God, and neuer seene till now? No Worlds, Times, Churches, Patriarchs, Prophets, Apostles, Martyrs, Fathers, Doctors, Christians, euer saw this truth looke forth besides you, vntill you? Externall light was Gods first creature, and shall this spirituall light, whereby all Churches should be discerned, come thus late? Mistrust therefore your eyes, and your light: and feare Esayes woe, and the Iewes miserable disappointment: wee wait for light, but loe, it is darkenesse: for brightnesse, but we walke in obscurity.

But the Church of England (say you) is our Mother, and so ought not to be auoided: But say I, we must not so cleaue to holy Mother Church, as we neglect our Heauenly Father, and his commandements, which we know in that estate we could not but transgresse, and that hainously, and against our consciences, not onely in the want of many Christian Ordinances, to which wee are most straightly bound both by Gods Word and our owne necessities.

Section XVII.

The Motherhood of the Church of England; how far it obligeth vs. Deut. 21, 22, 23.

THE Church of England is your Mother, to her small comfort; she hath borne you, and repented. Alas, you haue giuen her cause to powre out Iobs curses vpon your Birth day, by your not onely forsaking but cursing her: Stand not vpon her faults, which you shall neuer proue capitall: Not onely the best Parent might haue brought forth a rebellious sonne to be stoned. What then? Doe we prefer duty to piety, and so plead for our holy Mother Church, that we neglect our Heauenly Father, yea, offend him? See what you say: it must needs be an Holy Mother that cannot be pleased without the displeasure of God: A good wife, that oppose such an husband: a good sonne that vpbraids this vniustly: Therefore is she a Church, your Mother, holy, because she bred you to God, cleaues to him, obeyes his commandements, and commands them. And so farre is she from this desperate contradiction, that shee voweth not to hold you for her sonne, vnlesse you honour God as a Father. It is a wilfull slander that you could not but hainously transgresse vnder her: I dare take it vpon my soule, that that all your tranſgreſſion which you ſhould neceſſarily haue incurred by her obedience, is nothing ſo hainous, as your vncharitableneſſe in your cenſures and diſobedience. Cõſcience is a common plea, euen to thoſe you hate: we inquire not how ſtrong it is, but how wel informed: not whether it ſuggeſt this, but whereupon. To go againſt the conſcience is ſinne, to follow a miſ-informed conſcience is ſinne alſo: If you do not the firſt, we know you are faultie in the ſecond: He that is greater than the conſcience, will not take this for an excuſe: But wherein ſhould haue beene this tranſgreſſion; ſo vnauoidable, hainous, againſt conſcience? Firſt, in the want of many ordinances, to which we are moſt ſtrictly bound, both by Gods Word, and our owne neceſſities.

SECTION XVIII.

CAn you thinke this hangs well together? You ſhould here want many of Gods Ordinances: why ſhould you want them? Becauſe you are not ſuffered to enioy them: who hinders it? Superior powers: Did euer man wilfully and hainouſly offend, for wanting of that which he could not haue? What hath conſcience to doe with that which is out of our power? Is neceſſity with you become a ſinne, and that hainous? Dauid is driuen to lurke in the wilderneſſe, and forced to want the vſe of many diuine Ordinances: It was his ſorrow, not his tranſgreſſion: Hee complaines of this, but doth he accuſe himſelfe of ſinne? Not to deſire them had beene ſinne, no ſinne to be debarred them: Well might this be Sauls ſinne, but not his. Haue you not ſinnes enow of your owne, that you muſt needs borrow of others? But I ſee your ground: You are bound to haue theſe Ordinances; and therefore without Princes, yea againſt them: ſo it is your tranſgreſſion to want them in ſpight of Magiſtrates: Gaudentius the Donatiſt taught you this of old; And this is one of the Hebrew Songs which M^r. Barrow ſings to vs in Babylon, that we care not to make Chriſt attend vpon Princes, and to be ſubiect to their Lawes and Gouernment: and his Predeceſſor (the root of your Sect) tels vs in this ſenſe the Kingdome of Heauen muſt ſuffer violence, and that it comes not with obſeruation; that men may ſay, Loe the Parliament, or loe, the Biſhops decrees: and in the ſame Treatiſe; The Lords Kingdome muſt wait on your policy, forſooth; and his Church muſt be framed your ciuill State, &c. Iuſt as that Donatiſt of old, in Auguſtine, Quid vobis, &c. What haue you to doe with worldly Emperours? and as that other in Optatus: Quid Imperatori cum Eccleſia? What hath the Emperour to doe with the Church? Yea, your Martyr feares not to teach vs, that Gods ſeruants being as yet priuate men, may and muſt together build his Church, though all the Princes of the World ſhould prohibit the ſame vpon paine of death: Belike then you ſhould ſin hainouſly, if you ſhould not be Rebels. The queſtion is not, whether we ſhould aske leaue of Princes to be Chriſtians; but whether of Chriſtian Princes we ſhould aske leaue to eſtabliſh circumſtances of Gouernment: God muſt be ſerued though we ſuffer; our bloud is well beſtowed vpon our Maker: but in patience, not in violence. Priuate profeſſion is one thing; Publike Reformation and Iniunction is another; Euery man muſt doe that in the maine: none may doe this, but they of whom God ſayes, I haue ſaid, Ye are Gods: and of them, There is difference betwixt Chriſtian and Heathen Princes: If (at leaſt) all Princes were not to you Heathen: If theſe ſhould haue beene altogether ſtayed for, Religion had come late: If the other ſhould not be ſtayed for, Religion would ſoone be ouer-laid with confuſion: Laſtly, the body of Religion is one thing, the skirts of outward Gouernment another: that may not depend on men to be embraced, or (with loyaltie) proſecuted: theſe (vpon thoſe generall rules Chriſt) both may, and doe, and muſt: If you cut off but one lap of theſe with Dauid, you ſhall be touched: To deny this power to Gods Deputies on Earth, what is it, but Ye take too much vpon you, Moſes and Aaron, all the Congregation is holy: wherefore lift ye your ſelues aboue the Congregation of the Lord? See, if herein you come not too neere the walls of that Rome, which yee ſo abhore and accurſe, in aſcribing ſuch power to the Church, none to Princes. Let your Doctor tell you, you, whether the best Israelites in the times of Abijah, Asa, Iehosaphat, Ezekiah, Iosiah, tooke vpon them to reforme without, or before, or against their Princes? Yea, did Nehemiah himselfe without Artahshat (though an Heathen King) set vpon the walls of Gods Citie? Or what did Zerubbabel, and Ieshua without Cyrus? In whose time Haggai and Zechariah prophesied indeed, but built not: And when contrary Letters came from aboue, they laid by both Trowels and Swords: They would be Iewes still, they would not be Rebels for God: Had those letters inioyned Swines flesh, or Idolatry, or forbidden the vse of the Law, those which now yeelded, had suffered, and at once testified their obedience to authority, and piety to him that sits in the assembly of these earthen gods. I vrge no more: Perhaps you are more wise, or lesse mutinous: you might easily therefore purge your conscience from this sinne, of wanting what you might not perforce enioy.

Say that your Church should employ you backe to this our Babylon, for the calling out of more Proselytes: you are intercepted, imprisoned: Shall it be sinne in you not to heare the Prophesies at Amsterdam? The Clinke is a lawfull excuse: If your feet be bound, your conscience is not bound. In these Negatiues, outward force takes away both sinne and blame, and alters them from the patient to the actor: so that now you see your straight bonds (if they were such) loosed by obedience, and ouer-ruling power.

Section XIX.

The bonds of Gods Word vniustly pleaded by the Separ.

But what bonds were these straight ones? Gods Word and your owne necessitie: Both strong and indissoluble.

Where God hath bidden, God forbid that wee should care for the forbiddance of men: I reuerence from my soule (so doth our Church, their deare sister) those worthy forraine Churches which haue chosen and followed those formes of outward Gouernment that are euery way fittest for their owne condition. It is enough for your Sect to censure them: I touch nothing common to them with you: * While the world standeth, where will it euer be shewed out of the Sacred Booke of God, that hee hath charged, Let there be perpetuall Lay-Elders in euery Congregation: Let euery Assembly haue a Pastor and Doctor, distinct in their charge and offices: Let all Decisions, Excommunications, Ordinations, be performed by the whole multitude: Let priuate Christians (aboue the first turne, in extremitie) agree to set ouer themselues a Pastor, chosen from amongst them, and receiue him with Prayer, and (vnlesse that Ceremony be turned to pompe and Superstition) by imposition of hands. Let there be Widowers (which you call Releeuers) appointed euery where to the Church-Seruice. Let certaine discreet and able men which are not Ministers, be appointed to preach the Gospell, and whole truth of God to the people.

All the learned Diuines of other Churches are in these left, yea, in the most of them censured by you: Hath God spoken these things to you alone? Plead not Reuelations, and we feare you not. Pardon so homely an example: As soone, and by the same illumination shall G. Iohns. proue to your Consistory the lace of the Pastors wiues sleeue, or rings, or Whale-bones, or others amongst you (as your Pastor confesseth) knit-stockings, or corke-shooes forbidden flatly by Scriptures, as these commanded. We see the letter of the Scriptures with you: you shall fetch blood of them with straining, ere you shall wring out this sense: No, no, (M. R.) neuer make God your stale: Many of your ordinances came from no higher than your owne braine: Others of them though God acknowledges, yet he imposed not: Pretend what you will: These are but the cords of your owne conceit, not bonds of Christian obedience.

SECTION XX.

THe first of these then, is easily vntwisted: your second is necessitie: Than which what can be stronger? what law, or what remedy is against necessitie? What we must haue we cannot want: Oppose but the publike necessitie to yours: your necessitie of hauing, to the publike necessitie of withholding: and let one of these necessities (like two nailes) driue out another: So they haue done, and your owne necessitie (as the stronger) hath preuailed; for that other necessitie might be eluded by flight: you haue sought and found elsewhere what the necessitie of our lawes denied, and the necessitie of your conscience required. Beware lest vniustly: Sinne is as strong bond to a good heart as impossibilitie; Christians cannot doe what they ought not: contrary to the lawes of your Prince and Country: you haue fled not onely from vs, but from our Communion. Either is disobedience no sinne, or might you doe this euill, that good may come of it? But what necessitie is this? simple and absolute, or conditionall? Is there no remedie but you must needs haue such Elders, Pastors, Doctors, Releeuers, such offices, such executions? Can there be no Church, no Christians without them? What shall we say of the families of the Patriarkes, of the Iewish congregations vnder the Law, yea, of Christ and his Apostles? Either deny them to haue beene visible Churches, or shew vs your distinct offices amongst them: But as yet (you say) they were not: Therefore God hath had a true Church (thousands of yeeres) without them: Therefore they are not of the essence of the Church: You call mee to the times since Christ: I demand then, was there not a worthy Church of God in Ierusalem from the time of Christs Ascension, till the election of the seuen Deacons. Those hundred and twentie Disciples, Act. 1.15. and three thousand Conuerts, Act. 2.41. Those continuall Troupes that flocked to the Apostles, were they no true Church? Let the Apostles and Euangelists be Pastors and Doctors: where were their Elders, Deacons, Releeuers? Afterwards, when Deacons were ordained, yet what newes is there of Elders, till Act. 11? yet that of Ierusalem was more forward than the rest: We will not (as you are wont) argue from Scriptures negatiuely: no proofe, yet much probabilitie is in S. Pauls silence: Hee writes to Rome, Corinth, and other Churches: those his Diuine letters in a sweet Christian ciuility salute euen ordinary Christians: And would he haue vtterly passed by all mention of these Church-officers, amongst his so precise acknowledgement of lesser titles in others, if they had beene ere this ordained? yet all these more than true Churches, famous some of them, rich, forward and exemplary. Onely the Philippian Church is stiled with Bishops and Deacons, but no Elders besides them. The Churches of Christ since these, (if at least you will grant that Christ had any Church til now) haue continued in a recorded succession thorow many hundreds of yeares. Search the Monuments of her Histories: shew vs where euer in particular Congregations all these your necessary Offices (as you describe them) were either found or required. It was therefore a new-no-necessitie that bound you to this course, or (if you had rather) a necessitie of Fallibilitie: If with these God may be well serued, he may be well serued without them. This is not that vnum necessarium that Christ commends in Mary: you might haue sate still with lesse trouble, and more thankes.

SECTION XXI.

BVt besides that we ought to haue had somewhat which we want, we haue somewhat which we should haue wanted: Some? yea, many Antichristian enormities.

The enormities of the Church in common.

To say we are absolute, and neither want nor abound, were the voice of Laodicea or Tyrus in the Prophet: Our Church as she is true, so humble: and is as farre from arrogating perfection, as acknowledging falshood: If she haue enormities, yet not so many: or if many, not Antichristian. Your Cham hath espied ninetie one nakednesses in this his mother, and glories to shew them; All his malice cannot shew one fundamentall errour: and when the foule mouth of your false Martyr hath said all, they are but some spots and blemishes, not the old running issues, and incurable botches of Ægypt: the particulars shall plead for themselues. These you eschew as hell: While you goe on thus vncharitably both alike; Doe you hate these more, than Master Smith, and his faction hates yours? His Character shall be Iudge: So doe we value your detestation, as you his. It were well for you, if you eschewed these enormities lesse, and hell more: Your sinfull subiection to these vnchristian humors, will proue more fearefull than to our Antichristian enormities.

She may be your Mother (you say) and not the Lords Wife. It is a good Mother that hath Children, and no Husband: Why did you not call her plaine Whore? Your old Embleme is, As is the mother, so is the Daughter. These are the modest circumlocutions of a good Sonne, who cares not to proue himselfe a Bastard, that his Mother may be markt for an Harlot: be you a true Lo-ammi; but England shall neuer (I hope) proue an Apostate Israel: Wee haue no Calues in our Dan and Bethel, none of Ieroboams Idolatry: We haue still called God IEHOVAH, and neuer burnt incense to Baalim: It is your Synagogue that hath fallen away from vs, as Israel from Iuda: But these Children were bidden to plead: Gods command shields them from the note of vngracious. Abraham must sacrifice his Sonne; and this Sonne must condemne his Mother: shew vs either our equall desert, or your equall warrant. Where hath God proclaimed our Church not his? By whose hand hath he published her diuorce? You haue shamed her wombe, not she her bed, not God her demeanour.

Your tongues are your owne, who can forbid you? We know you will plead, and excuse; and censure, and defend; till all the world be weary: we may pray with Hierom to this sense that of the Psalmist, Increpa Domine Bestias Calami: yet wee see your Pens, Tongues, and Presses, busie and violent. I will not apply to you that which Augustine of his Donatists. Though truth compell you to be dumbe, yet iniquitie will not suffer you to be silent. But if you write whole Marts and worlds of Volumes, you shall neuer be able either to iustifie your Innocence, or excuse your fault: In the meane time, the noise of your contentions is so great, that your truth cannot be heard. Learned Iunius, and our learnedst Diuines, and neighbour Churches, haue oft heard your clamours, neuer your truth: So little haue you of this, and so much of the other, that we are ready to wish (as he of old) either our selues deafe, or you dumbe.

Is not Babylon the Mother of Gods people? whom he therefore commandeth to depart out of her, lest being partakers of her sinnes, they also partake of her plagues. And to conclude, what say you more against vs, for your Mother the Church of England, than the Papists doe for their Mother, and your Mothers Mother, the Church of Rome, against you, whom they condemne as vnnaturall Bastards and impious Patricides in your separation from her?

SECTION XXIII.

THE spirit of your Proto-Martyr, would hardly haue digested this title of Babylon Mother of Gods people; a murdering Step-mother, rather: Shee cannot be a Mother of Children to God, and no Church of God: Notwithstanding, Gods people (would he say) may be in her, not of her. So Babylon bore them not, but Sion in Babylon; But I feare not your excesse of charitie: You fly to your Doctors challenge; and aske what we say against you for vs, which Rome will not say for her selfe against vs: Will you iustifie this Plea of Rome, or not? If you will, why doe you reuile her? If you will not, why doe you obiect it?

How the Church of England hath separated from Babylon. Gyff. refut. 2. warfg. Resol. 18. 2. Ans. fore-speech to Counterpoyse Heare then what we say both to you and them, our enemies both: and yet the enemies of our enemies: First, wee disclaime, and defie your Pedegree and theirs. The Church of Rome was neuer our Mothers Mother: Our Christian faith came not from the seuen-hilles: Neither was deriued either from Augustine the Monke, or Pope Gregory. Britany had a worthy Church before either of them lookt into the world: It is true that the ancient Romane Church was sister to ours: here was neere kindred, no dependance: And not more consanguinitie, than (while she continued faithfull) Christian loue: Now she is gone a whoring, her chaste sister iustly spitteth at her: yet euen still (if you distinguish, as your learned Antagonist hath taught you, betwixt the Church and Papacie) she acknowledges her Sisterhood, though she refraines her conuersation: as she hath many slauish and factious abettors of her knowne and grosse errours (to whom we deny this title) affirming them the body, whereof Antichrist is the head, the great Whore, and Mother of abominations; so againe how many thousands hath she, which retaining the foundation according to their knowledge, (as our learned Whitakers had wont to say of Bernard) follow Absolom with a simple heart: all which to reiect from Gods Church, were no better than presumptuous cruelty. It were well for you before God and the world, if you could as easily wash your hands of vnnaturall impietie, and trecherousnesse, as we of Bastardy and vniust sequestration. There can be no Bastardie, where was neuer any Motherhood, wee were nephewes to that Church, neuer sonnes: vnlesse as Rome was the mother Citie of the world, so by humane institution, we suffered our selues to be ranged vnder her Patriarchall authority, as being the most famous Church of the West: a matter of courtesie, and pretended Order; no necessity, no spirituall obligation. As for our sequestration, your mouth and theirs may be stopt with this Answer: As all corrupted Churches, so some things the Church of Rome still holds aright; a true God in three persons, true Scriptures, though with addition, a true Christ, though mangled with foule and erroneous consequences; true Baptisme, though shamefully deformed with rotten Traditions; and many other vndeniable truths of God: some other things (and too many) her wicked Apostasie hath deuised and maintained abominably amisse; the body of her Antichristianisme, grosse errours, and (by iust sequell) heresies; their Popes Supremacie, infallibilitie, Illimitation, Transubstantiation, Idolatrous and superstitious worship, and a thousand other of this branne: In regard of all these latter, we professe to the world a iust and ancient separation from this false faith and deuotion of the Romish Church; which neither you will say, nor they shall euer proue faultie: yea rather they haue in all these separated from vs, who still irrefragably professe to hold with the ancient, from whom whom they are departed. In regard of the other wee are ſtill with them, holding and embracing with them what they hold with Chriſt: neither will you (I thinke) euer proue that in theſe we ſhould differ. As for our communion, they haue ſeparated vs by their proud and fooliſh excommunications: if they had not, we would iuſtly haue begun: from their Tyrannie and Antichriſtianiſme, from their miſerable Idolatrie: but as for the body of their poore ſeduced Chriſtians, which remaine amongſt them vpon the true foundation (as doubtleſſe there are thouſands of them which laugh at their Pardons, Miracles, Superſtitions, and their truſt in merits repoſing only vpon Chriſt) wee adhere to them in loue and pitie, and haue teſtified our affection by our bloud, ready vpon any iuſt call to doe it more; neither would feare to ioyne with them in any true ſeruice of our common God: But the full diſcourſe of this point, that honourable and learned Pleſſes hath ſo foreſtalled, that whatſoeuer I ſay, would ſeeme but borrowed. Vnto his rich Treatiſe I referre my Reader, for full ſatisfaction: Would God this point were thorowly knowne, and well weighed on all parts. The neglect or ignorance whereof hath both bred and nurſed your ſeparation, and driuen the weake and inconſiderate into ſtrange extremities.

Phil. Morn. du Pleſſes Lib. de Eccle. cap. 10.

This ſay we of our ſelues in no more Charitie than Truth: But for you; how dare you make this ſhameleſſe compariſon? Can your heart ſuffer your tongue to ſay; that there is no more difference betwixt Rome and vs, than there is betwixt vs and you? How many hundred errours, how many damnable hereſies haue we euinced with you, in that (ſo compounded) Church? ſhew vs but one miſ-opinion in our Church that you can proue within the ken of the foundation: Let not zeale make you impudent: Your Doctor could ſay (ingenuouſly ſure) that in the Doctrines which ſhe profeſſeth, ſhe is farre better and purer than the Whore Mother of Rome, and your laſt Martyr, yet better: If you meane (ſaith he) by a Church (as the moſt doe) that publike profeſſion whereby men doe profeſſe ſaluation to be had by the death and righteouſneſſe of Ieſus Chriſt, I am free from denying any Church of Chriſt to be in this Land: for I know the doctrine touching the holy Trinity, the natures and offices of the Lord Ieſus, free iuſtification by him; both the Sacraments, &c. publiſhed by her Maieſties authoritie, and commanded by her lawes, to be the Lords bleſſed and vndoubted Truths, without the knowledge and profeſſion whereof no ſaluation is to be had: Thus hee with ſome honeſtie, though little ſenſe. If therefore your will doe not ſtand in your light, you may well ſee, why wee ſhould thus forſake their Communion, and yet not you ours. Yet though their corruptions be incomparably more, we haue not dared to ſeparate ſo farre from them, as you haue done from vs for leſſe: Still we hold them euen a viſible Church, but vnſound, ſicke, dying,; ſicke, not of a conſumption onely, but of a leproſie or plague (ſo is the Papacie to the Church) diſeaſes, not more deadly than infectious: If they be not rather in Sardies taking; of whom the Spirit of God ſaith, thou haſt a name that thou liueſt, but thou art dead; and yet in the next words bids them awake, and ſtrengthen the things which are ready to die. And though our iudgement and practice haue forſaken their erroneous doctrines and ſeruice, yet our charitie (if you take that former diſtinction) hath not vtterly forſaken and condemned their perſons. This is not our coolenеſſe, but equalitie: your reprobation of vs for them, hath not more zeale than headſtrong vncharitableneſſe.

And were not Luther, Zuinglius, Cranmer, Latimer, and the reſt begot to the Lord in the Wombe of the Romiſh Church? did they not receiue the knowledge of his Truth when they ſtood actuall members of it? whom notwithſtanding afterwards they forſooke, and that iuſtly for her fornication.

SECTION XXIV.

BVT how could you without blushing once name Cranmer, Latimer, and those other holy Martyrs, which haue beene so oft obiected to the conuiction of your Schisme? Those Saints so forsooke the Romish Church, as we haue done, died witnesses of Gods truth in that Church, from which you are separated: liued, preached, gouerned, shed their bloud in the communion of the Church of England, which you disclaime and condemne as no Church of God, as meerely Antichristian: Either of necessity they were no Martyrs, yea, no Christians, or else your Separations and Censures of vs are wicked. Chuse whether you will; They were in the same case with vs; we are in the same case with them; no difference but in the time: either their bloud will be vpon your heads, or your owne: this Church had then the same constitution, the same confusion, the same worship, the same ministery, the same gouernment (which you brand with Antichristianisme) swayed by the holy hands of these men of God; condemne them, or allow vs. For their Separation: They found many maine errours of doctrine in the Church of Rome (in the Papacy nothing but errours) worth dying for: shew vs one such in ours, and we will not only approue your Separation, but imitate it.

The separation made by our Holy Martyrs.

SEP.

But here in the name of the Church of England, you wash your hands of all Babylonish abominations, which you pretend you haue forsaken, and her for them. And in this regard you speake thus: The Reformation you haue made of the many and maine corruptions of the Romish Church, we doe ingenuously acknowledge, and doe withall embrace with you all the truths which to our knowledge you haue receiued in stead of them. But Rome was not built all in a day. The mystery of iniquity did aduance it selfe by degrees: and as the rise was, so must the fall be. That Man of Sinne, and Lawlesse man, must languish and die away of a consumption, 2 Thess. 2. 8. And what though many of the highest Towers of Babel, and of the strongest Pillars also be demolished, and pulled downe, yet may the building stand still, though tottering to and fro (as it doth) and only vnder-propped and vpheld with the shoulder and arme of flesh, without which in a very moment it would fall flat vpon, and lie leuell with the earth.

SECTION XXV.

THE Church of England doth not now wash her hands of Babylonish abominations, but rather shewes they are cleane. Would God they were no more foule with your slander than her owne Antichristianisme. Here will be found not pretences, but proofes of our forsaking Babylon; of your forsaking vs, not so much as well-coloured pretences: You begin to be ingenuous; while you confesse a reformation in the Church of England: not of some corruptions, but many; and those many not slight, but maine.

What separation England hath made.

The gifts of Aduersaries are thankelesse: As Ierome said of his Ruffinus; so may we of you, that you wrong vs with praises: This is no more praise than your next page giues to Antichrist himselfe. Leaue out many, and though your commendations be more vncertaine, we shall accept it: so your indefinite proposition shall sound to vs as generall, That wee haue reformed the maine corruptions of the Romish Church: None therefore remaine vpon vs, but slight and superficiall blemishes. So you haue forsaken a Church of foule skin, but of a sound heart; for want of beautie, not of truth.

But you say many, not All; that if you can picke a quarrell with one, you might reiect all: yet shew vs that one maine and substantiall errour, which we haue not reformed: and you doe not more embrace those truths with vs which we haue receiued, than we will condemne that falshood which you haue reiected, and embrace the truth of that Separation which you haue practised.

The

The degrees whereby that ſtrumpet of Babylon got on horſeback you haue learned of vs, who haue both learned and taught, that as Chriſt came not abruptly into the world, but with many preſages and prefigurations, (The day was long dawning ere this Sunne aroſe) ſo his aduerſary (that Antichriſt) breakes not ſuddenly vpon the Church, but comes with much preparation and long expectance: and as his riſe, ſo his fall muſt be graduall, and leiſurely: Why ſay you then, that the whole Church euery where, muſt at once vtterly fall off from that Church where that Man of Sinne ſitteth? His fall depends on the fall of others, or rather their riſing from vnder him: If neither of theſe muſt be ſudden, why is your haſte? But this muſt not be, yet ought: as there muſt be hereſies, yet there ought not: It is one thing what God hath ſecretly decreed, another what muſt be deſired of vs: If we could pull that Harlot from her ſeat, and put her to Iezabels death, it were happy: Haue we not endeuoured it? What ſpeake you of the higheſt Towers, and ſtrongeſt pillars, or tottering remainders of Babylon? we ſhew you all her rooſes bare, her walls razed, her vaults digged vp, her monuments defaced, her Altars ſacrificed to deſolation: Shortly, all her buildings demoliſhed, not a ſtone vpon a ſtone, ſaue in rude heapes, to tell that here once was Babylon: Your ſtrife goes about to build againe that her Tower of confuſion. God diuides your languages: It will be well; if yet you build not more than we haue reſerued.

SECTION XXVI.

The maine grounds of Separation.

YOu will now be free both in your profeſſion and gift; You giue vs to haue renounced many falſe doctrines in Popery: and to haue embraced ſo many truths: we take it vntill more: You profeſſe where you ſticke, what you miſlike: In theſe foure famous heads, which you haue learned by heart from all your predeceſſours: An hateſull Prelacie, A deuiſed Miniſtery, a confuſed and prophane communion, and laſtly, the intermixtures of grieuous errours.

SECTION XXVII.

FOr our deuiſed office of Miniſtery, you haue giuen it a true title. It was deuiſed indeed by our Sauiour, when he ſaid, Goe teach all Nations and baptize; and performed in continuance, when he gaue ſome to be Paſtors and Teachers; and not onely the Office of Miniſtery in generall, but ours whom he hath made able to teach, and deſirous, ſeparated vs for this cauſe to the worke, vpon due triall admitted vs, ordained vs by impoſition of hands of the Elderſhip, and prater, directed vs in the right diuiſion of the Word, committed a charge to vs; followed our Miniſtery with power, and bleſſed our labours with gracious ſucceſſe, euen in the hearts of thoſe whoſe tongues are thus buſie to deny the truth of our vocation: Behold here the deuiſed Office of our Miniſtery: What can you deuiſe againſt this? Your Paſtor, who (as his brother writes) hopes to worke wonders by his logicall skill, hath killed vs with ſeuen Arguments, which he profeſſeth the quinteſſence of his owne, and Penries extractions, whereto your Doctor refers vs as abſolute. I would it were not tedious, or worth a Readers labour to ſee them ſcanned. I proteſt before God and the world, I neuer read more groſſe ſtuffe ſo boldly and peremptorily faced out: ſo full of Tautologies and beggings of the Queſtion neuer to be yeelded. Let me mention the maine heads of them, and for the reſt be ſorry that I may not be endleſſe.

The auth and warrant of the Miniſterie of England. Mat. 28. 19. Epheſ 4. 11. 2 Tim. 2. 2. 1 Tim. 5. 1. Act. 13 1 Tim. 3. 6. 1 Tim. 5. 22. 1 Tim. 2. 15. Diſcourſe of the trouble and Excom. at Amſt.

To proue therefore that no communion may be had with the Miniſtery of the Church of England, he vſes theſe ſeuen demonſtrations; Firſt, Becauſe it is not that Miniſtery which Chriſt gaue, and ſet in his Church. Secondly, Becauſe it is the Miniſtery of Antichriſts Apoſtaſie. Thirdly, Becauſe none can communicate with the Miniſtery of England, but he worſhips the beaſts image, and yeeldeth ſpirituall ſubiection to Antichriſt. Fourthly, Becauſe this Miniſtery deriueth not their power and function from Chriſt. Fiftly, Becauſe they miniſter the holy things of God by vertue of a falſe ſpirituall calling. Sixtly, Becauſe it is a ſtrange Miniſtery, not appointed by God in his word. Seuenthly, Becauſe it is not from Heauen, but from Men.

Certaine Arg. againſt the Miniſt. of England. Counterpoyſe.

Now I beſeech thee Chriſtian Reader, iudge whether that which this man was wont ſo oft to obiect to his brother (a crackt braine) appeare not plainely in this goodly equipage of reaſons? For what is all this, but one and the ſame thing tumbled ſeuen times ouer? which yet with ſeuen thouſand times babbling ſhall neuer be the more probable. That our Miniſtery was not giuen and ſet in the Church by Chriſt, but Antichriſtian, what is it elſe to be from men, to be ſtrange, to be a falſe ſpirituall calling, not to be deriued from Chriſt, to worſhip the image of the Beaſt? So this great challenger that hath abridged his nine arguments to ſeuen, might aſwell haue abridged his ſeuen to one a halfe. Here would haue beene as much ſubſtance, but leſſe glory: As for his maine defence: Firſt, we may not either haue, or expect now in the Church that Miniſtery which Chriſt ſet: Where are our Apoſtles, Prophets, Euangeliſts? If we muſt alwayes looke for the very ſame adminiſtration of the Church which our Sauiour left, why doe we not challenge theſe extraordinary functions? Doe we not rather thinke, ſince it pleaſed him to begin with thoſe Offices which ſhould not continue, that herein he purpoſely intended to teach vs, that if we haue the ſame heauenly buſineſſe done, we ſhould not be curious in the circumſtances of the perſons? But for thoſe ordinarie callings of Paſtors and Doctors (intended to perpetuity) with what forehead can he deny them to be in our Church? How many haue we that conſcionably teach and feed, or rather feed by teaching? Call them what you pleaſe, Superintendents (that is) Biſhops, Prelates, Prieſts, Lecturers, Parſons, Vicars, &c. If they preach Chriſt truly, vpon true inward abilities, vpon a ſufficient (if not perfect) outward vocation: ſuch a one (let all hiſtories witneſſe) for the ſubſtance, as hath bin euer in the Church ſince the Apoſtles times: they are Paſtors and Doctors allowed by Chriſt: We ſtand not vpon circumſtances and appendances of the faſhions of ordination, manner of choice, attire, titles, maintenance: but if for ſubſtance theſe be not true Paſtors and Doctors, Chriſt had had neuer any in his Church, since the Apostles left the earth. All the difficultie is in our outward calling: Let the Reader grant our graue and learned Bishops to be but Christians, and this will easily bee euinced lawfull, euen by their rules: For, if with them euery plebeian Artificer hath power to elect and ordaine by vertue of his Christian profession (the act of the worthiest standing for all) how can they deny this right to persons qualified (besides common graces) with wisdome, learning, experience, authority? Either their Bishopricke makes them no Christians (a position which of all the world besides this Sect, would be hissed at) or else their hands imposed are thus farre (by the rules of Separatists) effectuall. Now your best course is (like to an Hare that runnes backe from whence shee was started) to flie to your first hold: No Church, therefore no Ministery: So now, not the Church hath deuised the Ministery, but the Ministery hath deuised the Church: I follow you not in that idle circle: Thence you haue beene hunted already: But now, since I haue giuen account of ours; I pray you tell me seriously, Who deuised your Office of Ministery; I dare say, not Christ, not his Apostles, not their Successors: What Church euer in the world can be produced (vnlesse in case of extremity for one turne) whose conspiring multitude made themselues Ministers at pleasure? what rule of Christ prescribes it? What reformed Church euer did, or doth practise it? what example warrants it? where haue the inferiours laid hands vpon their Superiours? What congregation of Christendome in all records afforded you the necessary patterne of an vnteaching Pastor, or an vnfeeding Teacher?

Brow. state of Christians.

It is an old policy of the faulty, to complaine first: Certainly, there was neuer Popish Legend a more errand deuice of man than some parts of this Ministery of yours, so much gloried in for sincere correspondence to the first Institution.

SECTION XXVIII.

YOur scornfull exception at the confused communion of the profane multitude, sauours strong of Pharisee, who thought it sinne to conuerse (cum terræ filijs) the base vulgar, and whose very Phylacteries did say, Touch me not, for I am cleaner than thou. This multitude is prophane (you say) and this communion confused: If some be profane, yet not all; for then could be no confusion in the mixture; If some be not profane, why doe you not loue them as much as you hate the other? If all maine truths be taught amongst some godly, some profane; why will you more shun those profane, than cleaue to those Truths, and those godly? If you haue duly admonished him, and detest and bewailed his sin; what is another mans profaneneſſe to you? If profaneneſſe be not punished, or confusion be tolerated, it is their sin, whom it concerneth to redresse them: If the Officers sin, must we run from the Church? It is a famous and pregnant protestation of God by Ezekiel: The righteousnes of the righteous shall be vpon him, and the wickednes of the wicked shall be vpon himselfe. And if the Fathers sowre Grapes cannot hurt the childrens teeth, how much lesse shall the neighbours? But whither will you runne from this Communion of the profane? The same fault you finde with the Dutch and French; yea, in your owne. How haue well you auoided it in your separation, let M. White, George Iohnson, Master Smith be sufficient witnesses, whose plentifull reports of your known vncleannesses, smothered mischiefes, malicious proceedings, corrupt packings, communicating with knowne offenders, bolstering of sinnes, and willing conniuences, as they are shamefull to relate, so might well haue stopt your mouth from excepting at our confused Commuuion of the prophane.

Shall some generall Truths (yea, though few of them in the particulars may be soundly practised) sweeten and sanctifie the other errours? Doth not one Heresie make an Heretike? and and doth not a little Leauen, whether in doctrine or manners, leauen the whole lumpe? 1 Cor. 5.6. But to wade no further in vniuerſalities; we will take a little time to examine ſuch particulars, as you your ſelfe haue picked out for your moſt aduantage, to ſee whether you be ſo cleare of* Babels Towers in your owne euidence, as you beare the world in hand.

SECTION XXIX.

HOw many and grieuous errors are mingled with our Truths, ſhall appeare ſufficiently in the ſequell; If any want, let it bee the fault of the accuſer. It is enough for the Church of Amſterdam to haue no errors. But ours are grieuous: Name them, that our ſhame may be ſequell to your griefe: So many they are, and ſo grieuous, that your Martyr, when he was vrged to inſtance, could finde none but our opinion concerning Chriſts deſcent into Hell; and except he had ouer-reached, not that. Call you our Doctrines ſome generall truths? Looke into our Confeſſions, Apologies, Articles, and compare them with any, with all other Churches; and if you finde a more particular, ſound, Chriſtian, abſolute profeſſion of all fundamentall truths in any Church, ſince Chriſt aſcended into Heauen, renounce vs: you do, and we will ſeparate vnto you: But theſe truths are not ſoundly practiſed: Let your Paſtor teach you, that if errors of practiſe ſhould bee ſtood vpon, there could bee no true Church vpon earth: Pull out your owne beame firſt: wee willingly yeeld this to bee one of your truths, that no truth can ſanctifie error: That one hereſie makes an Hereticke: but learne withall, that euery error doth not pollute all truths: That there is hay and ſtubble, which may burne, yet both the foundation ſtand, and the builder bee ſaued: Such is ours at the worſt, why doe you condemne where God will ſaue? No Scripture is more worne with your Tongues and Pens, than that of the Leauen, 1 Cor. 5.6. If you would compare Chriſts Leauen with Pauls, you ſhould ſatisfie your ſelfe. Chriſt ſayes, The Kingdome of Heauen is as Leauen; Paul ſayes, A groſſe ſinne is Leauen: Both leauens the whole lumpe: neither may be taken preciſely, but in reſemblance: not of equalitie (as hee ſaid well) but of qualitie: For notwithſtanding the Leauen of the Kingdome, ſome part you grant is vnſanctified; So notwithſtanding the Leauen of ſinne, ſome (which haue ſtriuen againſt it to their vtmoſt) are not ſowred: The leauening in both places muſt extend onely to whom it is extended: the ſubiects of regeneration in the one; the partners of ſinne in the other: So our Sauiour ſaith, Yee are the ſalt of the earth; yet too much of the earth is vnſeaſoned: The truth of the effect muſt bee regarded in theſe ſpeeches, not the quantitie: It was enough for S. Paul to ſhew them by this ſimilitude, that groſſe ſinnes where they are tolerated, haue a power to infect others: whether it bee (as Hierome interprets it) by ill example, or by procurement of iudgements: and thereupon the inceſtuous muſt be caſt out: All this tends to the excommunicating of the euill, not to the ſeparating of the good: Did euer Paul ſay, If the inceſtuous bee not caſt out, ſeparate from the Church? Shew vs this, and we are yours: Elſe it is a ſhame for you, that you are not ours: If Antichriſt hold many truths, and wee but many, wee muſt needs be proud of your praiſes: We hold all his truths, and haue ſhewed you, how we hate all his forgeries, no leſſe than you hate vs: Yet the myſterie of iniquitie is ſtill ſpun in the Church of England; but with a finer threed: So fine, that the very eyes of your malice cannot ſee it; yet none of our leaſt Motes haue eſcaped you: Thanks be to our good God, we haue the great myſterie of godlineſſe ſo fairely and happily ſpunne amongſt vs, as all, but you, bleſſe God with vs, and for vs: As ſoone ſhall yee finde Charity and Peace in your Engliſh Church, as hereſie in our Church of England.

To this end I desire to know of you, whether the office of Archbishops, Bishops, and the rest of that ranke, were not parts of that accursed Hierarchie in Queene* MARIES dayes, and members of that Man of sin? If they were then as shoulders and armes vnder that head the Pope, and ouer the inferiour members; and haue now the same Ecclesiasticall Iurisdiction deriued and continued vpon them, whereof they were possessed in the time of Popery (as it is plaine they haue by the first Parliament of Queene ELIZABETH) why are they not still members of that body, though the head the Pope be cut off?

SECTION XXX.

Whether our Prelacie bee Antichristian. Seuen Argu. first Answ. Counterpoys.

TO the particular instances: I aske where are the proud Towers of their Vniuersall Hierarchie? You answer roundly: One in Lambeth, another in Fulham, &c. What Vniuersall? Did euer any of our Prelates challenge all the World as his Dioceese? Is this simplicitie or malice? If your Pastor tell vs, that as well a World as a Prouince, Let me returne it; If he may be Pastor ouer a Parlour-full, why not of a Citie? And if of a City, why not of a Nation? But these you will proue vnruinated Towers of that Babel: You aske therefore whether the Office of Archbishops, Bishops, and the rest of that ranke, were not in Queene MARIES dayes, parts of that accursed Hierarchie, and members of that man of sinne. Doubtlesse they were: Who can denie it? But now (say you) they haue the same Ecclesiasticall Iurisdiction continued: This is your miserable Sophistrie: Those Popish Archbishops, Bishops, and Clergie were members of Antichrist: not as Church-Gouernours, but as Popish; while they swore subiection to him, while they defended him, whiles they worshipt him aboue all that is called God, and extorted this homage from others, how could they be other but limmes of that Man of sinne? shall others therefore which defie him, resist, trample vpon him, spend their liues and labours in oppugnation of him, bee necessarily in the same case, because in the same roome? Let mee helpe your Anabaptists with a sound Argument: The Princes, Peeres, and Magistrates of the Land in Queene MARIES dayes were shoulders and armes of Antichrist; their calling is still the same; therefore now they are such: Your Master Smith vpon no other ground, disclaimeth Infants Baptisme, crying out that this is the maine relique of Antichristianisme: But see how like a wise Master you confute your selfe: They are still members of the body, though the head (the Pope) be cut off: The head is Antichrist, therefore the body without the head is no part of Antichrist: He that is without the head Christ, is no member of Christ: so contrarily; I heare you say, the very Iurisdiction and Office is here Antichristian, not the abuse: What? in them, and not in all Bishops since, and in the Apostles times? Alas, who are you that you should oppose all Churches and times? Ignorance of Church-storie, and not distinguishing betwixt substances and appendances, personall abuses, and callings, hath led you to this errour: Yet since you haue reckoned vp so many Popes, let me helpe you with more: Was there not one in Lambeth, when Doctor Cranmer was there? One in Fulham, when Ridley was there? One in Worcester, when Latimer was there? One at Winchester, when Philpot was there? We will goe higher; Was not Hilarius at Arles, Paulinus at Nola, Primasius at Vtica, Eucherius at Lyons, Cyril at Alexandria, Chrysostome at Constantinople, Augustine at Hippo, Ambrose at Millaine? What should I be infinite? Was not Cyprian at Carthage, Enodius, and after him Ignatius in Saint Iohns time at Antioch, Polycarpus at Smyrna, Philip at Cæsarea, Iames and Simeon and Cleophas at Hierusalem, and (by much consent of Antiquitie) Titus in Creet, Timothy at Ephesus, Marke at Alexandria: yea, to bee short, was there not euery where in all Ages, an allowed Superioritie of Church-Gouernours vnder this title? Looke into the frequent Subscriptions of all Councels, and their Canons:

Let Hemingius teach you that this was the practiſe of the pureſt Church: Thus it was euer; and if Princes haue pleaſed to annex either large maintenances, or ſtiles of higher dignitie, and reſpect vnto theſe, doe their additions annihilate them? Hath their double honour made voyd their callings? Why, more than extreme needineſſe? If Ariſtotle would not allow a Prieſt to be a Tradeſman, yet Paul could yeeld to homely Tent-making: if your Elders grow rich or noble, doe they ceaſe to be, or begin to be vnlawfull? SECTION XXXI.

FRom your owne Verdict you deſcend to the teſtimonies of all Reformed Churches: I bluſh to ſee ſo wilfull a ſlander fall from the pen of a Chriſtian. That all Reformed Churches renounce our prelacie as Antichriſtian, what one hath done it? Yea, what one forraine Diuine of note, hath not giuen to our Clergie the right hand of Fellowſhip? ſo farre is it from this, that I. Alaſco was the allowed Biſhop of our firſt Reformed ſtrangers in this land; ſo far, that when your Doctor found himſelfe vrged (by M. Spr.) with a cloud of witneſſes for our Church and Miniſterie, as Bucer, Martyr, Fagius, Alaſco, Caluin, Beza, Bullinger, Gualter, Simler, Zanchius, Iunius, Rollocus, and others, he had nothing to ſay for himſelfe, but, Though you come againſt vs with Horſe-men and Chariots, yet we will remember the name of the Lord our God; and turnes it off with the accuſation of a Popiſh plea and reference to the practiſe of the Reformed: And if therefore they haue ſo renounced it, becauſe their practiſe receiues it not; Why, like a true Make-bate doe you not ſay, that our Churches haue ſo renounced their Gouernment? Theſe ſiſters haue learned to differ, and yet to loue and reuerence each other: and in theſe caſes to inioy their owne formes, without preſcription of neceſſitie or cenſure. Let Reuerend Beza be the Trumpet of all the reſt, who tells you that the Reformed Engliſh Churches continue, vpheld by the authoritie of Biſhops, and Archbiſhops, that they haue had men of that Ranke, both famous Martyrs, and worthy Paſtors and Doctors: and laſtly, congratulates this bleſſing to our Church: or let Hemingius tell you the iudgment of the Daniſh Church: Iudicat cæteros Miniſtros, &c. it iudgeth, ſaith he, that other Miniſters ſhould obey their Biſhops in all things, which make to the edification of the Church, &c. It ſeemes, the ſacred (ſo called) Synod aſſumeth little leſſe vnto her ſelfe in her determinations: otherwiſe, how durſt ſhee decree ſo abſolutely, as ſhe doth, touching things reputed indifferent, viz. *that all men in all places muſt ſubmit vnto them without exception, or limitation? Except ſhee could infallibly determine, that theſe her Ceremonies thus abſolutely impoſed, ſhould edifie all men at all times, how durſt ſhe thus impoſe them? SECTION XXXII.

Our Synods determination of things indifferent. Article 21.

THERE was neuer a more idle and beggerly cauill than your next: your Christian Reader must needs think you hard driuen for quarrels, when you are faine to fetch the Popes infallibility, out of our Synod, whose flat Decree it was of old: That euen generall Councels may erre, and haue erred. But wherein doth our sacred Synod assume this infallibilitie, in her determinations? Wherefore is a Synod, if not to determine? But of things reputed indifferent? What else are subiect to the constitutions of men? Good and euill are either directly, or by necessarie sequell ordred by God; these are aboue humane power: What haue men to doe, if not with things indifferent? All necessary things are determined by God, indifferent by men from God, which are as so many particulars, extracts from the generals of God: These things (saith learned Caluin) are indifferent, and in the power of the Church: Either you must allow the Church this, or nothing. But these decrees are absolute, what lawes can be without a command? The law that tyes not is no Law: No more than that (saith Austen) which ties vs to euill. But for all men, and all times? How for all? For none (I hope) but our owne. And why not for them? but without exception and limitation: Doe not thus wrong our Church: our late Arch-bishop (if it were not piacular for you to read ought of his) could haue taught you in his publike writings, these fiue limitations of inioyned ceremonies: First, that they be not against the Word of God. Secondly, that Iustification or Remission of sinnes be nor attributed to them: Thirdly, that the Church bee not troubled with their multitude: Fourthly, that they be not decreed as necessarie, and not to be changed; And lastly, that men be not so tied to them but that by occasion they may bee omitted, so it be without offence and contempt; you see our limits: but your feare is in this last, contrary to his. He stands vpon offence in omitting, you in vsing: As if it were a iust offence to displease a beholder, no offence to displease and violate authoritie: What Law could euer be made to offend none? Wise Cato might haue taught you this, in Liuie, that no Law can be commodious to all: Those lips which preserue knowledge, must impart so much of it to their hearers, as to preuent their offence: Neither must Law-giuers euer fore-see what constructions will be of their Lawes, but what ought to bee: Those things which your Consistory imposes, may you keepe them if you list? Is not the willing neglect of your owne Parlour-Decrees punished with Excommunication? And now what is all this to infallibility? The sacred Synod determines these indifferent Rites, for decencie and comlinesse to be vsed of those whom it concernes, therefore it arrogates to it selfe infallibilitie: A conclusion fit for a Seperatist.

That they should feed their Flockes with Word and Doctrine, we require more than you: That Patrons present, Bishops institute, Arch-Deacons induct some, which are vnable, we grant and bewaile. But that our Church-Lawes iustifie them, wee deny, and you slander: For our Law (if you know not) requires, that euery one to bee admitted to the Ministery, should vnderstand the Articles of Religion, not only as they are compendiously set downe in the Creed, but as they are at large in our Booke of Articles, neither vnderstand them onely, but be able to proue them sufficiently out of the Scripture, and that not in English onely, but in Latine also: This competency would proue him (for knowledge) διδακτικον: If this be not performed, blame the persons, cleere the Law. Profound Master Hooker tels you, that both Arguments from light of Nature, Lawes, and Statutes of Scripture, the Canons that are taken out of ancient Synods, the Decrees and Constitutions of sincerest times, the sentences of all antiquity, and in a word, euery mans full consent and conscience, is against ignorance in them that haue charge and cure of soules. And in the same booke; Did any thing more aggrauate the crime of Ieroboams Apostasie, than that he chose to haue his Clergie the scumme and refuse of his whole Land? Let no man spare to tell it them, they are not faithfull towards God, that burden wilfully his Church, with such swarmes of vnworthy Creatures: Neither is it long, since a zealous and learned Sermon dedicated to our present Lord Archbishop by his owne Chaplaine, hath no lesse taxed this abuse, whether of insufficiencie, or negligence (though with more discretion) than can bee expected from your malicious Pen. Learne henceforth not to diffuse crimes to the innocent.

For the rest: your Baal, in our Dispensations for Pluralities, would thus plead for himselfe: First, he would bid you learne of your Doctor to distinguish of sinnes: sinnes (saith hee) are either controuertible, or manifest: if controuertible or doubtfull, men ought to beare one with anothers different iudgment; if they doe not, &c. they sinne: such is this: if some be resolued, others doubt; and in whole Volumes plead, whether conuenience, or necessity: how could your charitie compare these with sinnes euicted? Secondly,

Secondly, hee would tell you that these Dispensations are intended and directed, not against the offence of God, but the danger of Humane Lawes: not securing from sinne, but from losse: But, for both these points of Non-residence and sufficiencie, if you sought not rather strife than satisfaction; his Maiesties Speech in the Conference at Hampton Court, might haue stayed the course of your quarrellous Pen: No reasonable minde, but would rest in that Gratious and royall determination. Lastly, Why looke you not to your owne Elders at home? euen your handfull hath not auoided this crime of Non-residency: What wonder is it, if our world of men haue not escaped?

You are wiser, and I hope honester than thus to attempt, though that receiued Maxime amongst you (No Ceremony, no Bishop; no Bishop, no King) sauours too strongly of that Weed. But what though you be loyall to earthly Kings and their Crownes and Kingdomes, yet if you bee Traytors and Rebels against the king of his Church Iesus Christ, and the Scepter of his kingdome, not suffering him by his Lawes and officers to reigne ouer you, but in stead of them do stoop to Antichrist in his offices and Ordinances; shall your loyaltie towards men, excuse your Treasons against the Lord? though you now cry neuer so loud, Wee haue no King but Cæsar, Iohn. 19. 15. yet is there another King, one Iesus, which shall returne and passe a heauy doome vpon the Rebellious, Luke 19. 27. These enemies, which would not haue me reigne ouer them, bring them and slay them before me.

YOV that confesse our wildome and honesty, must now plead for your owne: your hope is not more of vs, than our feare of you. To depose Kings, and dispose Kingdomes is a proud worke: you want power, but what is your will? For Excommunication it is cleare enough: While you fully hold that euery priuate man hath as much power in this censure, as the Pastor; and that Princes must be equally subiect with them to these their censures. Let any man now deuise if the Brownists could haue a King, how that King could stand one day vnexcommunicated? Or if this censure meddle onely with his soule, not with his Scepter: How more than credible is it, that some of your Assemblies in Queene ELIZABETHS dayes concluded, that shee was not (euen in our sense) Supreme Head of the Church, neither had authority to make Lawes Ecclesiasticall in the Church? It is well if you will disclaime it: But you know your receiued position; That no one Church is superiour to other: No authoritie therefore can reuerse this Decree; your will may doe it: yea, what better than Rebellion appeares in your next clause? While you accuse our Loyaltie to an earthly King, as treasonable to the King of the Church, Christ Iesus; If our Loyalty be a sinne, where is yours? If we be Traytors in our obedience, what doe you make of him that commands it? Whether you would haue vs each man to play the Rex, and erect a new Gouernment, or whether you accuse vs as Rebels to Christ in obeying the old: GOD blesse King IAMES from such Subiects. But whose is that so vnsauourie weed; No Bishop, no King? Know you whom you accuse? let me shew you your Aduersarie; it is King IAMES himselfe in his Hampton Conference: is there not now suspition in the word? surely you had cause to feare that the King would proue no good subiect: Belike, not to Christ: What doe you elsse in the next but proclaime his opposition to the King of Kings? or ours in not opposing his? As if we might say with the Israelites, O Lord our God, other Lords besides thee haue ruled vs: If we would admit each of your Elders to be so many Kings in the Church, wee should stoope vnder Christs Ordinances: Shew vs your Commission, and let it appeare, whether we be Enemies, or you Vsurpers; Alas, you both refuse the rule of this true Deputie, and set vp false; Let this fearefull doome of Christ light where it is most due: Euen so let thine enemies perish O Lord.

Not to ſpeake of the errour of vniuerſall Grace, and conſequently, of Free-will, that groweth on apace amongſt you, what doe you elſe but put in for a part with God in conuerſion? though not through freedome of will, yet in a deuiſed Miniſtery, the meanes of conuerſion: it being the Lords peculiar as well to appoint the outward Miniſtery of conuerſion, as to giue the inward grace.

SECTION XXXV.

GOe on to ſlander: Euen that which you ſay, you will not ſpeake, you do ſpeake with much ſpight and no truth: What hath our Church to doe with errors of vniuerſall grace or Free-will? Errors which her Articles doe flatly oppoſe: what ſhameleſneſſe is this? Is ſhee guilty euen of that which ſhee condemnes? If ſome few priuate iudgements ſhall conceiue, or bring forth an error, ſhall the whole Church doe penance? Would God that wicked and hereticall Anabaptiſme, did not more grow vpon you than thoſe errours vpon vs, you had more need to defend, than accuſe: But ſee (Chriſtian Reader) how this man draggs in crimes vpon vs, as Cacus did his Oxen: We doe (forſooth) part ſtakes with God in our conuerſion; wherein? in a deuiſed Miniſterie: the meanes of conuerſion; well fetcht about: There may bee a Miniſterie, without a conuerſion; and (è conuerſo) there may be a conuerſion without a Miniſtery: Where now are the ſtakes parted? yet thus we part ſtakes (with the Apoſtle) that wee are Gods Fellow labourers in this great worke: He hath ſeparated vs to it, and ioyned vs with him in it, it is he (as we haue proued) that hath deuiſed our Miniſterie: yea, your ſelfe ſhall proue it: it is his peculiar to appoint the outward Miniſtery, that giues the inward grace. But hath not God giuen inward grace, by our outward Miniſterie? Your hearts ſhal be our witneſſes: What wil follow therefore, but that our Miniſterie is his peculiar appointment?

Where (ſay you) are thoſe rotten heapes of Tranſubſtantiating of bread? and where (ſay I) learned you your deuout kneeling to, or before the bread, but from the error of Tranſubſtantiation? Yea, what leſſe can it inſinuate, than either that, or ſome other the like idolatrous conceit? If there were not ſome thing more in the Bread and Wine than in the water at Baptiſme, or in the Word read or preached, why ſhould ſuch ſolemne kneeling be ſo ſeuerely preſſed at that time, rather than vpon the other occaſions? And well and truly haue your owne men affirmed that it were farre leſſe ſinne, and appearance of an Idolatrie that is nothing ſo groſſe, to tye men in their Prayers, to kneele before a Crucifix, than before the Bread and Wine: and the reaſon followeth, for that, Papiſts commit an Idolatrie far more groſſe and odious in worſhipping the Bread, than in worſhiping any other of their Images or Idols whatſoeuer. Apol. of the Min. of Lincoln. Dioc. part. 1. pag. 66.

SECTION XXXVI.

OVR kneeling you deriue (like a good Herald) from the errour of Tranſubſtantiation: but to ſet downe the deſcent of this pedigree, will trouble you: we doe vtterly denie it, and challenge your proofe. How new a fiction Tanſubſtantiation is, appeares out of Berengaries Recantation to Pope Nicolas: The error was then ſo young, it had not learned to ſpeake; ſhew vs the ſame noueltie in our kneeling. Till of late, men held not the Bread to bee God; of old, they haue held it ſacred: This is the geſture of reuerence in our Prayer at the receit, as Maſter Burgeſſe well interpreted it, not of idolatrous adoration of the Bread. This was moſt-what in the eleuation: the aboliſhing whereof cleares vs of this imputation: you know wee hate hate this conceit, why doe you thus force wrongs vpon the innocent? Neither are we alone in this vse: The Church of Bohemy allowes and practises it: and why is this error lesse palpable in the waters of Geneua? If the King should offer vs his hand to kisse, wee take it vpon our knees: how much more when the King of Heauen giues vs his Sonne in these pledges? But if there were not something more than iust reuerence, why doe we solemnly kneele at the Communion, not at Baptisme? Can you finde no difference? In this (besides that there is both a more liuely and feeling signification of the thing represented) we are the parties, but in the other witnesses: This therefore I dare boldly say, that if your partner M. Smith should euer (which God forbid) perswade you to rebaptize, your fittest gesture (or any others at full age) would be to receiue that Sacramentall water, kneeling: How glad you are to take all scraps, that fall from any of ours for your aduantage? Would to God this obseruation of your malicious gathering would make all our reuerend Brethren wary of their censures: Surely, no idolatry can be worse than that Popish ἀρπαγμα. The Bread, and the Crucifix striue for the higher place: if we should therfore be so tied to kneele before the Bread, as they are tied to kneele before the Crucifix, their sentence were iust: They adore the Crucifix, not we the Bread: they pray to the Crucifix, not we to the Bread: they direct their deuotions (at the best) by the Crucifix to their Sauiour, we doe not so by the Bread, we kneele no more to the Bread, than to the Pulpit when we ioyne our praiers with the Ministers: But our quarrell is not with them; you that can approue their iudgements in dislike, might learne to follow them in approbation, and peaceable Communion with the Church: if there be a galled place, you will be sure to light vpon that. Your charity is good; whatsoeuer your wisdome be.

SEP.

To let passe your deuout kneeling vnto your Ordinary when you take the Oath of Canonicall obedience, or receiue absolution at his hands, which (as the maine actions are religious) must needs be religious adoration, what is the adoring of your truly humane (though called Diuine) Seruice booke in and by which you worship God, as the Papists doe by their Images? If the Lord Iesus in his Testament haue not commanded any such Booke, it is accursed and abominable: if you thinke he haue, shew vs the place where, that we may know it with you; or manifest vnto vs that euer the Apostles vsed themselues, or commended to the Churches after them any such Seruice booke. Was not the Lord in the Apostles time, and Apostolike Churches, purely and perfectly worshipped, when the Officers of the Church in their ministration manifested the spirit of prayer which they had receiued according to the present necessities and occasions of the Church before the least parcell of this patchery came into the World? And might not the Lord now be also purely and perfectly worshipped, though this printed image, with the painted and carued Images, were sent backe to Rome, yea, or cast to Hell, from whence both they and it came? Speake in your selfe, might not the Lord be intirely worshipped with pure and holy worship, though none other Booke but the holy Scriptures were brought into the Church? If yea (as who can deny it that knowes what the worship of God meaneth) what then doth your Seruice-booke there? The Word of God is perfect and admitteth of none addition. Cursed be he that addeth to the Word of the Lord, and cursed be that which is added, and so be your great idoll the Communion booke, though like Nabuchadnezzars Image some part of the matter be Gold and Siluer, which is also so much the more detestable, by how much it is the more highly aduanced amongst you.

SECTION XXX VII.

Whether our Ordinary and Seruice booke be made Idols by vs.

YEt more Idolatry? And which is more, New, and strange; such (I dare say) as will neuer be found in the two first Commandements. Behold, here two new Idols, Our Ordinary, and our Seruice booke, a speaking Idoll, and a writing Idoll. Calecute hath one strange Deitie the Deuill, Siberia many, whose people worship euery day what they see first. Rome hath many merry Saints: but Saint Ordinary, Ordinary, and Saint Seruice-booke were neuer heard of till your Canonization. In earneſt, doe you thinke we make our Ordinary an idoll? What elſe? you kneele deuoutly to him when you receiue either the Oath or Abſolution. This muſt needs be religious adoration: is there no remedy? You haue twice kneeled to our Vice-Chancellor, when you were admitted to your degree; you haue oft kneeled to your Parents, and God fathers, to receiue a bleſſing; did you make Idols of them? the party to be ordained, kneels vnder the hand of the Presbyterie: doth he religiouſly adore them? Of old they were wont to kiſſe the hands of their Biſhops, ſo they did to Baal: God and our Superiours haue had euer one & the ſame outward geſture: Though here, not the Agent is ſo much regarded, as the Action: if your Ordinary would haue ſuffered you to haue done this peece of Idolatry, you had neuer ſeparated.

Paulus in vita Ambroſ.

But the true God Bel, and Dragon of England is the humane-Diuine-Seruice-Booke: Let vs ſee what aſhes or lumpes of pitch this Daniel brings: We worſhip God in, and by it, as Papiſts doe by their Images: Indeed, we worſhip God in, and by prayers contained in it: Why ſhould we not? Tell me, why is it more Idolatry for a man to worſhip God in, and by a prayer read, or got by heart, than by a prayer conceiued? I vtter both, they are both mine: if the heart ſpeake them both, feelingly and deuoutly, where lies the Idoll? In a conceiued prayer, is it not poſſible for a mans thought to ſtray from his tongue? in a prayer, learned by heart, or read, is it not poſſible for the heart to ioyn with the tongue? If I pray therefore in ſpirit, and heartily vtter my deſires to God, whether in mine owne words, or borrowed (and ſo made mine) what is the offence? But (ſay you) if the Lord Ieſus in his Teſtament haue not commanded any ſuch Booke, it is accurſed and abominable: But ſay I, if the Lord Ieſus hath not any where forbidden ſuch a Booke, it is not accurſed nor abominable: Shew vs the place where, that we may know it with you: Nay, but I muſt ſhew you where the Apoſtles vſed any ſuch Seruice-booke: ſhew you mee, where the Apoſtles baptized in a Baſin: or where they receiued women to the Lords table: (for your ἀνδρωπος, 1 Cor. 11. will not ſerue) ſhew me that the Bible was diſtinguiſhed into Chapters and Verſes in the Apoſtles time: ſhew me that they euer celebrated the Sacrament of the Supper at any other time than euening, as your Anabaptiſts now doe: ſhew mee that they vſed one prayer before their Sermons alwaies, another after; that they preached euer vpon a Text: where they preached ouer a Table: or laſtly, ſhew mee where the Apoſtles vſed that prayer which you made before your laſt propheſie; and a thouſand ſuch circumſtances. What an idle plea is this from the Apoſtolike times? And if I ſhould tell you that Saint Peter celebrated with the Lords Prayer, you will not beleeue it: yet you know the Hiſtorie. But let the Reader know that your quarrell is not againſt the matter, but againſt the Booke; not as they are prayers, but as ſtinted, or preſcribed: Wherein all the world beſides your ſelues are Idolaters: Behold, all Churches that were, or are, are partners with vs in this crime. Oh idolatrous Geneua, and all French, Scottiſh, Daniſh, Dutch Churches! All which both haue their ſet Prayers with vs, and approue them. Quod ad formulam, &c. As concerning a forme of Prayers and Rites Eccleſiaſticall (ſaith Reuerend Caluin) I doe greatly allow that it ſhould be ſet and certaine, from which it ſhould not be lawfull for Paſtors in their function to depart. Iudge now of the ſpirit of theſe bold Controllers, that dare thus condemne all Gods Churches through the world, as idolatrous. But ſince you call for Apoſtolike examples; did not the Apoſtle Paul vſe one ſet forme of apprecations, of benedictions? What were theſe but leſſer Praiers? The quantitie varies not the kinde: Will you haue yet ancienter precedents? The Prieſt was appointed of old to vſe a ſet forme vnder the Law, Num. 6.23. ſo the people Deu. 26.3.4.5. &c. 15. Both of them a ſtinted Pſalme for the Sabbath, Pſal. 92. What ſaith your Doctor to theſe? Becauſe the Lord (ſaith he) gaue formes of Prayers and Pſalmes, therefore the Prelates may? Can we think that Ieroboam had ſo ſlender a reaſon for his calues? Marke (good Reader) the ſhifts of theſe men: This Anſwerer cals for Examples, and will abide no ſtinting of Prayers, becauſe we ſhew no patterns from Scripture. We doe ſhew patterns from Scripture, and now their Doctor ſaith, God appointed it to them of old, old, must wee therefore doe it? So, whether we bring examples or none, wee are condemned: But Master Doctor, whom, I beseech you, should we follow, but God in his owne seruices? If God haue not appointed it, you cry out vpon inuentions: if God haue appointed it, you cry, We may not follow it: shew then where God euer inioyned an ordinary seruice to himselfe, that was not ceremoniall (as this plainely is not:) which should not bee a direction for vs? But if stinting our prayers bee a fault (for as yet you meddle not with our blasphemous Collects) it is well that the Lords prayer it selfe beareth vs companie, and is no small part of our Idolatry: Which, though it were giuen principally as a rule to our prayers, yet since the matter is so heauenly, and most wisely framed to the necessitie of all Christian hearts; to deny that it may bee vsed intirely in our Sauiours words, is no better than a fanaticall curiousnesse: yeeld one and all, for if the matter bee more diuine, yet ths stint is no lesse faultie: This is not the least part of our patchery: except you vnrip this, the rest you cannot. But might not God be purely and perfectly worshipped without it? Tell me, might not God be purely and perfectly worshiped without Churches, without houses, without garments, yea, without hands or feet? In a word, could not God be purely worshipped, if you were not? Yet would you not seeme a superfluous creature: speake in your selfe: Might not God bee intirely worshipped with pure and holy worship, though there were no other Bookes in the World, but the Scripture? If yea as who can denie it, that knowes what the worship of God meaneth? What then doe the Fathers and Doctors and learned Interpreters? To the fire with all those curious Arts and Volumes, as your Predecessors called them: Yea, let me put you in minde, that God was purely and perfectly worshipped by the Apostolike Church, before euer the New Testament was written. See therefore the idlenesse of your proofes; God may be serued without a prescription of Prayer, but (if all Reformed Churches in Christendome erre not) better with it: The Word of God is perfect, and admits no addition: cursed were we, if we should adde ought to it: cursed were that which should be added: But cursed be they that take ought from it, and dare say, Ye shall not pray thus, Our Father, &c. Doe wee offer to make our Prayers Canonicall? doe we obtrude them as parts of Gods Word? Why cauill you thus? Why doth the same Prayer written adde to the Word, which spoken addeth not? Because conceiued Prayer is commanded, not the other: But first, not your particular Prayer: Secondly, without mention either of conception, or memorie, God commands vs to pray in spirit, and with the heart: These circumstances, onely as they are deduced from his Generals, so are ours: But whence soeuer it please you to fetch our Booke of publike Prayer, from Rome or Hell; or to what Image soeuer you please to resemble it; Let moderate spirits heare what the precious IEWEL of England saith of it: We haue come as neere as we could to the Church of the Apostles, &c. neither onely haue wee framed our Doctrine, but also our Sacraments, and the forme of publike Prayers according to their Rites and institutions. Let no Iew now obiect Swines flesh to vs: He is no iudicious man (that I may omit the mention of Cranmer, Bucer, Ridley, Taylor, &c. some of whose hands were in it, all whose voyces were for it) with whom one IEWEL will not ouer-weigh ten thousand Separatists.

SEP.

The number of Sacraments seemes greater amongst you by one at the least, than Christ hath left in his Testament, and that is Marriage; which howsoeuer you doe not in expresse termes call a Sacrament (no more did Christ and the Apostles call Baptisme and the Supper Sacraments,) yet doe you in truth create it a Sacrament, in the administration and vse of it. There are the parties to bee married and their marriage, representing Christ and his Church, and their spirituall vnion: to which mysterie, saith the Oracle of your Seruice-Booke expressly, God hath consecrated them: there is the Ring hallowed by the said Seruice-Booke, (whereon it must bee laid) for the Element; there are the words of consecration; In the Name of the Father, and of the Sonne, and of the Holy Ghost: there is the place, the Church; the time vsually, thee: Lords Lords day; the Miniſter, the Pariſh-Prieſt. And being made as it is a part of Gods worſhip, and of the Miniſters office, what is it if it be not a Sacrament? It is no part of prayer, or preaching, and with a Sacrament it hath the greateſt conſimilitude: but an Idoll I am ſure it is in the celebration of it, being made a Miniſteriall duty and part of Gods worſhip, without warrant, call it by what name you will.

SECTION XXXVIII.

HOw did Confirmation eſcape this number? how did Ordination? it was your ouer-ſight, I feare, not your charity: ſome things ſeeme, and are not: ſuch is this your number of our Sacraments: you will needs haue vs take in marriage into this ranke: why ſo? we doe not (you confeſſe) call it a Sacrament as the vulgar, miſinterpreting Pauls Myſterium, Eph. 5. why ſhould we not if we ſo eſteemed it? wherefore ſerue names, but to denotate the nature of things? if we were not aſhamed of the opinion, we could not be aſhamed of the word: No more (ſay you) did Chriſt and his Apoſtles call Baptiſme and the Supper, Sacraments; but we doe, and you with vs: See now whether this clauſe doe not confute your laſt: where hath Chriſt euer ſaid, There are two Sacraments? Yet you dare ſay ſo: what is this but in your ſenſe an addition to the word? yea, we ſay flatly, there are but two: yet wee doe (ſay you) in truth create it a Sacrament: how oft, and how reſolutely hath our Church maintained againſt Rome, that none but Chriſt immediately can create Sacraments? If they had this aduantage againſt vs, how could we ſtand? How wrongfull is this force, to faſten an opinion vpon our Church which ſhe hath condemned? But wherein ſtands this our creation? It is true, the parties to bee married, and their marriage repreſent Chriſt, and his Church, and their ſpirituall vnion: Beware, leſt you ſtrike God through our ſides: what hath Gods Spirit ſaid, either leſſe, or other than this? Eph. 5. 25, 26, 27, & 32. Doth he not make Chriſt the husband, the Church his Spouſe? Doth hee not from that ſweet coniunction, and the effects of it, argue the deare reſpects that ſhould bee in mariage? Or what doth the Apoſtle allude elſe-where vnto, when he ſayes (as Moſes of Eue) wee are fleſh of Chriſts fleſh, and bone of his bone? And how famous amongſt the ancient is that reſemblance of Eue taken out of Adams ſide ſleeping, to the Church taken out of Chriſts ſide ſleeping on the Croſſe? Since marriage therefore ſo clearely repreſents this myſterie: and this vſe is holy and ſacred: what error is it, to ſay that marriage is conſecrated to this myſterie? But what is the Element? the Ring; Theſe things agree not; you had before made the two parties to bee the matter of this ſacrament: What is the matter of the Sacrament, but the Element? If they be the matter, they are the Element, and ſo not the Ring; both cannot be: if you will make the two parties to be but the receiuers; how doth all the myſtery lie in their repreſentation? Or if the Ring be the Element, then all the myſterie muſt be in the Ring, not in the parties: Labour to bee more perfect, ere you make any more new Sacraments: but this Ring is laid vpon the Seruice-booke: why not? For readineſſe, not for holineſſe: Nay, but it is hallowed (you ſay) by the booke: If it bee a Sacramentall Element, it rather hallowes the booke, than the booke it; you are not mindfull enough for this trade: But what exorciſmes are vſed in this hallowing? Or who euer held it any other than a ciuill pledge of fidelity? Then follow the words of Conſecration: I pray you what difference is there betwixt hallowing, and conſecration? The Ring was hallowed before the booke, now it muſt be conſecrated: How idely? By what words? In the name of the Father, &c. Theſe words you know are ſpoken after the Ring is put on: was it euer heard of, that a Sacramentall Element was conſecrated after it was applied? See how il your ſlanders are digeſted by you: The place is the Church, the time is the Lords day, the Miniſter is the actor; and is it not thus in all other reformed Churches as well as ours? Behold we are not alone: all Churches in the world (if this will doe it) are guiltie of three Sacraments: Tell me, would you not haue marriage ſolemnized publikely? You cannot miſlike: though your founder ſeemes to require nothing here but notice giuen to witneſſes, and then to bed: Well, if publike, you you account it withall, a graue and weighty busineſſe: therefore ſuch, as muſt be ſanctified by publike praier: What place is fitter for publike praier than the Church? Who is fitter to offer vp the publike prayer, than the Miniſter? who ſhould rather ioyne the parties in Mariage, than the publike deputie of that God, who ſolemnly ioyned the firſt couple? who rather than hee which in the name of God may bleſſe them? The prayers which accompany this ſolemnitie, are parts of Gods worſhip, not the contract it ſelfe: This is a mixt action, therefore, compounded of Eccleſiaſticall and ciuill: impoſed on the Miniſter, not vpon neceſſity but expedience: neither eſſentiall to him, but accidentally annexed, for greater conuenience. Theſe two friuolous grounds haue made your cauill either very ſimple, or very wilfull.

Marriage not made a Sacrament by the Church of England.

Commutation of Penance in our Church.

SEE if this man bee not hard driuen for accuſations, when hee is faine to repeat ouer the very ſame crime which he had largely vrged before: All the world will know that you want variety, when you ſend in theſe twice-ſod Coleworts: Somewhat yet we finde new, Commutation of Penance. Our Courts would tell you, that here is nothing diſpenſed with, but ſome ceremony of ſhame in the confeſſion: which in the greater ſort is exchanged (for a common benefit of the poore) into a pecuniary mulct; yet (ſay they) not ſo as to abridge the Church of her ſatisfaction, by the confeſſion of the offender: and if you grant the Ceremony deuiſed by them, why doe you finde fault that it is altered, or commuted by them? As for Abſolution, you haue a ſpite at it, becauſe you ſought it, and were repulſed: If the cenſures be but their owne (ſo you hold) why blame you the menaging of them in what manner ſeemes beſt to the authors? This power is no more a limme of the Prelacy, than our Prelacy is that Beaſt in the Reuelation: and our Prelacie holds it ſelfe no more S. Iohns beaſt, than it holds you S. Pauls beaſt, Phil. 3. 2.

Oath Ex officio.

IAske of Auricular Confeſſion; you ſend mee to our High Commiſſion Court: theſe two are much alike: But here is alſo very abſolute neceſſity of confeſſion: True; but as in a caſe of iuſtice, not of ſhrift: to cleare a truth, not to obtaine abſolution: to a bench of Iudges, not to a Prieſts eare; Here are too many ghoſtly Fathers, for an auricular confeſſion: But you will miſtake, it is enough againſt vs, that men are conſtrained in theſe courts to confeſſe againſt themſelues: why name you theſe courts onely? Euen in others alſo oaths are vrged, not onely (ex officio mercenario, but nobili:) The honourableſt Court of Star-chamber giues an oath in a criminall caſe to the defendant; So doth the Chancery, and Court of Requeſts: Shortly, to omit forraine examples, how many inſtances haue you of this like proceeding in the common Lawes of this Land? But withall you might learne, that no Enquiry Ex officio may be thus made but vpon good grounds, as Fame, Scandall, vehement preſumption, &c. going before, and giuing giuing iuſt cauſe of ſuſpicion : Secondly, that this proceeding is not allowed in any caſe of crime, whereby the life, or lims of the examined party, may be indangered : nor yet where there is a iuſt ſuſpition of future periury vpon ſuch enforcement. Thus is the ſuſpected wife vrged to cleare her honeſty by oath : Thus the Maſter of the houſe muſt cleare his truth, Exod. 22. 8. Thus Achan and Ionathan were vrged to be their owne accuſers, though not by oath : But if perhaps any ſiniſter courſe be taken by any corrupt Iuſticer in their proceedings; muſt this be imputed to the Church? Looke you to your petty-Courts at home: which ſome of your owne haue compared to theſe courſes, not onely to the Commiſſion-Court of England, but to the inquiſition of Spaine : See there your Paſtor defending himſelfe to be both an accuſer and Iudge in the ſame cauſe : See their proceedings Ex Officio without commiſſion : and if your priſons cannot witneſſe it, your excommunications may.

Though you haue loſt the Shrines of Saints, yet you retaine their dayes, and thoſe holy as the Lords day, and that with good profit to your ſpirituall carnall Courts, from ſuch as profane them with the leaſt and moſt lawfull labour, notwithſtanding the liberty of the ſix dayes labour, which the Lord hath giuen : and as much would the Maſters of theſe Courts bee ſtirred at the caſting of theſe Saints dayes out of the Calendar, as were the maſters of the poſſeſſed maid, when the Spirit of diuination was caſt out of her, Act. 16.19.

SECTION XLI.

WEe haue not loſt, but caſt away the Idolatrous ſhrines of Saints: their daies we retaine; theirs, not for worſhip of them, which our Church condemneth, but partly for commémoration of their high deſerts, and excellent examples : partly for diſtinction : indeed therefore Gods dayes, and not theirs: their praiſes redound to him : ſhew vs where we implore them, where wee conſecrate daies to their ſeruice: The maine end of Holy-daies is for the ſeruice of God, and ſome, as Socrates ſets downe of old, (quo ſe à laborum contentione relaxent) for relaxation from labour: and if ſuch daies may be appointed by the Church (as were the Holy-daies of Purim, of the dedication of the wall of Ieruſalem, the dedication of the Temple) whoſe names ſhould they rather beare (though but for meere diſtinction) than the bleſſed Apoſtles of Chriſt ? But this is a colour onely : for you equally condemne thoſe dayes of Chriſts Birth, Aſcenſion, Circumciſion, Reſurrection, Anunciation, which the Church hath beyond all memory celebrated : what then is our fault ? Wee keepe theſe holy as the Lords day, in the ſame manner, though not in the ſame degree : Indeed we come to the Church, and worſhip the God of the Martyrs and Saints : is this yet our offence ? No, but we abſtaine from our moſt lawfull labour in them; True, yet not in conſcience of the day, but in obedience to the Church : If the Church ſhall indict a ſolemne Faſt, doe you not hold it contemptuous to ſpend that day in lawfull labour; notwithſtanding that liberty of the ſix dayes which God hath giuen? Why ſhall that be lawfull in a caſe of deiection, which may not in praiſe and exultation ? If you had not loued to cauill, you would rather haue accepted the Apology, or excuſe of our ſiſter Churches in this behalfe, than aggrauated theſe vncharitable pleas of your owne: yet euen in this, your owne Synagogue at Amſterdam (if wee may beleeue your owne) is not altogether guiltleſſe : your hands are ſtill and your ſhops ſhut vpon feſtiuall dayes; But we accuſe you not: would God this were your worſt. The Maſters of our Courts would tell you, they would not care ſo much for this diſpoſſeſſion, as that it ſhould be done by ſuch coniurers as your ſelfe.

If an ignorant and vnpreaching Ministery be approued amongst you, and the people constrained by all kinde of violence to submit vnto it, and therewith to rest (as what is more vsuall throughout the whole Kingdome?) then let no modest man once open his mouth to deny, that ignorance is constrained and approued amongst you. If the seruice said or sung in the Parish Church may be called deuotion, then sure there is good store of vnknowne deuotion, the greatest part in most parishes, neither knowing nor regarding what is said, nor wherefore.

SECTION XLII.

Our approbation of an vnlearned Ministery disproued.

YOur want of quarrels makes you still runne ouer the same complaints: which if you redouble a thousand times, will not become iust, may become tedious: God knowes how far we are from approuing an vnlearned Ministery: The protestations of our gracious King, our Bishops, our greatest Patrons of conformity in their publike writings, might make you ashamed of this bold assertion: we doe not allow that it should be, we bewaile that it will bee: our number of Parishes compared with our number of Diuines, will soone shew, that either many parishes must haue none, or some Diuines must haue many Congregations, or too many Congregations must haue scarce Diuine-Incumbents. Our deare Soueraigne hath promised a medicine for this disease; But withall tels you that Ierusalem was not built all on a day. The violence you speake of is commonly in case of wilfull contempt, not of honest and peaceable desire of further instruction, or in supposall of some tolerable ability in the Ministery forsaken; we do heartily pray for labourers into this harueſt: we doe wish that all Israel could prophesie: we publish the Scriptures, we Preach, Catechise, Write, and (Lord thou knowest) how many of vs would doe more, if we knew what more could bee done, for the information of thy people, and remedy of this ignorance which this aduersary reproues vs to approue.

Confer. at Hampt.

Wee doubt not but the seruice said in our Parish-Churches, is as good a seruice to God, as the extemporary deuotions in your Parlours: But, It is an vnknowne deuotion, you say: Through whose fault? The Readers, or the Hearers, or the Matter? Distinct reading you cannot deny to the most Parishes: the matter, is easie Prayers, and English Scriptures: if the hearers be regardlesse, or in some things dull of conceit, lay the fault from the Seruice to the men: All yours are free from ignorance, free from wandering conceits: we enuy you not, some knowledge is no better than some ignorance, and careleſnesse is no worse than mis-regard.

Penances inioyned in the Church of England.

COmming now to the Vaults of Popery, I aske for their Penances, and Purgatory; those Popish Penances, which presumptuous Confessors enioyned as satisfactory, and meritorious vpon their bold absolutions: You send me to Sheet-penances and Purse-penances: the one, ceremonious corrections of shame, enioyned and adioyned to publike Confessions of vncleanneſse, for the abasing of the offender, and hate of the sinne: such like as the ancient Church thought good to vse for this purpose. Hence they were appointed (as Tertullian speaketh) in sackloth and ashes, to craue the prayers of the Church, to besmeare their body with filthineſse, to throw themselues down before Gods Minister and Altar; not to mention other more hard & perhaps no no leſſe ancient Rites ; and hence were thoſe fiue ſtations of the Penitent, whereby he was at laſt receiued into the body of his wonted Communion : the other a pecuniarie mulct impoſed vpon ſome (not all, you foulely ſlander vs) leſſe hainous offences ; as a penalty, not as a penance: I hope you deny not; Sodomy, Murder, Robbery, &c. which you would not) Theft it ſelfe is more deeply auenged : But did euer any of ours vrge either ſheet or purſe as the remedy of Purgatory, or enioyne them, to auoid thoſe infernall paines? vnleſſe we do ſo, our Penances are not Popiſh, and our Anſwerer is idle.

SEP.

Touching Purgatory, though you deny the doctrine of it, and teach the contrary, yet how well your practiſe ſutes with it, let it be conſidered in theſe particulars: Your abſoluing of men dying excommunicate after they be dead, and before they may haue Chriſtian burial. Your Chriſtian buriall in holy ground (if the party will be at the charges ;) your ringing of hallowed bels for the ſoule ; your ſinging the Corps to the graue from the Church ſtile ; your praying ouer, or for the dead, eſpecially in theſe words, That God would haſten his kingdome, that wee with this our Brother (though his life were neuer ſo wretched, and death deſperate) and all other departed in the true faith of thy holy Name, may haue our perfect conſummation both in body and ſoule. Your generall doctrines and your particular practiſes agree in this, as in the moſt other things, like Harpe and Harrow. In word you profeſſe many truths, which in deed you deny.

Theſe and many moe Popiſh deuices (by others at large diſcouered to the world) both for pomp and profit, are not onely not razed and buried in the duſt, but are aduanced amongſt you aboue all that is called God.

SECTION XLIV.

YOur next accuſation is more ingenuouſly malicious ; our Doctrine you grant contrary to Purgatory : but you will fetch it out of our practiſe, that we may build that which we deſtroy: Let vs therefore purge our ſelues from your Purgatory : We abſolue men dying excommunicate ; a rare practiſe, and which yet I haue not liued to ſee : but if Law-makers contemne rare occurrents, ſurely accuſers doe not: Once is too much of an euill : Marke then ; Doe we abſolue his Soule after the departure? No : what hath the Body to doe with Purgatory? Yet for the body : doe we by any abſolution ſeeke to quit it from ſinne ? Nothing leſſe : reaſon it ſelfe giues vs, that it is vncapable either of ſinne or pardon ; To lie vnburied, or to bee buried vnſeemly, is ſo much a puniſhment, that the Heathens obiected it (though vpon the hauocke and fury of Warre) to the Chriſtians, as an argument of Gods neglect. All that authoritie can doe to the dead Rebell, is to put his carcaſſe to ſhame, and deny him the honour of ſeemely ſepulture : Thus doth the Church to thoſe that will die in wilfull contempt. Thoſe Grecian virgins that feared not death, were yet reſtrained with the feare of ſhame after death : it was a reall, not imaginary curſe of Iezabel ; The dogs ſhall eat Iezabel. Now the abſolution (as you call it, by an vnproper, but malitious name) is nothing elſe but a liberty giuen by the Church (vpon repentance ſignified of the fault of the late offender) of all thoſe externall Rites of decent Funerall : Death it ſelfe is capable of inequality, and vnſeemelineſſe : Suppoſe a iuſt Excommunication : What reaſon is it, that he which in his life and death would be as a Pagan, ſhould be as a Chriſtian in his buriall? What is any, or all this to Purgatory?

The practiſes of the Church of England concerning the funerals of the Dead.

Aug. de Ciu. l. 1. Athenienſes decreuerunt ne ſi quis ſe interfeciſſet ſepeliretur in agro Attico, &c.

The next intimation of our Purgatory, is our Chriſtian buriall, in the place, in the manner : The place, holy ground, the Church, Churchyard, &c. The manner, Ringing, Singing, Praying ouer the Corps. Thus therefore you argue ; We bury the body in the Church, or Churchyard, &c. therefore we hold a Purgatory of the Soule ; a proofe not leſſe ſtrange than the opinion : We doe neither ſcorne the carcaſſes of our friends, as the old Troglodites : nor with the old Egyptians reſpect them more, than when they were enformed with a liuing ſoule : but we keepe a meane courſe betwixt both, vſing them as the remainders of dead men, yet as dead Christians: and as those which we hope one day to see glorious. We haue learned to call no place holy in it selfe (since the Temple) but some more holy in their vse, than others. The old (κοιμητηρια) of the Christians, wherein their bodies slept in peace, were not lesse esteemed of them, than they are scorned of you. Gallienus thought he did them a great fauour (and so they tooke it) when he gaue them the liberty not only of their Churches, but of their former burying places. In the same booke Eusebius commends Astirius a noble Senator, for his care, and cost of Marinus his buriall. Of all these rites of Funerall, and choice of place, we professe to hold with Augustine, that they are onely the comforts of the liuing, not helpes of the dead; yet as Origen also teacheth vs, we haue learned to honour a reasonable (much more a Christian) soule; and to commit the instrument or case of it honourably to the graue. All this might haue taught our Answerer, that we make account of an heauen, of a resurrection, not of a Purgatory. But we ring hallowed bells for the Soule: Doe not those bells hang in hallowed Steeples too? and doe we not ring them with hallowed ropes? What fancie is this? If Papists were so fond of old: their folly and their bells (for the most part) are both out of date; we call them soule-belles, for that they signifie the departure of the soule, not for that they helpe the passage of the soule. This is meere Boyes-play. But we pray ouer or for the dead; Doe we not sing to him also? Pardon me, I must needs tell you, here is much spite, and little wit. To pray for the consummation of the glory of all Gods elect: What is it, but Thy kingdome come? How vainly doe you seeke a knot in a rush, while you cauill at so holy a Petition? Goe and learne how much better it is, to call them our brothers, which are not, in an harmelesse ouerweening, and ouer-hoping of charity, than to call them no brothers, which are, in a proud and censorious vncharitablenes: you cannot be content to tell an vntruth, but you must face it out. Let any Reader iudge, how farre our practise in this dissented from our doctrine; would to God in nothing more: Yes (saith this good friend) in the most other things; our words professe, our deeds denie: at once you make vs hypocrites, and your selues Pharises. Let all the world know, that the English Church at Amsterdam professeth nothing which it practiseth not: we may not be so holy, or so happy.

Generality is a notable shelter of vntruth: Many moe, you say, Popish deuices, yet name none; No, you cannot. Aduanced aboue all that is called God? surely this is a paradox of slanders: you meant at once to shame vs with falshood, and to appose vs with Riddles: we say to the Highest, Whom haue we in Heauen but thee? and for earth, your selfe haue granted wee giue too much to Princes, (which are earthen Gods) and may come vnder Pauls (πως σκευασμα.) Either name our Deitie, or craue mercie for your wrong: certainly, though you haue not remorse, yet you shall haue shame.

THE Maiestie of Romish Petti-gods (I truely told you) was long agone, with Mithra and Serapis, exposed to the laughter of the vulgar: you straine the comparison too farre; yet we follow you: Their Priests were expelled: for (as your Doctor yeeldeth) other actors came vpon the same stage: others in religion, else it had beene no change: Their Ministerie and Monuments exposed to vtter scorne: Their Masses, their oblations, their adorations, their inuocations, their anoylings, their exorcizings, their shrift, their absolutions, their Images, Rood-lofts, and whatsoeuer else of this kinde: But the Temples of those old Heathens were demolished and razed: Here is the quarrell: ours stand still in their proud Maiestie: Can you see no difference betwixt betwixt our Churches and their Temples? The very name it selfe (if at least you haue vnderstood it) Kirke or Church (which is nothing but an abbreuiation of κυριακὸν) the Lords house) might haue taught you, that ours were dedicated to God, and theirs to the Deuill, in their false gods: Augustine answers you, as directly, as if he were in my roome: The Gentiles (saith he) to their gods erected Temples, we not Temples vnto our Martyrs, as vnto Gods, but memorialls as vnto dead men, whose spirits with God are still liuing: These then if they were abused by Popish Idolatry, is there no way, but Downe with them, downe with them to the ground? Well fare the Donatists yet your old friends: they but washed the walles that were polluted by the Orthodox; by the same token, that Optatus askes them, why they did not wash the bookes which ours toucht, and the heauens which they looked vpon: What, are the very stones sinfull? what can be done with them? The very earth where they should lye on heapes would be vncleane: But not their pollution angers you more, than their proud Maiestie: What house can be too good for the Maker of all things? As God is not affected with State, so is he not delighted in baseneſſe. If the pompe of the Temple were ceremoniall, yet it leaues this moralitie behinde it, that Gods house should be decent: and what if goodly? If we did put holineſſe in the stones, as you doe vncleanneſſe, it might be sinne to be costly: Let me tell you, there may be as much pride in a clay wall, as in a carued: Proud Maiestie is better than proud baseneſſe: the stone or clay will offend in neither, we may in both: If you loue cottages, the ancient Christians with vs, loued to haue Gods house stately, as appeares by the example of that worthy Bishop of Alexandria, and that gracious Constantine, in whose dayes these sacred piles began to lift vp their heads vnto this enuied height: Take you your owne choice, giue vs ours; let vs neither repine, nor scorne at each other.

But your Temples, especially your Cathedrall and mother Churches, stand still in their proud Maiestie possessed by Arch-Bishops and Lord Bishops, like the Flamins and Arch-Flamins amongst the Gentiles, from whom they were deriued and furnished with all manner of pompous and superstitious monuments, as carued and painted Images, Massing-Copes and Surplices, chanting and Organ-musicke, and many other glorious ornaments of the Romish Harlot, by which her Maiesty is commended to, and admired by the vulgar: so far are you in these respects for being gone, or fled, yea, or crept either, out of Babylon.

Now if you be thus Babylonish where you repute your selues most Sion-like, and thus confounded in your owne euidence, what defence could you make in the things whereof an aduersary would challenge you? If your light be darkneſſe, how great is your darkneſſe?

SECTION XLVI.

ALL this while I feared you had beene in Popish Idolatry; now I finde you in Heathenish: These our Churches are still possessed by their Flamins, and Arch-Flamins: I had thought none of our Temples had beene so ancient: certainly I finde but one poore ruinous building, reported to haue worne out this long tyrannie of time: For the most, you might haue read their age, and their Founders in open records: But these were deriued from those: surely the Churches as much as the men: It is true, the Flamins, and what euer other Heathen Priests, were put downe, Christian Bishops were set vp; Are these therefore deriued from those? Christianity came in the roome of Iudaisme: was it therefore deriued from it? Before you told vs, that our Prelacy came from that Antichrist of Rome, now from the Flamins of the Heathen: Both no lesse, than either: If you cannot be true, yet learne to be constant. But what meane you to charge our Churches with carued and painted Images? It is well you write to those that know them; Why did not you say we bow our knees to them, and offer incense? Euery building that is coupled together in this corner-stone, groweth vnto an holy Temple in the Lord: No aduersary, either Man or Deuill, can confound vs, either in our euidences, or their owne challenges: we may be faultie, but we are true: And if the darknesse you finde in vs be light, how great is our light?

And that you pretend to be, none other than your consorting with the Papists in certaine Ceremonies: touching which, and our separation in regard of them thus you write.

SECTION XLVII.

On what ground Separation or Ceremonies were obiected.

HEE that leaues the whole Church in a grosse and wilfull error, is an Heretike; he that leaues a particular Church for appendances, is a Schismatick: such are you, both in the action and cause: The act is yeelded, the cause hath beene in part scanned, shall be more: This I vainly pretended to be our consorting in Ceremonies with the Papists: Behold here the ground of your loud challenge of my ignorance: Ignorance of your iudgement and practice: Here is my abuse of you, of my Reader: and, how durst I? Good words (M. R.) What I haue erred, I will confesse: I haue wronged you indeed: but in my charity: I knew the cause of Brownisme, but I knew not you: For (to say ingenuously) I had heard and hoped, that your cause had beene lesse desperate; My intelligence was, that in dislike of these Ceremonies obtruded, and an hopelesnesse of future liberty, you and your fellows had made a secession, rather than a separation from our Church, to a place where you might haue scope to professe, and opportunity to enioy your owne conceits: whence it was that I termed you Ring-leaders of the late separation, not followers of the first, and made your plea against our Church, imperfection, not falshood: I hoped you, as not ours, so not theirs: not ours in place, so not quite theirs in peeuish opinion: I knew it to be no new thing for men inclining to these fancies, to begin new Churches at Amsterdam, seuerall from the rest: witnesse the letters of some (sometimes yours) cited by your owne Pastor: I knew the former separation, and hated it; I hoped better of the later separation, and pitied it: My knowledge both of *M. Smith whom you followed, and your selfe, would not let me thinke of you, as you deſerued: How durſt I charge you with that, which perhaps you might diſauow? It was my charity therefore, that made my accuſations eaſie: it is your vncharitableneſſe that accuſes them of ignorance. I knew why a Browniſt is a true Schiſmaticke; I knew not you were ſo true a Browniſt. But why then did I write? Taking your ſeparation at beſt; I knew how iuſtly I might take occaſion by it to diſſwade from ſeparation; to others good, though not to yours: Now I know you better, or worſe rather, I thinke you heare more: Forgiue mee my charitie, and make the worſt of my ignorance. I knew that this ſeparation (which now I know yours) ſtands vpon foure grounds, as ſome beaſts vpon foure feet. Firſt, God worſhipped after a falſe manner; Secondly, Prophane multitude receiued; Thirdly, Antichriſtian Miniſtery impoſed; Fourthly, Subiection to Antichriſtian Gouernment: The Ceremonies are but as ſome one paw in euery foot: yet if we extend the word to the largeſt vſe, diuiding all Religion into Ceremonie, and Subſtance; I may yet, and doe auerre, that your ſeparation is meerely grounded vpon Ceremonies.

And touching the Ceremonies here ſpoken of, howſoeuer we haue formerly refuſed them, ſubmitting (as all others did and doe) to the Prelates ſpirituall Iuriſdiction, (herein through ignorance ſtraining at Gnats, and ſwallowing Camels) yet are we verily perſwaded of them, and ſo were before we ſeparated, that they are but as leaues of that tree, and as badges of that Man of ſinne, whereof the Pope is head, and the Prelates ſhoulders. And ſo we for our parts ſee no reaſon why any of the Biſhops ſworne ſeruants (as all the Miniſters in the Church of England are Canonically) ſhould make nice to weare their Lords Liueries. Which Ceremonies notwithſtanding we know well enough, howſoeuer you for aduantage extenuate and debaſe them vnto vs, to be aduanced and preferred in your Church, before the preaching of the Goſpell.

It is much that they being not ſo much as Reed, nor any part of the building (as you pretend) ſhould ouerturne the beſt builders amongſt you as they doe. The proportion betwixt Zoar and them holds well: Zoar was a neighbour vnto Sodome, both in place and ſinne, and obnoxious to the ſame deſtruction with it: and it was Lots errour to deſire to haue it ſpared, Gen. 19. 15. 18, 19, 20. and ſo he neuer found reſt nor peace in it, but forſooke it for feare of the ſame iuſt iudgement, which had ouertaken the reſt of the Cities, verſe 30. The application of this to your Ceremonies, I leaue to your ſelfe, and them to that deſtruction, to which they are deuoted by the Lord.

SECTION XLVIII.

AND touching Ceremonies; you refuſed them formerly, but not long: and when you did refuſe them, you knew not wherefore; for immediately before your ſuſpenſion, you acknowledged them to be things indifferent, and for matter of ſcandall by them, you had not informed your ſelfe (by your owne confeſſion) of a whole quarter of a yeare after: Why refuſed you then, but as the Poet made his Playes, to pleaſe the people, or as Simon Magus was baptized, for company? But refuſing them, you ſubmitted to the Prelates ſpirituall Iuriſdiction: there was your crime; this was your Camell, the other your Gnats: Did euer any Prelate challenge ſpirituall rule ouer your conſcience?

Eſtimation of Ceremonies, and ſubiection to the Prelates.

This they all appropriate to the great Biſhop of our ſoules: and if other; grant them as your malice faineth: what ſinne is it to be the ſubiect of a Tyrant? now vpon more grace, refuſing the Prelacy, you haue branded the Ceremonies: So you did before your ſeparation; Tell vs, how long was it after your ſuſpenſion, and before your departure, that you could haue been content (vpon condition) to haue worne this linnen badge of your Man of ſinne? Was not this your reſolution, when you went from Norwich to Lincolneſhire, after your ſuſpenſion? Deny it not; my witneſſes are too ſtrong. But let vs take you as you are: theſe Ceremonies, though too vile for you, yet are good enough enough for our Ministers of England: As if you said, Lord, I thanke thee, I am not as this Publican: Why for our Ministers? Because, those are the Lucries, and these the sworne seruants of the Antichristian Bishops: We haue indeed sworne obedience to our Ordinary, in honest and lawfull Commandements, but seruice to Christ: But doth all obedience imply seruitude? This obedience is, as to Spirituall Fathers, not to Masters: yet so are we the seruants of Christ, that we are ready to giue our seruice to the least of his Saints: Thus vile will we be for God: How much more to those whom God hath made (as Hierome sayes) Principes Ecclesiæ: whiles they command for God: What doe we herein, but that which Epiphanius vrged of old against Aërius; What but the same which Ignatius (that holy and old Martyr) requires (not once) of all Presbyters, and offers the ingagement of his owne soule for vs in this act?

Ignat. Epist. ad Tarsens.

As for our Ceremonies, aggrauate them how you can for your aduantage, they are but Ceremonies to vs: and such, as wherein we put no holinesse, but order, decencie, conuenience: but they are preferred (you say) in our Church, before the preaching of the Gospell: a most wrongfull vntruth; We hold preaching an essentiall part of Gods seruice, Ceremonies none at all: the Gospell preached wee hold the life and soule of the Church; Ceremonies either the garment, or the lace of the garment: The Gospell preached we hold the Foundation and Walls; Ceremonies hardly so much as Reed, or Tile: But how then (say you) haue they ouerturned our best builders? This is a word of rare fauour: I had thought you had held vs all ruiners, not builders: Or if builders; of Babel, not of Ierusalem: in which worke the best builders are the worst. Those whose hand hath beene in this act, would tell you, that not so much the Ceremonies are stood vpon, as obedience: If God please to trie Adam but with an Apple, it is enough: What doe we quarrell at the value of the fruit, when we haue a prohibition? Shimei is slaine: what meerely for going out of the Citie? the act was little, the bond was great: what is commanded, matters not so much, as by whom; insult not, we may thanke your outrage for this losse.

For your retortion of my Zoar and Sodom: I can giue you leaue to be witty, you vse it so seldome: but when you haue played with the allusion what you list, I must tell you that he which will needs vrge a comparison to goe on foure feet, is not worthy to goe vpon two: Zoar was neere to Sodom, not part of it: Zoar was reserued when Sodom was destroyed: Zoars neerenesse to the place where Sodome stood, needed not haue giuen Lot cause of remouall. Zoar might safely haue beene the harbour of Lot: his feare was, for want of faith: God promised him and the place security: the far-fetcht application therefore of the wickednesse of Zoar, to our Ceremonies, might well haue beene forborne, and kept to your selfe: much lesse needed you (like some Anti-Lot) to call for fire and brimstone from heauen vpon your Zoar.

How we would haue behaued our selues in the Temple, where the Money-changers were, and they that sold Doues, we shall answer you, when you proue your Church to be the Temple of God, compiled and built of spiritually hewne and liuely stones, 1 King. 5. 17, 18. and 6, 7. 1 Pet. 2. 5. and of the Cedars, Firres, and Thyne trees of Lebanon, 2 Chron. 2. 8. framed and set together in that comely order, which a greater than Salomon hath prescribed: vnto which God hath promised his presence. But whilest we take it to be (as it is) a confused heape of dead and defiled and polluted stones, and of all rubbish, of briers and brambles of the wildernesse, for the most part, fitter for burning than building; we take our selues rather bound to shew our obedience in departing from it, than our valour in purging it, and to follow the Prophets counsell in flying out of Babylon, as the Hee-goats before the flocke, Ier. 50. 8.

SECTION XLIX.

HOw you would haue behaued your ſelfe in the Temple to the Mony-changers, you will anſwer when we proue our Church to be Gods Temple, built of that matter, and in that forme which God hath preſcribed: and here you ſend vs to 1 King. 5. 17. and 2 Chron. 2. 8. Ignorantly; as if Salomons Temple had ſtood till Chriſts time: when neither the firſt, nor ſecond (though called Beth Gnolam) out-laſted more than foure hundred yeeres: Or as if the Market had beene vnder the very rooſe of that Temple. Whether Herods were built of the ſame matter with Salomons, and in full correſpondence to it, I diſpute not: it was certainly dedicated to Gods ſeruice, and that (which you would hardly diſgeſt) in a ſolemne anniuerſary Holy day: though not erected vpon the word of any Prophet. But to let paſſe Allegories: we muſt proue our ſelues the true Church of God: Thus we doe it: Wee are true Chriſtians, for we were baptized into the Name of Chriſt; we truly profeſſe our continuance in the ſame faith into which we were baptized: we ioyne together in the publike Seruices of God: wee maintaine euery point of the moſt ancient Creeds: we ouerthrow not the foundation by any conſequence. Therefore what euer is wanting to vs, what euer is ſuperfluous, in ſpight of all the gates of Hell, we are the true Church of God. Let me aske you: Were not the people of the Iewes in the Prophets, and in Chriſts time, a confuſed heape of dead and defiled, and (for I will vſe your Tautologies) polluted ſtones, and of all rubbiſh, of bryers and brambles of the Wilderneſſe, for the moſt part fitter for burning than building? Can we be worſe than they? If wickedneſſe can defile a Church, they ſhall iuſtifie vs: did either thoſe Prophets, or our Sauiour, rather ſhew their obedience to God in departing from it, than their valour in purging it? you haue well imitated theſe heauenly patternes. But what; Can your charity finde nothing but rubbiſh? Not one ſquare ſtone, not one liuing? You will be iudging till God iudge you: if you take not heed of theſe courſes, you will ſo runne with the He-goats, that you will ſtand with the Goats on the left hand. That God, whoſe place you haue vſurped, giue you more wiſdome and loue.

And what (I pray you) is the valour which the beſt hearted, and moſt Zealous Reformers amongſt you haue manifeſted, in driuing out the money-changers? doth it not appeare in this, that they ſuffer themſelues to be driuen out with the two ſtringed whip of Ceremonies and ſubſcription, by the mony-changers, the Chancellors and Officials, which ſell ſinnes like Doues: and by the chiefe Prieſts, the Biſhops which ſet them on worke? ſo farre are the moſt Zealous amongſt you from driuing out the mony-changers, as they themſelues are driuen out by them, becauſe they will not change with them to the vtmoſt farthing.

SECTION L.

THe valour of our moſt zealous Reformers hath truly ſhewed it ſelfe in yeeldance: As in Duels: ſo here, he is the moſt valiant that can ſo maſter himſelfe as not to fight: you according to the common opinion of Swaggerers, blame the peaceable of cowardiſe, and accuſe them of ſuffering. Behold a new crime; That they ſuffer themſelues to be driuen out: What ſhould they haue done? Should they haue taken armes, and cry, The ſword of God, and Gedeon? You that will not allow a Prince to compell Subiects, will you allow Subiects to compell Princes? God forbid; This were high Treaſon againſt Gods Anointed: what then? Should they approue the Ceremonies by ſubſcription, by practiſe? This you exclaime vpon, as high treaſon againſt the Higheſt: What yet more? Should they haue preached with their mouthes ſtopt? This is it, which you haue learned of your Founder, and through not many hands receiued, and required with no leſſe violence: Clamour and tumults is that you deſire ſtill:

Whether Miniſters ſhould indure themſelues ſilenced.

Brow. Reform. without Tar.

ſtill let our ſinne be peaceable obedience, yours fury and oppoſition. Your head-ſtrong conceit is, that it is a ſinne to be ſilenced: Men muſt preach euen when they may not: all times before you, would haue wondered at this Paradox. For howeuer the Apoſtles, which had not their calling from men, would not be ſilenced by men, yet we finde that all their ſucceſſors held, that thoſe hands which were laid vpon their heads, might be laid vpon their mouthes: looke into all Hiſtories: Thoſe Conſtitutions (which though not Apoſtolike, yet were ancient) in the ſeuenth Canon puniſh a Biſhop, or Presbyter, that vpon pretence of Religion ſeparates from his wife, with depoſition: and if any Presbyter ſhall ſhift his charge without licence (τὸν κελεύσαντα μὴ κατὰ λειτουργεῖν) and laſtly, inflicts the ſame penalty vpon Fornication, Adultery, Periury.

The great Nicene Councell takes the ſame order with ſome miſliked Biſhops, and Presbyters in diuers Canons: Gaudentius in the Councell of Sardy, takes it for granted, that a Biſhop may by Biſhops be depoſed: ſo the ſecond Councell of Carthage, Can. 13. ſo the fourth Councell of Carthage, more than once impoſes degradation: ſo Leo the firſt threats to put ſome offending perſons from the office of their Miniſtery: ſo (that I may not be endleſſe) bleſſed Cyprian aduiſes Rogatianus, a good old Biſhop, which was abuſed by a malapert Deacon, by the authority of his Chaire to right himſelfe, and either to depoſe, or ſuſpend the offender. Leontius in Socrates, is depriued of his Prieſthood: yea, what Councell or Father giues not both rules and inſtances of this practiſe? See how farre the ancient Church was from theſe tumultuous fancies: No, no, (M. R.) we well finde, it is doing that vndoes the Church, not ſuffering: If your fellowes could haue ſuffered more, and done leſſe, the Church had beene happy: As for our Church-Officers, you may raile vpon them with a lawleſſe ſafety: there is a great Ditch betwixt you and them: elſe you might pay deare for this ſinne of ſlandering them with their cheape peny-worths. How idly doe you inſult ouer thoſe, whom your mony-changers haue driuen out of their Pulpits: When you confeſſe (after all your valour) that they haue driuen you both out of Church and Countrey: who can pitty a miſerable inſulter?

For the Wafers in Geneua, and diſorders in Corinth, they were corruptions which may and doe (or the like vnto them) creepe into the pureſt Churches in the World: for the Reformation whereof Chriſt hath giuen his power vnto his Church, that ſuch euils as are brought in by humane frailty, may by diuine authority be purged out. This power and preſence of Chriſt you want, holding all by homage (or rather by villanage) vnder the Prelates, vnto whoſe ſinfull yoke you ſtoope in more than Babyloniſh *bondage, bearing and approuing by perſonall communion, infinite abominations. Power of Reforming abuſes giuen to the Church: and the iſſue of the neglect of it.

YOu that can grant there will be corruptions in all other Churches, will endure none in ours: If England ſhould haue either vnleauened Wafers, or drunken Loue-feaſts (though no other blemiſhes) ſhe could not but bee Babylon: We enuy not your fauours: Theſe, or whatſoeuer like enormities, Chriſt hath giuen power vnto his Church to reforme: but what if the Church neglect to vſe it? What if thoſe euils, which are brought in, by humane frailty, will not by diuine authority be purged out? Now the errour (by your doctrine) is growne fundamentall; ſo Chriſt is loſt, and the foundation razed: if we ſhall then aſſume (againſt our friends, to conuince our enemies) The Church of Geneua hath beene ſeriouſly dealt with, in this corruption, and diſſwaded by vehement importunity, yet ſtill perſiſteth: How can you free them, and charge vs? ſee how we loue to be miſerable, with company. purge out your selues: you haue done it; but still there remaine some: would God we had as much execution as power: Our Church should be as cleane as yours is Schismaticall. If you should measure faculties by their exercise; Naturall rest should be the greatest enemy to vertue: and the solitary Christian should be miserable: This power of ours is not dead, but sleepeth: When it awaketh vnto more frequent vse, (which we earnestly pray for) looke you for the first handsell of it: None can bee more worthy: as it is, we offend not more in defect than you in excesse: Of whom that your Lazarello of Amsterdam, G. I. could say, that you haue Excommunication as ready as a Prelate hath a Prison: Christ is in many that feele him not; but we want not the power onely, but the presence of Christ: How so? he was with vs while you were here: Did he depart with you? will the Separatists ingrosse our Sauiour to themselues, & (as Cyprian said of Pacianus) goe to Heauen alone? yea, confine the God of Heauen to Amsterdam? What insolence is this? we haue him in his Word: we haue him in his Sacraments: we haue him in our hearts: we haue him in our profession; yet this enemy dare say, wee want him: Wherein? I suppose in our censures: Wee haue Peters keyes (as his true successors both in office and doctrine:) our fault is, that we vse them not as you would: What Church doth so? your first Martyr doth as zealously inueigh against the practise of Geneua, and all other Reformed Congregations in this point, as against vs: both for the woodden Dagger (as he termes it) of suspension, and for their Consistoriall Excommunication. Woe were to all the World, if Christ should limit his presence onely to your fashions: Here you found him, & here you left him: Would to God we did no more grieue him with our sins, than you please him in your presumptuous censures: in the rest, you raile against our Prelates and vs: Can any man thinke that Christ hath left peaceable spirits, to goe dwell with Railers? Indeed, yours is free-hold: so you would haue it: free from subiection, free from obedience: This is looseneſſe, more than liberty: You haue broken the bonds, and cast the cords from you: but you mis-call our tenure: We hate villenage no lesse than you hate peace; and hold (in capite) of him, that is, the head of his body, the Church: vnder whose easie yoke wee doe willingly stoope in a sweet Christian freedome; abhorring and reprouing, and therefore (notwithstanding our personall Communion) auoiding all abominations: In these two respects therefore of our confusion, and bondage, we haue well seene in this Discourse, how iustly your Sion accounts vs Babylon: since it is apparent for the one, that here is neither confusion, nor babylonish, nor without separation: For the other, no bondage, no seruility: Our Prelates being our Fathers, not our Masters: and if Lords for their externall dignity, yet not Lords of our Faith: and if both these your respects were so, yet so long as we doe inuiolably hold the foundation, both directly, and by necessary sequell; any Railer may terme vs, but no Separatist shall proue vs Babylon: you may flie whither you list: would God yet further, vnlesse you had more loue.

The view of the sinnes and disorders of others, whereupon obiected, and how far it should affect vs.

I Need no better Analyser than your selfe, saue that you doe not onely resolue my parts, but adde more: whereas euery motion hath a double terme, from whence and whither: both these could not but fall into our discourse. Hauing therefore formerly expostulated with you for your (since you will so terme it) impietie, in forsaking a ceremonious Babylon of your owne making in England; I thought it not vnfit to compare your choice with your refusall; England with Amsterdam, which it pleaseth you to intitle a substantiall Babylon: impiety and madnesse are titles of your owne choice; let your guiltinesse be your owne accuser: The truth is, my charity and your vncharitableneſſe haue caused vs to mistake each other. My charity thus: Hearing both at Middleburgh, and here, that certaine companies from the parts of Nottingham and Lincolne (which Harbinger had beene newly in Zeland before me) meant to retire themselues to Amsterdam, for their full liberty, not for the full approbation of your Church: not fauouring your maine opinions, but emulating your freedome in too much hate of our Ceremonies, and too much accordance to some grounds of your hatred: I hoped you had beene one of their Guides; both because Lincolneshire was your Countrey, and Master Smith your Oracle, and Generall. Not daring therefore to charge you with perfect Brownisme, what could I thinke might bee a greater motiue to this your supposed change, than the view of our (so oft proclaimed) wickednesse, and the hope of lesse cause of offence in those forraine parts? This I vrged, fearing to goe deeper than I might be sure to warrant: Now comes my charitable Answerer, and imputes this easinesse of my challenge to my ignorance; and therefore will needs perswade his Christian Reader, that I knew nothing of the first separation, because I obiected so little to the second.

It were strange if I should thinke, you gather Churches there by Towne-rowes (as wee in England) who know that some one Prison might hold all your refined Flocke, you gathered here by Hedge-rowes; but there it is easier to tell how you diuide, than how you gather: let your Church be an intire body, enioying her owne spirituall Communion, yet if it be not a corrosiue to your heart to conuerse in the same streets and to bee ranged in the same Towne-rowes with Iewes, Arrians, Anabaptists, &c. you are no whit of kinne to him, that vexed his righteous soule with the vncleannesses of foule Sodome. That good man had nothing but ciuill societie with those impure Neighbours: hee differed from them in Religion, in practise: yet could he not so carelesly turne off this torment: His house was Gods Church; wherein they had the spirituall Communion of the Saints: yet whiles the Citie was so vncleane, his heart was vnquiet: We may (you grant) haue ciuill societie with ill men, spirituall Communion onely with Saints: Those must be accounted the world, these onely the Church; your owne allegations shall condemne you. They are not of the World (saith Christ) as I am not of the World: Both Christ and they were parts of the Iewish Church: The Iewish Church was not so sanctified, but the most were extremely vncleane: therefore wee may bee parts of a Visible vnsanctified Church, and yet bee separate from the World. Saint Paul writes to his Corinthians, sanctified in Christ, Saints by calling: True; but not long after, he can say, Ye are yet carnall. In his second Epistle: Come out (saith he) from among them: But from whom? From Infidels by profession, not corrupted Christians.

Could you ſay worſe of vs? Where neither Sabbath can be rightly ſanctified, nor preſence or abſence knowne, nor any holy action rightly performed, what can there be but meere confuſion?

SECONDLY, That they baptize the ſeed of them who are no members of any Viſible Church; of whom moreouer they haue not care as of members, neither admit their Parents to the Lords Supper: Meere Babyloniſme, and ſinne in conſtitution, yea the same that makes vs no Church: for what separation can there bee in such admittance? what other but a sinfull commixture? How is the Church of Amsterdam now gathered from the World?

THIRDLY, That in the publike worship of God they haue deuised, and vsed another forme of Prayer, besides that which Christ our Lord hath prescribed, Matth. 6. reading out of a Booke certaine Prayers inuented and imposed by man. Behold here our fellow-Idolaters: and (as followes) a daily Sacrifice of a set Seruice Booke, which in stead of the sweet Incense of spirituall Praiers is offered to God; very Swines-flesh, a new Portuise, and an equall participation with vs of the Curse of addition to the Word.

Barr. against Greg.

FOVRTHLY, That rule and commandement of Christ, Matth. 18.15. they neither obserue, nor suffer rightly to bee obserued among them. How oft haue you said that there can be no sound Church without this course, because no separation? Behold the mayne blemish of England in the face of Amsterdam!

FIFTHLY, That they worship God in the Idol Temples of Antichrist: so the Wine is marr'd with the Vessell; their seruice, abomination with ours: neither doe these Antichristian stones want all glorious ornaments of the Romish Harlot yet more.

SIXTLY, That their Ministers haue their set maintenance in another manner than Christ hath ordained, 1 Chron. 14. and that also such, as by which any Ministerie at all, whether Popish or other, might be maintained: Either Tythes, or as ill: Behold, one of the maine Arguments whereby our Ministery is condemned as false and Antichristian, falling heauy vpon our Neighbours.

SEVENTHLY, That their Elders change yeerely, and doe not continue in their Office, acording to the Doctrine of the Apostles and practise of the Primitiue Church: What can our Church haue worse than false Gouernors? Both annuall and perpetuall they cannot be: What is (if not this) a wrong in Constitution?

EIGHTLY, That they celebrate mariage in the Church, as if it were a part of the Ecclesiasticall Administration: a foule shame and sinne: and what better than our third Sacrament?

NINTHLY, That they vse a new censure of suspension which Christ hath not appointed: no lesse than English presumption.

TENTHLY, That they obserue daies and times, consecrating certaine daies in the yeere to the Natiuitie, Resurrection, Ascension of Christ: Behold their Callendar as truly possessed: Two Commandements solemnly broken at once; and we not Idolaters alone.

ELEVENTHLY, which is last and worst, that they receiue vnrepentant Excommunicates to bee members of their Church, which by this meanes becomes one bodie with such as bee deliuered vnto Satan; therefore none of Christs bodie: England can bee but a miscelline rabble of prophane men; The Dutch and French Churches are belike no better: who can be worse than an vnrepentant Excommunicate? Goe now, and say, It is the Apostasie of Antichrist to haue communion with the World in the holy things of God, which are the peculiars of the Church, and cannot without Sacriledge bee so prostituted and prophaned; Goe say that the plaguy-spirituall-leprosie of sinne rising vp in the foreheads of many in that Church, vnshut vp, vncouered, (yea, wilfully let loose) infects all both persons and things amongst them: Goe now and flie out of this Babylon also, as the He-Goats before the flocke, or returne to ours: But how-euer these errors be grosse, perhaps they are tractable; Not the sinne vndoes the Church, but obstinacie: here is no euasion. For behold, you doe no more accuse those Churches of corruption, than of wilfulnesse: for diuers times haue you dealt with them about these fearefull enormities: yea you haue often desired, that knowledge thereof might bee by themselues giuen to the whole bodie of their Church, or that (at least) they would take order it might be done by you: They haue refused both; What remaines, but they bee our fellow Heathens and Publicans? And not they alone, but all Reformed Churches beside in Christendome, which doe ioyntly partake in in all theſe (except one or two perſonall) abominations: will you neuer leaue, till you haue wrangled your ſelues out of the world?

H. Ainsworth in his Counterpoyson.

But now I feare I haue drawne you to ſay, that the helliſh impieties both in the Citie and Church of Amſterdam, are but Frogs, Lice, Flies, Murraine, and other Ægyptian plagues, not preiudicing your Goſhen: Say ſo if you dare; I feare they would ſoone make the Ocean your Red Sea, and Virginia your Wilderneſſe.

The Church is Noahs Arke, which gaue ſafety to her Gueſts, whereof ye are part; but remember that it had vncleane beaſts alſo, and ſome ſauage: If the waues drowne you not, yet (methinkes) you ſhould complaine of noiſome ſocietie. Satans throne could not preiudice the Church of Pergamus: but did not the Balaamites (the Nicolaitans?) Yet their heauenly Communion ſtood, and the Angell is ſent away with but threats.

SEP.

It is the will of God and of Chriſt, that his Church ſhould abide in the world, and conuerſe with it in the affaires thereof, which are common to both: But it is the Apoſtaſie of Antichriſt to haue Communion with the World in the holy things of God, which are the peculiars of the Church, and cannot without great ſacrilege be ſo proſtituted and prophaned.

SECTION XLVI.

AS it were madneſſe to deny that the Church ſhould conuerſe with the World in the affaires thereof: So to deny her Communion in Gods Holy things, with any of thoſe of the World, which profeſſe Chriſtianity (as yet vncenſured) is a point of Anabaptiſticall Apoſtaſie: ſuch of the World are ſtill of the Church. As my cenſure cannot eiect them, ſo their ſinne (after my priuate endeuour of redreſſe) cannot defile me: I ſpeake of priuate Communicants: If an vnbidden Gueſt come with a ragged garment, and vnwaſhen hands, ſhall I forbeare Gods heauenly dainties? The Maſter of the Feaſt can ſay, Friend, how cameſt thou in hither? not, Friends, why came you hither with ſuch a Gueſt? God bids mee come: Hee hath impoſed this neceſſity, neuer allowed this excuſe: My teeth ſhall not be ſet on edge with the ſowre Grapes of others: If the Church caſt not out the knowne vnworthy, the ſinne is hers: If a man will come vnworthy, the ſinne is his: But if I come not, becauſe he comes, the ſinne is mine: I ſhall not anſwer for that others ſinne: I ſhall anſwer for mine owne neglect: Another mans fault cannot diſpenſe with my duty.

Conuerſation with the World.

SEP.

The aire of the Goſpell which you draw in, is nothing ſo free and cleare as you make ſhew: it is only becauſe you are vſed to it, that makes you ſo iudge. The thicke ſmoke of your Canons, eſpecially of ſuch as are planted againſt the Kingdome of Chriſt the viſible Church, and the adminiſtration of it, doe both obſcure and poiſon the aire, which you all draw in, and wherein you breath. The plagny-ſpirituall leproſie of ſin riſing vp in the foreheads of ſo many thouſands in the Church, vnſhut vp, vncouered, infects al, both perſons & things amongſt you, Leu. 13. 45, 46, 47. 2 Cor. 6. 17. The blaſting Hierarchie ſuffers no good thing to grow, or proſper, but withers all, both bud and branch. The daily ſacrifice of the Seruice-booke, which in ſtead of ſpirituall Prayer, ſweet as incenſe, you offer vp Morning and Euening, ſmels ſo ſtrong of the Popes Portwiſe, as it makes many hundreds amongſt your ſelues, ſtop their noſes at it, and yet you boaſt of the free and cleere aire of the Goſpell, wherein you breathe.

SECTION LV.

The impure mixtures of the Church of England.

AS there is no Element which is not through many mixtures departed from the first simplicity: So no Church euer breathed in so pure an aire, as that it might not iustly complaine of some thicke and vnwholsome euaporations of errour and sinne. If you challenge an immunity, you are herein the true brood of the ancient Puritanes: But if too many sinnes in practise haue thickned the aire of our Church, yet not one Heresie; that smoke of the bottomlesse pit hath neuer corrupted it: and therefore iustly may I auerre, that here you might draw in the cleere aire of the Gospell: No where vpon earth more freely. And if this be but the opinion of custome, you whom absence hath helped with a more nice and dainty sent, speake your worst: Shew vs our Heresies, and shame vs: you haue done it, and behold foure maine infections of our English aire: The first, the smoke of our Canons: Wittily: I feare the great Ordinances of the Church haue troubled you more with the blow than the smoke: For you tell vs of their plantation against the Kingdome of Christ: What Kingdome? The visible Church: Which is that? Not the Reformedst peece of ours, whose best are but Goats and Swine: Not the close Nicodemians of your owne Sect amongst vs, which would be loth to be visible: Not forrainers; to them they extend not: None therefore in all the World, but the English Parlour-full at Amsterdam: Can there be any truer Donatisme? Cry you still out of their poysoning the aire: We hold it the best cleansed by the batteries of your idle fancies, by ridding you from our aire, and by making this your Church inuisible to vs; smart you thus, till we complaine.

1. Canons.

2. Sinne vncensured.

The second is the plague or leprosie of sin vnshut vp and vncouered: We know that sinne is as ill as the Deuill can make it; a most loathsome thing in the eyes of God, and his Angels, and Saints: and we grant to our griefe, that among so many millions of men, there may bee found some thousands of Lepers: Good Lawes and censures meet with some, others escape: It is not so much our fault as our griefe. But that this Leprosie infects all persons, and things, is shamefully ouer-reacht: Plague and Leprosie haue their limits, beyond which, is no contagion; If a man come not neere them, if he take the wind in an open aire, they infect not: such is sinne: It can infect none but the guilty: Those which act or assent to, or beare with it, or detest it not, are in this pollution: But those which can mourne for it, and cannot redresse it, are free from infection: How many foule Lepers spiritually did our Sauiour see in the publike aire of the Iewish Church? wherewith yet hee ioyned, and his, not fearing infection so much, as gracing the remnants of their ruinous Church: Were those seuen thousand Israelites, whose knees bowed not to BAAL, infected with the Idolatry of their Neighbours? yet continued they still parts of the same Church.

Certè nullus crimen maculat nescientem. Aug. Epist. 48.

1. Reg. 19. 18.

3. Hierarchie.

But this yet exceeds: Not onely all persons, but all things: What? Our Gospell? Our Heauen, Earth, Sea? Our Bookes, Coyne, Commodities? Behold, you see the same heauen with vs, you haue no Bibles but ours: our aire in his circular motion comes to be yours: the water that washeth our Iland, perhaps washeth your hands. Our vncleane Siluer (I feare) maintaines you: Our commodities (in part) inrich your Land-Lords: and yet all things amongst vs infected: you are content to take some euill from your neighbours.

4. Seruice-booke.

The third is our blasting Hierarchie, which suffers no good thing (that is, no Brownist, no singular fancy, for what good things haue wee but yours?) to grow, or prosper amongst vs, but withers all, both bud and branch, would to God the root also. The last is a dayly Sacrifice of a Seruice-booke: an Incense, how euer vnsauoury to you, yet such as all Churches in Christendome hold sweet, and offer vp as fit for the nostrils of the Almighty; we are not alone thus tainted; all Christian Churches that are, or haue beene, present the same Censers vnto God. But ours smels strong of the Popes Portuise:

See

See whether this be any better then triuiall cauilling: If either an ill man, or a Deuil ſhall ſpeake that which is good; may not a good man vſe it? If a good Angell, or man ſhall ſpeake that which is euill, is it euer the better for the Deliuerer? If Satan himſelfe ſhall ſay of Chriſt, Thou art the Sonne of the liuing God, ſhall I feare to repeat it? Not the Author, but the matter in theſe things is worthy of regard: As Ierome ſpeakes of the poyſoned Works of Origen, and other dangerous Treatiſes, Good things may bee receiued from ill hands. If the matter of any Prayer be Popiſh, fault it for what it containes, not for whence it came: what ſay you againſt vs in this, more than Maſter Smith (your ſtout Anabaptiſt) ſaith of our baptizing of Infants? Both of them equally condemned for Antichriſtian. Still therefore we boaſt of the free and cleere aire of the Goſpell: if it bee annoyed with ſome practicall euils, we may bee ſoule, the Goſpell is it ſelfe and our profeſſion holy, neither can we complaine of all euils while we want you.

Patres veſtri non ſolum ante Cypriani tempora vel Agrippinum, ſed poſtea ſæpiſſime in eam conſuetudinem venerunt, vt quæcunque diuinæ atque legitimum in aliqua hæreſi vel ſchiſmate integrã reperirent, approbent potius quam negarent. Auguſt.

SEP.

That all Chriſtendome ſhould ſo magnifie your happineſſe (as you ſay) is much, and yet your ſelues and the beſt amongſt you, complaine ſo much both in word, and writing, of your miſerable condition, vnder the imperious and ſuperſtitious impoſitions of the Prelates, yea, and ſuffer ſo much alſo vnder them, as at this day you doe, for ſeeking the ſame Church Gouernment and Miniſterie, which is in vſe in all other Churches ſaue your owne. The truth is, you are beſt liked where you are worſt knowne. Your next neighbours of Scotland know your Biſhops Gouernment ſo well, as they rather chuſe to vndergoe all the miſerie of bonds and baniſhment, than to partake with you in your happineſſe this way, ſo highly doe they magnifie and applaud the ſame. Which choice I doubt not other Churches alſo would make if the ſame neceſſitie were laid vpon them. And for your graces, we deſpiſe them not, nor any good thing amongſt you, no more than you doe ſuch graces & good things as are to be found in the Church of Rome, from which you ſeparate not withſtanding. We haue, by Gods mercy, the pure and right vſe of the good gifts and graces of God, in Chriſts Ordinance, which you want. Neither the Lords people, nor the holy Veſſels, could make Babylon, Sion, though both the one and the other were captiued for a time.

SECTION LVI.

THat which followeth is but words, a ſhort anſwer is too much: That all Chriſtendome magnifies the worthineſſe of our Church, in ſo cleare euidences of their owne voices, you cannot denie; and now when you ſee ſuch teſtimonies abroad (leſt you ſhould ſay nothing) you fetch cauils from home: Thoſe men which (you ſay) complaine ſo much of their miſerable condition vnder the Prelates impoſitions, haue notwithſtanding with the ſame pens and tongues not onely iuſtified our Church, but extold it: you haue found no ſharper aduerſaries in this very accuſation, for which you maliciouſly cite them: How freely, how fully haue they euinced the truth? yea, the happineſſe of the Church of England againſt your falſe challenges: and yet your forehead dare challenge them for Authors. So hath their moderation oppoſed ſo neappendances, that they haue both acknowledged and defended the ſubſtance with equall vehemence to your oppoſition: neither doe they ſuffer (as you traduce them) for ſeeking another Church gouernment: looke into the Millenaries petition (the common voice of that part) I am deceiued, if ought of their complaints ſound that way, much leſſe of their ſufferings: deformitie in practiſe is obiected to them, not endeuour of innouation; That quarrell hath beene long ſilent, your motion cannot reuiue it: would God you could as much follow thoſe men in moderate and charitable carriage, as you haue out-run them in complaint.

The iudgment of our owne and our neighbours of our Church. Socrat. lib. 1. c. 4. Conſtant. Alex. & Ario. Ac tametſi vos inter vos vicißim de re quapiam nominis mouentibus diſſentitis (ſiquidem neque omnes de omnibus rebus idem ſentimus) nihilominus tamen fieri poterit, vt eximia concordia ſincerè inter vos, integreq; ſeruetur, & vna inter omnes communio & conſociatio cuſtodiatur.

It pleaſeth you to deuiſe vs, like pictures vpon courſe Canuaſſe, which ſhew faireſt at fartheſt; attributing forraine approbation (which you cannot denie) to diſtance more than to deſert. How is it then, that (beſides ſtrange witneſſes) we which looke vpon this face without preiudice, commend it, (God knowes) without flattery ? wee can at once acknowledge her infirmities, and bleſſe God for her graces : Our neighbours, (yea, our ſelues) of Scotland, know our Church ſo well, that they doe with one conſent praiſe her for one of Gods beſt daughters ; neither doe the moſt rigorous amongſt them, more diſlike our Epiſcopall Gouernment, than imbrace our Church : what fraud is this ; to flie from the Church in common, to one circumſtance ? we can honour that noble Church in Scotland, may we not diſlike their alienations of Church-liuings ? If one thing offend, doe all diſpleaſe ? Yet euen this Gouernment, which you would haue them reſiſt to bonds and baniſhment (who knowes not ?) begins to finde both fauour and place : what choice other Churches would make, as you doubt not, ſo you care not. If you regard their ſentence, how durſt you reuile her as a falſe Harlot, whom they honour as a deare Siſter ? If you were more theirs than we, you might vpbraid vs : Now you tell vs what perhaps they would doe; we tell you what they doe, and will doe : Euen with one voice, bleſſe God for England, as the moſt famous and flouriſhing Church in Chriſtendome: your handfull only makes faces, and enuies this true glory. Who yet (you ſay) deſpiſe not our graces, no more than wee thoſe of Rome : See how you deſpiſe vs while you ſay, you are free from deſpite : How malicious is this compariſon ? as if wee were to you, as Rome to vs : and yet you deſpiſe vs more : Wee grant Rome a true Baptiſme, true Viſibility of a Church, though monſtrouſly corrupted : you giue vs not ſo much : Thankes be to God, we care leſſe for your cenſure, than you doe for our Church : We haue by Gods mercy the true and right vſe of the Word and Sacraments, and all other eſſentiall gifts and graces of God ; if there might be ſome further helpes in execution, to make theſe more effectuall, we reſiſt not : But thoſe your other imaginary ordinances, as we haue not, ſo we want not : Neither the Caldeans, nor any Idolatrous enemies could make Sion Babylon, nor the holy veſſels profane ; ſo as they ſhould ceaſe to be fit for Gods vſe : but they were brought backe at the returne of the captiuity, to Ieruſalem: Such were our Worſhip, Miniſtery, Sacraments, and thoſe manifold ſubiects of your cauills, which whilſt you diſgrace for their former abuſe, you call our good euill, and willingly deſpiſe our graces.

M. Smiths retort vpon M. Clifton, p. 50.

SEP.

Where the truth is a gainer, the Lord (which is truth) cannot bee a loſer. Neither is the thankes of ancient fauours loſt amongſt them, which ſtill preſſe on towards new mercies : Vnthankfull are they vnto the bleſſed Maieſtie of God, and vnfaithfull alſo, which knowing the will of their Maſter doe it not, but goe on preſumptuouſly in diſobedience to many the holy ordinances of the Lord and of his Chriſt, which they know, and in word alſo acknowledge, he hath giuen to his Church to be obſerued, and not for idle ſpeculation, and diſputation without obedience.

It is not by our ſequeſtration, but by our confuſion, that Rome and Hell gaines. Your odious commixture of all ſorts of people in the body of your Church, in whoſe lap the vileſt miſcreants are dandled, ſucking her breſts as her naturall children, and are be-bleſt by her (as hauing right thereunto) with all her holy things, as Prayer, Sacraments, and other Ceremonies, is that which aduantageth hell, in the finall obduration and perdition of the wicked, whom by theſe meanes you flatter and deceiue.

The Romiſh Prelacie and Prieſthood amongſt you, with the appurtenances for their maintenance and miniſtrations, are Romes aduantage. Which therfore ſhe challengeth as her owne, and by which ſhe alſo ſtill holds poſſeſſion amongſt you, vnder the hope of regaining her full inheritance at one time or other. And if the Papiſts take aduantage at our condemnation of you, and ſeparation from you : it concernes you, well to ſee where the blame is, and there to lay it ; leſt through light and inconſiderate iudgement, you iuſtifie the wicked, and condemne the righteous.

SECTION

SECTION LVII.

ALL the ſequell of my Anſwerer is meerely ſententious: it is fitter for vs to learne than replie: Where the truth gaines (ſay you) God loſeth not: I tell you againe, where God loſeth, the truth gaineth not, and where the Church loſeth, God (which indowed her) cannot but loſe: Alas, what can the truth either get or ſaue by ſuch vnkinde quarrels? Surely ſuſpition on ſome hands, on others reiection: for (as Optatus of his Donatiſts) betwixt our Licet, and your Non licet, many poore ſoules wauer and doubt: neither will ſettle, becauſe we agree not: Thanks are not loſt, where new fauours are called for, but where old are denied. While your Poeſie is: Such as the mother, ſuch is the daughter; where are our old, our any mercies? They are vnthankfull, which know what God hath done, and confeſſe it not: They are vnthankfull to God and his Deputy, which knowing themſelues made to obey, preſume to ouer-rule, and vpon their priuate authoritie, obtrude to the Church thoſe ordinances to be obſerued, which neuer had being but in their owne idle ſpeculation.

The iſſue of Separation.

Inter licet veſtrum, & non licet noſtrum, nutant ac vemigant animæ Chriſtianorum. Optat. contr. Parm.

Your Sequeſtration and our confuſion, are both of them beneficiall, where they ſhould not: and as you pretend our confuſion for the cauſe of your Separation; So is your Separation the true cauſe of too much trouble, and confuſion in the Church: Your odious tale of commixture hath cloyed and ſurfeted your Reader already, and receiued anſwer to ſatiety: this one diſh ſo oft brought forth, argues your pouertie: The viſible Church is Gods Drag-net, and Field, and Floore, and Arke; here will be euer at her beſt, Sedge, Tares, Chaffe, vncleane Creatures: yet is this no pretence for her neglect: the notoriouſly euill ſhee caſts from her breſt, and knee, denying them the vſe of her Prayers, and (which your Leaders miſlike) of her Sacrament. If diuers through corruption of vnfaithfull Officers, eſcape cenſure; yet let not the tranſgreſſions of ſome, redound to the condemnation of the whole Church. In Gods iudgement it ſhall not; we care little, if in yours. Wee tell wicked men, they may goe to hell with the water of Baptiſme in their faces, with the Church in their mouthes, we denounce Gods iudgements vnpartially againſt their ſinnes, and them: Thus wee flatter, thus we deceiue. If yet they will needs runne to perdition; Perditio tua ex te Iſrael.

Non enim propter malos bonis deſerendis, ſed propter bonos mali tolerandi ſunt, &c. Sicut tolerauerunt Prophetæ, &c. Aug. Ep. 48. Barr. againſt Gyff.

Our Clergie is ſo Romiſh as our Baptiſme: If therefore Romiſh becauſe they came thence, we haue diſproued it: If therefore Romiſh, becauſe they haue beene vſed there, wee grant and iuſtifie it; That ancient confeſſion of their faith which was famous through the world, we receiue with them: If they hold one God, one Baptiſme, one Heauen, one CHRIST, ſhall we renounce it? Why ſhould we not caſt off our Chriſtendome and humanity, becauſe the Romans had both? How much Rome can either challenge, or hope to gaine in our Clergie and Miniſtration, is well witneſſed by the bloud of thoſe Martyrs, eminent in the Prelacie, which in the freſh memories of many, was ſhed for God, againſt that Harlot: and by the excellent labours of others, both Biſhops and Doctors: whoſe learned pens haue pulled downe more of the walls of Rome, than all the corner-creeping Browniſts in the world ſhall euer be able to doe, while Amſterdam ſtandeth. It is you that furniſh theſe Aduerſaries with aduantages, through your wilfull diuiſions: Take Scilurus his arrowes, ſingle out of the ſheafe, the leaſt finger breakes them, while the whole bundle feares no ſtreſſe: wee know well where the blame is, our deſeruings can be no protection to you: you went from vs, not we from you. Pleade not our conſtraint, you ſhould not haue been compelled to forſake vs, while CHRIST is with vs: But who compels you not to call vs brethren? to deny vs Chriſtians? your zeale is ſo far from iuſtifying the wicked, that it condemnes the righteous.

SEP.

And for the suspition of the rude multitude, you neede not much feare it. They will suspect nothing that comes vnder the Kings broad seale: they are ignorant of this fault. Though it were the Masse that came with authoritie of the magistrate, they (for the most part) would be without suspition of it: so ignorant and profane are they in the most places, 1 Sam. 10. 10. It is the wise-hearted amongst you that suspect your dealings, who will also suspect you yet more, as your vnsound dealing shall be further discouered.

SECTION LVIII.

The Brownists scornfull opinion of our people.

HOw scornfully doe you turne ouer our poore rude multitude, as if they were beasts, not men; or if men, not rude but sauage! This contempt needed not: These sonnes of the earth may goe before you to Heauen: Indeed it was of old said, that all Ægyptians were Physitians: So may it now of you; All Brownists are Diuines, no Separatist cannot prophesie: No sooner can they looke at the skirts of this hill, but they are rapt from the ordinarie pitch of men: Either this change is perhaps by some strange illumination, or else your learned paucitie got their skill amongst our profane and rude multitude: we haue still many in our rude multitude, whom wee dare compare with your Teachers: neither is there any so lewd and profane, that cannot pretend a scandall from your separation: Euen these soules must bee regarded (tho not by you.) Such were some of you, but yee are washed, &c.

The wise-hearted amongst vs doe more than suspect, finde out our weaknesses, and bewaile them; yet doe they not more discouer our imperfections than acknowledge our truth: If they be truly wise, wee cannot suspect them, they cannot forsake vs: Their charitie will couer more, than their wisdome can discouer.
